THE PREFACE.

THE Deſign of the following Book is to give as clear and diſtinct a View of the State and Condition of the Britiſh Churches, from their firſt Plantation to the Converſion of the Saxons, as could be had at ſo great a diſtance, and by ſuch a degree of Light as is left us concerning them. When I firſt undertook this Subject, I intended no more than an Introduction to ſomething elſe; but being entred into it, and laying the ſeveral parts of it before me, I found ſo many common miſtakes to be rectified, ſo many conſiderable parts of Church-Hiſtory, which tended to illuſtrate it, that either I muſt give a very imperfect Account of it, or ſo much exceed the proportions of a Preface, that I concluded I had better alter my deſign, and with more Pains and Materials make it an intire Work of it ſelf. To this end I laid aſide whatever related to the firſt occaſion of my undertaking it, reſerving that for its proper Place and Seaſon; and then I reſumed the conſideration of this preſent Argument, with larger and freer thoughts, and reſolved to attempt ſomething towards the reſcuing this part of Church-Hiſtory, wherein we are ſo much concerned, from thoſe Fabulous Antiquities which had ſo much debaſed the Value and eclipſed the Glory of it.

This I knew was a Work, not only of much Labour and Induſtry in ſearching and comparing good and bad Authors Printed and MS. foreign and domeſtick; but which required more than ordinary care and judgment in ſeparating the Oar from the Droſs; which being done as it ought, the queſtion might be, whether it would not fall out here as in ſome Mines, that the quantity of good Oar would be ſo ſmall as hardly to compenſate for the Pains of digging and refining it. But this was not all the difficulty to be foreſeen; for ſome Mens Eyes are ſtill ſo tender as not to be able to bear the ſtrong impreſſions of Light; eſpecially in what relates to the Antiquities of their own Countrey.

For whatever the reaſon be, of that Love Mankind do naturally bear to the Countrey they are born in, we find it ſo univerſal, that even the Laplanders and Samoyeds admire no Countrey like their own; and are impatient of any contradiction to their Fancies of the Beauties and Conveniencies of it. And it is pity to rob Men of any ſuch falſe Idea's, not entrenching upon Religion or Morality, which tend ſo much to the Eaſe and Comfort of their Lives. For, if Men will be in love with a cold Air and a barren Soil, with Ice and Mountains, with living in Caves and Hutts, and travelling upon the hardned Snow, to what purpoſe ſhould any go about to confute them, by proving that the Elyſian Fields are more pleaſant than thoſe Northern Climates? And ſo ſtrong is the Inclination that is rooted in Mankind to the Love of their Countrey, that ſome learned and witty Men, who have been born in none of the moſt tempting Climates have uſed great Art and Induſtry to repreſent them with ſuch advantage to the World, as though Paradiſe were but another Name for their Native Countrey. Of which we have a remarkable inſtance in the late Work of an ingenious Perſon, who with mighty pains hath endeavoured to prove not only that Plato's Atlantick Iſland, but

Ola. Rudbeck. Atlantic. c. 7. 23. the Elyſian Fields themſelves are to be found in one of the remoteſt Northern Countries.

And it is to little purpoſe to go about to alter ſuch Mens Opinions, which are not ſo much founded on Reaſon, as on an over bearing Paſſion for their native Soil, which hurts no other Part of the World, and makes their own ſeem more pleaſant to themſelves. Some will be apt to think, the greateſt Puniſhment to ſuch Perſons, is to let them live at Home and enjoy their own Opinions; but I rather look on it as an effect of the Wiſdom of Divine Providence to make Men contented with the Places of their Habitations: For if all Mankind ſhould love and admire one and the ſame Countrey, there would be nothing but deſtroying one another in hopes to enjoy it; whereas now, ſince the true Paradiſe is loſt, it ſeems to be moſt convenient for the World, that every Nation ſhould believe they have it at Home.

If therefore any of our Neighbour Nations ſhould think their own the richeſt, the pleaſanteſt, the fruitfulleſt Countrey in the World, I ſhould by no means think it fit to diſpute it with them, no more than I would the Wiſdom or Goodneſs of their Parents. For, however the Truth of things be, it is beſt for Children to believe well of them; and it may prove of very ill conſequence to alter a miſtaken good Opinion in them; for it makes them leſs contented, and leſs fit to be governed than before; and living under ſuch a miſperſuaſion can never do them ſo much hurt, as the unſeaſonable diſcovery of their Error doth. From hence I look on all National Quarrels as very fooliſh and miſchievous, it being reaſonable that all Perſons ſhould love their own Countrey as they do their Parents; and no Man ought to ſuffer in his eſteem for that which it was never in his Power to help. But whoſoever fixes an ill Character upon a Perſon on the account of his Countrey, makes a whole Nation his Enemies, which no wiſe Man will ever do; and whoever doth it, will one time or other ſee cauſe to repent his Folly.

But is it not poſſible for learned and ingenuous Men to enquire into and debate the ſeveral Antiquities of their Nations, without making a National Quarrel about them? In matter of Self-defence there is a Moderamen inculpatæ tutelæ to be obſerved; and ſo there ought certainly to be in the Defence of our Countrey; eſpecially when the Diſpute relates neither to the Safety, nor Profit, nor the true Honour or Eſteem of it, but only to a mere point of Antiquity; wherein wiſe and learned Men may differ from each other, that are Natives of the ſame Countrey. And theſe matters are not to be decided in the Field, nor at the Bar, nor by a majority of Voices, but depend upon the comparing of ancient Hiſtories, the credibility of Teſtimonies, and a ſagacity in ſearching, and skill in judging concerning them. It is not every one that can plead eloquently at the Bar, or quote Authors at ſecond Hand, or diſpute warmly out of common Places, that is preſently fit to judge about ſuch things; for he that takes upon him to do that ought not only to have a general skill in Antiquity and the beſt Authors, but to compare the Hiſtories and Annals, the Succeſſions and the Settlements of the Neighbour Nations together, and then with great impartiality to deliver his Judgment; but by no means to eſpouſe any particular Intereſt, as though he were retained on that ſide. Which he plainly diſcovers if he appear reſolved to maintain one ſide againſt the ſtrongeſt evidence, and to cry down the other in an ignominious and reproachful manner; as though nothing but particular Piques and Animoſities, or which is far worſe, ill Will to the Government, could lead Men into ſuch debates; nay as though it were a degree of Leſe-Majeſty, (as it is termed) to call in queſtion ſome very remote and very uncertain Traditions about the firſt

Succeſſion of the Kings of a Neighbour Nation. This I have particular reaſon to take notice of, from the uſage the very learned and judicious Biſhop of St. Aſaph hath lately met with in this kind, merely becauſe in his late excellent Book he rejects the long Succeſſion of Kings from Fergus the Son of Ferquard, and from the time of Alexander's taking of Babylon; which he doth chiefly on theſe two Grounds, 1. Becauſe he proves from good Authorities in his Book, that the Scots could not be ſo early ſettled in Britain. 2. Becauſe thoſe Scotiſh Hiſtorians who have aſſerted it are not of ſufficient Authority to be relied upon which he ſhews at large in his Preface.

Hiſtorical Account of ancient Church Government in Great Britain and Ireland.

Now upon this occaſion, His Majeſty's learned Advocate in Scotland, hath been pleaſed to think it a part of his Duty to anſwer this part of the Biſhop's Book, not without ſome kind of ſharpneſs and unhandſome Reflections on a Perſon of his Character and Merit; but none like this, That he admires that any of the Subjects of Great-Britain did not think it a degree of Leſe-Majeſty to injure and ſhorten the Royal Line of their Kings. But there is more Reaſon to admire at the ſtrangeneſs of this Accuſation, unleſs it were intended to ſhew that he could as well proſecute as write againſt the Biſhop by virtue of his Office, for diſputing their Antiquities. As though the fundamental Conſtitution of the Britiſh Monarchy were at all concerned in the Credit of Hector Boethius, for upon it, as I ſhall preſently ſhew, the main ſtreſs of this Matter doth reſt.

Letter to Lord Chancelor, p. 11.

But becauſe theſe are dangerous Inſinuations, and may as well be urged againſt ſome part of the following Book, I ſhall here make it clear how very unjuſt and unreaſonable they are. For it is not the Antiquity of the Royal Line which is in diſpute, but the Succeſſion of it in ſuch a Place; the Iriſh Antiquaries carrying the Succeſſion much farther back than Hector Boethius, or Leſly, or Buchanan do. And therefore they charge others far more with ſhortning the Royal Line, making it to begin with Fergus; when they derive it long before by a continued Succeſſion from Simon Brek, and Herimon, and Gathelos, who they ſay was but ſix Deſcents from Japhet. But if there be any degree of Leſe-Majeſty (for I am very unwilling to put theſe hard Words into proper Engliſh) in thoſe who debate any thing wherein the Honour of the Royal Line is concerned, let them clear themſelves of it, who lay the Foundation of the Monarchy in the Election of Fergus. For that is truly the ſtate of the Caſe; thoſe who contend ſo earneſtly for the Succeſſion of the Royal Line from Fergus the Son of Ferquard, placing his Title to the Monarchy in the Choice of the Heads of the Tribes; which will appear from the Words of Hector Boethius, who is in truth the main ſupport of all this Tradition.

V. Gratian. Lucium in Cambr. Everſ. p. 248, 249.

For, although Fordon doth mention the Succeſſion of many Kings from Fergus the Son of Ferquard to Fergus II. yet he profeſſes he could find nothing particular concerning them; although he quotes ſeveral Chronicles, and we are told he had the View of their Annals, ſuch as they were, of Paſly, Scoon and other Places. He names indeed 45 Kings, but he deſires to be excuſed as to the ſeveral times of their Reigns, for he had not met with them written at large, but from the time of Fergus II. he promiſeth to be very diſtinct and particular. Yet after him comes Hector Boethius, of whom the learned Advocate tells us that Eraſmus ſaid he could not lye (which comes very near to Infallibility in Matter of Fact) and he is as diſtinct and particular in the firſt Succeſſion as he is in the ſecond. From whence comes this mighty difference? Of this he informs us from Hector Boethius himſelf (and can we have a better Authority than his that could not lye?) That he had ſeveral Books from Icolmkill, which he followed in writing his Hiſtory. I cannot now enter upon the conſideration of the Authority of theſe Books, (of which afterwards) but, as far as yet appears, it depends upon the Credibility of Hector.

But that which I am now to ſhew is, that if Hector Boethius his Authority be allowed, thoſe who lengthen the Royal Line do more Injury to the Monarchy than thoſe who ſhorten it. For the firſt Account he gives of
l. 1. f. 6. it is this, " That the Scots in Britain being preſſed by the Picts and Bri-
" tains, they ſent over into Ireland for Aſſiſtance; Ferquard ſent his Son
" Fergus with Supplies; who, ſaith he, left it to the choice of the Heads " of the Tribes, what Government they would have, whether a Monarchy, " Ariſtocracy or a Commonwealth; and they pitched upon a Monarchy,
" and made Fergus their King: which he ſaith, was juſt 330 Years be- " fore Chriſt's Nativity. After which he ſets down Fergus his owning " that he received his Authority from the People; and their Fundamen-

" ved, was ingraven in Marble Tables, and then the Agrarian Law fol-
p. 6. l. 19. " low'd. And (which is very obſervable) the firſt Deſign we find laid for altering the Succeſſion of the Crown, and excluding the next Heir, is in Hector Boethius his Account of the immediate Succeſſor to Fergus the
f. 10. 2. Son of Ferquard. For notwithſtanding the binding Oath to the Poſterity of Fergus, yet immediately after his Death, he ſaith, Feritharis was cho- ſen King, although Fergus left Ferlegus his Son and Heir; and not only ſo, but a Law, ſaith he, was paſt, excluding the next Heir from any Right to Government till he attained to ſuch an Age. The effect whereof was, that Ferlegus attempting to recover his Right from Feritharis was baniſhed
f. 15. and utterly excluded. Hector himſelf confeſſes, he was at juſt Age when he demanded the Crown, but he was put by and ſeverely rebuked, quod injuſſu Patrum petiiſſet Regnum, for doing it without the Authority of the Senate; upon which they impriſoned him, but he made his eſcape and fled firſt to the Picts, then to the Britains, and after Feritharis his Death Main was choſen to ſucceed. This is the juſt and true Account of this Matter, as it is delivered by Hector Boethius, and after Leſle l. 2 p. 81. him by Leſly; who ſpeaks more plainly of Ferlegus his excluſion; ſed Fer-legum recuſavit Populus. Buchanan ſaith, that he was condemned in Buch. l. 4. p. 29 his Abſence; but he would fain reconcile this Practice to their former
p. 245. Oath; (although the Advocate himſelf ſaith, this Oath did in Law and Reaſon bind them to obey the Lineal Succeſſor according to the proximity of Blood) but Buchanan's pretence is becauſe the preſent King during the Minority of the Heir, was but a King in truſt, and the Heir at ſuch an Age was to ſucceed. But how well that was obſerved appears by this firſt Inſtance, and in truth, Hector Boethius and the reſt after him do put the whole Power as to theſe Matters, in the Hands of the People, or at leaſt of the Heads of the Clans; as will appear more afterwards.

Defence, &c. p. 110. It cannot therefore but be very ſurprizing to us to ſee his Majeſty's Advocate ſo zealouſly defending this Hiſtory of the firſt Succeſſion of their Kings, and reflecting upon a Biſhop of our Church, for calling it in queſtion. And yet he cannot deny that this Law was the Occaſion of many bloody Civil Wars between the Uncles and Nephews; and he calls it the Diſpute betwixt ſuch as were for the Crown and ſuch as were for Popular Elections. From whence it follows, That Hector Boethius his Hiſtory of the firſt Succeſſion from Fergus is to ſet up the popular Claim. And quite through that firſt Race Hector makes the ſupreme unaccountable Power in all Caſes of Male Adminiſtration to be lodged in the Heads of the People, and the Miniſterial in the Monarch.

And therefore, we ſhould have thought it had better become his Majeſty's Advocate to have overthrown ſuch pernicious Principles to Monarchy, as are contained in this account of the firſt Race of their Kings from Fergus the Son of Ferquard. And although Buchanan among the half-learned, bear the blame of theſe Antimonarchical Principles, yet it is evident that he only built on the Foundations laid by thoſe who ſet up this firſt Race, as the Advocate himſelf confeſſeth, whoſe Words are, All Buchanan's Arguments for reſtraining Kings being founded on the Authority of our Hiſtorians, who, as he ſaith, aſſert that King Fergus was firſt elected King by the People. And therefore thoſe Hiſtorians who ſet up this Succeſſion in ſuch a manner had no kindneſs to Monarchy, as appears by what Leſly himſelf ſaith about King Fergus and his Succeſſors.

Leſle. Hiſt. p. 77, 79.

It is true that the learned Advocate hath, according to his duty, publiſhed a Juſt Defence of the Monarchy of Scotland; but I muſt crave leave to ſay, that it can never be defended upon good Grounds unleſs the Account of Fergus the Son of Ferquard, and the Succeſſion of Kings from him as delivered by Hector Boethius and Leſly as well as Buchanan be rejected. And this is too plain from the Anſwers he gives to this Conſent of their Hiſtorians.

1. He ſaith, That Gathelos was not at all Elected by the People. Whither are we now carried? The Queſtion was concerning Fergus in Scotland, the Anſwer is concerning one who is ſuppoſed to have lived I know not how many Ages before him, and we know not where: And it had been to as much purpoſe to have ſaid, Adam was not choſen by the People. But who was this Gathelos? In very truth, he was no other (according to theſe Hiſtorians) than a Son of a certain King of Athens, who went into Ægypt and married Scota the Daughter of Pharaoh, who was drowned in the Red Sea, and afterwards ſettled in Portugal, from him called Portus Gatheli, (as the Advocate obſerves) from whence a Colony of that Race tranſported it ſelf into Ireland, and another into Scotland. Now, ſaith he, all thoſe who are deſcended from his Colonies were by Law obliged to obey the eldeſt Son and Repreſentative of that Royal Family. What! by the Law in King Fergus's time? For there is none ſo much as mentioned before that fundamental Contract; and was it not well kept after Fergus's Death? But if there had been any Precedent the other had been needleſs. However the queſtion is not concerning Gathelos and his Poſterity in Ireland, but Fergus and his Succeſſors in Scotland.

p. 28.

2. He anſwers, That the Heads of their Tribes acknowledged Fergus for their King. But do not theſe Hiſtorians ſay expreſly, That they choſe him, and that he left it to them to chuſe what Government they pleaſed? And the Words of Fergus in Hector Boethius are theſe, Veſtrum erit in hoc Negotio, quid utilius ad veſtram Rempublicam ſit diſcernere, noſtrum veſtra capeſſere imperia. Did ever Man more own the Supreme Authority of the People than Hector Boethius makes Fergus to do in theſe Words? Whether theſe very Words were ſpoken by him, even Hector dares not ſay; but he is ſure they were ſuch like. And afterwards he ſaith, tandem Ferguſio Regnum decernunt; And to the ſame purpoſe Leſly, Ferguſio Regnum ab omnibus decernitur. Is all this a bare Acknowledgment of him for their King? What more emphatical Words could be uſed to expreſs a free Election, and that the People gave Fergus the Power, than theſe Hiſtorians do uſe?

Leſl. Hiſt. Scot. p. 77.

3. He goes on to give a farther Anſwer, which is very remarkable in his Majeſty's Advocate, viz. that we read nothing at all of the Conſent of the People, but of the Heads of the Tribes, who had no Commiſſion from the People, each of them having by his Birth-right a Power to command his own Tribe, and conſequently the Royal Power was not derived from the People. What is the meaning of all this, but only to ſhew that the Royal Authority was not derived from the Rabble, but from the Nobility or Heads of the ſeveral Clans; and conſequently the Power of calling their Kings to account lay only in them? No, ſaith he, Fergus ſucceeded in the Right of thoſe Chiefs to command their reſpective Families. Then Fergus had no more Power, as Monarch, than the Heads of the ſeveral Clans had before. But did they, according to theſe Hiſtorians, part with their Rights of Government to Fergus and his Poſterity? By what Authority then did they take upon them to impriſon and depoſe (a) Euenus III. and ſet up Cadalanus as King? By what Authority did they take Arms againſt (b) Dardanus and ſet up Galdus, who took away his Life, communi omnium Ordinum conſenſu, ſaith Leſly? By what Authority did they aſſemble againſt (c) Lugtachus, Galdus his Son, and ſent Soldiers to diſpatch him? By what Authority did they riſe againſt (d) Mogallus his Succeſſor, with a deſign to deſtroy him, as Hector confeſſeth, which they did effectually, as Leſly agrees? How came they to take upon them to impriſon (e) Conarus and ſet up Argadus in his room? And to diſpoſe of the Government in the time of (f) Ethodius II. and according to Leſly commit him to Priſon, where he was killed? How came they, notwithſtanding the Law of Regency to ſet up (g) Athirco, while he was uncapable by it? I meddle not with thoſe Kings who were killed by ſecret Conſpiracies, nor with open Uſurpers, ſuch as Nathalocus and Donald of the Iſles; but I only ſet down what theſe Hiſtorians deliver, as to the Right and Authority which the Nobles aſſumed to themſelves in caſe of Male-adminiſtration, to ſhew that if theſe Mens Accounts muſt be received, the Heads of the Clans did not part with their ſhare in the Government ſo much, but upon occaſion they did reſume it. And therefore I have been apt to ſuſpect (from the Controverſie about Regency at the time when Hector wrote) that all this Hiſtory of the firſt Race of Kings was framed on purpoſe out of ill will to the* Monarchy, and with a deſign to advance the Power of the Nobility. And now let any true friend to the Monarchy judge, whether thoſe who ſhorten the Royal Line, or thoſe who ſo earneſtly contend for this Story of Fergus and his Succeſſors, be more liable to be charged with any degree of Leſe-Majeſty.

4. But after all, the Advocate ſaith, That Fordon, the moſt antient of their Hiſtorians affirms, That Fergus made himſelf King. Indeed Fordon doth ſay, That Fergus the Son of Ferard, (as he calls him) hearing there were many Scots in the Northern Parts of Albion, living without Order and Government, and hearing a good Account of the Countrey, he was prompted by his Ambition to go over to them, and taking with him a good number of young Men, he gathered together the diſperſed Scots, and joining them all together in the Weſtern Parts, he made himſelf King over them. Which is no improbable Account, but Fordon don ſaith not a Word of all the former Paſſages in the other Hiſtorians. And if Fordon be the moſt ancient of their Hiſtorians, what becomes of Veremundus and Cornelius Hibernicus, the two great Supporters of Hector Boethius his Hiſtory? If they were after Fordon, how came they to be ſo well inſtructed in ſo many particulars in the firſt Succeſſion, which Fordon, was wholly unacquainted with?

I cannot deny that Fordon, ſpeaking of the Coronation of Alexander III. (as he calls him) mentions an old Highlander, who in the Iriſh Tongue repeated the Genealogy of their Kings backward as far as Fergus the Son of Ferquard. But therein he comes not up to the number, either in Fordon or Hector Boethius; and hath very conſiderable differences from the Accounts either in him, or in Leſly and Buchanan. For after Fergus he leaves out Feritharis, and makes Main his next Succeſſor; the next he calls Arindal whom they call Dornadilla; his Son, Roveyn, they Nothatus; and his Rether is the ſame with their Reuther; but here they interpoſe a Reutha to make their Story agree with Bede*'s* Reuda. But this Genealogiſt next names Ther, whom they call Thereus, and his Son Roſin; but they ſay Joſina ſucceeded Thereus, being his Brother. After this, we find a greater difference, for inſtead of Finnanus, Durſtus, Euenus, Gillus, Euenus II. Ederus, Euenus III. Metellanus, Caratacus; we find there only Dethach, Jaw, Aliela, Euen, Ederskeol, Comermore; Some agreement there is, but a far greater diverſity, and Hector*'s famous* Caratacus quite omitted. Then ſucceeded Corbre, whom they call Corbred, after him Daradiamore, by them ſtiled Dardanus; then another Corbre inſtead of their Galdus; and then Luthach, Lugtacus in them; then Mogalama, their Mogallus; Coner their Conarus; Ethath their Ethodius; Fiachrath their Satrahel; then another Ethath, whom they call Ethodius II. before whom they place King Donald, in whoſe time, they ſay, Chriſtianity was firſt received in Scotland, who is utterly excluded by this ancient Genealogy. For after this Ethodius follows in it Athirkiwr, which is their Athirco, then Findachar, which is their Findocus, and ſo Nathalocus is ſhut out; and ſo after him are the two Donalds, for the next that follows is Thrinklind, whom they call Crathlintus; then Fencormach their Fincormacus, after him Romaich, their Romachus; then Eneguſſa, which is plainly their Anguſianus, and Fethelmech their Fetelmachus; then Enguſafich and Etheat, inſtead of which they put Eugenius and Ethodius his Brother; whom both make Grand-father to Fergus II. whoſe Father they call Erthus, but the ancient Genealogy and Fordon Eirch.

Now by comparing this Genealogy and Hector Boethius together, I am convinced that he did not forge all the Names of his firſt Race of Kings, between the two Ferguſſes; but yet from hence it appears, (1.) That Hector did inſert many things contrary to this ancient Genealogy; and when he did ſo he had ſome end to ſerve in it. As when he puts in Regents which the Genealogy never owns; but this was to ſupport his Law of Incapacity; but in all this Genealogy there is a direct lineal Deſcent, and when he puts in Reutha it is to anſwer Bede*'s* Reuda, and Galdus for Tacitus his Galgacus, and Caratacus for the famous Britiſh King of that Name; and King Donald to anſwer our King Lucius, that they might have a Chriſtian King in the time of the Pope next ſucceeding Eleutherius. 2. That this Genealogy may be allow'd without any advantage to the Succeſſion of Kings in Scotland, from Fergus I. ſo long before the Nativity of Chriſt; for it is very obſervable, that this ancient Genealogiſt doth very much ſhorten the Succeſſion between Fergus II. and this Alexander. For he leaves out Eugenius II. and makes Dongard to ſucceed him; after him Cobren, and then Edanius, whereas here they inſert Conſtantius I. Congallus, Conranus, Eugenius III. Convallus, Kinnatillus between Dongard and Aidanus: Scotichr. l. 4. c. 38. Buchan. l. 5. p. 45. After him he names his Son Occahebind, whom Fordon calls Eothodius-bind, which he ſaith is the ſame with Eugenius; and about him, Hector Boethius, as Buchanan obſerves, contradicts the Book of Paſly, for this ſaith, he lived in continual Wars, and the other that he enjoy'd a conſtant Peace; ſo that Boethius ſlights the Authority of their ancient Annals. Next after him they place Ferquard, of whom the Genealogy ſaith nothing at all; Fordon next to nothing. Scotichr. l. 4. c. 41. In cujus nihil actum eſt tempore, ſaith he; but the other Hiſtorians tell ſad Stories of his vicious Life and tragical End. After Eugenius in the Genealogy we c. 45. find Donewald breck, Fordon ſaith, he died after 14 Years Reign; and to him ſucceeded Ferquard his Brother's Son, not mentioned in the Genealogy; nor Malduinus Son to Donald; for the next is Ethac, i. e. Eugenius, and here they put in another Eugenius, Ambirkelethus, Eugenius VII. and Mordacus between Ethac and Ethfin, whereas the Genealogiſt makes Ethafind Son to Ethdre, to whom ſucceeded Ethas, i. e. Eugenius VIII. in their Account, after him follows Alphin; but between theſe, they have inſerted Fergus III. Solvathius, Achaius, Convallus and Dongallus. They all agree with the Genealogiſt, that Kenneth immediately ſucceeded Alphin; but then follows a wonderful difference; for here they put in no fewer than 13 Kings between Kenneth and Malcolm the Son of Kenneth, whom the Genealogiſt places next after him; then follows Duncan in all; between whom and Malcolm Canmoir they put in Machabæus. After Malcolm he takes no notice of four Kings they inſert between him and David, and where they put another Malcolm he placeth Henry, and then they agree in William, Alexander and his Son Alexander; in whom the Genealogy begins, and ſo runs backward in a lineal Aſcent.

Now it deſerves very well to be conſidered, that this ancient Genealogiſt hath ſo much ſhortned the Succeſſion as will bring the whole into a much leſs compaſs: For the modern Hiſtorians have inſerted more Kings in the ſecond Race from Fergus the Son of Erk than are contained in the Genealogy from Fergus the Son of Ferquard to Fergus II. and ſo the whole Succeſſion will ſtand within the ſame time that it now doth, from Fergus the Son of Erk.

And if the ſhortening the Royal Line be ſuch an Injury to it, as the Advocate ſuppoſeth, it is well for this ancient Genealogiſt that he lived ſo long ſince, or elſe he might have had a caſt of the Advocate*'s Office*.

Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line, p. 20, 21. Neither is the Authority of this Genealogiſt to be ſlighted by the learned Advocate, ſince himſelf giving an account how their Tradition might have been, and was preſerved, he brings this very inſtance of the Genealogy of King Alexander in the Year 1242. before Fordon's time, and related ſo by him that his Relation cannot but be credited; and ſo he repeats the beginning of it as it is in Fordon. But if he had taken the pains to compare it, he would have found how much it overthrew the Credit of their Hiſtorians. For if this was the Way their Tradition was preſerved, then by this Way, we are to judge of the Truth of their ancient Tradition; and conſequently we muſt reject thoſe Kings whoſe Names are not preſerved in this ancient Genealogy.

And to confirm this we have another ſaid to be more ancient in Fordon, p. 22. which the Advocate attributes to Baldredus, Abbat of Melros, (otherwiſe wiſe called Ealredus, Abbat of Rhieval) in his Lamentation of King David, ſoon after his death, who died A. D. 1151. But I confeſs I do not find, that Fordon attributes this Genealogy to Baldredus, for he ſaith, he had it from Walter de Wardlaw, Cardinal and the Biſhop of Glaſgow, who lived in the time of Robert II. ſaith Leſly: (which helps to diſcover Fordon*'s Age.*) And in this Genealogy the firſt part from David to Fergus is cut off with an &c. but the other part from Fergus II. up to Fergus I. is preſerved entire, and except in the ſpelling of ſome few Names, exactly agrees with the former Genealogy, leaving out all thoſe Kings which are omitted in the other. But the latter Genealogy having been corrupted before Fordon*'s time, he would not have it ſtand upon Record againſt him; which caution he forgot when he came to* Alexander III.

Leſlæ. p. 250.

But there is ſtill a third Genealogy in Fordon, which ſupplies in ſome meaſure the defects in that of King David, and it is the Succeſſion of Kenneth, the firſt Monarch of Scotland (the Picts being totally ſubdued by him) and then he makes no more between them but Alphin, and then Achai (which ſeems to be truer than the other, which calls Alphin*'s Father* Ethas) before him he places Ethfin, called Ethafind in the other; next him is Eugenius in the other Ethodac; then Dongard the Son of Donwald Breck; whereas in the other this Dongard is omitted; before Donewaldbreck in this Genealogy, is Eugenius-bind called Occahebind in the other; then Aidanus, in the other Edanus; then Gouran called there Cobren, then Dongard, and ſo we are come to Fergus the Great; and there is but one difference, i. e. about Dongard, in theſe Genealogies. And this makes but 10 Kings between Fergus and Kenneth, whereas the common Hiſtorians make 28. which is a very unreaſonable Addition to their own moſt ancient Genealogies. But if this were not done there would appear no probability, that the firſt Fergus ſhould have come into Scotland 330 Years before Chriſt's Nativity. Which the learned Advocate affirms in the very beginning of his Defence, that all their Hiſtorians are agreed on. And yet farther to confirm theſe Genealogies, he tells us he had ſeen an old Genealogy of the Kings of the Albanian Scots, agreeing with that mentioned at the Coronation of King Alexander II. and which has ſtill been preſerv'd as ſacred there, i. e. at Icolmkill, I ſuppoſe, or the Iſland Jona. But it is obſervable, that Hector mentioning the Coronation of this Alexander, takes notice of the Highlander's repeating the Genealogy by heart, and he carries it as far as Gathelos, but ſets down nothing at all of the particulars, which he knew would by no means agree with his Catalogue of Kings ſo long before Chriſt. And to confirm all theſe Genealogies, the Iriſh Genealogies in Gratianus Lucius agree with them in excluding ſo many Kings, which Hector hath inſerted to make the account of time ſeem probable. Only they make Fergus the Son of Erk to be the firſt who carried the Scots from Ireland in Albany; and the Anceſtors before to have lived in Ireland, and to have been derived from the Monarchs there.

Gratian. Luc. Cambr. Everſ. p. 248.

But when Hector Boethius found 330 Years before Chriſt pitched upon by Fordon for the Scots coming into Scotland with ſo much punctuality, that he ſaith it was in the ſixth Year of Alexander, wherein he killed Darius and took Babylon, he thought it by no means fit to omit it, but to it he adds the very Year of the World, and of the building of Rome, and how long it was after Brutus his firſt coming to Britain; which are all great Confirmations of the Truth of this Account. But Fordon quotes no Author for this wild Computation; only he ſubjoins a Paſſage out of the Legend of S. Congall, which mentions the coming of Fergus the Son of Ferquard out of Ireland into Britain, and after he mentions Rether for one of his Succeſſors, the ſame, he ſaith, with Bede's Reuda. Suppoſe all this be granted, yet what ſhadow of Proof is there, that Fergus came into Scotland ſo long before Chriſt's Nativity? Fordon confeſſes he knew not how long any of thoſe Kings after Fergus reigned; how then came he to know ſo exactly the time of their coming? What certain Note or Character of time had they to help them in their Calculation? If they could produce any ſuch, and be able to adjuſt the times of the Succeſſion of their ſeveral Kings by them, there might be a great deal ſaid for this pretended Antiquity; but when it is at the ſame time confeſſed they had no ſuch thing, how could they ſatisfie any reaſonable Enquirer into theſe Antiquities?

Hect. Boeth. l. 1. f. 7.

Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 2. n. 175.

Things ſtanding thus, and Hector Boethius with the help of his Phyſician of Aberdeen, (who, as Dempſter ſaith, was ſo very uſeful to him in framing his Hiſtory) ſet about the rectifying and curing the Body of their Antiquities; and endeavour'd to bring it into better form, and to fill up the Vacuities of it, and render it more agreeable to the Palates of that time, which had more ſmattering of Learning than in the Ages before. And ſo he begins his Hiſtory very formally in imitation of the beſt Roman Authors, with deducing their Hiſtory from Gathelos and Scota, deriving their Succeſſion from the Greeks and Egyptians, as the Romans did theirs from the Trojans. This I do not attribute to his Invention, for it is at large in Scotichr. l. 1. c. 9. Fordon; who quotes ſome old Chronicles and Legends for it; eſpecially the Legend of S. Brendan; an admirable and authentick Record. But to do right to Hector in this matter, he ſaith ingenuouſly that their People follow'd the Cuſtom of other Nations therein. Chap. 5. And as I have ſhew'd in the following Book at large (where I treat of theſe Antiquities) this humour had overſpread all the Northern Nations, as ſoon as they ſhook off the Roman Yoke, and began not only to be diſtinct Kingdoms, but to have ſome affectation of the Roman Learning, and to have Perſons of their own Nation who began to write their Hiſtories; who thought they did nothing for the Honour of their Countrey unleſs they could, ſome way or other, derive themſelves from the Trojans, or Greeks, or Egyptians, whom they met with ſo often in the Roman Authors; and the Romans in moſt Provinces mixing together with the Northern People, excited a greater Ambition in them, either to be like the Romans, or to exceed them in their pretended Antiquities. And their Inventions not being extraordinary, there is very little variety in their ſeveral Accounts, as will appear by comparing them in their proper Places.

In this point Hector Boethius hath acquitted himſelf well enough; but finding the Succeſſion of their Kings very ſhort and meagre, having no fleſh to fill it, nor nerves to ſupport it, nor colour to adorn it; therefore he ſets himſelf to make up what he found defective, and to put it together under the Names of Veremundus and Cornelius Hibernicus or others; out of theſe he frames a long Series or Catalogue of Kings, which looked big, and raiſed Mens Expectations, and ſeem'd well enough contrived to ſerve the pretence to ſo great Antiquity. This being done, he fills up the Story of theſe Kings, not out of their old Annals (as far as yet appears) but in a great meaſure out of his own Invention, ſo as to mix the Commonwealth-Learning of the Greeks and Romans with the Hiſtory of their ancient Kings. Which hath done great prejudice to the Rights of the Monarchy; for He-

Hector's Hiſtory took ſo much among the Nobility, (for very good Reaſons to them) that all that have written ſince him, have depended upon his Authority, as appears both by Buchanan and Leſly; unleſs it were where he groſly contradicted the Roman Hiſtory, and there Buchanan leaves him, but for the main of his Hiſtory he relies upon him; and Leſly doth nothing in effect but abridge him, whatever he pretends as to Records and the Annals of the Monaſteries of Paſley and Scoon; which the Advocate ſuppoſeth he ſaw at Rome, whither he ſaith they were carried. If ſo, it had been worth while to have procured well atteſted Copies from thence; which had not been hard in all this time, ſo many Gentlemen of that Nation travelling thither, and ſeeing all the Curioſities of their Libraries. But Leſly ſaith no ſuch thing; for he appeals to the Publick Archives of the Kingdom, and not to any MSS. at Rome; ſo that if they were any where, they were then in Scotland.

Leſle. Paran. ad Nobil. Scot. p. 22.
Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line, p. 39.

But the Advocate ſeems to have forgotten what he had ſaid before, viz. that the black Book of Scoon was among Preſident Spotſwood's Books; Indeed, he ſaith, King Charles I. ranſom'd it from Rome; but how that appears I know not; but I know the Circumſtances he mentions about Col. Fairfax, &c. relate not to the Book of Scoon, but to a Copy of Fordon, which was preſented by him to King Charles II. And if Buchanan had the uſe of the Books of Paſley, and the famous Book of Pluſcarden, as the Advocate believes, upon Buchanan*'s Word, then in his time they were not carried to* Rome. For my part, I do not queſtion that there were MSS. Chronicles in Scotland before Fordon; for I find him frequently citing them; but by the things he quotes out of them they were not conſiderable, nor done by any Authority, as the Annals of the Royal Monaſteries of this Kingdom, his Continuer ſaith were and afterwards examined and compared. I am ſorry to find Sir R. Sibbald reckon up among the Books he had never ſeen, (having made it his buſineſs ſo many Years to illuſtrate his Countrey) not only Cornelius Hibernicus and Veremundus, but the Annals of Paſley and Scoon: But however, we are glad that the Advocate aſſures us he hath a very old Abridgment of the Book of Paſley; and may this preſent heat againſt the Biſhop of St. Aſaph provoke them to procure and publiſh their ancient Annals, ſuch as they are, which will be the greateſt advantage to the World of this Contention about their Antiquities. And I am ſo far from any Pique or Animoſity in this matter, that I ſhould be glad to ſee thoſe Antiquities, which yet appear dark and confuſed, clear'd up to the Satisfaction of all learned and ingenuous Men.

But I muſt beg pardon of his Majeſty's Advocate, if I take the freedom to ſay, he hath not taken the right method to do it. For he ought firſt to have proved the matter in diſpute by clear and indubitable Teſtimonies, before he had made his ſevere Reflexions and Inferences; but as Cicero ſaid of the Muſician who defined the Soul to be Harmony, ab Arte ſua non receſſit, ſo this ingenious Gentleman hath managed this whole debate in a way more agreeing to the Character of an Advocate than of an Antiquary. For why ſo many Inſinuations, as though ſome Injury were intended to the Royal Line, which I dare ſay, the Biſhop of St. Aſaph doth really honour and eſteem as much as his Majeſty's Advocate himſelf. For, doth any Man of Underſtanding think that it is any Injury to the Royal Line of Britain to have the fabulous Antiquities of Geoffrey of Monmouth, concerning the Succeſſion of Britiſh Kings down from Brutus confuted? And is not this done by Buchanan? And the Advocate in plain Engliſh ſaith, thoſe tempt Men to lye who endeavour to derive themſelves from the Trojans.

jans. But why not, as well from the Greeks and Egyptians? But the Biſhop of St, Aſaph is ſo juſt to Truth, and ſo little a Friend to popular Fables, that he fairly gives up Geoffrey before he attacks Hector Boethius; could any thing be more fairly and impartially done? or more convincing, that he only deſigned to find out Truth in theſe Matters, without regard to that fondneſs ſome Men ſtill have for theſe Britiſh Antiquities? For there are and will be ſome (and thoſe not wholly unlearned) who are naturally inclined to believe Fables; and have ſo paſſionate a Zeal for ſuch things, that they cry out upon all Diſcoveries of this kind, as Injuries to their Countrey, if not to the Royal Line.

But may it not juſtly ſeem ſtrange, that when our polite and learned Neighbours have endeavoured with ſo much care to reform their Hiſtories, and to purge away all fabulous Antiquities out of them; we of this Iſland ſhould grow angry and impatient when any undertake ſo generous a Deſign? What Injury is it thought to be to the Royal Line of France, that Hunibaldus his Antiquities find no longer place in their Hiſtories? And yet nothing ſeems more glorious, than to have their Royal Line deduced long before the time that Alexander took Babylon. For according to Hunibaldus his Account, which he took he ſaith out of an ancient MS. of Vaſtaldus (ſuch another Author as Veremundus) the Franks went from Troy under the Conduct of Francio towards the Palus Mœotis *juſt about the time that Æ*neas went for Italy, where they fixed, and built the City Sicambria, and at laſt removed into Germany under Marcomir the Son of Priamus, and Sunno the Son of Antenor. After Francio, Hunibaldus ſets down a formal Succeſſion of Kings of two ſeveral Races, 16 in the firſt, and 31 in the ſecond. All which he gives a very particular account of, as to the times of their Reign for above 413 Years before Chriſt's Nativity. And although this ancient Succeſſion of Kings was a long time received and magnified, Scotichr. l. 3. c. 19 as appears by Lazius and P. Æmilius, and Fordon quotes Sigebert for it; yet now their learned Hiſtorians are aſhamed to mention it, much more to plead for it, and to charge thoſe with a degree of Leſe-Majeſty who call it in queſtion.

Suffr. Petr. de Origine Friſiorum, l. 3. c. 2. Suffridus Petrus hath written the Antiquities of Friſeland much in the way that Hector Boethius hath done thoſe of Scotland. He tells a very grave Story concerning a Province in the Indies called Freſia, from whence a Colony was ſent under Friſo, Saxo and Bruno, who went into Alexander*'s Army; and for this he quotes old* Friſian Rythms, and one Patrocles, an old Indian Writer; and beſides, he hath all the Advocate's Common c. 3. Places of Tradition, common Fame, the Teſtimonies of their own Hiſtorians, and he names Andreas Cornelius, (it ſeems there was a Cornelius Friſius as well as Hibernicus) Solco Fortemannus, Occo Scherlenſis, Joh. Ulleterpius, and ſeveral others, who with one Conſent deliver theſe Anti- c. 4. quities. But, ſaith he, ye will object, That in ſo long a time and amidſt ſo many Wars ſuch Antiquities could hardly be preſerved. To that he anſwers, "That Friſo being admirable skilled in Greek Learning ſet up a "publick School at Stauria near the Temple of Stavo, and in the Temple "a Library on purpoſe for Antiquities (like that of Icolmkill) and be-"ſides a Palace was built by Uffo, wherein was contained the Effigies of "all the Kings from Friſo, (who came to Friſeland juſt 313 Years be-"fore Chriſt's Nativity) to the time of Charlemagn, for 1113 Years. And are not theſe Antiquities very well atteſted? Yet ſince Ubbo Emmius hath confuted them, no learned Advocate hath appeared in vindication of them.

Is it any diſparagement to the Royal Line of Spain to have the firſt Succeſſion of Kings there diſputed; viz. from Jubal to Melicola the 24th King from him, who is ſaid to have reigned there, the very Year after the deſtruction of Troy? So very punctual are the Authors of fabulous Antiquities. And if you believe them, they have good ancient Authors and the Tradition of their Countrey for them; hæc noſtri Majores multis Libris tradiderunt, ſaith the pretended Beroſus. And by theſe helps, we have great light given us into the Antiquities of Europe; for thereby we underſtand that Janus, (who was ſomewhat elder than Gathelos, being Noah himſelf) gave Tuyſco the Countrey from the Tanais to the Rhyne, Italy to Gomer, the Celtick Provinces to Samothes, and Celtiberia to Jubal. And this was juſt 131 Years after the Flood; Gomer went into Italy the 10th Year of Saturn the Father of Jupiter Belus; in the 12th Jubal went into Celtiberia, and not long after Samothes, called Dis, founded the Celtick Colonies; among which were the Britains, and from him their Druids were called Samothei: After Jubal among the Celtiberians reigned Iberus his Son, from whom came the Name of Iberi; and among the Celtæ, Magus the Son of Samothes in the 51ſt Year of Ninus, who ſucceeded Jupiter Belus: This Magus in the Scythian Language is Magog, and from him came ſo many terminations of the Names of Towns, as Rhotamagum, Noviomagum, Juliomagum, Cæſaromagum, &c. In the 34th of Semiramis, Jubelda Son of Iber, ſucceeded in Celtiberia; in the time of Ninias, Son to Semiramis, reign'd Sarron among the Celtæ, from him the learned Gauls were called Sarronidæ, the ſame I ſuppoſe with our Advocate's Sanachies. In the 20th of Arius, Brigus reigned in Celtiberia, p. 14. and in the 29th Dryius among the Celtæ; nothing can be more natural than to derive the Druids from him: Who being converted, the Advocate tells us, became their firſt Monks, and in the Iriſh Verſion of p. 13. the New Teſtament the Wiſe-men are tranſlated Druids; therefore the Druids were originally Iriſh. In the time of Aralius, the ſeventh King of Babylon, Bardus was King over the Celtæ; and he was the Inventor of Muſick and Verſes; and from him came the Bards, who were the Poets of their Traditions, as the Advocate ſtyles them. After him ſucceeded p. 14. Longo, then Bardus junior, after him Lucus, and then Celtes, and Galates, Narbon, Lugdus, Beligius, Allobrox, Romus, Paris, Lemannus, Galatas junior, and Francus.

Muſt we allow all theſe noble Antiquities for fear of ſhortning the Royal Lines of the Princes of Europe? And yet here is a great appearance of exactneſs, a pretence to ancient Records, and to the common Tradition of the ſeveral Countries; for Beroſus appeals both to Tradition and Writing; and ſo doth Manetho in the continuation of him, quæ ex noſtris Hiſtoricis vel eorum relationibus conſecuti ſumus; ſo that here we have the two Supporters of Antiquities, which the Advocate builds upon, viz. Tradition and Records. And Metaſthenes, another pretended continuer of Beroſus ſaith, he took all out of the Royal Library at Suſa, where the Perſian Annals were preſerved. But notwithſtanding all theſe fair ſhews and ſpecious pretences, there is not a Man of tolerable judgment in Europe, who would venture his Reputation to plead for theſe Antiquities.

But the learned Advocate ſaith, That their Antiquities have been re- p. 2. ceived with great Applauſe for many hundreds of Years by all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks of other Nations who had any occaſion to take notice of their Affairs. Theſe are very high Expreſſions, and argue a good aſſurance in the very beginning of his Book. For my part, I do not pretend to acquaintance with all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks for many hundreds of Years; and ſo there may have been ſome, for any thing I know, who have applauded their Hiſtories from 330 Years before Chriſt; but upon my little knowledge in Books, I dare venture to name him ten who have applauded the Antiquities of Beroſus and Manetho, for one who hath allowed theirs. But ſuch hath been my Misfortune that I have met with Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks, who have been far from applauding them; ſuch a one was * Ubbo Emmius, who declares his Opinion freely, " That he could not allow any Certainty " in them, becauſe they depend not upon any ancient " Annals, but unwritten Traditions; and he not " only ſpeaks thus of the firſt Succeſſion of Kings " from Fergus I. to the ſecond, but from Fergus II. " to the deſtruction of the Picts by Kenneth, which " he reckons Anno Dom. 829. But another of the ſame Character, both an Hiſtorian, Antiquary and Critick, viz. † M. Zuerius Boxhornius hath paſſed a ſevere Cenſure upon them, for he ſaith, Without doubt their Antiquities are Fabulous; and their pretended ancient Annals but lately made. Theſe may ſerve at preſent, to ſhew that all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks have not ſo much applauded their Antiquities.

But this is not all, for the Advocate ſaith, They have done it for many hundreds of Years. What! before they were known to the World? For Hector Boethius was the firſt Perſon who pretended to give ſuch a clear Account of them after the Diſcovery of Veremundus and Cornelius Hibernicus at Icolmkill; and it is not many hundreds of Years ſince he wrote, his Book being firſt printed ſince the beginning of the ſixteenth Century. And what account had they of their firſt Antiquities before? Joh. Major indeed was printed about five Years before him, by the ſame Badius Aſcenſius, and he was no great Critick, but a very Scholaſtick Hiſtorian, and a Man of great eſteem in his time, as the Advocate confeſſeth; Defence, &c. p. 37. but he is ſo far from applauding the remote Antiquities of his own Countrey, that he calls the Story of Gathelos and Scota and their coming out of Greece and Egypt a mere Figment, and invented only to match the Britains, who derived themſelves from the Trojans, Joh. Major, Hiſt. Scot. l. 1. f. 17. c. 9. and he condemns their Annals about Simon Brek; which ſhews what a regard he had to their Authority. c. 11. And when he comes to Fergus he ſets down the old Verſes about the time of it; but ſeems to give very little credit to them; for he firſt mentions Bede's Account about Reuda, and then relates what their Annals ſay, i. e. their old Verſes (for he quotes no other) and then ſaith this doth not contradict Bede; for ſaith he, Regni debile fundamentum Ferguſius jecit; he laid a very ſlender beginning of a Monarchy, which was after inlarged by Reuda, whom he makes to be Rether, and therein contradicts Hector's Veremundus and the Catalogues of their Kings, according to which Reuda ſucceeds him. So that theſe Antiquities were ſo far from being univerſally received abroad that they went down very hardly at home. And this ſame Hiſtorical School-man expreſly ſaith, l. 4. c. 17. that Fergus had no other Right, but what the People gave him; and that it is in their Power to take it away; which he not only aſſerts, but endeavours to prove in a Scholaſtick manner as far as Septimò & Finaliter. And is not this a degree of Leſe-Majeſty above the endeavouring to ſhorten the Royal Line? Surely they had far better deny any ſuch Perſon as Fergus, than to make him a King upon ſuch terms, which overthrow the Monarchy.

* Hoc ſolum judicamus, quæ de Scotis & eorum Regibus ab anno 330 ante caput æræ Chriſtianæ, cum Alexander Macedo rerum potiretur in Oriente uſque ad Ferguſium 2. Regem Scotiæ quadrageſimum, cujus initium conjicitur à Scotis Scriptoribus in annum Chriſti 404. qui ejectos è Britannia Scotos dicitur reduxiſſe, non ex annalibus vetuſtis vetuſtos autores habentibus, ſed ex ἀγράφοις traditionibus à recentoribus deprompta memorantur, ea nos pro certis habere non poſſe Scimus enim quam lubrico atque inſtabili fundamento nitantur. Quinimo ne iſta quidem ſatis certa nobis videntur, quæ à Ferguſii 2. initio, & Scotorum reditu in Britanniam in rebus Scoticis recitantur ad A. D. 829. quo Picti ſcribuntur in Britannia à Scotis eſſe deleti 6. ſcil. anno Kenethi 2. Regum hujus gentis, ut Traditiones habent LXIX. Ubb. Em. Rer. Chronolog. l. 5. p. 198.

But who are theſe foreign Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks, who at any time have ſo much applauded theſe Antiquities? Joſeph Scaliger did indeed applaud his own Wit for his Criticiſm about Scoto-Brigantes in Seneca*'s Verſes. But what is this to* Fergus his coming ſo ſoon into Scotland? For Scaliger himſelf there grants, that theſe Scoto-Brigantes were ſtill in Ireland; and he believes that Claudius did make an attempt upon them there, becauſe Juvenal mentions the Coaſts of Juverna as brought under the Roman Power. Scalig. in Tibull. l. 4. Scoti ſunt in Hibernia adhuc, non in Britannia, are Scaliger*'s own Words. And I wonder to ſee* Buchanan labour ſo hard about this Paſſage, to ſo little purpoſe. Buch. l. 2. p. 22. 2. But the Advocate ſaith, that the ſame Scaliger in his Notes on Euſebius, hath a moſt learned and full Proof of their Antiquity, too learned to be anſwered by any Adverſary. Defence of the Antiquity, &c. p. 80. What doth he mean by their Antiquity? That of the Nation? No one denies it. That of their ſettlement in Scotland 330 Years before Chriſt? That is to be proved, for Scaliger doth it not. He affirms, "That "the Brigantes were a People of Ireland, and that during the flouriſhing "of the Roman Empire, they made frequent Incurſions into Britain, and "for proof he brings the Teſtimony of Pauſanias about Antoninus his beat- "ing the Brigantes in Britain; and the Inſcriptions in Scotland, wherein "mention is made of the Leg. 2. which ſignifie very little to this purpoſe. Scalig. in Euſeb. n. 2060. Pauſan. in Arcad. For why could not the ſecond Legion fight againſt the Brigantes, ſuppoſing them to be Britains, as well as ſuppoſing them to be Iriſh? But Scaliger*'s Opinion was this,* "The Brigantes and the Britains were two diſtinct Peo- "ple; while they continued at home, they were called by no other Name, "but when they made excurſions abroad, then they were called Scoto-bri- "gantes and Scoto-britanni; and ſo the Word Scot, he ſaith, is not a "proper Name, but Appellative; and not Iriſh but Britiſh, for thoſe who "go from home in hopes of Booty, as the Names of Bedwin and Saracen; "and ſo as the Arabs were after called Saracens; ſo theſe Brigantes, when "they ſo much infeſted Britain in Claudian*'s time, and after were called* "Scoti. Now what there is in all this, that ſhould ſo much pleaſe the Advocate, I cannot imagine. He is very angry with the Biſhop of St. Aſaph for repreſenting their Anceſtors as a company of barbarous Pilferers and Robbers (although he only produces the Teſtimony of Gildas) how then comes he to be ſo much pleaſed with Scaliger, who makes the Name Scot to ſignifie ſo much? Defence, &c. p. 104, 106, 108. I had thought he ſhould have been more concerned to have diſproved ſuch a reproachful Etymology than to have magnified this Diſcourſe of Scaliger ſo highly. But where is it that he mentions the firſt Succeſſion of their Kings with approbation, or Fergus his coming into Scotland before Chriſt's Nativity? All that he ſaith is, That the Scots "might be a Nation before they were known by that Name, (and who doubts it) "as the Burgundians and Lombards were; and that the Bri- "gantes out of Ireland might make inroads and excurſions into Britain in the flouriſhing times of the Empire. And I ſee no reaſon to deny this, although it be not ſufficiently proved. But the queſtion is about a ſtanding Monarchy in Scotland from the time of Fergus I. and of this Scaliger ſaith not a Word. For theſe Brigantes coming out of Ireland, land, might fix there for ſome time, and return again to Ireland, as Gildas ſaith they did afterwards, or they might fix as a ſcatter'd People not united under a Monarchy, as Fordon ſaith, they did before Fergus his coming. So that if their Antiquities be no more applauded by other Antiquaries and Criticks than they are by Scaliger, this Argument will come to very little.

Defence, &c.p.126. And yet Salmaſius and the reſt he mentions, ſay much leſs than Scaliger; Salmaſius only uſeth Scaliger's Criticiſm about the Scoto-Brigantes without adding any thing. Lipſius unhappily calls Galgacus a Scot; which was an improper expreſſion, as I have proved in the proper place; becauſe it is ſo evident from Tacitus, that the Caledonians were not Scots; unleſs it be taken for Scythians, (of which afterwards) but by Scots here we mean ſuch as came out of Ireland to ſettle in Britain; and ſuch Galgacus and Hiſt. de grand. Chemins, l. 1. c. 10. n. 9. his Soldiers were not. And the like impropriety Bergier, though a learned Antiquary, fell into, when he interprets the Caledonians by Scots; but ſuch as Dempſter is frequently guilty of, when he calls the Britains Engliſh, becauſe the Engliſh dwelt in Britain afterwards. But improper Expreſſions, where they fall from learned Men by chance, ought rather to be paſſed over with ſilence than made uſe of as Arguments; unleſs thoſe who uſe them go about to prove what is implied in them. Sigonius his Name ſtands among the reſt, being indeed a learned Hiſtorian, Antiquary and Critick; but not one Word can I find produced out of him in his whole Book. What Baronius ſaith relates to the Converſion of the Scotiſh Nation, and not to theſe Defence, &c.p.107. 1108. Antiquities; of which I have treated at large in the following Book. Andr. Favin and P. Æmilius ſpeak only of an Alliance between Achaius King of the Scots and Charles the Great; and what is this to Fergus and the Succeſſion of Kings for 330 Years before Chriſt's Nativity? Which he p. 2. 10. ſaith in the beginning was applauded by all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks, and as though this were not extravagant enough, he ſaith after- p. 126. wards, that Baronius, Scaliger, Salmaſius, Lipſius, Sigonius, Favin and others of the firſt Rank (too many to be named) have paſſionately defended their Antiquity, and not only ſuſtained but praiſed their Hiſtories. Whereas not one of theſe produced by him ſpeaks any thing to the matter in queſtion. But we hope to ſee theſe things better cleared in the third Part of Sir R. Sibbald's Scotia Antiqua, where he has promiſed to give a particular account of the State of the Scots in Britain before they had Kings, then under Kings from Fergus I. to Fergus II. and from thence to Malcolm Canmore. If he doth clear theſe Parts of their Antiquities, he will do a great thing; and for my part, I ſhall be as willing to believe Fergus to have come into Britain in the time of Alexander as any time after, provided there be ſufficient Evidence to prove it; which muſt be ſomewhat more convincing than his Majeſty's Advocate hath been pleaſed to make uſe of; but I remember Scaliger's Cenſure of Claudian, addit de ingenio quantum deeſt materiæ.

Therefore from the Teſtimony of Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks, I proceed to examine the Argumentative part of his Book; and ſetting aſide all common Places about Hiſtorical Certainty, Tradition, common Fame, &c. I ſhall keep cloſe to the Point before us, and examine the force and ſtrength of his Reaſoning, which conſiſts in theſe things.

p. 6. (1.) That upon the ſame Reaſon we queſtion their Antiquities, we may call in queſtion the Roman, Jewiſh, Greek, French, Spaniſh Antiquities, all which depended upon Tradition without Records for a long time.

This is indeed a material Objection; for we ought not to give a partial Aſſent to ſome Antiquities, and deny it to others, if there be the ſame ground either to give or deny Aſſent to all. But this muſt be examined.

(1.) As to the Roman Antiquities, he cites a paſſage in Livy, in which he ſaith, that the uſe of Letters was not then ordinary; the only certain preſerver of the memory of things paſt (ſo Livy's Words are to be underſtood, raræ per ea tempora Literæ, una cuſtodia fidelis memoriæ rerum geſtarum, and not as the Advocate with too much art, hath tranſlated them, that the beſt Records were the faithful Remembrance of things paſt. For if this were Livy's meaning why doth he complain of the want of the common uſe of Letters, when he ſaith, Tradition is the beſt way to preſerve the memory of things? Which is to make Livy ſpeak inconſequently.) But he goes on, ſaying, that what Memorials were left by the High Prieſts, or were in publick or private hands were moſt part deſtroyed in the burning of the Town. He doth not ſay all were loſt, but the moſt part. This Livy alledgeth to excuſe the ſhortneſs and obſcurity of his firſt Books for want of ſufficient Records; and he ſpeaks like a very judicious Hiſtorian in it. And when he gives an Account of the remote Antiquities of Rome, he is far from confident aſſerting them; but he ſpeaks with great Modeſty and Diſcretion about them; ſaying, “That he would neither affirm nor deny them; being rather built on Poetical Fables than any certain Monuments of Affairs at that time, that an allowance muſt be made to Antiquity; which was wont conſecrare Origines ſuas, to make their beginnings as ſacred and venerable as they could. But as to ſuch things he would be no Advocate either for or againſt them. Then he proceeds to deliver the common Tradition about Æneas his coming into Italy, and Aſcanius ſucceeding him; but he cannot tell whether Aſcanius the Son of Creuſa, or another the Son of Lavinia; quis enim rem tam veterem pro certo affirmet? Who can be certain in ſuch remote Antiquities? And yet at that time it was thought a great diſparagement to the Royal Line, to have it queſtion'd whether it were the elder Aſcanius, becauſe the Julian Family, as Livy there ſaith, derived themſelves from him who was called Iulus. It is true, Livy after this, relates the Roman Antiquities down to the burning of the City, when ſo many Records were loſt; but we are to conſider, that the Romans had certain Annals before that time, and that ſome of them were preſerved, That they had Annals both publick and private appears by Livy's own Words, who mentions both the Commentarii Pontificum and the publica & privata monumenta; and Cicero affirms, that the Romans from the beginning had Annals made up by the Pontifex Maximus of the tranſactions of every Year; and theſe were publickly expoſed in a Table in his Houſe that the People might be ſatisfied about them; and theſe he ſaith were called Annales Maximi; which he adds were continued down to the time of Mucius Scævola, who was Pontifex Maximus about A. U. C. 623. Theſe, as Servius ſaith, were after made up into 80 great Books, and were the ſtanding Monuments of their Antiquities. And it is obſervable that the Author of the Book de origine Gentis Romanæ, as Voſſius and others take notice, inſerts ſeveral things as taken out of the Pontifical Annals which hapned before the building of Rome; from whence they do juſtly infer, that matters of more remote Antiquity were put into them, whether by the firſt Pontifex Max. in Numa's time or after it is impoſſible now to determine. It ſeems at firſt the People were not permitted to view theſe Annals, as Canuleius in Livy complains; but afterwards they were expoſed to all. And it appears

c. 20. for the ſame purpoſe with the Annales Maximi, but compoſed by the Magiſtrates ) were preſerved in Æde Monetæ, and in them the Names of the Magiſtrates were inſerted; and in the ſame place Livy takes notice of the Annales priſci, and the Libri Magiſtratuum for determining a Point about the Conſuls of a Year long before the burning of Rome; which ſhews that Livy did not think all their Records then deſtroyed. And afterwards
c. 20. he ſaith in the ſame Book, diſputing about another Conſul, that Auguſtus rebuilding the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, found there in thorace linteo the name of that Conſul. So that the Romans had not only the Pontifical Annals but Civil too, being made up by the Magiſtrates, and therefore called Libri Magiſtratuum by Livy, which he diſtinguiſhes from the Annales In Bruto, Priſci. And beſides theſe Livy mentions private Records among them; of
c. 16. which Cicero ſpeaks, which belonged to particular Families: and there is no probability theſe ſhould be all loſt in the burning of the City; for the Capitol was not burnt, in which probably after the Romans found the Gauls coming upon them, they preſerved their ancient Annals. And it is conſiderable, Dionyſ Antiq. Rom. l. 1. that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus quotes a paſſage of Antiochus Syracuſanus, (who lived before the burning of Rome, and wrote concerning the affairs of Italy) wherein he ſaith, that he took his Hiſtory out of ancient and undoubted Records; which ſhews that there were certain written Annals both at Rome and in other Cities of Italy very early; and
l. 2. the ſame Dionyſius quotes the Domeſtick Annals of the Sabins, and Feſtus Feſt. v. Roma. the Hiſtory of Cuma. So that the Roman Hiſtories were built on better foundation than the very uncertain Tradition of the Natives; which
p. 7. the Advocate is pleaſed to make the ſureſt Foundation of all Hiſtories; but I am ſo much of another Opinion, that I think it (ſince the ſhortening of Mens Lives) the certain foundation of none. Let now the Reader judge whether the caſe of the Antiquities in diſpute be the ſame with that of the Romans; for here are no ancient Annals pretended near the time of Fergus I. nor in the time of any King of the firſt Race; no nor from Fergus II. till after the Deſtruction of the Picts; nor any Record yet produced for a long time after that; how then can any Perſons pretend that if we reject their Antiquities we muſt reject the Roman?

But this is not all, for he goes higher, and ſaith the ſame Objections will lie, p. 6. (2.) Againſt the Jewiſh Antiquities. For ſaith he, the Jewiſh Hiſtory had no hiſtorical Warrant for the firſt 2000 Years but Tradition, and after that time their Tranſactions were mentioned in very few foreign Hiſtories; and Annals of their own Prieſts were thought good Hiſtorical Foundations in the Opinion of Joſephus even for the Sacred Hiſtory.
And not long after he ſaith, that the Jewiſh Hiſtory was challenged
p. 9. by Appion upon the ſame ground that theirs is now quarrell'd by the Biſhop
p. 132. of St. Aſaph. This looks ſomewhat ſtrange among us, for the Antiquities of any particular Nation ſo far ſhort of the Jewiſh, to be parallell'd with them in point of Credibility; ſince the Records of Scripture are own'd to be divine and ſacred, and not merely built on the authority of Tradition, or the Annals of the Jewiſh Prieſts. Whatever Joſephus or other Jews might ſay in defence of their Antiquities againſt the Greeks, we that own our ſelves to be Chriſtians ought to look on Moſes and the Prophets under a higher Character. I know a late Critick in great Vogue among ſome, hath endeavoured to reduce the Sacred Hiſtory to the Authority of the ancient Annals of the Jews, but withall adding that we have only ſome imperfect Abridgments of them, much like that which the Rector of Ranfrew made of the Book of Paſley, which the Advocate ſaw in Sir R. Sibbald's Library. p. 32, 33. A Doctrine ſo unreaſonable and miſchievous in the Conſequences of it, that I wonder it hath hitherto paſſed ſo eaſily through ſo many hands. But this is not my preſent buſineſs. I am now only to ſhew the vaſt diſparity of theſe Antiquities in queſtion, and thoſe of the Jews. It's very true that Appion did object againſt them, becauſe the Greek Writers took ſo little notice of them. But how doth Joſephus anſwer him? He ſhews, "That the Greeks were very late Writers of Hiſtory, and therefore incompetent Judges of matters of ſo great Antiquity; and he proves that the more ancient Nations as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians had a moſt laſting way of preſerving their Hiſtories, for they had publick Annals made by their wiſeſt Men, and kept in ſacred Places, but the Greeks were very defective in thoſe things; having no publick Writings in their Temples or elſewhere; and that they had not the uſe of Letters in the time of the Trojan War; and their firſt Hiſtorians were little elder than the Perſians War againſt the Greeks. And this reaſon he gives of the diſſonancy of the Greek Hiſtorians, becauſe they had no publick Annals, which would have prevented Errors, and kept Men from a power of deceiving. But great care, he ſaith, from the moſt ancient times was taken of ſuch things among the Egyptians and Babylonians. And for their Anceſtors, he ſaith they exceeded all others in their exactneſs this way, committing the care of theſe things to their High Prieſts and Prophets. But the authority of Writing was not allow'd promiſcuouſly to all, but certain Prophets were pitched upon who wrote the moſt remote Antiquities by divine Inſpiration, and the matters in their own times plainly and according to Truth; and therefore, ſaith he, we have no ſuch multitude of Books differing from each other, as the Greeks have, but only 22, containing on Account of all times paſt, written with great Fidelity and Authority. Afterwards their Annals were continued, but not with equal Authority, the Succeſſion of their Prophets failing. And to ſhew of how great credit theſe Books (of the firſt ſort) are among us; in ſo long time, ſaith he, no Man hath dared either to add, or to take away, or to tranſpoſe any thing. Which is utterly inconſiſtent with the Principles of the late Critick; for without a liberty of abridging and tranſpoſing, and inſerting his new Inventions come to nothing. But as to the ſilence of other Nations about them, he ſhews, "That they were a People who lived in a great Retirement, that the Romans themſelves were a conſiderable People before the Greeks knew them; and after all he ſhews they were known to the Egyptians, Babylonians and Greeks, which he proves from many particular Teſtimonies. Now what is there parallel to theſe things in the preſent caſe? Have they produced any ſuch publick and ſacred Annals, written and preſerved with ſo much care, as the ancient Jews had? Have they had a Succeſſion of Prophets among them whoſe Books are preſerved to this day with great Veneration without addition or diminuetion? What mean then ſuch ſtrange Compariſons? Can they produce any one Author contemporary with Fergus I. and his Succeſſors, who mention that Succeſſion? As Joſephus brings the Egyptian, Phœnician, Chaldean Writers to atteſt the Story of the Scripture.

(3.) As to the Greek Antiquities, he ſaith, the Greeks could have no Records for many hundreds of Years before they wrote. p. 7. And what follows, but that therefore there is great uncertainty in the Antiquities of Greece till that time? For which reaſon Varro, that great and judicious Antiquary rejected two Parts in three, of the Times of the Greeks; the Cenſor. de die Natali, c. 21.

one he ſaid was wholly in the dark for want of Records, and the other Fabulous; becauſe, as Joſephus obſerves, they had no publick Annals, but their firſt Writers were Poets, who minded to write rather things entertaining than true. But we are of late told, that this ſaying of Varro might hold as to the Greek Antiquities; but it is unjuſtly applied by Camden to the Antiquities of other Nations; for the utmoſt Eaſtern Nations the Chineſes, and the utmoſt Weſtern, the Iriſh have preſerved their Antiquities far beyond the time which Varro allows for true Hiſtory. I grant Varro intended this chiefly for the Greeks, who made the greateſt noiſe with their Antiquities then; and yet Varro himſelf, as St. Auguſtine tells us, began his account of the Roman Antiquities, with the Succeſſion of the Sicyonian and Athenian Kings; not as though he would deliver it for certain Hiſtorical Truth, but as the moſt common received Opinion. And in the Fabulous Times, he might endeavour to pick out what Antiquities he thought came neareſt to Hiſtory. As to the Chineſes, they are very remote from us, and we have had different accounts of them, as appears by comparing Gonſales Mendoza and Martinius together; and of their Antiquities as delivered by the former, a learned Man hath ſaid, that they ſeem to him like Manetho's Egyptian Dynaſties. However Scaliger thought fit to inſert the Succeſſion of their Kings in his Chronological Canons, and makes the beginning of that Empire coincident with the end of the thirteenth Egyptian Dynaſty; but in his Notes upon it, he complains of the want of farther information about them. Which the World hath ſince in great meaſure received by Martinius, both in his deſcription of the Countrey, and the firſt Decad of the Hiſtory from the beginning of the Empire to the Nativity of Chriſt. But their way of preſerving Antiquities was peculiar to themſelves, and therefore theſe cannot very well be made a Parallel for the Scotiſh or Iriſh Antiquities. Martinius hath indeed given a very plauſible account of the remote Antiquities of China, but in ſuch a manner, as ſhews that even the Chineſes had a dark and fabulous time as well as the Greeks, and he tells us, that themſelves acknowledge that before the Reign of Fohius they have no certain account of things becauſe then they had no uſe of Letters; but afterwards, they look upon the Succeſſion of their Kings as delivered down to them with great Fidelity. But there are two things this certainty of their Hiſtory depended upon. (1.) A fixed Rule for the computation of Times, without which it is impoſſible any Nation ſhould have an exact account of the ancient Succeſſion of their Kings. And herein lay the great accuracy of the Chineſes that they were very early given to the finding out the beſt methods for Calculation; and they uſed a Cycle of 60 Years, 2670 Years before Chriſt's Nativity; and therefore Martinius magnifies the Chineſes, eſpecially for their Skill and Exactneſs in the Succeſſion of their Princes; which it is impoſſible to give a certain account of without a fixed meaſure of time; and therefore it hath been ſo often ſaid, that the Greeks had no certain Hiſtory before the Olympiads. (2.) The Chineſes did not ſuffer any Perſons to write Hiſtory that would, but ſome of great Reputation were appointed after the Emperor's deceaſe to write his Life; which being approved, was allowed as the only authentick Hiſtory of him, and theſe being put together made up their publick Annals, which are preſerved to this day. For, notwithſtanding the Perſecution of their Hiſtories in the time of Chingus, who endeavoured to ſuppreſs them, that he might be thought the Founder of the Empire; yet his Son oppoſing his deſign, and many learned Men being baniſhed upon it, there were means uſed to preſerve their Annals; but Semedo ſaith, ſaith, they could never recover a perfect Account of the firſt beginning of that famous Empire.

Semedo Part I. ch. 22.

Now before any other Nation can preſume to vye with the exactneſs of the Chineſes in their Antiquities, they muſt firſt ſhew us what means they had for the computation of times, by which we may judge of their Antiquity and Succeſſion of their Kings; and next they muſt give an equal Account of the Care taken time enough to preſerve their Hiſtory of publick Annals, as the Eaſtern People and the Romans did.

For inſtance, we are told from a late Iriſh Antiquary Geoffrey Keting, that the Poſterity of Gathelos and Scota, or the Mileſian Race ſettled in Ireland, A. M. 2736. after the Flood 1086. after Moſes paſſing the Red Sea 192. before Chriſt's Nativity 1308. from whence the Antiquity of the Iriſh Nation, is ſaid not be parallell'd, unleſs by the Chineſes only.

Proſpect of Ireland by P. W. p. 6. p. 15.

Here is a pretence to very great Antiquity, and an appearance of exact Calculation; but I only ask by what Cycles the Iriſh proceeded when they began; how they could adjuſt the time ſo well to the Age of the World; or what other certain way they had which might be reduced to it. If they had none, all this might be only Fancy and Opinion, unleſs there were ſome Characters of Time fixed, and certain by Eclipſes and Aſtronomical Obſervations, or certain Periods of time, or coincident paſſages, which might connect the Year of their deſcent into Ireland, with ſuch a Year of the World, or after the Flood. If nothing of this kind be produced, we muſt be excuſed if we do not yet think the Iriſh Antiquities parallel to thoſe of China. For if there be no ſuch Characters of Time which may direct us in comparing one thing with another, it is poſſible that there may be one or two thouſand Years difference in the Computation, and yet neither able to confute the other. For ſuppoſe I ſhould ſay, that the Poſterity of Gathelos came into Ireland juſt 308 Years before Chriſt's Nativity, here is 1000 Years difference. That is a ſmall matter, you will ſay, in ſo great Antiquity; but as ſmall as it is, ſome account ought to be given of a thouſand Years. Now I deſire to have ſome evident proof brought me of ſome Event in the World which happened 1308 Years before Chriſt's Nativity, to which the Iriſh deſcent muſt be coincident. To make this more plain by Example, ſuppoſe the Queſtion be in what Age of the World the Peloponneſian War began; we ſhould by no means think it ſufficient for any Man preſently to ſet down, it was ſuch a Year of the World, ſuch a Year from the Flood, ſo long before Chriſt; but we demand ſome certain Character of this time, i. e. ſuch which agrees to that and to no other; and here, whoſoever intends to give ſatisfaction, will ſearch Thucydides, Diodorus and Ptolemy to find out ſome undoubted Character; as that Thucydides ſaith, that Pythodorus was then Archon at Athens, and it was the Year of the Olympick Solemnities. Diodorus ſaith, this was the 87 Olympiad, and that Apſeudes was Archon the Year before; Ptolemy ſaith he was Archon in the Year of Nabonaſſar 316. So by comparing the Olympiads and the Years of Nabonaſſar with the Years of the World, we may come to a certainty in this matter. And beſides Thucydides mentions a great Eclipſe the firſt Year of the War, which the Aſtronomers ſay, was 317 of Nabonaſſar, when Euthydemus ſucceeded Pythodorus at Athens. Such a method of proceeding by certain Characters of time, is a way to convince reaſonable Men; but without any of theſe to think to impoſe upon Mankind, under a pretence of exact Calculation, argues too great preſumption upon the Credulity of Mankind. Thus as to the coming of Fergus I. into Scotland juſt 330 Years before Chriſt, which the Advocate ſaith all their Hiſtorians affirm; let them produce any one certain Character of that time out of ſuch Annals as were written within the compaſs of knowing the Truth of it, and we will never diſpute this matter more.

But to proceed,

p. 7. (4.) As to the French Antiquities; which the Advocate ſaith, may be more juſtly queſtioned on theſe Grounds than theirs, we only deſire them to be as ingenuous as the late learned Writers of their Antiquities have been, who reject all before the Merovingian Race, as either Fabulous, or ſo doubtful and uncertain, that they make no Account of it, unleſs it be Rer. Francic. To. 1. what they find in the Roman Authors concerning the Franks, as may be ſeen in Hadrianus Valeſius, a learned Hiſtorian, Antiquary and Critick.

(5.) As to the Spaniſh, which are joined with the French; what relates to their Antiquities before the Romans War in Spain, we grant to be parallel with theirs. For although Strabo ſaith, they had the uſe of Letters, Strab. Geogr. l. 3. p. 96. and had ſome Records of ancient times among them; yet they are utterly loſt. And although Reineſius de Deo Endovellico ſeems to think, that Annius had ſome Fragments of thoſe Antiquities which he mixed with his own Inventions, yet I can ſee no reaſon for it; becauſe he would then have alledged the old Spaniſh Records, and not have fathered his Antiquities on Perſons ſo remote as Beroſus and Manetho.

But if they had the uſe of Letters and Records among them, might not the Iriſh and Scotiſh derive both from them? I anſwer, That the coming of the Iriſh immediately from Spain and not from Britain is not ſo evidently proved that any thing can be built upon it. Camden and Sir Camd. Brit. p. 728. James Ware two learned Antiquaries both think Ireland firſt peopled from Antiq. Hibern. c. 2. p. 11. Britain; and Camden offers good Reaſons for his Aſſertion, " as the agreement of the Britiſh and Iriſh Languages in very many Words; the " ſimilitude of Cuſtoms and Manners; it's being anciently called the leſſer " Britain, and the Inhabitants Britains; the conveniency of paſſage from " Britain thither; which ſeem to be of far greater moment than any thing brought to prove the Legend of Gathelos and Scota and their Poſterity coming out of Spain. But becauſe this Opinion doth not ſeem to give any account of the Scoti in Ireland (from whence they certainly went into Scotland, as is now confeſſed on all hands) therefore I ſhall endeavour to clear this Matter, by propoſing what ſeems moſt probable to me concerning the firſt Peopling of theſe Iſlands.

Arab. Geogr. l. 1. p. 23. We are then to conſider, that the moſt ancient Geographers, as Strabo obſerves out of Ephorus, divided the then known World into four Parts, the Eaſtern they called India, the Southern Æthiopia, the Weſtern Celtia, and the Northern Scythia. And in the European Parts they knew but of two Nations beſide the Greeks, and thoſe are the Celtæ and the Scythæ. Strab. l. 1. p. 22. Thoſe that inhabited Northward, ſaith Strabo, were called Scythæ, and thoſe to the Weſt Celtæ; who were likewiſe called Iberi and Celtiberi, as he affirms; and theſe peopled Spain and Gaul, and from thence ſpread into the Neighbour Countries; and among the reſt came over into Britain: Which in the Book de Mundo commonly attributed to Ariſtotle, but by Buchanan to Theophraſtus, is ſaid, together with Ireland, (which are both there called the Britiſh Iſlands) to be ſituate in the Ocean, not far from the Scythæ and the Celtæ. But the latter were ſo much nearer in Gaul, that it is very reaſonable to believe the firſt Habitation Vit. Agric. here was by the Celtæ, who came from thence. And Tacitus truly obſerves, the agreement was ſo very great between the Gauls and the old Britains,that although he ſuſpected the Silures might come immediately from Spain, (or rather from the Iberi, which Strabo ſaith was a more general Name, and ſome of theſe went into Ireland) yet upon the whole matter, he concluded all the Southern Parts of Britain to have been peopled immediately from Gaul. But as to the Caledonians he affirms them to have been of a German Extraction : i. e. taking Germany in the extent he took it in, which went as far as Sarmatia, and took in Scandinavia ; from whence in probability the Northern Parts of Britain, were firſt peopled. It is true that Tacitus calls them Britains as well as the Celtæ ; and however they were united in Intereſt againſt the Romans, as Galgacus ſhews in his excellent Speech to them, yet Tacitus, we ſee, makes them of a different Extraction. And theſe were originally from the European Scythæ, or from Scandinavia, which was abundantly peopled, and ſupplied other Countries, as Jornandes ſaith ; and that they were provided of Shipping very early, I have proved in the following Book, where I ſpeak of the Original of the Picts. And beſides what is there ſaid to ſhew that thoſe who dwell in thoſe Northern Parts, were then called Scythians, Scymnus Chius lately publiſhed out of Holſtenius his Papers, affirms, that the Scythians extended from the Palus Mæotis to Countries wholly unknow to the Greeks. For being tempted by the Rivers, as Olaus Rudbeck conjectures, having no Skill in Navigation or Aſtronomy, and the Woods in the firſt Ages of the World being unpaſſable, the People ſtill went farther and farther by the Rivers ſide, till at laſt finding themſelves bounded by the vaſt Mountains in thoſe Northern Parts and the Sea beyond them, they ſat down there, and in time ſo repleniſhed thoſe Parts, that they were willing to diſcharge themſelves by ſending Colonies abroad. To which end they accuſtomed themſelves to the Sea, and ſo from thence theſe Scythians came into the Northern Parts of Britain, where they had the Name of Caledonians ; and upon new Supplies coming after the Romans had ſubdued the Southern Parts of Britain, were then called Picts. But of theſe things afterwards. That which I now deſign, is to ſhew that ſome of theſe Scythæ being encouraged by the Adventures of others, who had ſettled in Britain, paſſed by the Northern Iſlands and went into Ireland ; and ſo the Celtæ from Britain, who were called Iberi in Strabo, and theſe Scythæ met there as they did in Britain. But Britain ſtill retained its Name ; and therefore to diſtinguiſh themſelves from thoſe who remained there, their Countrey was called Ibernia from the Iberi, and Scotia from theſe Scythæ ; for ſaith Walſingham, Scythæ, Scythici, Scoti, Scotici are all one ; which he took from Radulphus de Diceto, Imag. Hiſtor. ad A. 1185. and Nennius expreſly calls them Scythæ, and Gildas the Iriſh Sea, Vallem Scythicam ; and Alfred in the Engliſh Tranſlation of Oroſius calls the Scots Scyttan ; and the Germans both Scythians and Scots Scutten, and the old Britains Yſcot, as Cambden hath already obſerved.

And it is conſiderable that a late Iriſh Antiquary tells us that a part of their Countrey in their own Language is called Gæthluighe, i. e. Gothland, from the Goths or Scythians who took poſſeſſion of it. He rather thinks the Getuli a People of Africa gave the Name ; but of their coming into Ireland there is no probability. And in the ſame place he ſaith, that Lamfinnus was the firſt who brought a Colony thither out of Scythia ; which he proves out of one of their moſt ancient Monuments. And Colganus obſerves on the Life of St. Cadroe, that whereas they are ſaid to be derived from Scota who is ſaid to be Pharaoh's Daughter, the true Name, he he ſaith, was Scytha; and that Name was given her becauſe her Husband came from Scythia. And the ſame Antiquary confeſſes, that it appears by all their ancient Records, that they had their original from the Scythians, and Keting himſelf he ſaith at laſt yields it, and that the Name of Scota was given becauſe the Mileſian Race came out of Scythia.

Ogyg. p. 350.

And to confirm the Peopling of Ireland from Britain and Scandinavia, we are to obſerve that the Iriſh Antiquaries from their beſt Records do ſpeak of two great Colonies which came thither from Britain, the one of the Belgæ, of which Slangius or Slanius was the Head, who was the firſt Monarch of Ireland; wherein Giraldus Cambrenſis is confeſſed to agree with their own Antiquities; and another of the Dannanæ from the Northern Parts of Britain under Nuadus. But beſides both theſe, and long after them they place the Dynaſty of the Scots or Scythians under Herimon; and the Pſaltir Na-rann, a Book of great Authority among them, ſaith, that Herimon was the firſt King of the Scots in Ireland. And in his time, they ſay, the Picts follow'd them thither. But that ſeems to be too ſoon. However that they came from the ſame Parts will appear very probable from what Bede ſpeaks of the Picts coming from Scythia (i. e. Scandinavia) in their long Boats, and being carried by Tempeſt to the Northern Parts of Ireland, he ſaith, they there found gentem Scotorum, i. e. their Countreymen the Scythians; and they would fain have ſettled there with them. And when they came to treat, we find no difficulty as to their underſtanding one another, which there would have been, if the Scots had come out of Spain, and the Picts out of Scandinavia. I know Bede there makes the Picts and Scots Languages to be different; but ſo they might be in continuance of time, although at firſt of the ſame Original; as appears by the ſeveral Languages now in Europe, derived from the Original Gothick or Scythick Tongue, which is Mother to moſt of them; only the Celtick and Latin being mixed with it. But to return to Bede, he ſaith, the Scots perſuaded the Picts to go to Britain, and take Poſſeſſion of the Northern Parts, as the Britains had done of the Southern. After this they obtained Wives from the Scots in Ireland; which ſhews familiarity and mutual confidence (as being of the ſame extraction) and the Picts engaged that in a diſputable Caſe, the Scotiſh Line ſhould be preferr'd to their own. In proceſs of time, ſaith Bede, ſome of the Scots themſelves, hearing of the Goodneſs of the Weſtern parts of Scotland, went thither under the Conduct of Reuda, and either by Force or Friendſhip took poſſeſſion of them; and from thence they were called Dalreudini, from this Reuda and Daal which ſignifies a ſhare or portion. This is all the Account Bede gives of this matter; wherein there is not a Word of Gathelos and Scota, or of Fergus his coming in the time of Alexander, or any time after. And it is ſomewhat ſtrange, that ſuch a Man as Bede, ſo inquiſitive into theſe matters, ſo well acquainted with the Story of Icolmkill, or of the Monks of Hy or Jona, ſhould ſay nothing of all this. For he ſeems to have concealed nothing he knew or had heard of; and ſtuffs out his Books with ſome not very probable Relations. And therefore it is not likely he would have omitted the former Stories if he had heard of them.

(2.) The ſecond Argument of any ſeeming force in the Advocate's Diſcourſe is, “ That their Hiſtories were firſt tranſmitted to Poſterity by the “ Druids in Verſes; and it is probable ſome of theſe Druids being con“verted, became their firſt Monks, and ſo it was eaſie for them to inform “ their Monaſteries, and that the Monks at Jona or Icolmkill kept the “ Records there from the foundation of the Monaſtery about A. “ where their Kings were buried until the Reign of Malcolm Can more;
“ that they had Annals in other Monaſteries, as at Scoon, Paſlay, Pluſcardin “ and Lindesfern, Abercorn and Melroſs; and that they had p. 24.
“ Hiſtorians who compiled Hiſtories from them; among whom he reckons p. 25.
“ as the moſt ancient Veremundus a Spaniard, A. D. 1076. who dedicated
“ his Hiſtory to Malcolm Can-more; and Joh. Campbell, Turgott “ and Alredus Rivallenſis, who wrote of their Affairs before Fordon. p. 29.
“ And he goes about to prove Veremundus could not be counterfeited by “ Hector Boethius, becauſe he is cited by Balæus, Holinſhed, Geſner, “ Chambers; and becauſe Hector gives an account to James V. that he “ was ſent him from Icolmkill. Which is the ſubſtance of what he ſaith about their old Hiſtories before Fordon.

To which I anſwer,

(1.) That here we have a very formal Pedigree of Hiſtorians, which might with equal probability have been carried back to Gathelos his firſt coming out of Egypt. For it is very hard to ſuppoſe ſo great a Prince, and Son to a King of Athens, ſhould be without his Druids, or Sanachies, or Bards, who would tranſmit to Poſterity his famous Actions; and therefore I cannot but wonder, that the learned Advocate ſhould ſeem to ſtick at their ancient Origination and Deſcent; and be ſo unwilling to go any farther p. 15.
back than their firſt Settlement in Scotland. For no doubt the Hiſtory of Gathelos and Scota were tranſmitted to Poſterity the very ſame way that the other was; and the ſame Arguments will indifferently ſerve for both.
Nay, why ſhould the Britiſh Hiſtory be queſtioned? ſince no doubt the Britains had Druids, Sanachies and Bards, as well as the Scots or Iriſh.
And yet the Advocate will by no means allow the Britiſh Antiquities, although they pretend to the very ſame Grounds which he makes uſe of to ſupport the Scotiſh. If the Druids were good Hiſtorians in Scotland, why not much rather among the Britains; where Cæſar ſaith they had their Original Inſtitution and the moſt ſacred Authority. But Buchanan abſolutely Buchan.
denies that the Druids ever wrote Hiſtories; and he affirms from Cæſar, l. 2.
that when he came hither they had no Records or way of preſerving the memory of things paſt; and Tacitus and Gildas could meet with no certain Account from Domeſtick Hiſtories. And as to his Sanachies and Bards, I ſhall only give him Buchanan's Anſwer in his own Words. Quod autem ad Bardos & Seneciones veteris memoriæ cuſtodes quidam confugiunt, prorſus perridicule faciunt. Which he proves, “ becauſe the “ Bards were an ignorant ſort of People, that had no Monuments of Antiquity; “ and the Sanachies were Men wholly without Learning, and who “ lived by flattering great Men; and therefore no certain Account of “ things can be expected from them. And withall, ſaith he, ſince we find “ Hiſtorians liable to ſo many Miſtakes after all the pains and care they “ take to ſearch after the Truth of things, what credit can be given to thoſe “ who pretend to deliver Hiſtory merely by their Memories?

But the Advocate objects, That the Laws of Lycurgus were preſerved p. 16. in the Memories of Men for 600 Years, as Plutarch obſerves; and the Scots and other Nations have preſerved Laws for much longer time, without the help of Letters.

But is there no difference between Laws of daily Practice, and Antiquities, which depend merely upon Memory, where there is no uſe of Letters?
And as to Laws themſelves I ſhall only deſire the learned Advocate to give an Account of their Macalpine Laws, which Fordon ſaith, were compoſed Scotic. by Kenneth, who ſubdued the Picts. I know that Hector Boethius, l. 4. c. 9.

who ſtands out at nothing, pretends to deliver them as exactly as if he had lived at that time; and Leſly who follows him very carefully, ſetts them down as he found them in him. But what ancient Copy do they produce for theſe Laws? Not one Word of that. But was it not fit that he who had made ſo many Kings ſhould make a Body of Laws too? Fordon never pretends to know them, only he thinks there were ſome of them ſtill remaining. Joh. Major takes no notice of them; Buchanan juſt mentions them, and ſaith, they continued long after him, but how long he could not tell. But it is obſervable, that when he comes to mention the Laws of Alexander III. ſo long after him (for he died A. D. 1285. and the other, according to him, A. D. 854.) he ſaith, they were all antiquated by the negligence of the People and the length of Time. Now if the Laws ſo much later were quite forgotten, how come the Macalpin Laws to be ſo exactly preſerved? But it may be there was another Cheſt of Laws at Icolmkill, beſides that of MSS. which Hector Boethius ſaith Fergus brought from the Sacking of Rome in the time of Alaric. Yet even that would prove that Records are the beſt preſervers of Laws; and one would think no Advocate in the World could be of another Opinion.

(2.) From the Druids I proceed to the firſt Monks of Scotland, who are ſaid to have left Records in their Monaſteries of the Hiſtory of former times. The firſt Monaſtery there, is confeſſed to be that of the Iſland Jona, or Hy, or Icolmkill, i. e. Hy the Cell of Columba, founded about the Year 560. and there, the Advocate ſaith, their Records were kept from the Foundation to the Reign of Malcolm Can-more. Now we are fallen into an Age of ſome Light, ſuch as it is, but whether it will be to the Advocate's ſatisfaction I know not. For Cummeneus Albus and Adamnanus, both Abbats of Hy not long after Columba, have given an Account of Columba the Founder of that Monaſtery; and both wrote before Bede's time. By them it appears that Columba came out of Ireland thither; and Adamnanus ſaith, he was the Son of Fedlimid the Son of Fergus, which Fergus, ſay the Iriſh Antiquaries, was ſecond Husband to Erica Daughter of Loarn, Brother to Fergus, who carried the firſt Colony into Scotland; and that Fergus, Grand-father to Columba, was Son to Conallus, Grandchild to Niellus Magnus King of Ireland about A. D. 405. in whoſe time St. Patrick was carried captive into Ireland. And ſo from the time of Columba's coming, and his Relation to the Kings both of Scotland and Ireland, they have endeavoured to fix the time of Fergus his coming with the firſt Colony into Scotland. The account they give in ſhort is this, that Carbre Riada was one of the Sons of Conar II. King of Ireland, about A. D. 165. from him the Family and Countrey where they lived was called Dalrieda (and they while in Ireland were ſtyled Kings of Dalrieda) from him deſcended Eric the Father of Loarn, and Fergus who went into Scotland. To this Fergus ſucceeded Domangardus, Comgallus, Gauranus and Conallus, the Son of Comgallus, in whoſe time Columba came into Scotland; for Adamnanus ſaith, he converſed with Conallus the Son of Comgill; who according to Tigernacus and the Ulſter Annals gave the Iſland Hy to Columba. But Bede ſaith, it was given by the Picts whom Columba converted to the Chriſtian Faith. Which muſt ſeem ſtrange, if the Scots then had the Poſſeſſion of thoſe Parts; and therefore the learned Primate of Armagh inclines to the former Opinion. The ſame Tigernacus in the Iriſh Annals makes Fergus the Son of Eric to have carried over the Dalreidians into Britain ſix Years after the death of St. Patrick; and the old Author cited by Camden confirms the Succeſſion of Fergus gus from Conar, and his being the firſt King of Albany; which agrees with the Iriſh Antiquaries, ſaying, that Carbre Riada the Anceſtor to Fergus, was the Son of Conar Monarch of Ireland.

“ But ſuppoſe all this, that Columba was deſcended from one Fergus, and related to the other, who went over with the Dalredians into Scotland; and that he was there in the time of Conallus Son to Comgill, Grandchild to this Fergus, how doth it hence appear that there was not another Fergus long before, and a Succeſſion of Kings in Scotland from him?

To this the Iriſh Antiquaries reply, that their ancient Annals do give a clear Account of this Fergus his Race and Time of going into Scotland, but although they have the Succeſſion of the Kings of Ireland long before, and the remarkable things done in their time, yet there is no mention at all of any Fergus or his Succeſſors going to ſettle in Britain before this time. They do believe that there were Excurſions made by ſome of the Kings of Ireland before; and I ſee no reaſon to queſtion it, even before the times mentioned by Ogyg. Gildas; but they utterly deny any foundation of a Monarchy there by Scots p. 464. going out of Ireland before the time of Fergus the Son of Eric, and that 100 Years later than the Scotiſh Antiquaries do place his coming; for they p. 472. make the firſt coming of this Colony to be A. D. 503. juſt the time which the Biſhop of St. Aſaph had pitched upon; but according to their Antiquities, Loarn the elder Brother was firſt King, and he dying Fergus ſucceeded A. D. 513. and becauſe his Race ſucceeded in that Kingdom, therefore Fergus is ſuppoſed to have been founder of the Monarchy.

The Queſtion now comes to this, whether the Iriſh or the Scotiſh Antiquaries go upon the better Grounds? For, here the Advocate's Common Places of Hiſtorical Faith, Common Fame, Domeſtick Tradition, &c. can determine nothing, ſince theſe are equal on both ſides, and yet there is a contradiction to each other about a matter of Fact. We muſt then appeal to the Records on both ſides; and thoſe who can produce the more Authentick Teſtimonies from thence are to be believed. The Advocate pleads that it is very credible that they had ſuch, becauſe they had Druids and Sanachies and Monks as well as thoſe in Ireland; and that Columba founded a Monaſtery at Icolmkill, and their Kings were buried there for a long time. But where are the Annals of that Monaſtery? Or of any other near that time? To what purpoſe are we told of the Monaſteries that were at Scoon, and Paſley, and Pluſcardin, and Lindesfern, and Abercorn, unleſs their Books be produced? It is by no means ſatisfactory to ſay, they had two p. 25. Books, their Regiſter or Chartulary, and their Black Book wherein their Annals were kept, for we deſire to ſee them of what colour ſoever they be, and to be convinced by Teſtimonies out of them, if they appear of ſufficient authority. But if theſe cannot be produced, let them print the full Account of Iriſh Kings, which the Advocate in his Advertiſement ſaith, he had lately ſeen in a very old MS. brought from Icolmkill, written by Carbre Lifachair, who lived ſix Generations before St. Patrick, and ſo about our Saviour's time. St. Patrick died about the end of the fifth Century, being above 100 Years old, if the Iriſh Hiſtorians may be believed; but how ſix Generations will reach from his birth to about our Saviour's time, is not eaſie to underſtand. For although the ancients differ'd much in computing Generations; yet Cenſorinus ſaith, they generally called 25 or 30 Years by the Name of 3 Generations. Cenſor. de die Natal. c. 17. Herodotus indeed extends a Generation to 100 Years, yet even that will not do here. But who was this Carbre Lifachair, who wrote ſo long ſince? I

Cambr. Everſ. p. 71. Ogyg. p. 341. p. 464. find one of that Name among the Kings of Ireland, about A. D. 284. and therefore I am apt to ſuſpect that ſome body not very well verſed in the Iriſh Language, finding this Name among the Kings, made him the Author of the Book. And the Iriſh Antiquaries ſpeak with ſome indignation againſt thoſe Scotiſh Writers, who pretended to debate theſe matters of Antiquity relating to the Iriſh Nation, without any skill in the Iriſh Language. For Camd. Brit. p. 85. this Debate doth not concern the Saxons in Scotland (as all the Low-landers are ſtill called by the High-landers) and many of the beſt Families of their Nobility ſettled there in the time of Malcolm Canmoir, after he had married the Siſter to Edgar; but it relating wholly to thoſe who came out of Ireland, the Iriſh Antiquaries think it reaſonable it ought to be determined by the Iriſh Annals.

“ But will not the ſame Objections lie againſt the Iriſh Antiquities which “ have been hitherto urged againſt the Scotiſh? For why ſhould we believe “ that the Original Iriſh were more punctual and exact in their Annals “ than thoſe who went from thence into Scotland?

I anſwer, that a difference is to be made concerning the Iriſh Antiquities. For they either relate to what hapned among them before Chriſtianity was received in Ireland or after. As to their remote Antiquities, they might have ſome general Traditions preſerved among them, as that they were peopled from Britain and Scythia, and had Succeſſions of Kings time out of mind; but as to their exact Chronology, I muſt beg leave as yet Act. Sanct. Mart. 17 Vit. Patric. §. 4. to ſuſpend my Aſſent. For Bollandus affirms that the Iriſh had no uſe of Letters till St. Patrick brought it among them; at which their preſent Antiquary is much offended, and runs back to the Druids, as the learned Advocate doth. But neither of them have convinced me that the Druids Ogyg. part 3. c. 30. p. 214. ever wrote Annals. All that Cæſar ſaith, is, that in Gaul they made uſe of the Greek Letters, which they might eaſily borrow from the Greek Colony at Marſeilles; but how doth it appear that they uſed theſe Letters in Ireland or Scotland? Or that they any where uſed them in any Matters of Learning; which ſeems contrary to the Inſtitution of the Druids, who were all for Memory, as Cæſar ſaith, and thought Books hurtful to the uſe of it. So that nothing could be more repugnant to their Diſcipline, than the 150 Tracts of the Druids, which St. Patrick is ſaid to p. 219. have caſt into the Fire. But I do not deny that they might have Genealogies kept up among them by their Druids, and Sanachies, and Bards, who made it their Buſineſs; and ſo it was in Scotland, as appears by the High-landers repeating the Genealogy of Alexander III. by Heart. But the great Error lay in fixing Times and Places, and particular Actions, according to the Names of thoſe Genealogies. And this was the true Reaſon of the Miſtake as to the Scotiſh Antiquities. For the Genealogiſts carrying the Pedigree of Fergus the Son of Erc ſo much farther back, ſome afterwards either imagined themſelves, or would have others think, that all thoſe mentioned before him were Kings in Scotland, as Fergus was; which by degrees was improved into a formal Story of forty Kings. And I am very much confirmed in this Conjecture, becauſe I find in the Genealogy in Fordon, the deſcent of Fergus, the Son of Erc from Conar the Iriſh Monarch, as it is in the Iriſh Genealogies, and that by Rieda, called by them Carbre Riada, by the other Eochoid Ried, and ſeveral other Names are the very ſame we now find in the Genealogy of the Iriſh Kings; as Eochoid, Father to Erc; Ængus, Fedlim, Conar, the Son of Ederskeol; and ſo up to Fergus, called in the Iriſh Catalogue of Kings, Ferguſius Fortamalius, (whom the Author of the Synchroniſm makes contemporary with Ptolemy Philometor.) From whence I conclude, that the original miſtake lay in applying the Iriſh Genealogy to the Kings of Scotland.

But if we go beyond theſe Genealogies in Ireland, and come to examine the matters of Fact relating to their remote Antiquities, we ſhall find no more certainty there, than we have done in Scotland. And it is ingenuouſly confeſſed by Tigernacus in his Annals, that all their Antiquities to the Reign of Kimbaithus, their 73d King, are very uncertain; but he might have gone farther, and done no injury to Truth. However we cannot but acknowledge it to be a great piece of Ingenuity to own ſo much in thoſe times when fabulous Antiquities were ſo much cried up and believed. But what becomes then of Cæſarea, Baronna and Balba, with fifty other Women and but three Men coming from Ireland juſt forty Days before the Flood; and the fifteenth day of the Moon? What becomes of Partholanus and his Company, who arrived in Ireland the 312th Year after the Flood, in the Month of May, 14th of the Moon, and upon Wedneſday? Is not this wonderful exactneſs at ſuch a diſtance of time? And the late Antiquary confeſſes he doth not know, how they came to underſtand the day of the Week and the Month ſo well. How come they to underſtand, that the ſecond Colony under Nemethus came to Ireland, when it had been 30 Years deſolate; and after the deſtruction of that Colony, that it remained ſo 200 Years? As to the Mileſian Colony from Spain, I diſcourſe at large afterwards of it, and the Authority of thoſe Annals theſe Antiquities depend upon.

c. 7.

But then as to later times, ſince Chriſtianity was among them, and ſome kind of Learning did flouriſh in Ireland for ſome time, there is greater reaſon to have a regard to the Teſtimony of their moſt ancient Annals. Such are thoſe of Tigernacus, who died A. D. 1088. and the Synchroniſms of Flannus, who died A. D. 1056. the Hiſtorical Poems of Coemannus, who is celebrated as their chief Antiquary, and he deduces his Hiſtorical Poem of the Kings of Ireland to A. D. 1072. which is ſuppoſed to be the time he lived in; Modudius continues the Hiſtory of their Kings from A. D. 428. to A. D. 1022. and he lived A. D. 1143. But beſides theſe, the Iriſh Antiquaries have found an Iriſh Poem of the Kings of Scotland, in the time of Malcolm Canmoir, with their Names and the time of their Reigns. Which Poem begins with Loarn, and Fergus the Son of Erc as the firſt King of Scotland, but takes notice of Kings among the Picts before; without the leaſt intimation of any among the Scots; which being join'd with the Teſtimony of their Genealogies and the Annals of Tigernacus, and of Jocelin in the Acts of St. Patrick, they conclude ſufficient to prove that there was no Monarchy in Scotland, till the time of this Fergus of the Dalredian Family. And it is not improbable that Bede ſhould underſtand this Colony under the Conduct of theſe Brethren, by his Duce Reuda; becauſe they being equal, the Denomination was taken from the Head of the Stock; who was Rieda or Reuda; and Daal the Iriſh Antiquaries ſay, originally ſignifies a Stock, and only by conſequence a Share or Portion.

Ogyg. p. 466.

But the Advocate ſtill inſiſts upon it, that in their chief Monaſteries they had ancient Annals kept; which muſt be of greater Authority than theſe Iriſh Hiſtorical Poems. This is a matter of Fact, and there can be no Argument drawn from the bare probability that there were ſuch Annals; but when they are produced and compared with the Iriſh Annals of Tigernacus, the Annals of Ulſter, Yniſfallin, Dungall and others which the Iriſh Antiquaries quote ſo often, beſides their Hiſtorical Poems, we ſhall then be able to judge better between them in point of Antiquitiy and Credibility. At preſent it doth not ſeem ſo probable, that they have any ſuch that are conſiderable, ſince they have not been alledged by ſo learned an Advocate for their Antiquities, who would not omit ſo material an evidence for his Cauſe. And there is a paſſage in the Concluſion of the Continuation of Fordon which makes it more than probable, they had no ancient authentick Annals in the Monaſteries. For there it is ſaid, "That in other Countries, and as he heard in England, in all their Monaſteries of Royal Foundation, there was a certain Perſon appointed to write the paſſages of the preſent times, and after the King's death, at the next great Council all theſe Writers were to meet and to bring in their Papers, which were to be compared and examined by skilful Men appointed for that purpoſe, and out of all one authentick Chronicle was to be made, which was to be laid up in the Archives of the Monaſteries as ſuch, from whence the Truth might be known : The like he wiſhes were done in Scotland." From whence it follows, that there were no authentick Annals in their Monaſteries before that time to his knowledge. Buchanan, I know, doth ſeveral times quote the Book of Paſley, but it had been far better to have printed the Book it ſelf, ſince Dempſter ſaith, it was in the hands of the Earl of Dumferlin, that others might have been better able to judge concerning it. But Fordon tells us, that Monaſtery was founded A. D. 1168. (or a Year after, ſaith the Chronicle of Melros) now, the very foundation of the Monaſtery is here ſo late, that no great matter can be expected as to remote Antiquities. That at Scone, as Fordon ſaith, was founded not much ſooner, A.D. 1107. As to Abercorn, though mentioned by Bede, yet Buchanan ſaith no one could find out ſo much as the Footſteps of it; and ſo we are not like to expect much light from thence. It is very ſtrange that Buchanan only ſhould ſee the famous Book of Pluſcardin : For Books do not eaſily grow famous by one Man's ſeeing them. But no great matter of Antiquity is to be expected from thence, ſince that Monaſtery at the ſooneſt was founded by Alexander II. in the thirteenth Century; but Dempſter rather thinks, it was 200 Years after. I never heard that Aidan, Finan and Colman left any Annals at Lindesfern; nor Columba or his Succeſſors at Icolmkill. If any ſuch be ever found, it will be a great favour to inquiſitive Men to oblige the World by publiſhing them, that if we are guilty of miſtakes, we may rectifie them upon ſuch great Authorities when they vouchſafe to let them ſee the light.

As to the Chronicle of Melros, lately publiſhed at Oxford, we find no advantage at all to the Advocate's Cauſe by it. But here is an odd kind of Reflection either on the MS. or the worthy Publiſher of it, as though it were very unfaithful in the things relating to the Scotiſh Nation. Whereas I have frequently peruſed the Original MS. in the Cotton Library, which is a very fair and ancient one. And thoſe Verſes he ſpeaks of, which are omitted, are not there in the ſame hand, but added in the Margin by another, and ſeem tranſcribed from ſome other Book; ſuch Verſes being frequent in Fordon, and it may be are the greateſt Monuments of Antiquity they have, being agreeable to the Iriſh Hiſtorical Poems. But ſeeing the firſt produced by the Advocate go no farther back than Alpin the Father of Kenneth who ſubdued the Picts, they can afford very little light in theſe matters. And it had been but a reaſonable piece of Juſtice in the Advocate, before he had charged ſuch unfaithfulneſs upon the MS. Copy of Melros, as it appears in the Oxford Edition, to have looked either on the Beginning or the End of the Book; and then he might have ſpared his Cenſure.

ſure. For in the Preface an Account is given of the Verſes relating to the Succeſſion of the Kings of Scotland: And in the end the very Verſes themſelves are printed, and more at large than he quotes them.

From the Annals of their Monaſteries I proceed to their Hiſtorians; and the firſt mentioned by the Advocate, is Veremundus a Spaniard, Arch- p. 25.
deacon of St. Andrews, A. D. 1076. who dedicated his Hiſtory to Malcolm Canmoir; and in his Epiſtle appeals to the Druids and Monks p. 16.
and the Monuments of Antiquity kept by them in the Iſles of Man and Icolmkill. This is an Evidence to the purpoſe, and ſpeaks home to the point. But the Biſhop of St. Aſaph hath unhappily queſtioned, whether there ever were ſuch a Writer; and I do not think the Advocate hath cleared the point. There may be two things in diſpute, with reſpect to this Veremundus; firſt, whether there ever were ſuch a Hiſtory appearing under the name of Veremundus: And then ſuppoſing there were, whether it were genuine, or made under his Name by Hector Boethius, or rather by his Phyſician of Aberdeen, who was ſo helpful to him, ſaith Dempſter, in texenda Hiſtoria, i. e. in weaving the Materials for his Hiſtory? I will not diſ-pute ſo much the former, and the Teſtimony of Chambers, a Lord of Seſſion p. 26. and learned Man, as the Advocate tells us, who wrote A. D. 1572. goes no farther, nor any other produced by him. But as to the ſecond point I am very much unſatisfied, for theſe Reaſons.

(1.) It is very well known, that it was no unuſual thing in that Age to publiſh Books under the Names of ancient Authors, which coſt the Criticks a great deal of Pains to diſcover the Impoſture, as is apparent in the Beroſus, Manetho, Metaſthenes (or Megaſthenes) Philo, Cato, Xenophon, Archilochus, Sempronius, publiſhed by Annius, who lived in the fifteenth Century, and was buried during the Popedom of Alexander VI. And not only Authors, but other Monuments of Antiquity were then counterfeited, as appears by many in Gruter's Collection of Inſcriptions, by thoſe of Annius in Italy; and by the Tuſcan Inſcriptions publiſhed by Inghiramius under the Name of Proſper Feſulanus; which were the Invention of Thomas Fœdrus, who lived at the ſame time with Hector Boethius. For, in that Age Men began to be inquiſitive into Matters of Antiquity; and therefore ſome who had more Learning and better Inventions than others ſet themſelves to Work, to gratifie the Curioſity of ſuch who longed to ſee ſomething of the Antiquities of their own Countrey. And ſuch things were ſo greedily ſwallowed by leſs judicious Perſons, that it proved no eaſie matter to convince ſuch of the Impoſture. For even Annius and Proſper Feſulanus, as well as Veremundus have had their Advocates to plead for them.

to, who never wrote concerning them. As for inſtance, three Books of the Hiſt. Ec-

Authors relating to their Antiquities, every one mentioned as genuine by Dempſter; and yet as far as we can find, not one of the whole number was ſo. Is it then any wonder, that Veremundus ſhould be reckon'd among the reſt?

(3.) No ſuch Author was known to Fordon, as far as appears by his Hiſtory; and he is very punctual in quoting the Authors he makes uſe of, and ſometimes tranſcribes large paſſages out of them; as out of Baldredus, as he calls him, and Turgot's Life of Malcolm, &c. Jocelin de Furnes, Vincentius, Adamnanus, and any old Legends or Chronicles he could meet with, as Chronica de Abernethy, & variæ Chronicæ upon many occaſions. I do not therefore deny that Fordon doth appeal to Chronicles before him; but I think the Argument ſo much ſtronger againſt Veremundus; when one who gathered all he could meet with never once takes notice of him, as far as I can find.

Hiſt. Scot. (4.) William Elphinſton, (Chancellor of Scotland, Biſhop of Aber-

2. writing his Hiſtory. Now as it happily falls out, this very Hiſtory of El-phinſtoun is in being among us, and I have at this time by me Eight
l. 1. c. 8. Books of it, which go as far as the thirteenth Century. He tells the Story of Gathelos and Scota, as others had done before him; or rather, juſt as Fordon had ſet it down. For there is very little variation from him in all the firſt Book, only the eighth Chapter in Fordon is very much contracted; the fifteenth about Gathelos his building the City Brigantia in Spain is tranſpoſed, another Chapter being ſet before it. In the ſeventeenth he follows Fordon exactly about the Poſterity of Gathelos coming into Ireland; and whereas Fordon only quotes Groſſum Caput for ſaying, that Scotia had its Name from Scota, the moſt noble Perſon in that Colony; he ſaith, it was in ſome Chronica; but what Chronica was ever written by Groſt-Scotichron head, deſerves to be enquired. For it is certain Fordon quotes him in o- [illegible] c. 14. ther Places about Scota and the Scots. Which makes me wonder that Dempſter doth not put him in among his Scotiſh Writers; but as far as I can perceive, he never read Fordon; nor ſaw Elphinſton. In Chap. 20. where Fordon quotes an old Chronicle which affirms, that Gathelos gave the ſame Laws to his People which Phoroneus did to the Greeks; and that the Scots to this day glory that they have thoſe Laws; this laſt Clauſe Elphinſtoun left out; and he paſſes over Chap. 21. where the miſerable condition of the Poſterity of Gathelos in Spain for 240 Years is ſet down. In ſome following Chapters he confutes Geoffrey of Monmouth in the very Words of Fordon, and uſes his very Expreſſions about the firſt Peopling of Scotland from Ireland, the coming of the Picts, and the hard uſage of the Scots by them, and Fergus his going over out of Ireland; in all which not one Authority is cited which is not in Fordon, and not the leaſt intimation of any ſuch Author as Veremundus.

In the ſecond Book he follows Fordon, not only in other things before, but when he deſcribes the Iſlands of Scotland, and particularly Jona; only he leaves out Fordon*'s Hebrew* Etymology, making Jona and Columba the ſame; and he ſaith not one Word of any Library or Records kept there, or any old Hiſtories and Annals to be there found, as Hector Boethius affirms; all that he ſaith is, that there was a Sanctuary for Tranſgreſſors. About Fergus and Rether he varies not a tittle from Fordon, and never mentions any other Kings of that Race, which he would never have omitted if he had known ſuch an Author as Veremundus. And he doth not ſuppoſe, that Rether ſucceeded Fergus in the Kingdom of Scotland, but that he came afreſh from Ireland; and ſo makes this the ſecond coming of the Scots out of Ireland: Which plainly overthrows the conſtant Succeſſion of the Monarchy from Fergus in Scotland: And he names no one King of Scotland from Rether to Eugenius, who was baniſhed with all the Scots.

Scotichron. l. 2. c. 10.

In the beginning of the third Book he gives an account after Fordon of Fergus the Son of Erc coming into Scotland, and he reckons 45 Kings between the two Ferguſſes, juſt as Fordon doth; and he deſires to be excuſed, as he did, for not ſetting down diſtinctly the times of their ſeveral Reigns, becauſe he could not then find any Writings about them; his Words are, ad præſens non in Scriptis reperimus. Now from this Expreſſion I thus argue againſt Hector Boethius his Veremundus: He ſaith, that Elphinſtoun gave the firſt intimation of him, and that he followed him in his Hiſtory; either therefore Veremundus gave no account of this firſt Succeſſion, which Hector pretends to have from him; and ſo his Authority ſignifies nothing at all in this matter; or Elphinſton never ſaw him; for he ſaith, he never could find any Hiſtory of this firſt Succeſſion. And therefore if ever there were ſuch a Book under the Name of Veremundus, it was after Elphinſton*'s days. For having ſearched the whole Nation for ancient Writings, and particularly* Jona, as Hector teſtifies, and finding no Hiſtory of the Succeſſion from Fergus, as himſelf declares, it is a plain Evidence, that Hector Boethius hath given a falſe account of Elphinſton in relation to Veremundus, and in all probability of Veremundus too. But this is not all, for Elphinſton doth not only ſay, that he could not find any Books relating to the Succeſſion of the Kings from Fergus, but he refers his Readers to the old Iriſh Annals; his Words are, ad antiquos Hiberniæ Libros referimus. So that according to Elphinſton*'s Judgment, the moſt certain account of their* Antiquities is to be taken from the Iriſh Authors. And ſo we may obſerve both in him and Fordon, the Iriſh Legends of S. Brendan and others, ſerved them for very good Authorities.

And ſo much for the Advocate*'s ancient Hiſtorian* Veremundus the Spaniard. For I ſuppoſe the mention of him by Bale, Geſner, Hollinſhed, &c. after he was ſo much celebrated by Hector Boethius, deſerves no farther conſideration. But Voſſius did not think him worth mentioning; and although he blames Luddus (as the Advocate calls him) or Humphry Lhuyd, for being too ſevere upon Hector Boethius, yet it is evident that he looked on him as a fabulous Writer, and ſo durſt not ſet him down on his Authority. The Advocate would excuſe this Cenſure of Voſſius, as though it related only to his credulity in point of Miracles, whereas there is not the leaſt intimation that way; and Voſſius ſaith that Leland on the account of his fabulouſneſs wrote ſharp Verſes upon him. What! for his having believed too many Miracles? No certainly, but for his fa- bulous Antiquities. But he hopes to bring Hector Boethius better off from the Cenſure of Biſhop Gavin Dowglas, which the Biſhop of St. Aſaph takes notice of from Polydore Virgil, becauſe Biſhop Dowglas died A. D. 1520. and Boethius his Hiſtory was not publiſhed till 1526. and he had not his Records from Icolmkill till 1525. To which I anſwer, that this looks like one of the Miracles the Advocate confeſſes that Hector did too eaſily report. For if he had the Records on which this Hiſtory was built but in 1525. how came his Hiſtory to be publiſhed the following Year? For he makes uſe of Veremundus his Authority in the very beginning of his Hiſtory, for the Scotiſh Antiquities both in Spain, Ireland and Albany. In his ſecond Book he ſaith, whatever he had written of the ancient Kings of Scotland, he had taken out of Veremundus, Campbell and Cornelius Hibernicus; all which he pretended to have had from Icolmkill. In his third Book about Cæſar's Expedition, he ſtill pretends to follow Veremundus. And in his ſeventh Book he declares he had kept cloſe to him in the whole ſeries of his Hiſtory. Now how was this poſſible if he had never ſeen Veremundus till A. D. 1525. and his Hiſtory was publiſhed by Badius Aſcenſius at Paris, A. D 1526. It would take up that Year in ſending it thither, and reviſing and correcting and publiſhing ſo large a Volume as his Hiſtory makes. So that there muſt be ſome great miſtake, as to the Year of his receiving thoſe Records, if ever he did. But if this were not the Hiſtory Biſhop Dowglas cenſured, what other was there at that time which could deſerve it? It could not be Joh. Major, for his Book was printed by Badius Aſcenſius after Dowglas his death: (if he died, as he ſaith, A. D. 1520.) and he pretends to no new Diſcoveries, as Boethius doth. But why ſhould the Advocate imagine his Hiſtory was not known by the learned Men at home, ſuch as Biſhop Dowglas was, before it was printed?

But to return to Voſſius, who is not ſparing in mentioning any of our MSS. Hiſtorians which he found well atteſted: and particularly Aelredus, Abbat of Rhieval, who wrote the Life of David King of Scots. But the Advocate tells us ſome news concerning him, viz. That he was Abbat of Mailros, which was called Ryval before King David's time. But Fordon expreſly diſtinguiſheth the two Monaſteries of Rieval and Melros; the one, he ſaith, was founded by King David, A. D. 1132. and the latter four Years after. And in the Chronicle of Melros it appears that Richard was the firſt Abbat there; to whom Waltheof ſucceeded, Uncle to King Malcolm, A. D. 1148. (who ſucceeded King David A. D. 1153.) After Waltheof William was Abbat of Mailros, A. D. 1159. after him Jocelin, A. D. 1170. In the mean time Aelredus dies Abbat of Rieval, A. D. 1167. and Silvanus was choſen in his place. From whence it is plain that the Abbies of Melros and Rieval were always diſtinct from their firſt foundation, and that Aelredus was never Abbat of Melros. This Aelredus may be called a Scotiſh Hiſtorian, for his Lamentation of King David, extant both in Fordon and Elphinſton; but I can find nothing of his writing relating to the Scotiſh Antiquities. I know he wrote a Chronicon, which Boſton of Bury (who calls him Adelredus) ſaith, was deduced from Adam to Henry I. but if there had been any thing in it to their purpoſe, thoſe Authors who cite a great deal out of it, relating to our Saxon Kings, would never have omitted what had been much more material to their Hiſtory.

Turgot is likewiſe mentioned by Voſſius, though a MS. Hiſtorian; becauſe he ſaw very good evidence for his writing ſome part of the Scotiſh Hiſtory. He lived ſaith the Advocate A. D. 1098. I grant that he is frequently quently cited by Fordon and Elphinſton, for the Acts of Malcolm and Margaret which he wrote; but I can find no more out of him than out of Aelred as to their remote Antiquities; although they ſeem to have left out very little of what Turgott wrote. But I wonder how the Advocate came to diſcover Turgott to have been Archbiſhop of St. Andrews; when Dempſter could have informed him that there was no Archbiſhop of St. Andrews till 300 Years after. And he might have found in Fordon, that there was no Archbiſhop of St. Andrews till after James Kennedy, who was Biſhop of St. Andrews, A. D. 1440. and was Nephew to James I. but after his death Patrick Graham firſt obtained the Metropolitan Right to the See of St. Andrews, but it was not quietly enjoyed till his Succeſſor Will. Sheues came into poſſeſſion of his place.

But there is in Fordon an account of the Succeſſion of the Biſhops of St. Andrews from the time of the expulſion of the Picts; which is wholly left out in Elphinſton; and there Turgott is ſaid to be conſecrated Biſhop, A. St.* Andrews was before called Kilremont, as appears by Fordon, who calls them the Biſhops of St. Andrews de Kilremont; Kil, as appears by the Scotiſh Hiſtorians, was a place of Devotion; Kilruil was the Church of Regulus (as Hector ſaith St. Andrews was called in the time of the Picts) and Kilremont, as being the Royal Seat and the principal Church, for Remont is Mons Regis; and from hence the Clergy of this Church were called Killdees (from which title the fiction of the ancient Culdees came, as the Biſhop of St. Aſaph hath truly obſerved.) Theſe Killdees had the ancient Right of chuſing the Biſhop, and were firſt excluded, as Fordon ſaith by William Wiſhart, A. D. 1273. and next by William Fraſer, after him by William Lamberton; upon which William Cumyng, Keldeorum Præpoſitus, i. e. Dean of the Church, appealed to Rome, but was overruled there. But the learned Primate of Armagh following Dempſter too much, calls him Auminus; and yet Dempſter quotes the Scotichronicon for it, where it is plainly William Cumyng. But that the Killdees were nothing but the Dean and Chapter of St. Andrews, not only appears by their Right of Election of the Biſhop, but by the exerciſe of the Juriſdiction in the vacancy of the See, which Fordon ſaith was in them.

I ſhould not ſo much have inſiſted on this miſtake of the Advocate in making Turgott Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, if he had not ſo ſeverely reflected on the Biſhop of St. Aſaph for making Fordon a Monk, as though he did it merely for his own conveniency, to ſhew him intereſted for the independency of Monks and Culdees from the Biſhops. I grant it was a miſtake, but not deſigned, and a very pardonable one, ſince Dempſter ſaith, ſome thought him a Monk, and he could not find of what condition he was; and yet he ſaith he read him; and Voſſius makes Joh. de Fordon a Monk in King John*'s time, Author of the* Scotichronicon.

This Book of Fordon the Advocate ſaith was ſo eſteemed that there were Copies of it in moſt of their Monaſteries; and he ſaith did agree with their ancient Annals; which I think will appear by the precedent Diſcourſe, not to be much to the advantage of his Cauſe.

p. 34.

And ſo much for the Authority of their Annals and Hiſtorians, from the Original Druids and Bards, to Fordon and Elphinſton.

Having thus gone through the moſt material points, which I have not diſtinctly anſwered in the following Book, there remain only ſome few things, which ſtand in need of being farther cleared. As, (1.) The Teſtimony of Eumenius in his Panegyrick to Conſtantius, from whence the Advocate proves that in the time of Cæſar there was another p. 68. Nation beſides the Picts who then inhabited Britain, and were a Colony of the Iriſh; and theſe muſt certainly have been Scots. The queſtion is not, whether there were not, according to Eumenius, Picts and Iriſh which Carm. 7. v. 90. the Britains fought with in Cæſar's time (juſt as Sidonius Apollinaris ſaith, that Cæſar conquer'd the Picts and Saxons in Britain, which is ſuch another Prolepſis as Sirmondus obſerves, who makes the coming of the Scots into Britain after the Saxons; and he was a judicious Critick and Antiquary) but the true queſtion is, whether Eumenius affirms that thoſe Buch. Rer. Scot. l. 2. Iriſh then dwelt in Britain? Yes, ſaith Buchanan, ſoli Britanni, are to be underſtood in the Genitive Caſe, and ſo theſe Words relate to the Picts and Iriſh of the Britiſh Soil. No, ſaith the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, they are to be underſtood in the Nominative Caſe; and ſo they ſet forth the advantage in Conſtantius his Victory over a Roman Legion above that of Julius Cæſar, who fought only with the Britains, a rude People, and accuſtomed to no other Enemies but Picts and Iriſh, a half naked People. The Words are thus printed in the late Paris Edition, after the comparing of ſeveral MSS. by Claudius Puteanus, and therefore more correct than the Plantin Edition. Ad hoc Natio etiam tunc rudis, & ſoli Britanni Pictis modo & Hibernis aſſueta hoſtibus, adhuc ſeminudis, facile Romanis armis ſigniſq; ceſſerunt.

The deſign of the Orator, was to leſſen the Reputation of Cæſar's Victory in compariſon of that of Conſtantius; and to that purpoſe it was very material to ſhew, that he fought with the Britains alone, who were themſelves a rude People, and had no other Enemies but ſuch as were as rude as themſelves, the Picts and Iriſh. Now to what great purpoſe was it for him to ſay that the Britains fought with the Iriſh of the Britiſh Soil? Were they ſo much better diſciplined and ſo much more famous among the Romans for deeds of Arms than the original Iriſh, that ſuch an Emphaſis muſt be p. 72. laid upon that? But the Advocate ſaith, the compariſon lies in this, that then they had been uſed only to the Picts and Iriſh, but Conſtantius overcame them when they had been long trained up in War. But if he had been pleaſed to have read the next Paragraph he would have found the Orator taking no notice of the Britains greater experience in War, but of a Roman Legion corrupted, foreign Soldiers and Gallican Merchants drawn out of the Provinces to ſtrengthen Carauſius and Allectus in their Rebellion; ſo that the Compariſon lies between the Britains alone in Cæſar's time, and the ſtrength of a well diſciplined Roman Army in the time of Conſtantius. And it is to be obſerved, that according to Eumenius his own manner of ſpeaking, if he were to be underſtood in Buchanan's ſenſe, it ſhould have been Soli Britannici for the Britiſh Soil. For ſo he hath Victoria Britannica at the end of the ſame Oration; and in another Britannica Trophæa. So that neither Senſe nor Grammar do favour Buchanan's Con- p. 70. ſtruction. But he ſaith, Joſeph Scaliger approves Buchanan's Conſtruction in his Notes on Tibullus. I have ſearched the place and can find no ſuch thing; but I am afraid he miſtook his own Notes; for there Scaliger ſpeaks about the Scoto-Brigantes, and which is more, he ſaith, the Scots were yet in Ireland. And becauſe he is ſo accuſtomed to Maxims of Law, I ſhall put him in mind of one; that a Witneſs which a Man brings for himſelf, he is bound to receive againſt himſelf.

(2.) As to Claudian*'s Expreſſion,*

he ſaith this is not to be underſtood of Ireland, but of a Countrey of Scotland of that Name, near to which the Romans had a Camp, the remainders whereof are ſtill diſcernible; and in which there are Stones found with Roman Inſcriptions deſigning the Stations of the Legions; and Strathern in Scotland is more ſubject to long Froſts than Ireland is.

p. 85.

This I confeſs is ingenuouſly obſerved. But I do not underſtand what the Roman Inſcriptions prove as to the Scots being in thoſe Parts of Britain; if the queſtion were about the Romans they would be of ſome uſe. I do not deny that Strathern had its Name from the River Ern, and the Countrey might in Latin be called Ierne from thence. But how doth it appear that Claudian or the Romans knew it by that Name? We are certain that Ierne commonly paſſed for Ireland among them; and that it was then accounted the Country of the Scots; as appears by the expreſs Teſtimony of Oroſius, who lived in that Age. And Dempſter, who fixes the Scots in Britain long before, yet is ſo convinced by theſe Words of Claudian that they were in Ireland, that he ſuppoſes them driven thither by Theodoſius, and there deſtroyed by him. And Claudian explains himſelf elſewhere, when he ſaith,

Where it ſeems ridiculous to ſay, that the Scots put all Strathern into Commotion; and this Ierne had the Sea lying between it and Britain, in whoſe Name Claudian ſpeaks; and Buchanan underſtands this of Ireland.

(3.) He urges the great improbability that the Scots ſhould manage ſo long a War, for 600 Years, and not ſettle in Britain. But this is that which is called begging the Queſtion; for the diſpute is how long the Scots in Britain did make War upon the Britains? Claudian ſaith in his time, the Scots came from Ierne, and made the Sea foam with their Oars; Gildas ſaith the Iriſh uſually returned home, intending to come back, and the Picts then reſted for a time in the farthermoſt parts of the Iſle. Why ſhould not Gildas have ſaid that the Iriſh and Picts went back to the remote parts of the Iſland, if they both inhabited there at that time?

p. 101, 103.

Gild. Epiſt.

If Gildas his Authority be allowed in this caſe, I think it is clear enough to decide the Controverſie. For, (1.) Upon Maximus his withdrawing the Roman Legions and Britiſh Infantry which never returned, he ſaith, the Britains were then firſt infeſted with two cruel tranſmarine Nations, the Scots from the Southweſt, and the Picts from the North. If there had been a War of 600 Years from before Julius Cæſar's time, as the Advocate ſaith, how comes Gildas to be ſo extremely miſtaken as to ſay, the firſt War began after Maximus his withdrawing the Roman Militia? (2.) He ſtill ſpeaks of their coming by Sea, and carrying away their anniverſary Prey beyond the Seas; and trans Maria fugaverunt, ſaith he, of the Roman Forces driving them back. How comes Gildas ſtill to mention the Seas, if they then inhabited the ſame Iſland?

p. 102, 103. But the Advocate ſaith, that by Seas the Friths are underſtood; and that in their old Laws the Frith of Forth is called Mare Scotiæ, the Sea of Scotland; and the Frith of Dumbritton is called one part of the Mare Scoticum by the Engliſh Authors; and this paſſage to and fro he makes to be eaſie, but the other home to Ireland almoſt impoſſible with their Boats in the Iriſh Seas; from whence he ſaith, that the Biſhop of St. Aſaph's Hypotheſis is abſurd and incredible, but his very conſiſtent.

To clear this we may obſerve, (1.) That to make theſe Friths to be called p. 103. Seas not improperly, he ſaith, they are 40 Miles broad in ſome places; and ſo makes the Paſſage more difficult over them than from Ireland to Scotland; for, as Camden Camd. Brit. p. 706. obſerves, there is hardly 13 Miles diſtance between ſome part of Scotland and Ireland. But this is to demonſtrate the conſiſtency of his own Ogyg. part. 3. c. 34. p. 254. Hypotheſis, and the abſurdity of the Biſhop's. (2.) The Iriſh Writers ſay, their Curroghs or light Boats cover'd with Leather were Adamn. Vit. Columb. l. 2. apud Caniſ. To. 5. Antiq. Lection. very convenient for tranſporting an Army, though not ſo proper for a Sea-fight. Adamnanus in the Life of St. Columba deſcribes one of them in which St. Cormac went to Sea, with all the Parts of a Ship, and with Sails and Oars, and a Capacity for Paſſengers; and he ſaith, he was out at Sea 14 Days Northward in it. Now what abſurdity or incredibility is there in it, that ſuch Veſſels ſhould convey the Iriſh forwards and backwards over ſo narrow a Paſſage as that between Ireland and thoſe parts of Scotland which lay neareſt to it? Why might not the Iriſh paſs thoſe Seas as well in theſe as the Britains did in Cæſar*'s time the Sea between* Gaul and Britain; for he ſaith, they gave Aſſiſtance to the Gauls, and they had then no other Cæſar. de Bell. Gallic. l. 3. kind of Ships? And Cæſar himſelf was ſo far from deſpiſing them, that he thought them a very uſeful Invention and made uſe of them himſelf in Spain to tranſport his Soldiers. The Keel and Maſts, he ſaith, were made De Bel. Civ. l. 1. of the lighteſt Wood, and the Bodies of them of Wicker, cover'd over with Leather; which he had learnt from the Britains. Lucan calls them little Ships, and not a miſerable little kind of ſhapeleſs Boats, as the Advocate doth. p. 101.

Lucan. l. 4. Primum cana Salix madefacto vimine, parvam and in theſe he ſaith, the Britains were wont to paſs the Ocean.

Navigat Oceano.——

In the old MSS. Gloſſaries in the Margin of Joſſelin*'s* Gildas, Curuca is Solin. c 35. rendred by Navis, and not a little ſhapeleſs Boat. And Solinus expreſly ſaith (even in the place quoted by him) that it was common to paſs between Ireland and Britain with theſe Curroghs. And ſuch kind of Veſſels covered with Leather were not only uſed by the Britains and Iriſh, but by the Æthiopians, Ægyptians, Sabeans, Romans and Spaniards; as might be ſhewed from the Teſtimonies of Agatharchides, Strabo, Virgil, Pliny and others. How comes it then to be almoſt impoſſible for the Iriſh to paſs the Seas in ſuch Veſſels? And wherein lies the Abſurdity and Incredibility of the Biſhop's Hypotheſis, when he makes them to croſs but 13 Miles from Ireland to Britain in theſe Curroghs, and the Advocate allows the Friths over which they were to paſs to be 40 Miles broad in ſome places? And how how could they be ſecure they ſhould not be driven into the broadeſt places? If theſe Veſſels then could convey them ſafely over the Friths, why not as well from Ireland to the neareſt Parts of Scotland?

But I have another Argument from Gildas that the Seas cannot be underſtood of the two Friths, viz. That Gildas ſaith, when the Roman Legion Gild. Epiſt. first defeated the Picts and the Scots, they commanded a Wall to be p. 13. 2. built between the two Seas to hinder their Incurſion: which is confirmed by Bede, who ſaith, this Wall began at Penneltun, not far from Abercorny, Bed. l. 1. c. 12. and ended at Alcluith, and was deſigned to keep out their Enemies. Now I deſire to know to what purpoſe this Wall was built between the two Friths, to keep out the Scots and Picts, if their Cuſtom was, as the Advocate ſuppoſes, to croſs over the two Friths and to land on this ſide the Wall? Did the Romans and Britains ſo little underſtand the way of their Enemies coming, to put themſelves to ſo much pains and trouble for no purpoſe at all? And Buchanan thinks the laſt Stone Wall made by the Romans Buch. p. for the Security of the Britains, mentioned by Gildas and Bede, was made 40. 2. in the ſame place where he thinks Severus his Wall ſtood before. Gild. p. 15. Bed. l. 1. And it had been madneſs to erect a Stone Wall there to keep out the Scots and Picts, c. 12. if they came out of Scotland over the two Friths, and landed where the Wall could do the Britains no Service. But Gildas and Bede ſay, they attempted the Wall, and forced themſelves a Paſſage over it; irrumpunt terminos ſaith Bede; and with their Iron hooks drew the Britains from the Wall, ſaith Gildas. What need all this if they came over the Friths, and ſo left the Wall between the two Friths behind them? But from hence it is very plain, that Gildas knew nothing of their paſſing the Friths, and therefore muſt be underſtood of their croſſing the Seas from Ireland to Scotland, and there joining with the Picts, and ſo marching towards the Wall between the two Friths in order to their paſſing into the Roman Province. And it is obſervable, that Gildas ſaith after the making the ſecond Wall, the Scots and Picts upon the Romans withdrawing grew more confident, and took poſſeſſion of the Northern part of the Iſland as far as the Wall, pro indigenis, in the Place of the Natives; which ſhews that he looked on them as late comers, and then newly entred into poſſeſſion there.

The laſt thing I ſhall take notice of is, concerning the early Converſion of the Scotiſh Nation to the Chriſtian Faith. And here I am particularly concerned to anſwer his Arguments, ſince in the following Book I have re- Ch. 2. jected the Tradition of the Scots Converſion under King Donald, and aſ- p. 52, 53. ſert Palladius to have been ſent to the original Scots in Ireland. But the Advocate thinks it ſo clear that they were converted before A. D. 503. p. 112. that from thence he concludes, that they were ſettled in Scotland before that time. And it were a piece of very ill Nature to deny this Concluſion, if the Premiſſes be well proved.

(1.) As to the Converſation under King Donald; he ſhews,

1. That it is very probable the Britiſh Chriſtians being perſecuted by p. 113. the Roman Emperors in the Southern Parts, would go into the Northern and propagate their Religion there. But this proves only the probability of the Converſion of the Northern Britains, and not of the Scots.

2. He ſaith, the Druids were prepared to receive Chriſtianity, and p. 114. ſo would be eaſie to be converted themſelves, and ready to convert the People. He ſpeaks ſoon after of a double Converſion of their Nation from p. 117. Paganiſm and Pelagianiſm. Methinks theſe Words do not argue the latter

Converſion to have been ſuch, as to have left no Dregs behind it. For how came the Druids natural improvements to facilitate their Converſion more than the Philoſophers at Athens or Rome? And the Iriſh Antiquaries ſay, the Druids there were the great oppoſers of the Goſpel. But ſtill theſe Druids might be among the Britains and not the Scots. Ogyg. p. 203.

p. 118. 3. He ſaith, That Donald was their firſt Chriſtian King, A. D. 203. ſeems moſt fully proved. Not by any thing yet ſaid. But what then is the full Proof? In ſhort it is this. It was a matter of Fact. Very true; Matters of Fact muſt be proved by Witneſſes. True again. But who are theſe Witneſſes? Even the Hiſtorians of their Countrey, and the Annals of their Monaſteries. And ſo we are thrown back upon the debate of their Authority, which I have gone through already. Let it therefore reſt upon their Credibility; only remembring that no ſuch King as Donald doth appear in their moſt ancient Genealogies.

p. 115. 4. He affirms, That Baronius allows their Converſion by Pope Victor, and he made Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory more his Task than the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and was more diſintereſted. It is poſſible, the Biſhop of St. Aſaph may have conſidered Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory with as much Care as Baronius himſelf; but I dare ſay, with greater judgment and impartiality. And of all things I cannot but wonder at the Advocate's looking on Baronius as more diſintereſted, when the Converſion from a Pope was in queſtion. Which ſhews him to be ſuch a ſtranger to Baronius, that one would think he had never looked into him. For Dempſter is diſpleaſed with Baronius, as one injurious to their Nation, as to this firſt Converſion, ſaying, that there were no Chriſtians in Scotland before Palladius but ſuch as fled thither out of this part of Britain becauſe of Perſecution. And Baronius doth wonder that ſuch a Converſion ſhould be omitted not only by Bede but by Marianus Scotus. Dempſt. Appar. l. 1. c. 6. Bar. A. D. 429. n. 2.

p. 117. 5. The Magdeburgian Centuries, he ſaith, agree with Baronius; and theſe are the Standards of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory to the Profeſſors of both Religions. He had as good have ſaid they were the Hercules Pillars and there is no paſſage beyond them. But no learned Profeſſors of either Religion allow theſe to be Standards. How many Errors in Baronius have been diſcovered by the learned Antiquaries of his own Communion? What Complaints have been made of his partiality to the Court of Rome, not only by the Sorboniſts but by the King's Advocates in France? And as to the Magdeburgians, we commend them for their noble attempt, and great diligence and induſtry; but matters of Eccleſiaſtick Antiquity are extremely improved ſince that time. More ancient Authors having been publiſhed out of MSS. and better Editions by comparing the Authors before printed with MSS. and many counterfeit Authors diſcovered, and far greater Enquiries have been made into all parts of Eccleſiaſtick Antiquities; ſo that after ſo many new diſcoveries to make theſe the Standards, were almoſt as abſurd as to make Ptolemy the Standard for modern Geography. We do not diſparage what he hath done, when we ſay, many things have been found out ſince his time.

p. 114. (2.) As to the miſſion of Palladius into Scotland, the Advocate inſiſts on theſe three things, 1. That Bede affirms that he was ſent to the Scots in Britain. p. 119. 2. That there is no probability in the Circumſtances of his being ſent into Ireland. p. 122. 3. That Dr. Hammond yields that the Scots were converted before Celeſtine's time; and therefore it is more probable that Palladius was ſent Biſhop to them.

To theſe particulars I ſhall give a diſtinct Anſwer.

(1.) To Bede's Teſtimony, he affirms, that in the eighth of Theodoſius l. 1. c. 13. the younger, Palladius was ſent by Celeſtine the firſt Biſhop to the Scots believing in Chriſt. Wherein Bede only applies Proſper's Words to the eighth of Theodoſius, which he had placed under Baſſus and Antiochus Conſuls; but he doth not determine whether theſe Scots were in Ireland or in Britain. But the Advocate ſaith, all that which Bede ſaith before and after concerning the Scots relates to the Scots in Britain, and therefore theſe Words are ſo to be underſtood. Whereas Bede in the very beginning declares, That Ireland was the proper Countrey of the Scots; and that l. 1. c. 1. Dumbritton Frith did anciently ſeparate the Picts and the Britains; but the Scots coming afterwards to the Northern part of that Frith, there ſettled themſelves. Which Words do evidently prove, that Bede did not look on the Scots as ancient Inhabitants there; for then he would have ſaid, that the Frith did antiquitus gentem Britonum à Scotis ſecernere; but he never mentions the Scots but the Picts as the ancient Inhabitants on the Northern part of the Frith. But, ſaith the Advocate, Bede's p. 60. Title of his Chapter is of the ancient Inhabitants of Britain, and he mentions the Scots among them. Very true; but ſhall not Bede explain himſelf whom he means by the ancient Inhabitants, viz. the Britains and Picts? For, by the Advocate's reaſoning the Saxons will be proved to have been in Britain before Julius Cæſar, as well as the Scots, for they make up one of the five Nations ſpoken of in that firſt Chapter. And ſo Bede doth not only ſettle the Scots and the Picts in this Countrey, by his firſt Chapter, but the Engliſh too. And it is an extraordinary ſagacity that can diſcover this Chapter in Bede, to be clear to a Demonſtration that he makes p. 65. the Scots to be ancient Inhabitants in Britain; whereas, to my dull apprehenſion Bede is clear the other Way.

But the Advocate proceeds to ſhew, that the Name of Scots doth originally belong to the Scots in Britain, and only by way of Communication to thoſe in Ireland. p. 146. This were indeed to the purpoſe if it were proved. And there ought to be the more care in doing it, ſince it is ſo new and ſingular an Opinion. For even Buchanan ſaith, that the Iriſh were at firſt called Scots; Buch. l. 2. and from thence they paſſed into Albany; and that by the p. 16. Name Scots their coming from the Iriſh is declared. p. 18. 2. Joh. Major ſaith, Major. that Scotia among their Anceſtors was the common Name for Ireland. H.ſt. Scot. And if their ancient Annals may be believed, the Name of Scot came from l. 1. c. 9. Scota the Wife of Gathelos, whoſe Poſterity went firſt into Ireland, and then carried the Name into Scotland. In Fordon and Elphinſton there is another Scota mentioned, as a Leader of the firſt Colony into Ireland, who gave the Name to that Countrey of Scotia; and Joh. Major ſaith, She was the Mother of Hiber. But whichſoever of theſe ſtands, unleſs the Advocate will at laſt give up the Cauſe of their ancient Annals, which he hath contended ſo warmly for, he muſt renounce this Opinion of his, that the Name of Scots doth originally belong to the Albian Scots, and only by way of communication to the Iriſh; ſo that there is no need to produce the plain Teſtimonies of Oroſius, Bede and Iſidore, which make Ireland the Oroſ. l. 1. c. 2. proper Countrey of the Scots. But it is a wonderful ſubtility from hence Bed. l. 1. c. 1. to infer, as the Advocate doth, as if it might have been juſtly doubted, and were not true in all ſenſes. Iſidor. Orig. l 14. c. 6. Doth he mean proper or improper ſenſes? p. 151. Their Words are plain that Ireland in a ſtrict and proper ſenſe was the Countrey of the Scots, i. e. the Patria Originis, though the other might afterwards be Patria incolatus & Domicilii; as the Advocate himſelf doth

p. 152. diſtinguiſh; but that which follows from hence is, that if the Scots came originally from Ireland, then the Name of Scots doth not originally belong to the Scots in Britain, but to thoſe in Ireland, unleſs he can ſhew that the reaſon of the Name doth agree to them only upon their removal into Britain. As, to take his own inſtance; no one will queſtion that the Colony of Virginia are called Engliſh, becauſe the Inhabitants of the Countrey from whence they came are ſo called. But were not the Iriſh called Scots before they went into Scotland? If not, that could not be propriè Scotorum Patria, as Oroſius and Bede and Iſidore affirm; as England could not be ſaid to be the proper Countrey of the Engliſh unleſs the Inhabitants were called Engliſh; and the Colony of Virginia received its denomination of being Engliſh becauſe they came from hence. Unleſs therefore the Advocate be pleaſed to ſhew, that the Name of Scots doth ſo belong to the Iriſh upon their remove into Britain, that it could not agree to them in Ireland, it will be impoſſible for him to make out, that the Name of Scots doth originally belong to the Iriſh in Britain, and only by way of communication to thoſe in Ireland. I have already ſhewed that Joſ. Scaliger doth aſſign ſuch a Reaſon of the Name of Scoti as agrees only to thoſe who came over upon Expeditions; but I believe the Scots will take it far better to receive their Name from the Iriſh Scots, than to have had the original Name given them on ſuch an Account.

p. 19. (2.) As to the Circumſtances of Palladius his Miſſion, the main difficulty objected, is from St. Patrick's being ſent ſo ſoon after into Ireland; which needed not have been if Palladius were ſent before thither and not rather into Scotland, whither Bale ſaith he went and died not, A. D. 431. but 434. This is the force of what the Advocate ſaith upon this matter. But the Biſhop of St. Aſaph had proved from Proſper, that Palladius was ſent to the Scots in Ireland; becauſe he diſtinguiſhes the two Iſlands, the one he calls Roman, i. e. Britain, the other Barbarous where the Scots lived, to whom Palladius was ſent; which could be no other than p. 116. Ireland. To which the Advocate anſwers, that the Northern part of Britain was by Tacitus and Bede ſaid to be reduced into an Iſland by the Roman Wall from Sea to Sea; and Bede in other places calls the Scots Iſlanders. Tacitus indeed ſaith, that by Agricola's Fortifications between the two Friths, the Britains were driven as into another Iſland; but this is a very different way of ſpeaking from that of Proſper, who makes a diſtinction between two proper Iſlands. And Proſper could not be ignorant that Feſtus Avienus not long before, viz. in the time of Theodoſius, had diſtinguiſhed the two Iſlands, the one inhabited by the Hiberni, and the other he calls Inſula Albionum, which takes in all that we now call Britain. But according to the old Geographers, Ireland was accounted one of the Britiſh Iſlands; as appears by the Teſtimonies of Pliny, Apuleius, Ptolemy, Diodorus Siculus and Marcianus Heracleota, which have been produced by others, and need not to be repeated here. (Uſſer. Primord. p. 722, &c. War. Antiq. Hib. c. 1.) But no one ever mentioned Scotland as a diſtinct Iſland, and therefore it is unreaſonable to underſtand Proſper in that Senſe. Bede mentions the Inſulani in the Chapter referr'd to; (Bed. l. 1. c. 12.) but nothing can be plainer, than that he ſpeaks of the Britains on this ſide the Wall; who raiſed up the Wall of Turf between the two Friths for their own ſecurity againſt their Enemies beyond the Wall. In the other l. 4. c. 26. place of Bede, the Inſulani are to be underſtood of thoſe of Ireland, as Bede clearly expreſſeth himſelf, miſſo in Hiberniam exercitu. But the ingenious Advocate hath a fetch beyond this, for he ſaith, that Bede by Ireland meant Scotland, which he ſets himſelf to prove from this very paſſage. For, ſaith he, he, the ſame thing that is firſt ſaid to be done in Hibernia is afterwards p. 153. ſaid to be done in Scotia. And might it not be ſo if Ireland were then called Scotia, as appears by the former Teſtimonies? But that Bede could not mean any other than Ireland appears from hence, that he ſaith, the Nation which Egfred invaded had been always kind to the Engliſh; and the Iriſh Annals give an account of the very Place and Time of Egfred's landing Ogyg. in Ireland, and the Captives he carried away from thence. But Bede elſewhere p. 230. ſaith, the Scots in Britain had been great Enemies to them, as appeared l. 1. c. 34. by the Battel at Degſaſtan, where the whole Army of the Scots was almoſt cut off by Edilfredus King of Northumberland, and their King Edan fled; from which time none of the Kings of Scotland durſt appear in the Field againſt the Engliſh. Which argues no great kindneſs between them; but Bede ſaith, that theſe had been Nationi Anglorum gens ſuper amiciſſima; and therefore his Words muſt relate to the Scots in Ireland.

" But doth not Bede ſay, that Columbanus came from Ireland to Hy, p. 153. " and ſo to Britain; and afterwards that Colman returned to Scotland, " i. e. to Hy from whence Columba came; therefore Scotland was called Ireland; or rather, Ireland was called Scotia; which is ſo clear in Bede, that I wonder that any that carefully read him can diſpute it. He ſaith indeed, that the Scots had a Kingdom in Britain, but where he ſpeaks of the Religion of the Scots he then means the Scots of Ireland; as will eaſily appear by the ſeries of his Diſcourſe. When he ſpeaks of Laurentius his care l. 2. c. 4. not only of the Britains but of the Scots too, he explains himſelf to mean thoſe who lived in Ireland, an Iſland near to Britain. Columba, he ſaith, l. 3. c. 4. came from Ireland to convince the Northern Picts, and obtained from their King the Iſland Hy, where he founded his Monaſtery, which he ſaith, was c. 3. the chief of all the Northern Scots, not of thoſe in Scotland but in Ireland. For in the ſame Chapter he diſtinguiſheth the Scots in the Southern Parts of Ireland, from thoſe in the Northern; the former following the Roman Cuſtom of Eaſter, and the Northern refuſing it. From theſe Aidanus came, the firſt Scotiſh Biſhop who ſettled among the Engliſh, being ſent for by King Oſwald. Furſeus, ſaith he afterwards, came from Ireland, c. 3, 5. being of the moſt noble Race of the Scots; and there he mentions the c. 19. Scots of his own Nation, and ſaith, he had preached a great while in Scotia before he came into England; but he never takes notice, after his coming over, of his being any where, but among the Britains before he went to the Eaſt Angles. After Aidan's death Finan came from the ſame Scots, c. 25. who perſiſted in the old way of the keeping Eaſter; after Finan Colman ſucceeded, who was miſſus à Scotia, who maintained the ſame practice; and afterwards he returned home, in Scotiam regreſſus eſt; but what he means c. 26. by it Bede preſently informs us, when he ſaith, that Tuda ſucceeded, who had been brought up among the Southern Scots, i. e. in the Southern Parts of Ireland. Tuda died of the Plague, which Bede ſaith paſſed into Ireland, whither many Engliſh went in the time of Finan and Colman, who c. 27. were all kindly received by the Scots. When Colman returned, Bede ſaith, l. 4. c. 4. he went firſt to Hy, then to an Iſland on the Weſt of Ireland; but not a Word of the Northern Parts of Britain. Afterwards he ſheweth how the l. 5. c. 16. greateſt part of the Scots in Ireland were brought to compliance in the point of keeping Eaſter by means of Adamnanus, who endeavoured to reduce thoſe of Hy but could not; but upon Egbert's coming to them from Ireland, the c. 13. Abbat there. And now let any indifferent Reader judge, whether by Scotia Bede underſtands the Northern Parts of Britain or Ireland.

p. 156. “ But after all, doth not Bede ſay, That the Iſland Hy did belong to “ Britain as a part of it? And what then follows? Doth not Bede in the ſame place, ſay, it was given be the Picts not by the Scots to the Scotiſh Monks who came from Ireland? So that upon the whole matter, that which Bede underſtands by Scotia ſeems to be Ireland, although he affirms the Scots to have ſettled in the Northern Parts of Britain, and to have ſet up a Kingdom there.

From whence there appears no probability of Palladius*'s being ſent to* the Scots in Britain; Bede ſaying nothing of their Converſion, when he ſo l. 3. c. 4. punctually ſets down the Converſion of the South Picts by Ninias a Britiſh Biſhop and of the Northern Picts by Columba, a Scotiſh or Iriſh Presbyter.

“ But if Palladius were ſent to the Scots in Ireland, how came St. Patrick to be ſent ſo ſoon after him? To this the Biſhop of St. Aſaph anſwers, that Palladius might die ſo ſoon after his Miſſion that Pope Celeſtine might have time enough to ſend St. Patrick before his own death. And this he makes out by laying the ſeveral Circumſtances of the Story together, as they are reported by Authors, which the Advocate calls a laborious Hy- p. 120, 121. potheſis, and elaborate contrivance to divert all the unanſwerable Authorities, proving that Palladius was ſent to them in Scotland, A. D. 431. What thoſe unanſwerable Authorities are, which prove Palladius ſent to the Scots in Britain I cannot find. And for all that I ſee by this Anſwer, the only fault of the Biſhop's Hypotheſis is. that it is too exact, and doth too much clear the appearance of contradiction between the two Miſſions.

(3.) As to Dr. Hammond's Teſtimony (who is deſervedly called by the p. 122. Advocate, a learned and Epiſcopal Engliſh Divine) it is very eaſily an- Vindication of the Diſſertation about Epiſcopacy, p. 160, &c. ſwered. For, 1. He looks on the whole Story of the Scots Converſion as very uncertainly ſet down by Authors. 2. He ſaith, That Bozius applies the Converſion under Victor to Ireland, then called Scotia; for which he quotes Bede. 3. That neither Marianus Scotus nor Bede do take the leaſt notice of it. 4. That if Proſper*'s Words be underſtood of the* Scots in Britain, yet they do not prove the thing deſigned by his Adverſaries, viz. That the Churches there were governed by Presbyters without Biſhops; for Proſper ſuppoſes that they remained barbarous ſtill, and therefore the Plantation was very imperfect, and could not be underſtood of any formed Churches. But the Advocate very wiſely conceals one paſſage which overthrows his Hypotheſis, viz. That they could not be ſuppoſed to receive the firſt Rudiments of their Converſion from Rome, viz. under Pope Victor, ſince the Scots joined with the Britains in rejecting the Roman Cuſtoms. From whence we ſee, that Dr. Hammond was far from being of the Advocate's mind in this matter; and what he propoſes as to ſome Rudiments of Chriſtianity in Scotland before Palladius his coming thither, was only from an uncertain Tradition, and for reconciling the ſeeming differences between Bede and Proſper; or rather for reconciling Proſper to himſelf.

p. 135. But I remember the Advocate*'s Obſervation in* the Caſe of their Predeceſſor's Apology againſt Edward I. viz. That they deſigned, as moſt Pleaders do, to gain their Point at any rate; and how far this eloquent Advocate hath made good this Obſervation through his Diſcourſe I leave the Reader to determine.

Having thus gone through all the material Parts of the Advocate*'s Book, I ſhall conclude with a ſerious* Proteſtation that no Pique or Animoſity led me to this Undertaking, no ill Will to the Scotiſh Nation, much leſs to the Royal Line, (which I do believe hath the Advantage in point of Antiquity above any other in Europe, and as far as we know in the World.) But I thought it nececeſſary for me to enquire more ſtrictly into this Defence of ſuch pretended Antiquities; both becauſe I owed ſo much ſervice to ſo worthy and excellent a Friend as the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, and becauſe if the Advocate*'s Arguments would hold good, they would* overthrow ſeveral things I had aſſerted in the following Book; and withall, I was willing to let the learned Nobility and Gentry of that Nation ſee how much they have been impoſed upon by Hector Boethius and his followers; and that the true Honour and Wiſdom of their Nation is not concerned in defending ſuch Antiquities, which are univerſally diſeſteemed among all judicious and inquiſitive Men. And it would far better become Perſons of ſo much Ingenuity and Sagacity, to follow the Examples of other European Nations, in rejecting the Romantick Fables of the Monkiſh Times, and at laſt to ſettle their Antiquities on firm and ſolid Foundations.

As to the following Book, it comes forth as a Specimen of a greater Deſign, (if God gives me Life and Opportunity) which is to clear the moſt important Difficulties of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. And becauſe I look on a General Church Hiſtory, as too heavy a Burthen to be undergone by any Man, when he is fit for it by Age and Conſideration, I have therefore thought it the better way to undertake ſuch particular Parts of it which may be moſt uſeful, and I have now begun with theſe Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches; which may be followed by others as I ſee occaſion. But I hope none will have juſt cauſe to complain that I have not uſed diligence or faithfulneſs enough in this preſent Work, or that I have ſet up Fancies and Chimæra*'s of my own inſtead of* the true Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches. I have neither neglected nor tranſcribed thoſe who have written before me; and if in ſome things I differ from them, it was not out of the Humour of oppoſing any great Names, but becauſe I intended not to deliver other Mens Judgments, but my own.

THE ANTIQUITIES OF THE Britiſh-Churches.

CHAP. I.

Of the firſt Planting a Chriſtian Church in Britain by St. Paul.

NO Chriſtian Church planted in Britain, during the Reign of Tiberius.
The Tradition concerning Joſeph of Arimathea and his Brethren coming to Glaſſenbury, at large examined.
No Footſteps of it in the Britiſh times.
The pretended Teſtimonies of Britiſh Writers diſproved.
St. Patrick's Epiſtle, a Forgery.
Of the Saxon Charters, eſpecially the large one of King Ina.
The Antiquity of Seals in England.
Ingulphus his Teſtimony explained.
All the Saxon Charters ſuſpicious, till the end of the ſeventh Century.
The occaſion of this Tradition, from an old Britiſh Church there.
The Circumſtances about Joſeph of Arimathea and Arviragus very improbable.
Sir Henry Spelman vindicated.
The State of the Roman Province in Britain about that time.
No ſuch King as Arviragus then.
Not the ſame with Caractacus.
A Chriſtian Church proved to be Planted here in the Apoſtles times.

The Authentick Teſtimonies of Euſebius, Theodoret, and Clemens Romanus to that purpoſe.

St. Paul in Probability, the firſt Founder of a Church here.

The Time and Opportunity he had for it, after his Releaſe.

St. Peter and St. Paul compared, as to their Preaching here, and the far greater Probability of St. Paul's.

IT is an Opinion generally received among our later Writers, as (a) one of them tells the World, That the Converſion of the Britiſh Nation, to the Chriſtian Faith, was performed towards the latter end of the Reign of Tiberius Cæſar, i. e. about thirty ſeven years after Chriſt's Nativity. But whoſoever compares the Circumſtances of thoſe times, and conſiders the ſmall number of the years between our Saviour's Paſſion, and the death of Tiberius, will find very little Probability, of the founding a Chriſtian Church ſo ſoon, in a place ſo remote as Britain.

(a) Animadverſ. on the Church Hiſt. of Britain, p. 5, 6.

To make this appear, I ſhall not inſiſt upon the Teſtimony of Apollonius in (b) Euſebius, concerning the ancient Tradition, That our Saviour commanded his Apoſtles, not to depart from Jeruſalem within twelve Years after his Aſcenſion; nor on that of the (c) Alexandrian Chronicle, wherein it is ſaid, That the Apoſtles did not ſeparate, till after the Council at Jeruſalem; nor on that of Hippolytus Thebanus in (d) Glycas, and of Euodius in (e) Nicephorus, who reckon the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, to be ſeven Years after Chriſt's Reſurrection (which ſome learned (f) Chronologers think more probable, than the common Computation which allows but one) before which time it is not pretended by any, that the Diſciples were diſperſed abroad.

But that which is of greater force and certainty, is, ſuppoſing the diſperſion to have been within the Reign of Tiberius, yet the Scripture gives ſuch an Account of the Extent, and Deſign of the Diſciples preaching upon it, as utterly overthrows any Probability of their coming hither, for the Words are, Now they which were ſcattered abroad upon the Perſecution, that aroſe about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, Preaching the Word unto none, but unto the Jews alone. But the neareſt of theſe places, is at a great diſtance from Britain, and if they Preached to none but to the Jews, they were not likely to convert the Gentile Britains. (g) Baronius grants, A. D. 35. That hitherto the Jews had only the Goſpel preached to them; Although at the ſame time he pleads for the Tradition of Lazarus, Mary Magdalen, Martha and Marcella, coming then with Maximinus in a Ship without Oars to Marſeilles, with a deſign, no doubt, to ſpread the Goſpel among the Gentiles in Gaul, for (h) Lazarus is ſuppoſed to have been Biſhop of Marſeilles, and Maximinus of Aix. And he adds out of a Manuſcript in the Vatican Library (which not only, like the Houſholder in the Goſpel, brings forth things New and Old, but ſometimes things New for Old, as happens in the Caſe of this Manuſcript, it being lately written, as (i) Archbiſhop Uſher hath obſerved) That Joſeph of Arimathea did bear them Company, and came over into Britain, to Preach the Goſpel;

Which according to his own Suppoſition, muſt be only to the Jews in Britain, if there were any here; But if it be underſtood of the Gentiles, (k) Jac. Sirmondus ſaith in plain Terms, This Tradition contradicts the Scripture; For ſaith he, If the People of Marſeilles (or Britain) had the Goſpel Preached to them ſo ſoon, how comes it to paſs, that ſix Years after, Cornelius is ſaid to be the firſt Fruits of the Gentiles? And that upon the Incouragement of his Example, thoſe of the Diſperſion, began to Preach to the Gentiles at Antioch? Which is confeſſed by (l) Baronius himſelf. The ſtrength of which Argument hath prevailed ſo much in France, that the (m) Defenders of this Tradition, have been there contented to let go the Reign of Tiberius, and to place it a great deal later, Anno Dom. 62. (n) For they evidently ſaw, there was no Poſſibility of defending it upon other Terms, although hereby they make Lazarus and Joſeph of Arimathea of great Age, when they undertook this Voyage with their Companions: But when ſuch a Tradition is either wholly rejected there, as diſagreeing to the Scripture, or ſet ſo much later, on purpoſe to reconcile it to the Acts of the Apoſtles, it cannot but ſeem ſtrange among us, that there ſhould be ſuch an Opinion ſtill ſo generally received, That the Goſpel ſhould be here Preached before the end of the Reign of Tiberius.

But that which hath miſ-led moſt of our Writers, hath been a paſſage in Gildas, which they have applied to the particular Preaching of the Goſpel in Britain, whereas it ſeems onely to be underſtood of the General Liberty of Preaching it throughout the World, as will beſt appear by conſidering, not barely the Words, but the Circumſtances of them. (o) Gildas, having undertaken to give ſome Account of the ancient Britiſh Church in the beginning of his Epiſtle, In the firſt place, ſadly laments the want of any Domeſtick Monuments, to give him certain information. For, ſaith he, If there were any ſuch, they were either burnt by our Enemies, or carried ſo far by the Baniſhment of our Countrymen, that they no longer appear, and therefore he was forced to pick up what he could out of Foreign Writers, without any continued Series. From hence, he proceeds to ſpeak of the Romans eaſie Conqueſt of Britain, but Difficult keeping of it, the Inhabitants being ſo unable to withſtand the Romans, and yet ſo unwilling to obey them. Of which he gives a Remarkable Inſtance, in the Revolt under Boadicea, and the harder uſage of the Britains after it. Interea, ſaith he, man Senate, death being threatned by that Prince, to all that ſhould inform againſt the Soldiers of Chriſt.

This I take to be Gildas his true meaning: For it is certain, he ſpeaks of a double ſhining of the Goſpel, one more General to the World, the other more particular to this Iſland: The former, he ſaith, was in the latter end of Tiberius; The latter was, Interea, In the mean time, of which he firſt ſpeaks, and that refers back to the time he had ſpoken of before, which was the fatal Victory over Boadicea, and the Britains, by Suetonius Paulinus, and the ſlavery they underwent after it. Which happen'd in the time of Nero, about the middle of his Reign, almoſt twenty years after Claudius had ſent A. Plautius to reduce Britain into the form of a Province, to whom ſucceeded P. Oſtorius Scapula, A. Didius Gallus, and Veranius, in the Government of Britain, before Suetonius Paulinus came into the Province. For after Claudius his Triumph for his Victory in Britain, the Romans began to deduce Colonies, to ſettle Magiſtrates and Juriſdictions here, after the manner of other Provinces, and ſo continual intercourſe was maintained between the Roman City, and the Britiſh Colonies; Cities of Trade were ſet up, and the Roman Merchants were very buſie in furniſhing new Provinces with neceſſaries, and Superfluities: And the Province of Britain, in the beginning of Nero's Reign was thought to be in ſo ſettled, and flouriſhing a condition, that (p) Dio ſaith, Seneca, had here at one time to the value of 300000 p. as Mr. Camden computes it. A vaſt ſum for a Philoſopher! But that which I infer from hence is, That this was a very probable time, which Gildas hath pitched upon, for the bringing the Goſpel hither, viz. between the time of A. Plautius's coming over, in the time of Claudius, and the Battel between Boadicea, and Suetonius Paulinus, as will more fully appear in the following diſcourſe, As to the more General ſhining of the Goſpel to the World, he pitches upon the latter end of Tiberius, as the certain time of it, in which he makes uſe of the very Expreſſions of (q) Euſebius, and that paſſage concerning Tiberius and the Senate differing about Chriſt and his followers, which Euſebius took from (r) Tertullian, who ſpeaks of it with great aſſurance; And (s) Oroſius gives a more particular account of it, all which is very agreeable to what Gildas had ſaid before, That he muſt make uſe of Foreign Writers in ſo great a defect of their own.

But to proceed clearly in this matter, there are three things I deſign, concerning the firſt planting a Chriſtian Church here.

1. To examine the Tradition, concerning Joſeph of Arimathea, and his Brethren coming hither to plant Chriſtianity.
2. To ſhew that there was a Chriſtian Church planted here, in the Apoſtles times, and within that compaſs Gildas ſpeaks of.
3. To prove the great probability, that St. Paul firſt founded a Church here.

1. As to the Tradition concerning Joſeph of Arimathea; I confeſs I look on it, as an Invention of the Monks of Glaſſenbury to ſerve their Intereſts, by advancing the Reputation of their Monaſtery. But becauſe becauſe this Tradition hath met with better Entertainment than it deſerved, among the generality of our late Writers, who took it for granted, and believed that it is grounded on the Teſtimony of ancient Records; I ſhall, before I proceed farther, take the pains to examine it, both as to the Authority, and the Circumſtances of it.

It ſeems to be a little Suſpicious, at firſt view, that ſo conſiderable a part of the Antiquities of this Church ſhould be wholly paſt by, by the moſt ancient and inquiſitive Writers of our Affairs; So that neither the true Gildas, nor Bede, nor Aſſerius, nor Marianus Scotus, nor any of the ancient Annals ſhould take the leaſt notice of this Tradition. (t) Sanders indeed ſaith, That Polydore Virgil proves it from the moſt ancient Gildas, but he never attempted any ſuch thing: For having ſet down the Tradition of Joſeph of Arimathea, with the beſt advantage, he only proves from Gildas, That the Chriſtian Religion was very early received here, which might be very true, although Joſeph had never come from Arimathea. And yet, (v) Card. Bona quotes Gildas for this Tradition, on the credit of Sanders, unleſs he were deceived by thoſe who produce the Teſtimony of Gildas Albanius, in his Book of the Victory of Aurelius Ambroſius to the ſame purpoſe. But no ſuch Book of the true Gildas could ever yet be found by thoſe who have ſearched after it with the greateſt diligence. (w) Leland particularly relates, concerning himſelf, What incredible pains he took to find out this piece of Gildas, and ſaith, That he hoped at laſt to have met with it in the Library at Glaſſenbury, where Gildas is ſaid by William of Malmesbury, to have ended his days, but not a Leaf of it was to be ſeen, either there, or in any of the Old Libraries in Wales, which he ſearched on purpoſe. And after all, he refers us to the credit of (x) Geoffrey of Monmouth, for it, where it muſt reſt, till ſome better Authority be produced for it: Yet Bale, and Pits, keep up the Title of it, as they do of many others which were never in being, as the Annals of Gildas Cambrius, the Epigrams of Claudia Rufina, and the Epiſtles of Joſeph of Arimathea, &c. which Bale thinks Probable, that he did Write, and therefore ſets them down as Written: And from him a learned (y) Antiquary reckons them among our Hiſtorical Antiquities. And no better Foundation can yet be diſcovered for this Book of Gildas, it being as probable, that he ſhould write a Book of that Victory of Ambroſius, ſince Gildas ſaith, He was born upon the day of his obtaining it, if it were that on Badon-Hill. But ſuch Probabilities, are very far from Teſtimonies. It is true, as the (z) learned Primate obſerves, That Gervaſe of Tilbury, Nauclerus, Trithemius and many others, ſay, That Geoffery followed Gildas in ſuch a Book written by him: But they produce no Authority for any ſuch Book, but Geoffrey himſelf, and untill ſome better appears, I muſt ſuſpend my belief: It being common with ſuch Writers as himſelf, to pretend to ſuch Authorities, as no one elſe ever had the fortune to find. For it being their buſineſs to give an account of times long before their own, it were a vain thing to hope for any Credit, unleſs they could produce ſome Teſtimonies nearer thoſe times, which might be of ſome weight if they were Authentick. And this is the Reaſon, why theſe Inventers of Hiſtory have ſtill given out, that they met with ſome Elder Writers, out of whom they have pretended to derive their Reports. Thus (a) Hunibaldus pretends, as much to follow the Old Sicambrian Manuſcripts of Waſthald, for the remote Antiquities of the Franks, as Geoffrey doth the Old Britiſh Manuſcripts, either for the Succeſſion of the Britiſh Kings, or the firſt bringing of Chriſtianity hither. But which makes this matter yet ſtranger, (b) Nennius himſelf, who ſometimes paſſes under the Name of Gildas, ſaith nothing of this Tradition, where he ſpeaks of the firſt receiving of Chriſtianity in Britain; and yet Bale ſaith of him, That he collected his Writings out of the former Britiſh Hiſtorians, ſuch as Telieſin, Melkin, Gildas, and Elvodugus; and it is not probable, he would have left it out, if he had found it in any of them. But (c) Bale quotes one of theſe Britiſh Authors, viz. Melkinus Avalonius for this Tradition about Joſeph of Arimathea, and Arviragus; but withall he confeſſes him to be a very fabulous Writer. (d) Leland ſaith, That he met with the Fragments of Melkinus in the Library at Glaſſenbury, by which he underſtood that he had written ſomething of the Britiſh affairs, but more eſpecially concerning the Antiquity of Glaſſenbury, and Joſeph of Arimathea; Which, ſaith Leland, he affirms without any certain Author, and which himſelf could not approve, not thinking it at all Credible, that Joſeph of Arimathea ſhould be buried there, but rather ſome Eremit of that Name, from whence the miſtake firſt aroſe. And (*) elſewhere, when he ſpeaks of the Glaſſenbury Tradition, He ſaith, That twelve Eremits are reported to have come hither, with one Joſeph in the Head of them, but not he of Arimathea as he ſuppoſes. But ſtill the Teſtimonies that concern this matter are derived from Glaſſenbury, inſomuch that even the Britiſh Hiſtorian hath the name of Avalonius from thence. But ſome make uſe of this Teſtimony however to prove the Antiquity of this Tradition, ſince this Author is ſaid to have lived Anno Dom. 550. under King Vortuporius, ſo Bale; but Pits places him ten years later, under Magoclunus: They might as well have made him contemporary with Gildas Cambrius, or to have been Secretary to Joſeph of Arimathea, when he wrote his Epiſtles, for they have no more Evidence to ſhew for the one than for the other. The truth is, there was an old Legend which lay at Glaſſenbury, which Leland ſaw, and out of which Capgrave hath tranſcribed that part which concerns this matter, from whom Bale took it. But it is ſo groſly fabulous, that even Capgrave himſelf (whoſe Stomach was not very nice as to Legends) put an &c. in the middle of it, as being aſhamed to ſet down the paſſage of Abaddar, a great man in Sephat, and the hundred and four thouſand which were buried with Joſeph of Arimathea at Glaſſenbury. Yet this ſenſleſs and ridiculous Legend is by (e) ſome thought to be the Britiſh Hiſtory which William of Malmesbury appeals to for the proof of this Tradition; and, which he found in the Libraries of St. Edmund and St. Auguſtin. But Malmeſbury, having deſigned to ſet the Antiquity of Glaſſenbury as high as he could, called that a Britiſh Hiſtory, which is now found to be written by an Engliſh Monk, as (f) Archbiſhop Uſher hath evidently proved (having ſeveral times peruſed it in the Cotton Library) there being the very ſame paſſage in it which Malmesbury quotes. And that he was no Britain is moſt certain, becauſe he calls the Saxon his Mother-Tongue, and England his Country. And yet after all, there is not a word of Joſeph of Arimathea or his Companions in it; all that is ſaid is, “That in “ the Weſtern parts of Britain there is a Royal Iſland called Gleſton, “ large and compaſſed about with Waters full of Fiſh, and having o“ ther conveniences of humane life; but, which was moſt conſidera-

(g) Concil. Brit. p. 15.

That which ſeems moſt agreeable to Truth from hence is, That in the latter times of the Britiſh Churches, when they were ſo miſerably haraſſed and perſecuted by the Pagan Saxons, they were forced to retire into places of moſt difficult acceſs for their own Security, and there they made them ſuch Churches as were ſuitable to their preſent condition, and lived very retired lives, being in continual fear of their barbarous Enemies. Such a place this Iſland of Avalon, or Glaſſenbury was; which might be of far greater requeſt among the Britains, becauſe it was the place where King Arthur was buried; for I ſee no reaſon to queſtion that which Giraldus Cambrenſis relates concerning the finding the Body of King Arthur there in the time of Henry II. with an Inſcription on a Leaden Croſs, which in Latin expreſſed, that King Arthur lay there buried in the Iſland of Avalon. For (h) Giraldus ſaith, he was preſent, and ſaw the Inſcription and the Body; which is likewiſe atteſted by the Hiſtorians of that time, as (i) Leland proves at large. And the account given that his Body was laid ſo deep in the Earth, for fear of the Saxons, farther confirms, That this was a place of retreat in the Britiſh times, but not without the apprehenſion of their Enemies Invaſion.

This Church, according to the Inſcription on the Braſs Plate on the Pillar in Glaſſenbury Church, was in length 60 Foot, in breadth 26, But that Inſcription, as the learned and judicious Antiquary * Sir H. Spelman obſerves, was by the Character not of above 300 Years Antiquity, and ſavours very much of the Legend. In it we read, “ That the Church was firſt built by Joſeph and his Companions, but was conſecrated by Chriſt himſelf to the Honour of his Mother. This being a very uſeful point, but not very agreeing with the ſimplicity of the primitive Chriſtians, wanted ſome more than ordinary confirmation, and ſuch we are told it had. “ For St. David having a deſign to conſecrate this Church, our Lord appeared to him in a Dream, and forbad him, having conſecrated both the Church and Church-yard before himſelf. And, for a Sign thereof, he thruſt his Finger through the Biſhop's hand. Which it ſeems was to paſs for the Token of a former Conſecration. But, as much as this looks like a Monkiſh Legend, (k) Alford and (l) Creſſy are much diſpleaſed with Sir H. Spelman for calling it in queſtion. But they who can in earneſt believe, That Chriſt himſelf did then conſecrate a Church and Church-yard to the honour of his Mother, are paſt all Confutation by reaſon, having their minds naturally framed to believe Legends; and to ſuch ſuch, one Legend ſerves to confirm another; which is the way thoſe perſons take to confute Sir H. Spelman. For Creſſy, to prove the Antiquity of dedicating Churches to the bleſſed Virgin, brings the Tradition of the Temple at Saragoſſa, called del Pilar, becauſe the Pillar on which her Image was placed was brought thither by the Miniſtery of Angels. Now thoſe things are thought Proofs by ſome, which to others look only like bringing one Abſurdity to ſupport another. But as yet we find no Teſtimony to confirm this Tradition, but what is taken from Glaſſenbury, which is not the beſt Witneſs in a Cauſe which ſo nearly concern'd it ſelf.

But theſe now mentioned Authors (m) at laſt venture on a conſiderable Teſtimony, if it hold good, viz. of Auguſtin the Monk, in an Epiſtle to Gregory, but upon Examination, that which they quote out of St. Auguſtin's Epiſtle is nothing elſe but the paſſage already mentioned by Malmesbury, which he found in a Book taken out of the Library of St. Auguſtin at Canterbury; and they might as well have quoted St. Edmund's Epiſtle to the Pope to the ſame purpoſe. For William of Malmesbury ſaith, He met with the ſame paſſage at St. Edmund's as well as St. Auguſtin's, i. e. in the Libraries of thoſe Monaſteries; I will not diſſemble that they cite two conſiderable (n) Authors of our own for this miſtake; I wiſh they had been as ready to have followed them where they were in the right, as where they were guilty of an overſight, which the moſt careful Writers may ſometimes fall into. But it is an unhappy temper to follow Great Men only in their Errours and Imperfections.

So that upon the whole matter, we have not one Teſtimony which reaches to the point concerning Joſeph of Arimathea, which is not originally taken from the Glaſſenbury Legends, where it ſeems there was great choice of them; For (o) Capgrave mentions ſeveral, one, out of which the Life of Joſeph of Arimathea there is extracted, is ſaid to be taken out of a Book which the Emperour Theodoſius found in the Palace of Pilate at Jeruſalem; which is a very hopeful Introduction to a Legend; And there we find the Hiſtory of Joſeph of Arimathea, very diſtinctly ſet down, " How he was miraculouſly delivered out of " Priſon in Jeruſalem and conveyed to Arimathea, whither the chief " of the Jews ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy to him of ſeven Perſons, with an " Epiſtle, wherein they beg Pardon for his Impriſonment, and deſire " his Company at Jeruſalem, whither being come, upon their requeſt, " he gives an account of his Eſcape, the houſe being taken up by four " Angels, and Chriſt appeared to him, and carried him to the place " where he buried him, and ſhewed him the Linen Cloth about his " Head, after which he was baptized by Philip, and was preſent with him " at the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, and fifteen years after he came " to Philip in Gaul, who ſent him over into Britain with twelve of " his Diſciples and his Son Joſephus. But another Tradition ſaith, " They were ſix hundred Men and Women who were to come over, " having taken a Vow of Abſtinence till they came to the Land, " which they did all break, but one hundred and fifty who paſſed the " Sea upon the Shirt of Joſephus, but the reſt repenting, a Ship was " ſent to convey them over which was built by King Solomon, and " with them came a Duke of the Medes called Nacianus, formerly " baptized by Joſeph in the City Sarum, with the King of it called " Mordraius, who valiantly killed a King of North-Wales, who kept “ Joſeph a Priſoner; After which he and his Companions preached “ here in the time of Arviragus. And then follows the common Tradition, “ of his giving the Iſland of Avalon to them, and the twelve “ Hydes of Land by the three Pagan Kings, Arviragus, Marius and Coi- “ lus. This is followed by another Tradition out of the Acts of King Arthur, and the Inquiſition of Lancelot de Lac; all which is concluded with the admirable Legend of Melkinus Avalonius already mentioned. Theſe are the choice Materials in Capgrave's Collection to confirm this Tradition. And if he had found any better, he would no doubt have produced them. It muſt be confeſſed that Mr. Creſſy, with ſome ſcorn, rejects that part of the Tradition taken out of the holy Graal about the ſix hundred Companions and the Prince of Media, &c. But I can find no better Authority for one part than for the other; and for all that I can ſee, the holy Graal deſerves as much credit as the Book taken out of Pilate's Palace, or Melkinus Avalonius, eſpecially ſince, (p) Pits hath given the ſuppoſed Author ſo good a place, among his Britiſh Writers, under the name of Eremita Britannus, and ſaith, he lived about the time of King Ina, Anno Dom. 720. And (q) Helinandus takes notice of the Viſion to the Britiſh Eremit about that time concerning Joſeph of Arimathea, and the Diſh wherein our Saviour eat the Paſſover with his Diſciples, which ſort of Diſh he ſaith was then called in French Graal; but others think the true name was Sangreal, being ſome of Chriſt's real bloud which he ſhed upon the Croſs, which was ſaid to be ſomewhere found by King Arthur. And to confirm this, it is ſaid in the authentick Writing of Melkinus, That in the Coffin of Joſeph were two Silver Veſſels filled with the Bloud and Sweat of Jeſus the Prophet.

But leſt I ſhould ſeem to expoſe ſo ancient a Tradition, by ſetting down only the fabulous Mixtures which the Monks thought to adorn it with, I now proceed from their Dreams and Viſions, to what ſeems to have much more weight and authority in it, viz. their ancient Records which William of Malmesbury ſeems moſt to rely upon: Among theſe, In the firſt place he mentions the Charter of St. Patrick, as he calls it, which is at large printed in the (r) Monaſticon, and both in (s) Alford and (t) Creſſy, and is magnified by them as a ſubſtantial proof of the Glaſſenbury Tradition, which Creſſy ſaith was tranſcribed out of a very ancient MS. belonging to Glaſſenbury by Marianus Victorius; and for this he quotes (u) Ger. Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. who ſaith only that Bale mentions a piece of his de Antiquitate Avalonica, but he adds, that Bale deſerves no credit in Writers of great Antiquity. But the perſon Creſſy means (or at leaſt his Author) was another Gerard Voſſius, Dean of Tongres, (w) who publiſhed part of this pretended piece of St. Patrick among other ancient Writings, which will have no great authority among conſidering men, if they have no other Characters of Antiquity than this Charter of Saint Patrick. However, Mr. Creſſy is pleaſed to call it, a monument of the goodneſs of God towards this Nation, ſo early, in the very beginning of Chriſtianity; becauſe therein mention is made of ſome Writings of St. Phaganus and Diruvianus wherein it was declared that twelve Diſciples of the Holy Apoſtles Philip and Jacob built the ſaid ancient Church to the honour of the Bleſſed Virgin, by the appointment of the Archangel Gabriel. And moreover, That our Lord himſelf from Heaven dedicated the ſaid Church to the honour of his Mother. As likewiſe, That three Pagan Kings beſtowed upon them twelve Portions of Land. If this hold good, it goes a great way towards the proving the ancient Tradition, although Joſeph of Arimathea be not mentioned. But St Patrick goes on, and ſaith, That in other Writings of a later date he found that Phaganus and Diruvianus obtained from Pope Eleutherius thirty years of Indulgence, as himſelf likewiſe procured from Pope Celeſtine twelve years: And towards the Concluſion, he grants a hundred days of Indulgence to thoſe who would clear the way to a certain Oratory there mention'd: And to make all plain, it begins with the Date, Anno Dom. 425. in theſe Words. In the Name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. I Patr ick the poor humble Servant of God, in the four hundred twenty fifth year of the Incarnation of our Lord, being ſent by the moſt holy Pope Celeſtine into Ireland, &c.

I confeſs this Charter offers very fair play towards the diſcovery of it's own Forgery by ſuch open Marks, and Characters as theſe. For it is certainly known, that in St. Patrick's time, no ſuch way of Computation was uſed from the year of our Lord. For Dionyſius Exiguus, writ his firſt Epiſtle to Petronius, Anno Dom. 525. where he firſt mentions, The reducing the Cycle to the years of Chriſt's Incarnation, that People might be better acquainted with it; after which it remained a great while in private uſe with the Paſchal Cycle, and was not publickly received, ſaith (x) Bucherius till about the time of Charles the Great. * Joachim Vadianus, ſaith, He never ſaw the Year of our Lord in any ancient Charters, of which ſort he had ſeen many: (y) Some obſerve, That it was never uſed in Charters before the ninth Age, and therefore the more ſubtile Pretenders to Antiquity always left it out. (z) Joh. Aventinus affirms, that the uſe of it in Epiſtles and Charters, was brought in by Carolus Craſſus, with whom (a) Nic. Vignier agrees, as to the Imperial Diplomata. But it ſeems probable to have been brought into England before that time, for in the (b) Council at Celichyth, Anno Dom. 816. Every Biſhop was required to take an Account of the year of our Lord. And by ſome Charters in Ingulphus, it appears to have been uſed here before it was uſed in France, or the Empire, but not long before the eighth Century; and the firſt publick Acts we find it applied to, were thoſe of Councils, as in that of Becanceld, under King Withred, *Anno Dom.*694. But the ſame King doth not uſe it in the Years of his Reign. The like Inſtances about Councils, eſpecially in the eighth and ninth Centuries are produced by (c) Mabillon: Who thinks, That Bede was the firſt who brought it into the uſe of Hiſtory. But that could not be before Anno Dom. 725. at which time he began to write his Hiſtory; and he adds, That from him by the means of Boniface, it came into the uſe of the French Councils and Hiſtories; and at laſt of all publick Charters both in France and the Empire, as well as here. But from all this it appears, that there is no Colour for this Charter of St. Patrick, which reckons from the Incarnation, a hundred years before Dionyſius Exiguus firſt introduced that way of Computation. Beſides, it cannot poſſibly agree with the time of St. Patrick's going firſt into Ireland; for (d) William of Malmesbury confeſſeth, He was made Biſhop by Celeſtine, and ſent by St. German into Ireland as an Apoſtle: But it is on all hands agreed, that Palladius was ſent thither before him; and Proſper, who lived at that time, fixeth the ſending Palladius, to the year wherein Baſſus and Antiochus were Conſuls, which was Anno Dom. 431. the year of the firſt Epheſine Council. So that this Charter of St. Patrick cannot be true, no not although we allow the different Computation in Capgrave, who reads it, 430.

430. But Alford confeſſes, both Malmesbury and the Glaſſenbury Antiquities have it, 425. It is ſtrange that Alford ſhould ſay, He found no Exception againſt the Credit of this Charter, ſince even (e) Capgrave himſelf mentions it not without doubt, and Suſpicion of the truth of it: And his own Brethren (f) Henſchenius, and Papebrochius deride his ſimplicity for believing it. And among other Arguments they produce that of the mention of Indulgences againſt it, which Name they Confeſs was not uſed for the Relaxation of Penance, till the eleventh Century; a very Competent time after the Date of this Charter. The queſtion is not as Mr. Creſſy would put it, Whether every Biſhop, or Pope as Chief, hath a Power to relax Penance? But, Whether the Name of Indulgences were then applied to ſuch a Senſe, as this Charter uſes it? Which thoſe learned Jeſuits deny. Add to all this, that St. Patrick ſaith, He obtained from Celeſtine twelve years of Indulgence, which being underſtood of Glaſſenbury, implies a plain impoſſibility: For St. Patrick is ſaid, to retreat thither towards the end of his Life, and Celeſtine dyed ſoon after his firſt ſending into Ireland: So that I need not to inſiſt on the Style, or the Names contained in this Charter, to prove the Forgery of it, it being ſo manifeſt by the Arguments already produced.

I now proceed to the Charters, whereof there are ſeveral extant in the (g) Monaſticon. The large Charter of King Ina, ſeems to be moſt conſiderable, and to favour the old Tradition, as it makes the Church at Glaſſenbury dedicated to Chriſt and the Bleſſed Virgin, to be the Fountain of all Religion, and the firſt in the Kingdom of Britain. But upon a ſtrict enquiry into the Circumſtances of this Charter, I ſee great reaſon to call in queſtion the Truth of it, and not merely from the diſſimilitude of Style, between this and other Charters of the Saxon times, which are allowed to be Authentick, ſuch as thoſe in Ingulphus, William of Malmesbury, the Additions to Matthew Paris, &c. But for theſe two Reaſons which ſeem to me to have weight in them.

1. Becauſe it refers to other ancient Charters of that Church, as to the Exemption of the Monaſtery. And the Benedictin Monks have a long time lain under ſo great a Suſpicion, among thoſe of their Religion, as to this matter of forging Charters of Exemption, that no prudent Perſons will think thoſe a ſufficient Foundation to build their Faith upon, as to any ancient Hiſtory, which muſt depend upon their Credibility. I ſhall not here mention what Gallonius, Launoy, Naude, and others abroad have ſaid upon this Subject, nor what inſufficient Anſwers (h) Mabillon hath lately made to their Objections; but it is reaſonable for us to conſider, how much they have been Charged here at home with this Crime, by the Biſhops of this Church, and how ill they have been able to defend themſelves. It appears by the Epiſtle of Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to Alexander the Third, in (i) Petrus Bleſenſis, that there was a general Suſpicion of Forgery in the Charters of Exemptions, which the Monaſteries pretended to, Ut falſitas in omnium ferè Monaſteriorum exemptione prævaleat, &c. And he there particularly inſtanceth in the Biſhop of Salisbury, charging the Abbot of Malmesbury, with producing falſe Charters for his Exemption from the Biſhop's Right of Election: But which is yet more conſiderable, in the time of Gregory the ninth, when St. Edmond was Archbiſhop of Canterbury;

terbury, ſome Monks of Canterbury were Convicted of Forging a certain Charter of Privileges: But the Pope's Legate took up the buſineſs, and procured a Diſpenſation from the Pope, which put an end to the Cauſe. Which Diſpenſation Dr. (k) Caſaubon declares to the World, He read in an Old Manuſcript belonging to the Church of Canterbury, wherein it was Regiſtred: And wherein, as both he and Sr. Henry (l) Spelman, tell us, It is obſerv'd, That that Church enjoy'd all its Lands and Privileges, only by Cuſtom and Preſcription, ſine Chartis vel Munimentis Regiis, without any written Charters, untill Anno Dom. 694. When Withred King of Kent cauſed the firſt to be written, which was the ſame with the Council of Becanceld. From hence Sr. Henry Spelman gives a prudent Caution, concerning the moſt ancient Charters, which the Monks pretended to, that they be not eaſily believed: There being ſo much Suſpicion of Fraud in them. And that not only now, but was ſo of Old, as appears by what (m) Gervaſe reports of the Monks of St. Auguſtin, That they produced very Suſpicious, and raſed Charters. The Caſe was this, the Monks of St. Auguſtine pretended an Exemption from the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as thoſe of Glaſſenbury did from that of the Biſhop of Wells; upon an Appeal to Rome, a Commiſſion was granted to the Biſhop of Durham, and the Abbot of St. Albans to inſpect their Charters, and to let the Archbiſhop examine them: But after great Tergiverſation, they at laſt produced two Writings, which they called their Originals; the firſt was ancient, but raſed and ſubſcribed, as if it were amended, and without a Seal, which they called King Ethelbert's Charter. The other was of much later Writing, with a Leaden Bull hanging at it, and the Figure of a Biſhop upon it, which they called St. Auguſtine's Charter. Againſt the Firſt, The Raſure was objected, and the manner of Subſcription, and want of a Seal. Againſt the Second, The lateneſs of the Writing, and the novelty of hanging Leaden Bulls to Charters, eſpecially by Biſhops on this ſide of the Alpes: And beſides, the Style was very different from the Roman. Both theſe Charters are extant in the (n) Monaſticon, and a third of Ethelbert, with an Inſpeximus of 36. Edw. III. But another Charter of Ethelbert is ſet down together with theſe in the (o) MS. Chronicle of St. Auguſtine's, the Author whereof was certainly a Monk there, being ſo zealouſly concern'd to defend theſe Charters, and to anſwer ſome of the former Objections againſt them. As to the want of a Seal to Ethelbert's Charter, he anſwers truly, That hanging Seals upon Wax were not then uſed, but only a Subſcription of the Name of the perſon with a Sign of the Croſs before it, in token of their Converſion. For (p) Ingulphus, a very competent Witneſs, declares, that the ancient Engliſh Charters to the time of Edward the Confeſſor were atteſted by Witneſſes who ſet their Names with Golden Croſſes, or other Marks before them. But the Normans brought in the uſe of Seals by Impreſſions upon Wax. But that MS. Author will not allow the uſe of ſuch Seals, till after the Conqueſt, except in the time of Cnut, who was a ſtranger. Whereas in the Conteſt between the Biſhop of Lincoln and the Abbot of St. Albans, before Henry II. when the (q) Saxon Charters were diſputed for want of Seals, the other Party knew not what to anſwer; but the King inſiſted on their Confirmation by Henry I. And the Monk who writes the account of this Proceeding, alledgeth the Seal of Edward the Confeſſor to the Church of Weſtminſter: But Edward brought in ſeveral Norman Cuſtoms, as Ingulphus ſhews, againſt the practice of his Predeceſſours. And this the Normans borrow'd from the

the French, whoſe Seals were generally affixed on the right ſide of the Charter, and not pendent with Labels, as they began to be about the Reign of Lewis VI. as (r) Mabillon hath ſhewed at large. And ſo ſome of our Learned (s) Antiquaries have thought, that pendent Seals were not brought into uſe here, till the time of Edward I. For in a Charter Henry I. granted to Anſelm, the great Seal was affixed on the left ſide of the Parchment. And (t) Brian Twyne affirms that he ſaw a Charter of William the Conquerour ſo ſealed in the Lumley Library. But that this Obſervation is not certain, appears by contrary Inſtances, as of the Pendent Seal to the Charter of Battel Abby, printed by (u) Mr. Selden; and of the Charter of Henry II. to Glaſſenbury Abbey, which (w) Dr. Caius ſaith he ſaw with a Seal of green Wax hanging to it by a ſtring of red and white Silk. But from hence we may ſee how dangerous it is to make general Rules, as to theſe matters, from ſome particular Examples, when the Cuſtom might vary. And, notwithſtanding the Teſtimony of Ingulphus, there might be Seals ſometimes uſed to Charters though not ſo frequently. Mr. (x) Selden hath produced ſome Inſtances to that purpoſe, as in that of King Edgar to the Abby of Perſore, which he ſaith had plain Signs of three Labels by the places cut for their being hanged on; which is atteſted in a Letter from Godfrey, Archdeacon of Worceſter, to Alex. III. And Among the Chartæ antiquæ, There are ſome, ſaith he, cum Sigillo; and one particularly cum Sigillo of King Cnout, which very much confirms what this Hiſtorian obſerves concerning Canutus his uſing a Seal. And our great (y) Lawyer hath produced the Deeds of King Edwin, Brother to King Edgar, and of King Offa, with Seals to them. And therefore, I think, Ingulphus ought not to be taken in ſo ſtrict a Senſe, that there were no Seals in uſe before the Norman time, but that Deeds or Charters before were good or valid by bare Croſſes and Marks, with Subſcriptions without Seals; But that the Normans would allow none that had no Seals to them. And this upon due conſideration will appear to be the true meaning of Ingulphus.

And the ſame MS. Author commends the diſcretion of the Saxon way of confirming Charters, above that of the Normans, a Seal of Wax being ſo apt to decay, or to be loſt or taken off. And he obſerves one partilar Cuſtom of the Normans, That they were wont to put ſome of the hair of their Heads or Beards into the Wax of their Seals. I ſuppoſe rather to be kept as Monuments than as adding any ſtrength or weight to their Charters. So he obſerves, That ſome of the Hair of William, Earl of Warren, was to his time kept in the Priory of Lewes.

To that of the Leaden Bull appending to the Charter of St. Auguſtine, he makes a pitiful Anſwer, viz. That he being deputed hither by the Pope, might uſe the ſame Seal which he did at Rome. And ſo every Legate might grant Bulls with Leaden Seals, which would not be well taken at Rome. But it is much more to the purpoſe which he adds, viz. That when in the time of Henry III. this Privilege was queſtioned by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, becauſe of this Leaden Bull, the Earl of Flanders produced ſuch another, given him by a foreign Biſhop, which he and his Predeceſſours had uſed; the Faſhion whereof he ſets down, and the Bull it ſelf was preſerved as a Monument in St. Auguſtine's. But if this were then ſo common a Cuſtom, eſpecially at Rome, why had they no ſuch Bulls of Gregory the Great, who ſent Auguſtine? To that he gves a frivolous Anſwer, viz. That Gregory died the ſame year of the endowment of St. Auguſtine's.

guſtine's. But, did he leave no Succeſſour? And, had it not been more to their purpoſe to have produced one Leaden Bull of the Pope's at that time, than twenty of Auguſtine's the Monk? But he gives no manner of anſwer to the Raſure of the firſt Charter, nor to the late Writing of the ſecond: And although the uſing of Leaden Bulls were not ſo ſoon appropriated to the Conſiſtorial Grants of the Biſhop of Rome, but Princes and Biſhops might uſe them, as Sir H. Spelman, and Monſieur du Cange, and Mabillon have all proved; yet there ought to be better proof brought of the matter of Fact, as to St. Auguſtine's Privilege, for it is ſtill very ſuſpicious, not only on the account of the Leaden Bull (which (z) Polydore Virgil could not find ſo early uſed even at Rome, and he allows it to be no elder than Anno Domini 772. and all the Inſtances brought before by (a) Dom. Raynaldus are confeſſed to be ſuſpicious by (b) Mabillon himſelf) but there are ſeveral things in it which in (c) Sir H. Spelman's Judgment ſavour of the Norman times, as the Jus conſuetudinarium, Judicia intus & foris, and the very Title of Archbiſhop, as it is there uſed, was hardly of that Antiquity in the Weſtern Church, and was never given to Auguſtine by Gregory. But according to (d) Iſidore's explication of it, who was Gregory's Diſciple, and underſtood the Language of that Age, Auguſtine could not properly call his Succeſſors Archbiſhops, for he ſaith, That Title belong'd to them who had power over Metropolitans as well as other Biſhops, and it was not before the ninth Age, as (c) Mabillon and others obſerve, that it came to be commonly uſed for a Metropolitan.

It was therefore a judicious Rule laid down by the Learned Authour of the (f) Preface to the Monaſticon concerning the Charters of Monks, that the older they pretend to be, the more they are to be ſuſpected; For which he is deſervedly praiſed by (g) Papebrochius; but (h) Mabillon is very unwilling to allow it, as overthrowing at once the authority of all their ancient Charters. And therefore he hath endeavoured with mighty Induſtry to defend chiefly the old Benedictin Charters in France; But he cannot deny many of them to be counterfeited (Papebrochius ſaith almoſt all) and at the Concluſion of his Diſcourſe he vindicates the Monks * by the commonneſs of the fault in elder times: Which is an Argument of Caution to us, rather than of any credit to be given to them. And it cannot be denyed, that he hath laid down many uſeful Rules for diſcerning the true and falſe, with reſpect to the Cuſtoms of France. But we are ſtill as much to ſeek as to our pretended Charters, ſince the Cuſtom of making Charters cannot be made appear to be ſo old here as it was there. He doth indeed endeavour to prove from † Bede's Epiſtle to Egbert, that in his time there were written Privileges granted to Monaſteries among the Saxons, and ſomething before that, among the Britains, by the Synod of Landaff, Anno Dom. 660. But he cannot prove, nor doth he attempt it, that there were any Charters among the Saxons before that of Withred, Anno Dom. 694. and if not, all the ancient Charters referr'd to in this Charter of Ina muſt be Falſe and Counterfeit.

2. How comes King Ina to have ſo great authority over all the Kings of Britain, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Dukes and Abbots, as this Charter expreſſeth? In the beginning of the Charter, he mentions Baldred as one of his Vice-Roys. In the middle he ſpeaks of Baldred as one of his Predeceſſors, and joins him with Kenewalchius, Kentwin and Cedwalla. But in the end he makes him to confirm what Ina has granted, Ego, Baldredus Rex, confirmavi. But who was this King Baldred? In the Kingdom of Kent, Edricus was in the beginning of Ina's Reign, according to the Savilian Faſti, and Withredus from the ſixth to the end. In the Kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons there were Sighardus, Senfredus, Offa and Selredus. In the Kingdom of Eaſt Angles, Beorna and Ethelredus. In the Kingdom of Mercia, Adelredus, Kenredus, Ceolredus, Athelbaldus. In the Kingdom of Northumberland, Alfredus, Oſfredus, Kenredus, Oſricus, But among all theſe not one Baldredus appears. There was indeed one of that Name King of Kent near an hundred years after; but what is that to the time of Ina? But ſuppoſe Baldred then in being, and only a Vice-Roy in ſome part of Ina's Dominions, how comes Ina to this Univerſal Monarchy or Power to command all the Kings of Britain, which is expreſſed in the Charter? Sed & omnibus Regni mei Regibus, &c. præcipio. By what Authority did the King of the Weſt Saxons at that time make ſuch a Precept to all other Kings in Britain? But, I remember, (i) Geoffrey of Monmouth makes him Grandchild to Cadwallader. And the (k) Authour of the Additions to King Edward's Laws ſaith, he had the Kingdom of Britain with his ſecond Wife Wala, Daughter of Cadwallader; and then Ina called a Parliament for the Intermarriage of Britains and Saxons. So that there was an Opinion among ſome, that Ina had the Monarchy of Britain, which Opinion was certainly follow'd by the Contriver of this Charter. But Mr. Lambard confeſſeth, that theſe Paſſages are not in the ancient MS. of King Edward's Laws, and it is a wonder they ſhould ever come into them, being ſo deſtitute of any colour of authority, and ſo remote from the deſign of his Laws.

(k) LL. Ed. Confeſſ. c. 35.

As to theſe counterfeit Charters, the Opinion of (l) Papebrochius ſeems moſt probable to me, that they were for the moſt part framed in the eleventh Century, when there was Ignorance enough to make them paſs, and occaſion enough given to the Monks to frame them for their own ſecurity, againſt the encroachments of others upon their Lands, and the Juriſdiction of Biſhops over their Monaſteries. And William the Conqueror having given ſuch invidious Privileges to Battell Abby, as may be ſeen in his Charter, the elder Monaſteries thought much to be ſo far behind them, and therefore made themſelves as great Privileges by the favour of Saxon Kings. From hence in the next Age aroſe ſo many Conteſts about Juriſdiction between the Biſhops and the ſeveral Monaſteries, of which we read not before, as we have already obſerved between the Abbey of St. Auguſtine and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; between the Abbey of Malmesbury and the Biſhop of Salisbury; and the Abbey of St. Albans and the Biſhop of Lincoln. And at that time thoſe Abbies were charged with forging their Charters: And when they were ſo charged were not able to defend them, as was remarkable in the caſe of St. Auguſtine's, as it is related by (m) William Thorn, a Monk of that Abbey: He confeſſeth the Archbiſhop chargeth their Privileges with Forgery, and that the Monks appealed to Rome, and that upon their Appeal ſeveral Commiſſions were granted to examine them; but by his own relation, they ſhamefully declined to produce them as long as they durſt, and ſtill continued their Appeal. But when they ſaw no remedy, they produced the Charters of Ethelbert and Auguſtine, the Copies whereof the Delegates ſent to Rome. But before they came thither the Pope died; and the next Pope, Lucius, ſent an Inhi-

Inhibition to the Archbiſhop, requiring him not to invade their Privileges till the queſtion of Forgery were determined; and he writes to King Henry II. in the behalf of the Abbey. Things being at this paſs, they fairly made a Compoſition with the Archbiſhop, viz. That he ſhould withdraw his Accuſation of Fraud, in the Court of Rome, and they would yield up to him the main points conteſted as to Juriſdiction. The form of which Compoſition is at large extant in Thorn. And the Confirmation of it by Henry II. in the other MS. Chronicon of that Abbey. Which in effect amounted to the Monks giving up the Cauſe of their Charters. Such a Controverſie about Juriſdiction there was between Jocelin, Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and the Abbey of Glaſſenbury about Anno Dom. 1215. as appears by the Book called Secretum Domini Abbatis lately in the Arundell Library, but now in a private hand. So that there appears a ſufficient inducement for them to forge ſuch large Immunities and Exemptions, with reſpect to the Biſhop's Juriſdiction, as this Charter contains; and that ſeems to be the main Point aimed at in it. But in order to it, ſome extraordinary matter was to be alledged in favour of this Place, and nothing ſerved ſo much in that Age, as to amuſe the People with wonderful Stories of the Antiquity of it, Calling it the Mother of Religion, and the Place of Viſions and Revelations and Miracles, where St. Patrick and St. David dwelt in former times, before ever the Saxons came (but not a word yet of Joſeph of Arimathea:) which were very plauſible Pretences for extraordinary Privileges, and ſo they are alledged in this Charter of King Ina, Ita & ipſa ſupereminentem Privilegii obtineat dignitatem, nec ulli omnino hominum ancillare obſequium faciat in terris, &c. Which words are ſpoken of the Bleſſed Virgin, but, according to the Conſtruction of that Age, to be underſtood of Glaſſenbury Abbey, becauſe the Church was believed to be conſecrated to her by our Saviour himſelf.

But it ſeems ſtrange that ſuch a Charter ſhould ever paſs for authentick with any who compare the Language of it with the Hiſtory of King Ina, as it is delivered by the Monkiſh Hiſtorians. For by them it appears what Wars he had with his neighbour Princes, and how far he was to the laſt from commanding Kings and Princes and Archbiſhops, whoſe Kingdom was confined to the Weſt and South Saxons, and had but one Biſhop in it till the eighteenth year of his Reign, when it was divided into two, Daniel having one ſhare, and Aldelm the other. And ſome years after Eadbertus was Biſhop of the South Saxons, ſo that he had but three Biſhops at the moſt, and never an Archbiſhop in his Dominions: How then could he call the ſeveral Kings, Archbiſhops and Biſhops together to paſs this Charter? The like groſs abſurdity there is in the (n) Charter of Eveſham Abbey, wherein Brightwaldus is ſaid to draw it up with the conſent of all the Princes in England met in Council, as Pope Conſtantine explains it; which is ſomewhat hard to believe concerning that Age, wherein they were under no common Head, but continually fighting with each other, till the Weſt Saxons prevailed. And the Caſe of the Abbey of Eveſham ſeems to have been much the ſame with that of Glaſſenbury. For (o) William of Malmesbury wonders how Bede came to omit the Foundation of it, if it were ſo ſolemnly declared at Rome as the Charters import, when Kenred and Offa were both there, which is mention'd by Bede. And in truth it is very ſtrange that ſo diligent a Writer, eſpecially of ſuch things, as Bede was, ſhould ſay not a Word either of Glaſſenbury or Eveſham.

Eveſham. But he judiciouſly imputes the occaſion of Founding this Monaſtery to ſome old Church of the Britains ſtanding there in a deſolate place, which Egwin, then Biſhop of Worceſter, took a great Fancy to, and ſo raiſed a Monaſtery there. But ſuch a plain Story as this would never doe the Monks buſineſs, and therefore they muſt have a Legend of Egwin's Chains, &c. and the Viſion of the Bleſſed Virgin there, and large Immunities granted to the Place on theſe accounts, as they have fully done in the Charters of Kenred and Offa, the Bull of Conſtantine and the Privilege of Egwin. But yet this unlucky charge of Pope Conſtantine to Brightwaldus, to ſummon a Council of the whole Nation, Princes and Biſhops, to confirm this Charter; at a time when there were ſo many Kingdoms not only divided, but moſt commonly in actual War with each other, makes this whole Charter appear to be an undoubted Forgery of the Monks to obtain great Privileges to themſelves.

But to return to Glaſſenbury; I do not queſtion that King Ina did Found a Monaſtery there, where before had been an ancient Church in the Britiſh times. But I ſee no ground to believe, that either Joſeph of Arimathea, or St. Patrick, or St. David had ever been there. But theſe were great and well founding Names to amuſe the People with, and by degrees advanced that Monaſtery to ſo high a Reputation, that the very Monks of other places were concerned to leſſen the authority of this Tradition, as is evident by the (p) MS. Chronicle of St. Auguſtine's, wherein the Monks of Glaſſenbury are charged with pretending to greater authority than they had reaſon for, that Monaſtery being firſt founded by King Ina, but they give out they had Land given by Arviragus a King of the Britains. And even (q) William of Malmesbury, although when he writes the Antiquities of Glaſſenbury, he ſeems firmly to believe St. Patrick's being there, yet when he comes elſewhere to ſpeak of his being buried there, he adds that cooling Expreſſion, Si credere dignum, and takes not the leaſt notice of Joſeph of Arimathea and his Companions. So much difference he thought there ought to be between writing the Legend of a Monaſtery and a true Hiſtory. And there he plainly affirms, that King Ina was the firſt Founder of it. To which (r) Aſſerius agrees in an ancient MS. Copy of his Annals. For A. D. 726. he ſaith, Ina went to Rome, and there died, having built and dedicated a Monaſtery in Glaſſenbury. But what Preſumption was it to ſay, he dedicated it, if it were dedicated ſo long before by Chriſt himſelf, as the Viſion of St. David and the Glaſſenbury Tradition affirm? I do not then deny that there was an ancient Church before Ina's time, which after the Weſtern Saxons became Chriſtians, grew into mighty Reputation, but all the Succeſſion of Abbats before, either of Worgreſius, or Brightwaldus, or others, I look on as fabulous. For (s) Bede and others ſay, Brightwaldus was Abbat of Reculver before he was Archbiſhop; which is a good diſtance from Glaſſenbury. But the firſt Abbat there was Hemgiſlus, to whom Ina granted a Charter; after him Beorwaldus, to whom King Ina granted ſeveral Lands by Charters, far more probable than this large one, whoſe authority I have hitherto diſcuſſed. Thoſe Charters are ſhort, and the Style agreeable to thoſe times, and not one word of Joſeph of Arimathea, or St. Patrick, or St. David, in any of them. And thoſe, I believe, were the original Charters of that Abbey.

But the Abbey being thus founded and well endowed, then, like a Man that hath made his own Fortunes, who pretends to be derived from ſome ancient Stock, ſo this Monaſtery growing rich betimes, ſaw it muſt be caſt much behind in Place and Dignity, unleſs it could lay claim to ſome greater Antiquity. And for this, the old Britiſh Church was an admirable Foundation. And St. Patrick and St. David, being two Saints of wonderful eſteem in Ireland and Wales, they firſt ſet up with the Reputation of their being at Glaſſenbury, the former lying buried there, and the latter building a little Chappel. The Monks finding the advantage of theſe Pretences, made a farther ſtep towards the advancement of their Monaſtery, by giving out that their old Church was the firſt Church in Britain, and that all Religion came from thence into other Parts; which by degrees gaining belief, they at laſt pitched upon Joſeph of Arimathea, as the Perſon who came firſt hither, being a Man whoſe Name was every where in great eſteem for the reſpect he ſhew'd to our Saviour's Body: And him they thought they might ſafely pitch upon, not being pretended to by any other Church. But it was a conſiderable time before the Name of Joſeph of Arimathea came to be mention'd, not being found in any of the Saxon Charters, which ſpeak moſt to the advantage of Glaſſenbury; as may be ſeen by thoſe of King (t) Edmund and King Edgar in the Monaſticon. But by the time of Henry II. the Tradition was generally received, that the old Church at Glaſſenbury was built by the Diſciples of our Lord; and that it was the original Church of this Nation, as appears by the Charter of Henry II. omitted in the Monaſticon, but printed by (v) Harpsfield, and the learned Primate of (w) Armagh, by which we ſee what Authority the Monks of Glaſſenbury had then obtained, for not only this Tradition is inſerted in the Charter, as a thing certain, but a Repetition is there made of ſeveral other Charters, as ſeen and read before the King, which were undoubtedly counterfeit, ſuch as that of King Arthur and ſeveral others; yet all theſe went down then, and were confirmed by the King's Inſpeximus. From this time the Monks of Glaſſenbury were triumphant, and no one durſt diſpute their Traditions how improbable ſoever. This Charter being confirmed by the Inſpeximus of Edw. II. An. 6, 7. of Edw. III. An. 1, 6. and 1 Edw. IV. And from hence it grew to be the common Opinion of the Nation, and was pleaded for the Honour of it in the Councils of Piſa, Conſtance, Siena and Baſil, of which the (x) Primate hath given a full account, and, as things paſſed among them then, Our Nation had as juſt Right to inſiſt on their Tradition of Joſeph of Arimathea, as the Spaniards on that of St. James going into Spain; for certainly one Tradition was as good as the other.

But having thus far examined the Authority of this Tradition, I now come to conſider the Circumſtances of it. And ſuppoſing the Teſtimonies to confirm it to have been of far greater Authority than I find them, yet the very improbable Circumſtances of the Story it ſelf would be a ſufficient reaſon for me to paſs it over (leaving every one to believe as much of it as he ſees cauſe) viz.

(1.) The Tradition of the Church mentioned by (y) Euſebius, (z) Sophronius, (a) St. Chryſoſtome, and (b) Hippolytus Portuenſis, That St. Philip continued preaching in the Eaſtern Parts, about Phrygia, and ſuffer'd at Hierapolis.

(2) The Eremetical courſe of their Lives ſo wholly different from that of the Apoſtles, and other Diſciples of our Lord, in an Age of ſo much buſineſs and employment in Preaching the Goſpel, who went from one City and Countrey to another for that End. (3.) The

(3.) The building of the Church by a Viſion of the Archangel, and devoting it and themſelves to the Bleſſed Virgin, ſavours too groſly of Monkiſh Superſtition to be near the time pretended.

(4.) The Conſecration of a Church-yard together with a Church, in order to the burial of perſons in it at that time, is none of the moſt probable Circumſtances, and yet it is a material one, Quod ipſe Dominus Eccleſiam ſimul cum Cœmeterio dedicarat. (c) Sir Henry Spelman obſerves, That the cuſtom of compaſſing Churches, with Church-yards, was not ſo ancient: And withall he adds, That although the Britiſh Cities had Churches from the beginning of Chriſtianity, yet there were no burying places within Cities, till Cuthbert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, obtain'd leave for it, about Anno Dom. 758. Upon this (d) Alford and (e) Creſſy charge him with a manifeſt miſtake and great impertinency. A miſtake, in that Ethelbert and Auguſtine were both buried in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul. And what then? Doth Sir Henry Spelman ſay there was no burying in Churches before Cuthbert's time? No. But that there was no Burying Place in Cities before that time. For the Church of St. Auguſtine, or St. Peter and St. Paul, was without the City. For ſo the (f) MS. Chronicle of St. Auguſtine's ſaith, That when the Bodies of the Kings and Archbiſhops were carried thither to burial, they follow'd our Saviour, who ſuffer'd without the Gate. And that it was like the children of Iſrael's going out of Egypt, &c. Which is ſufficient to prove the truth of Sir Henry Spelman's, Obſervation, which relates to Burying in Cities and not in Churches. And withall the Reaſon alledged in one of the Charters of (g) King Ethelbert, why that place was aſſigned for a Burying place, is, becauſe the City is for the Living, and not for the Dead. But why do they not prove the Antiquity of Church-yards to be ſo great, which was the moſt to the purpoſe? But they ſay, Sir Henry Spelman's Obſervation was impertinent, Glaſſenbury being then a ſolitary place, and very far from being a City. It is true, if the weight had been laid by him only upon that, there being no Evidence of any Roman City there. But his deſign was to prove, That Church-yards were not then adjoining to Churches, becauſe the Cemeteries were without the City, and the Churches within in the Britiſh times; And even in the Saxon time, (h) he ſaith, although they buried in Churches, yet thoſe Churches in which they buried were without the Cities, till Cuthbert firſt procured the alteration by Royal Authority, and, ſome ſay, by Papal too. But the Monks of St. Auguſtine's denied the Pope's Confirmation.

But the main Circumſtance I ſhall inſiſt upon, is, the Incongruity of this Story with the condition of the Roman Province at that time. For there was no ſuch Britiſh King then as Arviragus, and in that Country, as will appear by the more Southern parts of the Iſland being reduced into the form of a Province before Anno Dom. 63. when the Glaſſenbury Tradition ſaith, Joſeph of Arimathea came firſt to Britain. For (i) Tacitus ſaith, it was done as to the neareſt part of the Iſland, when A. Plautius and Oſtorius Scapula were Governours here, and between them and Suetonius Paulinus were Didius Gallus and Veranius. In probability the Belgæ were ſubdued by Veſpaſian, of whom (k) Suetonius ſaith, That he conquer'd here two powerfull Nations, above twenty Towns, and the Iſle of Wight. By which we find his employment was Weſtward, and the Belgæ and Danmonii were the two powerfull Nations that way. And in all the Actions afterwards, we find no Care taken by the Roman Generals to ſecure themſelves againſt the Belgæ, as they did againſt the Brigantes and Silures, among whom Caractacus commanded; ſo that there could be no ſuch Britiſh King at that time among the Belgæ as Arviragus is ſuppoſed to have been. For if there had been when (l) Oſtorius marched Northwards, having ſuppreſſed the Iceni, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he would have fixed his Garriſons on the Severn and the Avon, to ſecure the Province. For, as our (m) Judicious Antiquary hath well obſerved, The deſign of Oſtorius therein was to keep the Provincial Britains from joining with the others; and therefore, all on this ſide thoſe Garriſons were within the Roman Province; Now the places where the Garriſons were placed are by Tacitus ſaid to be Antona and Sabrina. The latter is certainly the Severn, which parted the Belgæ and the Silures. For Antona, Camden reads Auſona, (although Northanton comes nearer the former Name, and Southanton had its Name from the River Anton, which there runs into the Sea; and Ptolemy calls Triſanton, i. e. ſaith Camden, Traith Anton, the Mouth of Anton) But he chuſes Auſona, for this reaſon, becauſe the two Avons riſe both in the County of Northampton, and ſo cut the Iſland, that none can paſs out of the North, but they muſt croſs one or the other of them, or elſe fall upon the Roman Garriſons between, the Remainders whereof he takes notice of between the riſe of the two Avons at Gilsborough and Daintry; by which means he hindred all intercourſe between the Brigantes and the Roman Province, as the other did between the Silures and them. But if there had been ſuch a Britiſh King as Arviragus among the Belgæ, what would the fortifying the Severn have ſignified, when the Enemies to the Romans lived on the Roman ſide? Tacitus indeed mentions an Expedition of Oſtorius againſt the Cangi, whom (n) Camden ſometimes thought a ſmall People among the Belgæ, but upon better conſideration, (o) he places them in Cheſhire, where he found an Inſcription concerning the CEANGI. And Tacitus ſaith, They were not far from the Sea Coaſt which looks towards Ireland.

(p) R. White of Baſingſtoke ſuppoſes this Arviragus to beſtow the Iſland on Joſeph of Arimathea, when Trebellius Maximus was Governour here, who ſucceeded Petronius Turpilianus the year C. Suetonius Paulinus was Conſul at Rome; Which, according to the Savilian Faſti, was in the twelfth year of Nero, and Anno Dom 67. (four years after Joſeph's coming, according to the Glaſſenbury Tradition) but that is no great matter, if at that time we are ſure there was no ſuch a King as Arviragus among the Belgæ: But he again contradicts the Glaſſenbury Story. For Malmesbury ſaith, That the Barbarous King obſtinately refuſed to quit his Religion, but, out of pity to them, gave them the Iſland to live in; but White ſaith, He was well affected to the Chriſtian Religion, and was in all reſpects an admirable Prince. This Arviragus he takes out of the (q) Britiſh Hiſtory, where pleaſant Stories are told of him, and from thence in (r) Matthew Weſtminſter, as, of his oppoſing Claudius, and then marrying his Daughter Geniſſa, and the reconciliation between him and Veſpaſian by her means, &c. And how his Son Marius ſucceeded him, and then Coilus who was wonderfully beloved by the Roman Senate. Here we have found at laſt the three Kings of Glaſſenbury, Arviragus, Marius and Coilus, as they are exſtant in Capgrave and others: So that the Glaſſenbury Tradition had not its perfection till till it had received theſe improvements from the Britiſh Hiſtory. For William of Malmesbury, though he took ſo great pains in this matter, yet knew nothing of Arviragus, Marius and Coilus. He ſpeaks indeed of three Pagan Kings giving twelve portions of Land to the twelve Brethren, but he knew not their Names. Which Grant, he ſaith, was confirmed by King Lucius to twelve others who were placed there, in imitation of the firſt twelve. And this continued to the coming of St. Patrick. And yet towards the Concluſion of this Book he ſaith, That Anno Domini 601. the King of Dompnonia, i. e. Devonſhire and Cornwall, gave to the old Church in Glaſſenbury the Land called Ynis Withrin, or, the Iſland of Avalon. Who this King was, he ſaith, he could not learn, but he concludes him to have been a Britain, by calling the Iſland by the Britiſh Name. But as to Arviragus, that there was a Britiſh Prince of that name cannot be denied, ſince Juvenal mentions him in Domitian's time.

> Regem aliquem capies, aut de Temone Britanno
> Excidet Arviragus

Satyr. 4. v. 125.

The (s) Author of the Chronicle of Dover underſtands this Paſſage as ſpoken to Nero; which agrees much better with the Tradition of Glaſſenbury, but will by no means agree with Juvenal, who ſaith plainly enough that Satyr related to Domitian and his Flatterers. And this was a very inſipid Flattery to Domitian, unleſs Arviragus were a conſiderable Prince then living, and an Enemy to Cæſar. For what Triumph could he have over a Subject or a Friend as Arviragus is ſuppoſed after the reconciliation with Veſpaſian? And no ſuch Enemy could appear at that time in thoſe parts of Britain. For (t) Petilius Cerealis had Conquer'd the Brigantes, and Julius Frontinus the Silures, and Agricola after them the Ordovices: And in the time of his Government, Tacitus ſaith, Even the confederate Cities among the Britains, who ſtood upon Terms of Equality before they ſubmitted themſelves to the Roman Power, and received Garriſons among them. After this Agricola proceeded Northwards againſt new People, who deſtroyed them as far as the Frith of Taus (Tweed.) Then he fortified the Paſſage between Glota and Bodotria (Dumbretton and Edenborough Frith.) So that the Romans were abſolutely Lords of all this ſide, having caſt out the Enemy as it were into another Land, as Sir Henry Savil tranſlates the words of Tacitus. From which it is evident, there could be no ſuch King as Arviragus at that time in theſe parts of the Iſland, over whom Domitian could expect a Triumph.

But ſuppoſe there were, what is this to the eighth of Nero, when Joſeph of Arimathea is ſaid to have come hither, at what time Arviragus is ſaid to be King in Britain? It is poſſible he might live ſo long, but how comes he to be never mention'd in the Roman Story, as Praſutagus, Cogidunus, Caractacus, Togodumnus and Galgacus are? Arviragus his name was well known at Rome in Domitian's time; why not ſpoken of before? (u) Some think he was the ſame with Porſutagus; but this cannot be, for Praſutagus was dead before the Revolt of the Britains under Boadicea, which was occaſion'd by the Romans ill uſage of the Britains after his death. And Praſutagus left only two Daughters, what becomes then of his Son Marius? whom (w) White would have to be Cogidunus. But Marius is ſaid to ſucceed Arviragus, who was alive in Domitian's time, and Cogidunus had the Cities conferred upon him before Suetonius Paulinus came into Britain, as appears by Tacitus; which are things inconſiſtent. (x) Others ſay that Arviragus was the ſame with Caractacus; for this Opinion Alford contends, and Juvenal, he ſaith, mentions the name by a Poetical Licence, although he lived long before. But what reaſon is there to ſuppoſe that Fabricus Veienti ſhould make ſuch a courſe Complement to Domitian, that he ſhould triumph over a Man dead, and triumphed over once already, by Claudius, who was never known at Rome by any other Name than Caractacus (as far as we can find) by which he was ſo famous for his long Oppoſition to the Romans? But it is very probable, that in Domitian's time, after the recalling Agricola, and taking away the Life of Saluſtius Lucullus, his Succeſſor, The Britains took up Arms under Arviragus. And the (y) Learned Primate of Armagh mentions an old Britiſh Coin in Sir R. Cotton's Collections with theſe Letters on it ARIVOG, from whence he thinks his true name was Arivogus, which the Romans turned to Arviragus. And the old Scholiaſt there ſaith, that was not his true Name. The Britains being now up in Arms, as far as we can learn, were not repreſſed till Hadrian came over in Perſon, and built the firſt Wall, to keep them out of the Roman Province. For, before this, (z) Spartianus ſaith, The Britains could not be kept in ſubjection to the Roman Power. So that here was a fit ſeaſon in Domitian's time (Agricola being recalled in the beginning of Domitian's Reign) for ſuch a King as Arviragus to appear in the head of the Britains, and it was then a ſuitable Complement to him, to wiſh him a Triumph over Arviragus. But (a) Alford ſaith, that Claudius ſent Caractacus home again, and after many years he died in Peace, being a Friend to the Romans. How then comes Tacitus to take no notice of him, as he doth of Cogidunus? Is it probable the Romans would reſtore ſo ſubtile and dangerous an Enemy as Caractacus had been to them? Cogidunus had been always faithful to them, but Caractaeus an open Enemy, and the Silures ſtill in being, over whom he commanded, and not over the Belgæ, as he muſt have done, if he were the Arviragus who gave the Hydes of Land to Joſeph of Arimathea and his Companions.

Theſe things I have here put together to ſhew for what Reaſons I decline the Tradition of Joſeph of Arimathea's coming hither to Preach the Goſpel. And although they may not be ſufficient to convince others, yet I hope they may ſerve to clear me from unexcuſable Partiality, which (b) Mr. Creſſy charges on all who call this Tradition into queſtion.

(2.) But, notwithſtanding, I hope to make it appear from very good and ſufficient Evidence, that there was a Chriſtian Church planted in Britain during the Apoſtles times. And ſuch Evidence ought to be allow'd in this matter which is built on the Teſtimony of ancient and credible Writers, and hath a concurrent probability of Circumſtances.

I ſhall firſt produce the Teſtimony of ancient and credible Writers. For it is an excellent Rule of (c) Baronius in ſuch Caſes, That no Teſtimonies of later Authours are to be regarded concerning things of remote Antiquity, which are not ſupported by the Teſtimony of ancient Writers. And there there is a difference in the force of the Teſtimony of ancient Writers themſelves, according to their Abilities and Opportunities. For ſome had far greater Judgment than others, ſome had greater care about theſe matters, and made it more their buſineſs to ſearch and enquire into them; and ſome had greater advantages by being preſent in the Courts of Princes or Councils of Biſhops, whereby they could better underſtand the Beginning and Succeſſion of Churches. And for all theſe, there was none more remarkable in Antiquity than Euſebius, being a learned and inquiſitive Perſon, a Favorite of Conſtantine, the firſt Chriſtian Emperour (born and proclaimed Emperour in Britain) one preſent at the Council at Nice, whither Biſhops were ſummoned from all parts of the Empire, and one that had a particular curioſity to examine the Hiſtory of all Churches, deſigning an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory out of the Collections he made. The Teſtimony of a Perſon ſo qualified cannot but deſerve great Conſideration, eſpecially, when it is not delivered by way of Report, but when the force of an Argument depends upon it. And (d) Euſebius, in his third Book of Evangelical Demonſtration, undertakes to prove, that the Apoſtles, who firſt preached the Goſpel to the World, could be no Impoſtors or Deceivers; and, among other Arguments, he makes uſe of this, That although it were poſſible for ſuch men to deceive their Neighbours and Countreymen with an improbable Story, yet what madneſs were it for ſuch illiterate Men, who underſtood only their Mother Tongue, to go about to deceive the World by preaching this Doctrine in the remoteſt Cities and Countries? And having named the Romans, Perſians, Armenians, Parthians, Indians, Scythians; he adds particularly, that ſome paſſed over the Ocean ἐπὶ τὰς καλȣμένας Βρεττανικὰς νήσȣς, to thoſe which are called the Britiſh Iſlands. From whence he concludes, that ſome more than humane Power did accompany the Apoſtles, and that they were no light or inconſiderable Men, much leſs Impoſtors and Deceivers. Now unleſs this had been a thing very well known at that time, that Chriſtianity was planted here by the Apoſtles, why ſhould he ſo particularly and expreſly mention the Britiſh Iſlands? It cannot be ſaid that they are only ſet down to denote the moſt remote and obſcure places. For, long before that time the Britiſh Iſlands were very well known all over the Roman Empire, Britain having been the Scene of many Warlike Actions from Claudius his time; The Occaſion of Emperors additional Titles and Triumphs; The Reſidence of Roman Lieutenants and Legions; The Place of many Roman Colonies, Cities and Ways: But eſpecially, about Conſtantine's time, It was the talk of the World, for the Revolt of Carauſius and Allectus; The Victory and Death of Conſtantius here; The Succeſſion of Conſtantine, and his being declared Emperor by the Army in Britain. So that ſcarce any Roman Province was ſo much intereſted in the ſeveral Revolutions of the Empire as Britain, and therefore Conſtantine going from hence, and being ſo much in the eſteem of Euſebius, it is not to be conceived, that he ſhould ſpeak theſe Words at random, but that he had made a diligent Enquiry both of Conſtantine himſelf, to whom he was well known, and of others of his Court, concerning the State of the Britiſh Churches, of what continuance they were, and by whom planted. After all which Euſebius affirms it with ſo much aſſurance, That ſome of the Apoſtles preached the Goſpel in the Britiſh Iſlands.

(d) Euſeb. Demonſt. Evang. l 3. c.7. p.113.

Much to the ſame purpoſe (e) Theodoret ſpeaks, another learned and judicious Church Hiſtorian. For among the Nations converted by the Apoſtles, he expreſly names the Britains; and elſewhere ſaith, (f) That St. Paul brought Salvation to the Iſlands that lie in the Ocean, after he had mention'd Spain, and therefore in all probability the Britiſh Iſlands are underſtood by him. And in another place (g) he ſaith, That St. Paul, after his Releaſe at Rome, went to Spain, and from thence carried the Light of the Goſpel to other Nations. What other Nations ſo likely to be underſtood as thoſe which lay the neareſt, and are elſewhere ſaid to be converted by the Apoſtles, as the Britains are by him? St. (h) Jerome, ſaith, That St. Paul, having been in Spain, went from one Ocean to another, imitating the motion and courſe of the Sun of Righteouſneſs, of whom it is ſaid, his going forth is from the end of Heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it; and that his diligence in Preaching extended as far as the Earth it ſelf. Which are more indefinite Expreſſions. But elſewhere he ſaith, (i) That St. Paul, after his Impriſonment, preached the Goſpel in the Weſtern parts; By which the Britiſh Iſlands were eſpecially underſtood; As will appear by the following Teſtimony of (k) Clemens Romanus, who ſaith, St. Paul preached Righteouſneſs through the whole World, and in ſo doing went ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς Δύσεως, to the utmoſt bounds of the Weſt. Which Paſſage will neceſſarily take in Britain, if we conſider what was then meant by the Bounds of the Weſt. Plutarch, in the Life of Cæſar, ſpeaking of his Expedition into Britain, ſaith, He was the firſt who brought a Fleet into the Weſtern Ocean; By which he underſtands the Sea between Gaul and Britain. And (l) Euſebius ſeveral times calls the Britiſh Ocean, the Weſtern, and joins the Britiſh Ocean and the Weſtern parts together. And (m) elſewhere he mentions Gaul and the Weſtern parts beyond it; by which he underſtands Britain. And (n) Theodoret reckons up the Inhabitants of Spain, of Britain and Gaul, (who, ſaith he, lie between the other two) as thoſe who dwell in the bounds of the Weſt; And among theſe the Britains muſt be in the utmoſt bounds, becauſe the Gauls lie in the midſt. (o) Herodotus ſaith, the Celtæ are the moſt Weſtern of all the Europeans. Now the ancient Greek Geographers knew of but two Nations in Europe beſides themſelves, the Celtæ and the Scythæ; theſe latter comprehended all in the moſt Northern parts of Europe, and the Celtæ the Weſtern; And among theſe the remoteſt were the Britains. Thence (p) Horace calls them, Ultimos Orbis Britannos; As (q) Catullus before him, Ultimóſque Britannos. For before the diſcovery of Britain, the Morini, who lived over againſt it, were ſaid to be the utmoſt People of the Earth. So (r) Virgil calls them, Extremos hominum Morinos. And (s) Pliny, Ultimíque hominum exiſtimati Morini. Æthicus ſaith they were, Gentes Oceani Occidentalis. But Britain being throughly made known in the time of Claudius, The utmoſt bounds of the Weſt muſt be underſtood of Britain, eſpecially ſince (t) Catullus calls Britain, Ultimam Occidentis Inſulam. And (u) Arnobius ſetting down the bounds of the Goſpel Eaſt and Weſt, for the Eaſt he mentions the Indians, and for the Weſt the Britains. I cannot but wonder what ſo Learned a man as (w) Joh. Launoy means, when, being urged by his Adverſaries with this place of Clemens his Epiſtle to prove the Apoſtolical Antiquity of the Gallican Churches, He fairly rejects the authority of this Epiſtle, which hath been ſo univerſally received by all Learned men ſince the firſt publiſhing of it. But then he argues well, that if this paſſage holds for Gaul, it will much more hold for Britain. So that from this undoubted Teſtimony of Clemens it follows, not only, That the Goſpel was preached in Britain in the times of the Romans, but, That St. Paul himſelf was the Preacher of it. Which is affirmed by (x) Venantius Fortunatus, where he deſcribes St. Paul's labours.

Tranſit & Oceanum, vel quà facit Inſula Portum, Quáſque Britannus habet terras, quáſque ultima Thule.

But becauſe this may look only like a Poetical Expreſſion,

(3.) To make this out more fully, I ſhall conſider the concurrent probability of Circumſtances, together with theſe Teſtimonies. And I ſhall make it appear, (1.) From St. *Paul*s Circumſtances, that he had Leiſure and Opportunity enough to have come hither. (2.) From the Circumſtances of Britain, that here was incouragement and invitation enough for him to come. (3.) From the Circumſtances of the reſt of the Apoſtles, That he was the moſt likely to come hither of any of them.

(1.) That St Paul had Leiſure and Opportunity enough to come hither to preach the Goſpel. It is agreed by (y) Euſebius, St. (z) Jerome, and others of the Ancients, That St. Paul ſuffer'd at Rome, 14th of Nero. (a) Baronius ſaith, the 13th, reckoning the years of Nero exactly from the beginning of his Reign in October; But (b) Petavius ſaith, That the Ancients reckon'd the years according to the uſual cuſtom of a civil year. So that the 13th of Nero's Reign is the 14th from the Calends of January. St. Paul was ſent to Rome, when Feſtus was made Procurator of Judæa, in the room of Felix, which was, ſay Euſebius and St. Jerome, in the ſecond of Nero; And I ſee no reaſon to queſtion it; For although Felix ſucceeded Cumanus in the Government of Judæa, who was not condemned till the 12th of Claudius (from whence to the ſecond of Nero cannot be reckon'd thoſe many years (c) St. Paul ſaith he had been Governour among the Jews) yet we are to conſider, that Felix was not ſent immediately from Rome, as (d) Baronius miſtakes, but upon Cumanus his Sentence, had his former Government inlarged. Judæa being then added to his Province, and part of the Province which he had before being given to Agrippa, as (e) Joſephus ſaith; So that part of Galilee and Samaria having been under his Government before, Saint Paul might well ſay, he had been a Ruler among them many years, although he were diſmiſſed in the ſecond of Nero. And although (f) Tacitus ſaith, That Felix had been a long time Governour of Judæa, yet it appears, by the diſtribution of the Province between Cumanus and him, That before Cumanus his Baniſhment, that which was properly Judæa fell not to his ſhare; And it is not probable that his Government ſhould outlaſt the Favour of Pallas with Nero, which mightily declined in his ſecond year. After Saint Paul's coming to Rome, Saint Luke ſaith, he abode there (g) two years. But (h) Maſſutius obſerves from the Circumſtances of St. Paul's Voyage, That he could not come to Rome till the third of Nero. So that he could not have his liberty till the fifth, upon occaſion of the Favours ſhew'd, as he conjectures, to Priſoners and Exiles on the Murder of Agrippina. But from this time to his returning to Rome, he went up and down Preaching the Goſpel. To which time (i) Godeau, in his Life of St. Paul, allows eight years : (k) Maſſutius rather more ; (l) Baronius the ſame ; And he ſaith, it was time enough for him to paſs through the whole World ; Which Maſſutius repeats after him. The Queſtion now is, Where Saint Paul employ'd all this time? The ancient Writers of the Church generally ſay, in the Weſtern parts ; ſo Clemens, Theodoret, St. Jerome, Athanaſius, Epiphanius, and others. But I need not inſiſt on particular Teſtimonies, ſince the only Learned (m) Perſon who hath oppoſed this Opinion doth ingenuouſly confeſs it to have been the common and received Opinion of all the Fathers. And I ſee no reaſon, by any thing he hath produced, to recede from it. For ſuppoſe we ſhould grant, that he went back into the Eaſtern parts, and viſited the Churches there, ſome part of this time ; yet there is enough ſtill left for St. Paul to Preach the Goſpel in Britain and other Weſtern parts, as the Fathers ſay that he did. And if we compare the time ſpent by St. Paul in his former Travels in the Eaſt, and allow him to uſe an equal diligence afterwards, there cannot appear any improbability that he ſhould come into Britain, and eſtabliſh a Chriſtian Church here. Three Peregrinations of St. Paul we have an Account of in the Acts of the Apoſtles, before his Voyage to Rome. The (n) firſt is of him and Barnabas, from Antioch to Selencia, Cyprus, Perga, Iconium, Lyſtra, and Derbe of Lycaonia ; from whence they returned back and ſettled the Government of the Churches then planted by them. And although it be ſaid (o) that they abode long at Iconium and Antioch, yet (p) Maſſutius ſhews, That this whole Peregrination took up but five years : Which is as much as (q) Baronius allows from the beginning of it, to the Council of Jeruſalem. For that he placeth in the 4th of Claudius, and this in the 9th. But (r) he makes their return to Antioch in the 7th, ſo that he allows but three years to the founding and ſettling ſo many Churches. After the Council at Jeruſalem, St. Paul takes another Progreſs from Antioch, and went through (s) Syria and Cilicia, from thence to Derbe and Lyſtra ; and ſo through Phrygia, and Galatia, and Myſia ; and then from Troas croſſed the Sea into Macedonia, where he firſt Preached at Philippi, a Roman Colony : And from thence paſſed to Theſſalonica, and ſo to Berrhæa, Athens and (t) Corinth, where he tarried a year and ſix months and more, and then ſailed into Syria, and made haſt to Jeruſalem, and ſo returned to Antioch. This ſecond Progreſs (u) Baronius reckons from the ninth of Claudius to the twelfth, and half the time was ſpent at Corinth. The third was again from Antioch over all the Countrey of Galatia and Phrygia, to which (w) Baronius allows a years time ; And the next he fixes at Epheſus, where St. Paul ſaith he (x) tarried three years (not exactly, but the far greateſt part of it, having taught (y) three months in the Synagogue, and two years in the School of Tyrannus.) From Epheſus he goes into Macedonia and Achaia, and having abode there three months, he returned through Macedonia to Troas, and from thence he went to Miletus, whither he ſent for the Elders of the Church, and took his ſolemn leave of them, ſaying, (z) that they ſhould ſee his Face no more. From Miletus he paſſed to Phœnicia, and ſo to Jeruſalem, where he was kept two years in cuſtody, and then ſent by Feſtus to Rome. This is a ſhort account of St. Paul's labours and diligence in Preaching the Goſpel before his Impriſonment at Rome. And we cannot ſuppoſe a Perſon of ſuch indefatigable Induſtry and Pains, ſhould lie ſtill ſo many years after. It is certain he thought he ſhould never return more to the Eaſtern Parts, when he ſaid ſo ſolemnly, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone Preaching the Kingdom of God, ſhall ſee my Face no more. Which Words do not only concern the Church of Epheſus, but all the other Churches planted by him in the Eaſt; And this he ſpeaks not as his fear or conjecture, but out of certain Knowledge. And therefore it is not probable he ſhould return into the Eaſt, nor, if he did, would this hinder his coming into theſe parts afterwards, where he might plant Churches within that time. But it is objected, That there are no certain Monuments of ſuch Churches planted by him in Italy, Gaul, Germany or Spain. What certain Monuments are there of new Churches planted by him in the Eaſt after his return? And it is much leſs probable, becauſe the Eaſtern Writers, who ſhould know beſt, allot this time to his Preaching in the Weſt. But it is well obſerved by the Learned (a) M. Velſerus, ſpeaking of the Preaching of the Apoſtles, St. Peter and St. Paul, in theſe Weſtern parts, That we are not to judge of the Planting of Churches by the remaining Annals and Monuments, becauſe on the one ſide we are certain that their ſound went out into all the Earth: And on the other, great care was taken in the ſeveral Perſecutions, eſpecially that of Diocleſian, to burn all the Monuments which concerned the Chriſtian Churches. But yet, as to Britain, we have undoubted Teſtimony of a Chriſtian Church planted here by the Apoſtles, and by none ſo probably as St. Paul.. For Gildas ſaith, The Goſpel was here received before the fatal defeat of the Britains by Suetonius Paulinus; which, according to Sir H. Savil's Faſti, was the ſeventh of Nero, the eighth ſaith Petavius: And St. Paul being at liberty the fifth, had time and conveniency enough to ſettle a Chriſtian Church in Britain.

(2.) That there was Incouragement and Invitation enough for St. Paul to come into Britain, not only from the Infinite numbers of People, which, (b) Cæſar ſaith, were here in his time, but from the new Settlements that were daily making here by the Romans, after the firſt Succeſs, which they had in the time of Claudius: For then Colonies were drawn over hither; And not only Military Colonies ſettled for the ſecurity of the Roman Conqueſts, ſuch as that of Camalodunum is deſcribed by (c) Tacitus, formerly the Royal Seat of Cynobelin, King of the Trinobantes; but alſo Civil and Trading Colonies, ſuch as London was from the beginning, and therefore commended by Tacitus for its admirable Situation for Trading, and all Accommodations to that end; and, upon the beſt enquiry I can make, I very much incline to believe it of a Roman Foundation, and no elder than the time of Claudius (as will be made appear in another Diſcourſe:) And that in the time of Suetonius Paulinus it was inhabited by Romans and Britains together, is evident from Tacitus; When Suetonius Paulinus drew out the Inhabitants, the City not being then defenſible againſt the Britains, who in that Revolt deſtroyed LXX thouſand Romans and their Allies, ſaith Tacitus; But (d) Dio ſaith, two Cities (London and Verulam; for Camalodunum was deſtroyed before) and Eighty thouſand Men. This was a time of ſo much Diſorder and Bloudſhed, That Gildas with great reaſon places the Planting of Chriſtianity here before it. And St. Paul might have ſome particular incouragement at Rome to come hither from Pomponia Græcina, Wife to A. Plautius, the Roman Lieutenant under Claudius in Britain; For that ſhe was a Chriſtian appears very probable from the account Tacitus gives of her; (e) He ſaith, ſhe was accu- ſed of foreign Superſtition, and that ſo far as to endanger her Life; But her Husband clear'd her, ſitting as Judge according to the ancient form; and ſhe lived long after, but in perpetual ſadneſs. If Tacitus were to deſcribe the Primitive Chriſtians, he would have done it juſt after this manner, Charging their Religion with Superſtition, and the Severity of their Lives (abſtaining from all the Feaſts and Jollities of the Romans) as a continual Solitude. It was the way of the Men of that time, ſuch as (f) Suetonius, and (g) Pliny, as well as (h) Tacitus, to ſpeak of Chriſtianity as a Barbarous and Wicked Superſtition (as appears by their Writings) being forbidden by their Laws; which they made the only Rule of Religion. And this happen'd when Nero and Calphurnius Piſo were Conſuls, after St. Paul's coming to Rome, and therefore it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe her one of his Converts, by whom he might eaſily be informed of the ſtate and condition of Britain, and thereby be more incouraged to undertake a Voyage thither. It is certain that St. Paul did make conſiderable Converts at his coming to Rome; Which is the reaſon of his mentioning (i) the Saint in Cæſar's houſhold. And it is not improbable that ſome of the Britiſh Captives carried over with Caractacus and his Family, might be ſome of them; who would certainly promote the Converſion of their Country by St. Paul. But I cannot affirm, as (k) Moncæius doth, That Claudia, mention'd by St. Paul, was Caractacus his Daughter, and turn'd Chriſtian, and after married to Pudens a Roman Senator; whoſe Marriage is celebrated by Martial in his noted Epigrams to that purpoſe. It is certain that Claudia Ruffina was a Britain, who is ſo much commended by (l) Martial for her Wit and Beauty. But if theſe Epigrams were written in Trajan's time, as is very probable, It is ſomewhat of the lateſt for the Daughter of Caractacus who came in Claudius his time to Rome. But (m) Alford digeſts all this well enough, only he is extremely concern'd, leſt ſhe ſhould be made the Apoſtle of Britain, and preach here before St. Peter. But the (n) Author of the Antiquitates Britannicæ, whom he reflects upon, ſaith no ſuch thing as he would impute to him. He only ſaith, That if ſhe were a Chriſtian ſhe would acquaint her Countrymen as much with the Chriſtian Doctrine as ſhe did before with Martial's Wit. Wherein there is no Profaneneſs or Abſurdity. But he adds, that in ſo noble a Family, The reſt of her kindred who were baptized with her might be the Occaſions of diſperſing Chriſtianity in the Britiſh Nation. So that there was no need, for his bidding Claudia to keep at home, and make room for St. Peter to come to Britain to preach the Goſpel. But if this Claudia were St. Paul's Diſciple, why might not ſhe excite that Apoſtle to go into her Country, to plant Chriſtianity there, as he had done with ſo much Succeſs in other Places? And whether St. Peter or St. Paul were more probably the Apoſtle of Britain, is now to be conſidered. And I affirm,

(3.) That St. Paul was the moſt likely to come hither of any of the Apoſtles. The ſeveral Traditions about St. James, Simon Zelotes and Philip, are ſo deſtitute of any ancient Teſtimony or Probability, that the Competition among the Apoſtles can lie only between St. Peter and St. Paul. Some Writers of our Church Hiſtory have endeavoured for particular Reaſons, to prove St. Peter to have preached the Goſpel in Britain; But their Proofs are very ſlight and inconſiderable, and depend chiefly on the authority of Simeon Metaphraſtes or other Legendary Writers, or ſome Monkiſh Viſions, or ſome Domeſtick Teſtimonies of his pretended Suc-

Succeſſors, or ſome late partial Advocates, ſuch as (o) Eyſengrenius, who profeſſes to follow Metaphraſtes. All which together are not worth mentioning in compariſon with the Authors on the other ſide; I ſhall therefore examine the Probability of the thing from the Circumſtances of St. Peter, as I did before from thoſe of St. Paul; and I ſhall endeavour to ſhew, That his buſineſs lay quite another way, and that there is no probable Evidence of his coming hither.

I take it for granted, that the Apoſtles were employ'd according to the Tenour of their Commiſſions, viz. That the Apoſtle of the Circumciſion was to attend the Jews, and of the Uncircumciſion the Gentiles. Now St. Paul ſaith, That (p) the Goſpel of the Uncircumciſion was committed to him, as the Goſpel of the Circumciſion was unto Peter. This, (q) Baronius ſaith, was agreed at the Council at Jeruſalem. But he will not have it to be ſuch a diſtribution of diſtinct Provinces, as that the one upon no occaſion ſhould meddle with the Gentiles, nor the other with the Jews: But yet he grants, that the Apoſtleſhip of the Gentiles was in a particular manner committed to St. Paul, as of the Jews to St. Peter. And whatever they might do occaſionally, This, as he proves from (r) St. Jerome, was the Principal Mandatum, the Main of the Commiſſion to either of them. Which being ſuppoſed, It neceſſarily follows, that St. Peter's chief Employment muſt be where the greateſt numbers of Jews were. And from hence (s) Petrus de Marca infers, That St. Peter, having preached to the Jews in Judæa, employed himſelf in converting the Jews abroad both of the firſt and ſecond Diſperſion. The latter were chiefly in Egypt, at Alexandria, where he ſettled Mark the Biſhop over the converted Jews. From thence he went to Antioch; from thence to Babylon, where the Head of the firſt Diſperſion lived; And in this City, he ſaith, he wrote his Epiſtle to thoſe diſperſed Jews, over whoſe Synagogues the Patriarch of Babylon had Juriſdiction. Clemens Romanus takes no notice at all of St. Peter's Preaching in the Weſtern parts, as he doth of St. Paul's. But (t) Euſebius, from Origen ſaith, That St Peter preached to the diſperſed Jews in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, &c. And (u) Epiphanius, even where he ſaith, That St. Peter and St. Paul did both conſtitute Biſhops at Rome, upon their going thence to preach the Goſpel in other places; yet he adds, That St. Paul went towards Spain, but St. Peter frequently viſited Pontus and Bithynia, which was very agreeable to the deſign of his Commiſſion, there being ſo great a number of Jews in thoſe parts. And Pontus and Bithynia ſeem to have been reſerved as the peculiar Province of St. Peter; For when St. Paul attempted to go into Bithynia, (w) he was forbidden by the Spirit, which then commanded him to come into Europe. And ſo he made for Macedonia. (x) Baronius grants, that St. Peter ſpent the greateſt part of his time in the Eaſtern parts, but about Anno Dom. 58. he finds him employed in the Weſt, and particularly among the Britains. But what ancient authority, according to his own Rule, doth he produce for it? He names none but Metaphraſtes, and yet as it falls out unluckily, when the ſame Metaphraſtes his authority is produced, for St. Paul*'s preaching in the Weſtern parts*, he is apparently ſlighted by him (y) and for the very ſame Reaſon, which holds againſt the former Teſtimony, viz. for quoting things out of Euſebius, which are not to be found in him. And elſewhere he ſaith, (z) he is of no authority in theſe matters. But Metaphraſtes his Teſtimony ſerves to a good purpoſe in St. Peter's Caſe, viz. to clear a conſiderable difficulty, how St. Peter, if then Biſhop of Rome, ſhould not then be taken notice of by St. Paul, when he wrote his Epiſtle to the Romans. To which he anſwers, That St. Peter came to Rome the ſecond of Claudius, but being baniſhed thence with other Jews the ninth of Claudius, he ſpent the time then in preaching the Goſpel in other places, and ſo very conveniently finds him in Britain, when St. Paul wrote his Epiſtle to the Romans, which he placeth in the ſecond of Nero. But it is by no means probable, ſaith (a) Valeſius, That St. Peter ſhould come to Rome before the death of Herod Agrippa. And (b) Baronius ſaith, That after his being delivered out of priſon, he went to Cæſarea, Laodicea and Antioch (according to his own Author Metaphraſtes) and then into Cappadocia, Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia, and ſo returned by Antioch to Jeruſalem. So that if Metaphraſtes his authority be good for any thing, St. Peter could hardly come to Rome the ſecond of Claudius : And if the death of Agrippa followed ſoon after the delivery of St. Peter, as Valeſius thinks, and St. Luke ſeems to intimate; then he could not be at Rome till the fourth of Claudius, for all agree that Agrippa died that year. So that there is no certainty of St. Peter's coming to Rome the ſecond of Claudius. Yet let that be ſuppoſed, And that St. Peter went from Rome on the Edict of Claudius. What makes him ſo long abſent from thence as to the ſecond of Nero, when (c) St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans ſalutes Aquila and Priſcilla as then preſent at Rome, who certainly left it before on the (d) Account of that Edict. So that this Edict could be no reaſon of his being abſent from Rome at the time of this Epiſtle. But it falls out unhappily, That though St. Peter be made by Baronius and others, Biſhop of Rome for twenty five years, yet he can never be found in his own Dioceſe in all that time before his Martyrdom; But one excuſe or other is ſtill found for his abſence, when there were ſeveral remarkable Tranſactions which muſt have diſcovered him if he had been at Rome; As not only upon St. Paul's writing this Epiſtle to the Romans, but upon St. Paul's coming to Rome, upon his writing ſo many Epiſtles from thence, upon the defence he made for himſelf, when he ſaith (e) that all forſook him. What St. Peter too? So that upon the whole matter, the Opinion of (f) Lactantius in his late publiſhed Book, ſeems moſt agreeable to truth, That St. Peter came not to Rome till the Reign of Nero, and not long before his Martyrdom; And this Baluzius confeſſes to have been the moſt ancient and received Opinion in the Church, ſince Lactantius never diſputes it : And what he ſaith of the twenty five years wherein the Apoſtles planted Churches, was in likelihood the occaſion of that miſtaken Tradition concerning St. Peter*'s being twenty five years Biſhop of* Rome. So much may ſuffice to ſhew the greater probability, That the Chriſtian Church in Britain was rather founded by St. Paul than by St. Peter or any other Apoſtle.

HAving ſhew'd the great probability of the planting a Chriſtian Church here in the Apoſtles time, and that by St. Paul; I am now to conſider, the Succeſſion of this Church; of which we have undoubted Evidence from the unqueſtionable Teſtimonies of Tertullian and Origen, who mention it as a thing ſo very well known, That they uſe it as an Argument againſt the Jews, to prove Chriſt to have been the promiſed Meſſias, becauſe the uttermoſt parts of the Earth were given for his Poſſeſſion. Tertullian flouriſhed, as St. Jerome ſaith, under Severus and his Son; And in the time of Severus he wrote againſt the Jews, as (a) Baronius proves from ſeveral Paſſages in that Book. In his time the Affairs of Britain were very well underſtood in other parts of the Roman Empire, eſpecially by Men ſo learned and inquiſitive as Tertullian. For Clodius Albinus having ſet up for the Empire in Britain, and being beaten by Severus near Lyons, he took care to ſecure this Province by ſending Virius Lupus, his Lieutenant, hither. But things growing troubleſome here, Severus himſelf undertook an Expedition hither, and brought the Britains to ſuch Terms, That they were contented to live beyond the Wall which Severus built; where Hadrian's Wall had been before. The part of Britain beyond the Wall was called Caledonia, as (b) Dio ſaith. And it is apparent, that the Romans were at that time fully acquainted with the Condition of the Britains, both within the Province, and without; and therefore Tertullian cannot be ſuppoſed to ſpeak at random about this matter; when (c) he mentions the Nations of Gaul and the Britains, with as much aſſurance as he doth his Countrymen, the Moors, for receiving Chriſtianity; And ſaith, The Kingdom of Chriſt was advanced among them, and that Chriſt was ſolemnly worſhipped by them. Tertullian was a man of too much underſtanding to expoſe himſelf to the contempt of the Jews, by mentioning this as a thing ſo well known at that time, if the Britains were then known to be no Chriſtians; Or, if they had been ſuch, and were returned to Barbariſm, the Argument would have been ſtronger againſt him. When therefore ſuch a Paſſage doth not fall by chance from ſuch a Writer, but the force of an Argument depends upon it, it is of ſo much greater weight. How ridiculous would it appear for a man to prove that Popery is the Catholick Religion, by inſtancing not only in Italy and Spain, as the Nations where it is univerſally received; but in Great Britain, and Denmark, and Sweden? No leſs was the abſurdity than to prove Chriſt's univerſal Kingdom by enumerating Gaul and Britain with other Nations where Chriſt was worſhipped, if there were no Chriſtian Churches at that time in being among them.

But there are two Objections againſt this Paſſage of Tertullian, which muſt be removed. (1.) That he ſpeaks of that part of Britain which was not under the Roman Power, and the Converſion of it is ſaid to be later than to be here mention'd by Tertullian: For (d) Joh. Fordon and (e) Joh. Maior, from an ancient Diſtich in both of them

> Scotia Catholicam cœpit inire Fidem.)

ſay, That the Chriſtian Religion was received in Scotland in A. D. 203, about the ſeventh of Severus. But this was ſo little a time before Tertullian's Writing, that it could hardly be ſo well known in Africa, as to afford ſtrength to an Argument againſt the Jews.

To which I anſwer, That it is true, Tertullian doth add the greater Emphaſis to his Argument by ſaying, Et Britannorum inacceſſa Romanis loca, Chriſto vero ſubdita, the Goſpel had acceſs to thoſe parts of Britain whether the Romans had none. Which doth prove, that Chriſtianity ſtianity was then received beyond the Wall, but not by the Scots, who were not yet ſettled in thoſe parts; But by the old Britains, who were driven thither, as appears by the Account given by (f) Xiphilin out of Dio, who ſaith, that the Britains were divided into two ſorts, the Mæatæ and the Caledonii; The former dwelt by the Wall, and the latter beyond them. Theſe were the Extraprovincial Britains, and were diſtinct both from the Picts and the Scots, ſaith (g) John Fordon, who carefully diſtinguiſheth theſe three Nations when he ſpeaks of their Wars with the Romans; And he makes Fulgentius the Head of the Britains of Albany in the time of Severus; But he ſuppoſes both the Scots and Picts to have been in the Northern parts long before, and that the Scots received the Chriſtian Faith in the time of Severus, Victor being then Biſhop of Rome, who ſucceeded Eleutherius; To whom, ſaith (h) Hector Boethius, King Donald ſent Embaſſadors, to deſire him to ſend Perſons fit to inſtruct them in the Chriſtian Faith. And upon this, ſaith he, it was generally received in Scotland. * Dempſter, according to his cuſtom, is very warm in this matter, and ſaith, all their Annals and Hiſtories agree, that King Donald and the whole Kingdom of Scotland did then embrace Chriſtianity; And is angry with Baronius for putting off their Converſion to the time of Palladius. But notwithſtanding all his boaſting of the conſent of Annals and Hiſtories, the Scotichronicon is the only Authority he hath to produce: And in his Preface he ſaith, That King Edward I. deſtroy'd all the Monuments of the Kingdom; and it is ſomewhat unreaſonable to complain of the want, and to alledge the conſent of them at the ſame time. And beſides, he produceth ſomething out of Fordon concerning Paſchaſius of Sicily, being ſent by Victor into Scotland, and returning with a Meſſage from King Donald, which is not to be found in Fordon. But, as (i) Baronius obſerves, It is ſtrange, that ſo remarkable a Converſion ſhould be omitted not only by Bede, but by Marianus Scotus, who mentions the Miſſion of Palladius. And (k) Proſper ſaith, Upon the Miſſion of Palladius, who was made the firſt Biſhop over the Scotiſh Chriſtians, the People, who were barbarous before, were made Chriſtians.

But it is urged by Dempſter, not without ſhew of Authority, that Palladius was ſent to thoſe which were already Chriſtians, and therefore Chriſtianity muſt be planted among the Scots before the Miſſion of Palladius; and for this he quotes Beda, Ado Viennenſis, Hermannus Contractus, Marianus Scotus, and others; and he blames Platina and Giacconius who make him the Inſtrument of their Converſion, wherein he confeſſeth they follow Fabius Ethelwerd and Ingulphus; but he takes no notice, that Proſper himſelf, in his Chronicon, affirms the ſame thing, and the others have it from him. So that Proſper makes the Scots to be converted by Palladius, and to have been Chriſtians before his time; which are inconſiſtent: But (l) Nennius ſeems to have hit upon the true account of this matter, viz. That Paladius was ſent by Celeſtine to convert the Scots, but finding no great ſucceſs therein, he was driven on the Coaſts of Britain, and there died: And after his death, St. Patrick was ſent on the ſame Errand. And, if the Writers of his Life may be believed, Palladius did very little towards the Converſion of the Scots; And therefore what Proſper ſaith of Celeſtine's making a barbarous Nation Chriſtian, muſt be underſtood of his Deſign and good Intention, and not of the Event, which came not to paſs till ſome time after; and chiefly, by the means of St. Patrick, who went after the death death of Palladius: Unleſs we underſtand the Words of Proſper, of thoſe who were made Chriſtians at the time of his Writing; the Deſign whereof being laid by Palladius is therefore attributed to him, when he wrote againſt Caſſian, ſometime after the death of Celeſtine: But when he wrote his Chronicon, in the time of Leo, The Scots being then converted; he ſaith, That Palladius was appointed to be Biſhop over the believing Scots. Not that they did then believe before Palladius his coming, but that they did now believe when he wrote his Chronicon. For all the Teſtimonies of ſuch as Preached there before Palladius are of very little Credit. But nothing of all this relates to the Scots in Britain; but to the original Scots in Ireland, who were uncapable of a National Converſion in Britain, ſo long before they came to ſettle in it, as will appear afterwards: So that if there were any Converſion of Scots before the Miſſion of Palladius, it cannot at all reſpect this Place of Tertullian, who ſpeaks only of the Britains, and not of the Scots.

And Dio knew of none but Britains that lived Northward in that Expedition of Severus, although he ſaith, he went to the utmoſt extent of the Iſland, and at laſt concluded a Peace with the Britains upon their quitting no ſmall part of their Countrey, although they ſoon revolted; So that here was a great number of Britains to be converted in thoſe Places, where the Romans never had been before Severus his laſt Expedition: Which the Scotiſh Hiſtorians apply to the Converſion of their Nation, who were not yet come into Britain. But allowing that there were Churches planted among the Northern Britains, this doth not overthrow the continuance and propagation of the Chriſtian Church among the Provincial Britains; For now, for a long time, the Chriſtian Religion had a great Liberty of propagating it ſelf; For, from the time of Hadrian to Severus, the Chriſtians were generally free from Perſecution, excepting what the Rage of the People brought upon them in ſome Places, without any Edict of the Emperors, as in the time of the Antonini both at Rome, in Gaul, and ſome parts of the Eaſt: But theſe Perſecutions were neither general, nor continued ſo long as when the Emperors publiſhed Edicts on purpoſe; and therefore, the Perſecutions under Trajan and the Antonini, ought in reaſon to be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe under Nero and Domitian, Decius and Diocleſian, when the Emperors made it their buſineſs to root out Chriſtianity. But in the former Caſe, the Emperors reſtrain'd the People by their Edicts, but the People in ſome Places by falſe Suggeſtions fruſtrated the deſign of thoſe Edicts, which Places excepted, the Chriſtians enjoy'd a long time of Liberty; In which they neglected no opportunities to promote their Religion. And within this time the Chriſtian Writers ſay, There was no Nation almoſt then known, where Chriſtianity was not planted. So (m) Juſtin Martyr tells Trypho; ſo (n) Euſebius and (o) Ruffinus ſpeak; and (p) Lactantius ſaith, That Chriſtianity ſpread it ſelf into the Eaſt and Weſt, ſo that there was ſcarce any Corner of the Earth ſo remote whither it had not pierced, no Nation ſo barbarous that was not reduced by it. As to Britain, Gildas affirms the continuance of a Church here, from the firſt Plantation of the Goſpel, though not maintain'd with equal Zeal, to the Perſecution of Diocleſian; and even that was ſo far from deſtroying it, that it gained ſtrength and reputation by the Courage of Confeſſors and Martyrs; and the heat of it was no ſooner over, but, as (q) Bede and (r) Gildas both both ſay, The Chriſtian Church flouriſhed again in great Peace and Unity till the Arian Hereſie gave it diſturbance.

(2.) It is objected, That (s) Sulpicius Severus, ſpeaking of the Perſecution of Chriſtians in Gaul in the time of M. Aurelius Antoninus, ſaith, That Martyrdoms, were then firſt ſeen in Gaul, the Chriſtian Religion being more lately received beyond the Alpes. Which ſeems to overthrow the Antiquity of the Britannick as well as the Gallick Churches. But in my opinion (after ſo many Diſcourſes written in a neighbour Nation about this Paſſage) we are to diſtinguiſh that which Sulpicius Severus abſolutely affirms, viz. That there were no Martyrdoms in Gaul before that time; From that which he ſuppoſes to have been the reaſon of it, viz. That the Chriſtian Religion was more lately received on this ſide the Alpes. The other he was certain of, there being no authentick Relation of any Martyrdoms there before; but that which he aſſigns as the reaſon of it, hath no ſuch certainty in it; For the Chriſtian Churches might have been planted there before, and have eſcaped that Perſecution which befell the Churches of Lyons and Vienne in the time of M. Aurelius: He might as well have argued, that Chriſtianity was not here received till a little before the Perſecution of Diocleſian, becauſe we read of no Martyrdoms before thoſe of St. Alban, Julius and Aaron, at that time. But if there were no Edict for Perſecution of Chriſtians for above an hundred years together, viz. from the Perſecution of Domitian Anno Dom. 92. to the Edict of Severus, Anno Dom. 234. then it was very poſſible that there might be Chriſtian Churches in Gaul, and yet no Martyrdoms till the Perſecution under M. Aurelius by a popular Tumult, which, as (t) Euſebius tells us, was the ſeventeenth year of his Reign. (u) Baronius thinks that M. Aurelius ſent private Edicts againſt the Chriſtians. But (w) Tertullian ſaith, none of their good Emperors ever perſecuted the Chriſtians, and inſtanceth in Trajan, Hadrian, Pius, Verus and M. Aurelius. (x) Euſebius ſaith, That Trajan abated the fierceneſs of the Perſecution, but left the Laws in force, upon information, That Hadrian, in his Reſcript to Minutius Fundanus, Proconſul of Aſia, forbad a general Perſecution of any as Chriſtians; That, Antoninus Pius, not only purſued the ſame method, but threatned ſevere puniſhment to all Informers: the ſame he ſaith of M. Aurelius. In Commodus his time, he ſaith, the Chriſtian Churches flouriſhed very much in all parts; So that till Severus his Edict there was no Perſecution, by virtue of any Edict of the Emperors; by the account which Euſebius gives. And (y) Lactantius hardly allows any Perſecution at all from Domitian to Decius. Not but that the Chriſtians ſuffered very much in ſome Places, through the Rage of the People, and the Violence of ſome Governours of Provinces; But there was no general Perſecution countenanced by the Emperors Edicts, and therefore, where the People were quiet or intent upon other things, there might be Chriſtian Churches where there were no ſuch Martyrdoms as thoſe of Lyons and Vienne.

It is certain that (z) Irenæus mentions the conſent of the Celtick Churches, and thoſe of Germany and the Iberi, with the Eaſtern and Libyan Churches. All the Queſtion is, Whether this ought to be reſtrained to the Churches planted among the Celtæ, as they were one Diviſion of the Gauls in Cæſar's time, or whether he took the word in the larger ſenſe, as comprehending all the Gauls. This latter ſeems much more probable, becauſe Irenæus, in none of the others mention'd by him, takes any particular Diviſion of the People, but the general Name, as of the Germans and Iberi, and why not then the Celtæ in as large a ſenſe? Since (a) Strabo, (b) Plutarch, (c) Appian, and others, call the Gauls in general by the name of Celtæ; and Tertullian manifeſtly rejects that ſenſe of Celtæ for one Diviſion of the Gauls, when he mentions the ſeveral Nations of the Gauls which had embraced Chriſtianity. But I will not inſiſt, as (d) Petrus de Marca doth, That Tertullian by the Galliarum diverſæ Nationes means the four Provinces of Gaul into which Auguſtus did diſtribute it: But I ſay, that there is no reaſon to limit the ſenſe of Tertullian to one Diviſion of the Gauls, ſuppoſing the different Nations do comprehend thoſe of Gallia Ciſalpina and Tranſalpina; although I ſee no ground to underſtand Tertullian ſo, (e) ſince the name of Gallia Ciſalpina was much diſuſed; eſpecially after the new diſtribution of the Empire by Hadrian. So that from the Teſtimonies of Irenæus and Tertullian, we ſee no reaſon to queſtion the greater Antiquity of the Celtick Churches than Sulpicius Severus intimates, much leſs to overthrow the Antiquity of the Britannick Churches. For, beſides this Teſtimony of Tertullian concerning the Britiſh Churches; We have another of (f) Origen, not long after, who ſaith, When did Britain before the coming of Chriſt conſent in the Worſhip of one God? Which implies, that the Britains were then known to be Chriſtians; and, by being ſo, were brought off from the former Idolatry. And unleſs ſo learned a Man as Origen had been fully ſatisfied of the truth of this, having choice enough of other Inſtances, he would not have run as far as Britain to bring an Argument to prove, that all the Earth doth praiſe the Lord; Which, he ſaith, is fulfilled in the Chriſtian Churches diſperſed over the World. But I wonder what ſhould make two ſuch learned Antiquaries as (g) Mr. Camden and h) Biſhop Godwin, ſo far to miſtake the ſenſe of Origen, to underſtand him as if he had ſaid, That Britain, by the help of the Druids, always conſented in the belief of one God, whereas it is very plain, That Origen ſpeaks of it as a great Alteration that was made in the Religion of the Britains after the coming of Chriſt. And Origen doth not only ſpeak of the belief, but of the Worſhip of one God, which it is certain from Cæſar, That the Druids did never inſtruct the People in. But the Chriſtian Religion alter'd the whole Scheme of the Druids Worſhip, and inſtead of their Taranis and Heſus, and Teutates, and Belenus, and Andate, it taught them to believe and worſhip one true God, and Jeſus Chriſt, whom he hath ſent to be the Saviour of the World; Whoſe Power, (i) Origen ſaith elſewhere, was ſeen in Britain as well as Mauritania.

Thus far I have endeavoured to clear the Apoſtolical Succeſſion of the Britiſh Churches, which thoſe have rendred more doubtfull, who have derived our Chriſtianity from King Lucius his Meſſage to Pope Eleutherius, and the Perſons he ſent over to convert him and the whole Nation, as the Tradition goes, to the Chriſtian Faith. But there is a conſiderable difference to be obſerved about this Tradition, not merely about the time of the Converſion of this King Lucius (of which (k) Archbiſhop Uſher hath given ſo full an account, that to his diligence therein, nothing material can be added) but concerning the means and manner of his Converſion, and the Perſons employ'd in it. For (l) Petrus Equilinus ſaith, That he was baptized by Timothy, a Diſciple of St. Paul; and he had it from a much better Author, for (m) Notkerus Balbulus ſaith, That King Lucius was baptized by Timothy; not the Timothy to whom St. Paul wrote his Epiſtle; But the Brother of Novatus,

(o) Nauclerus takes notice, That this Relation agrees beſt with the Tradition of the Church of Curia, a noted City of Rhætia. And (p) Pantaleon calls Lucius the Diſciple of Timothy; out of the Annals of that Church. From whence (q) Marcus Velſerus ſhews, that he did not die here in Britain, but went over into thoſe parts of Rhætia to preach the Goſpel, and there ſuffer'd Martyrdom: or, at leaſt, ended his days; For they are not agreed about the manner of his death. And (t) Ferrarius in his new Topography to the Martyrologium Romanum, reckons King Lucius of Britain one of the Martyrs of Curia, which the Germans call Chur, and the Italians Choira. And the (u) Roman Martyrology ſaith, That there his memory is ſtill obſerved. (w) Notkerus Balbulus ſaith, That he converted all Rhætia, and part of Bavaria. If ſo, they had great reaſon to preſerve his Memory, and the Britiſh Church, on the account of King Lucius his converting their Countrey, hath as much right to challenge Superiority over Bavaria and Rhætia, as the Church of Rome hath over the Britiſh Church on the account of the Converſion of Lucius by Eleutherius. If this Tradition hold good, the other cannot; which differs as to time, Perſons, and the remainder of his Life, which our Writers ſay, was ſpent here; And (x) Geoffrey, from the Britiſh Hiſtory ſaith, That he died at Glouceſter, and left no Heir to ſucceed him. Wherein he is follow'd by (y) John Fordon, who ſaith, That after the death or diſappearance of King Lucius the Royal Stock failed, and then the Romans appointed Governors inſtead of Kings. But, by that Expreſſion, Vel non comparente, Fordon ſeems to doubt, whether he did not withdraw in his old Age, according to the German Tradition.

(z) Nennius ſaith, That Anno Dom. 164. Lucius, King of Britain, with all the inferior Kings of Britain, were baptized upon an Embaſſy ſent by the Roman Emperors and Pope Evariſtus. But the old MS. in the Cotton Library hath it, Poſt 167 annos poſt adventum Chriſti. One of the Cambridge MSS. poſt 164 annos. In the margin whereof it is ſaid, That Nennius is grievouſly miſtaken, becauſe Evariſtus his time cannot agree to either of the computations, Evariſtus dying, according to the old Catalogue of the Biſhops of Rome made about Anno Dom, 354. when Trebonius Gallus and Metilius Bradua were Conſuls, which according to the Faſti both of Onuphrius Panvinius and Sir H. Savil, was Anno Dom. 109. But Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves, that in one Copy of Nennius he found the name of Eleutherius, therefore I paſs it over: And yet the time of Eleutherius will not agree with either of theſe Computations: For he was made Biſhop of Rome, according to the ſame Catalogue in the Conſulſhip of Severus and Herennianus, which according to thoſe Faſti, is Anno Dom. 172. But it will be two hard to preſs the point of Chronology too far, when (a) Bede, according to the different Computations, ſometimes puts Anno Dom. 156. and at another time Anno Dom. 167. (a) Bed. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 4. Epit. Hiſtor, Popedom, I ſhall urge this matter no farther; ſince it muſt come within a very little compaſs, if the Characters of time muſt ſuit with it, which, Marianus Scotus ſaith, was when Pollio and Aper were Conſuls, the ſixteenth of M. Aurelius, and Anno Dom. 176. according to the Dionyſian account, although Marianus follow another himſelf. Which falls out to be the year before the Perſecution of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne, which, as (b) Euſebius ſaith, was the ſeventeenth of M. Aurelius, when Irenæus was ſent by them on a Meſſage to Eleutherius. (c) Baronius places the Converſion of Lucius ſomewhat later, in the beginning of Commodus, Anno Dom. 183. But therein, as Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves, he hath all the more ancient Hiſtorians againſt him; and it is only his own miſtake in the Chronology of the firſt Biſhops of Rome, which makes him ſay, the time of Eleutherius, will not agree to M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus, wherein he is too much followed by our (d) learned Antiquary.

Having then found no ſuch inconſiſtency in the point of time, but that if there were ſuch a King as Lucius in Britain then, he might well ſend to Eleutherius ſuch a Meſſage; I now proceed to conſider, how far this Tradition of King Lucius can agree with the State of the Britiſh Affairs at that time. The Britains being impatient of the Roman Yoke in Hadrian's time, he comes over and brings new Legions with him; And ſettles the whole Province in quietneſs, and built his Wall, to keep the other Britains in order. Notwithſtanding this, in Antoninus his time, the War broke out more fiercely; and not only the (e) other Britains forced their Paſſage into the Roman Province, but, as (f) Pauſanias ſaith, The Brigantes rebelled, who, for that cauſe, had part of their Countrey taken from them. But Lollius Urbicus being ſent hither, he drove the Britains back, built another Wall farther Northwards, where Agricola formerly had placed his Garriſons, as appears by the (g) Inſcriptions there taken up: So that Lollius Urbicus drove the Britains 100 Miles Northward; For ſo much is the diſtance between the Walls of Hadrian and Antoninus. For all this, the Britains brake out again with ſo much violence in the beginning of (h) M. Aurelius Antoninus his Reign, that Calphurnius Agricola was ſent againſt them, and from that time we read of no diſturbance here till the time of Commodus, when (i) Ulpius Marcellus was Roman Lieutenant. This being the true State of Britain at that time, what place is here left for ſuch a King over Britain as Lucius is repreſented? He muſt either be over the Britains beyond the Wall, which overthrows one main part of the Tradition as to his ſettling the Churches here after his Converſion; or he muſt be the Head of the Revolting Britains who were repreſſed by Calphurnius Agricola; or, he muſt be a ſubordinate King to the Romans, ſuch as Cogidunus and Praſutagus had been. But then how comes he to command all Britain? To have ſeveral Kings under him? To change the Affairs of Religion as he thought fit? Were theſe Privileges ever allowed to ſuch Titulary Princes? It is very true, That the Romans did often ſuffer Kings to govern Provinces under them; But then they were Provinces wholly ſubdued, and compaſſed about with the Roman Forces on all ſides: But no Inſtance can be given where they ſuffer'd an Hereditary King of the ſame Countrey to enjoy full power over his Subjects, whilſt a great part of the Countrey was in Arms againſt them, and ready to break out into a War, wherein the Romans were in continual fear, that the Natives within the Province vince ſhould join with thoſe without for their deſtruction. For them in ſuch a caſe as this, to truſt ſuch a King as Lucius with the Government of the Province, is to ſuppoſe them, to have utterly loſt thoſe Arts whereby they attained ſo vaſt an Empire. The Caſe of Antiochus in Aſia, Herod and his Children in Judæa, Dejotarus in Galatia, Ariobarzanes in Cappadocia, and of many others that might be named, will not at all make it probable, where the Circumſtances were ſo different, and eſpecially in ſuch an Iſland as Britain was then accounted, being incompaſſed with a Sea, which the Romans thought dreadful and almoſt unpaſſable, whither Supplies could not come without difficulty; and where the Inhabitants deſpiſed Death and Danger, as they found by ſo tedious a War, which was kept up ſo long here: And after all, they were forced to keep out their Enemies by Walls from Sea to Sea, in ſeveral places: So that the Romans never had the whole Iſland in ſubjection. And therefore it is very improbable, that they ſhould truſt the Power over it in the hands of a Native of the ſame Countrey; Which Conſideration makes me very hard to believe the Monkiſh Traditions concerning King Lucius.

But I do not deny, that there was ſuch a Perſon in this Iſland, or that he had Royal Authority in ſome part of it, or that he was converted to Chriſtianity at that time, or that the Chriſtian Church here flouriſhed by his means. That there was ſuch a Perſon, who was a King and a Chriſtian, is proved, beſides the concurrence of ſo many Authors from Bede's time, from the two Coins mentioned by (l) Archbiſhop Uſher, one Silver and the other Gold, having an Image of a King on them, with a Croſs, and the Letters of LUC, as far as they could be diſcerned. But if it be farther asked in what part of Britain this King Lucius lived, I ſhall only propoſe my Conjecture, and leave it to the Judgment of others. It is well known that the Romans were ſo well ſatisfied with the fidelity of Cogidunus, that they beſtow'd ſome Cities upon him. And Tacitus ſaith, he continued firm to the Roman Intereſt to his time. And where Kings were faithful to them, the Romans were kind to their Poſterity, and kept them up in the ſame dignity as long as they behaved themſelves as they expected from them. Of this we have a clear Inſtance in Herod's Poſterity; For Archelaus, Herodes Antipas and Philip, his Sons, ſucceeded into their ſhares of his Kingdom. Then Herod Agrippa, his Grandchild by Ariſtobulus, was made King by Caius Caligula, whoſe Government was inlarged by Claudius, and his Brother Herod had the Kingdom of Chalcis given him: Sometime after his Father's death, Claudius beſtow'd firſt the Kingdom of Chalcis upon his Son Agrippa, then the Tetrarchy of Philip, which was inlarged afterwards by Nero, and he continued till the War, and was the laſt King over the Jews. Now from hence we obſerve, That the Romans thought it no ill policy in ſome Caſes to continue the ſame Royal dignity to the Children of thoſe who deſerved ſo well of them as Cogidunus had done. And it ſeems moſt probable to me, that where Ptolemy places the Regni, were the Cities which Cogidunus had the rule over; not from the Name, but from the Circumſtances of thoſe places, which have fewer Roman Monuments or Towns than any other in Britain, tain, and therefore were the moſt likely ſtill under their own Prince, who kept up the Britiſh cuſtoms. Where ever the Romans inhabited, they may be traced by their Ways, by their Buildings, by their Coins, by their Urns, by their Inſcriptions: But ſcarce any thing of this nature could be found in Surry or Suſſex by the moſt diligent Enquirers. (m) Leland indeed diſcover'd ſome Roman Coins near Kingſton upon Thames, where others have been taken up ſince: (but Camden could hear of no Roman Antiquities thereabouts.) And (n) ſome ſuppoſe the place where thoſe Coins were taken up, to have been a Station of the Roman Souldiers under Aſclepiodotus, when he marched that way from Portſmouth to London, in the Expedition againſt Allectus. If ſo, it was too late for the days of King Lucius. All that (o) Camden pretends to, is only a Military way near Ockley, which was neceſſary for the conveniency of the Roman Souldiers paſſing to the remoter parts of the Province, and ſome Coins about Gatton; but as to his Noviomagus which he will have to be Woodcote in Surry, (p) Mr. Somner hath well proved from the courſe of the Roman Itinerary, that it muſt lie in Kent, in the Road to Portus Rutupis: and Woodcote is as far from it as London. In all Suſſex there is no remainder of any Roman Building, or Way, or Colony, or Coins yet diſcovered to the World, except towards the Sea ſide, which the Romans kept to themſelves. In Antoninus Pius his time (q) Seius Saturnius was Archigubernus in Claſſe Britannica; Which ſhews, that the Romans had then a Fleet here, and that he was Admiral of it. And in after-times, the Comes litoris Saxonici per Britanniam, had ſeveral Garriſons on the Sea ſide for Security of the Coaſts, as appears by the (r) Notitia Imperii where the places are ſet down, among which two were on the coaſts of Suſſex, Anderida and Portus Adurni; By the former our learned Antiquaries (s) Camden and (t) Selden underſtand Newenden in Kent, but that ſtands too much within Land. Mr. Somner in a MS. diſcourſe of the Roman Ports and Forts in Kent, rather thinks it to be Pemſey in Suſſex, or Haſtings, as more agreeing with (u) Gildas, who ſaith, that the Romans placed their Forts for Security of the very Coaſts in litore Oceani ad Meridionalem Plagam, upon the very Coaſts; And ſo the reſt of them ſtood, as Reculver, Richborough, Dover, Lim, which were all in Kent; and the Portus Adurni was Aldrington near Shoreham in Suſſex. From hence it appears, that the Romans, being ſecure of the Coaſts, and having their Souldiers diſperſed in the Colonies about, and being ſo near the Metropolis at London, where the chief Governours of this part of Britain reſided; They might better permit a Britiſh King to govern theſe parts of the Country. And this is the moſt probable account I can think of, as to this King Lucius within the Roman Province.

(w) Sir Henry Spelman would bring him to his Iceni, but without any colour of Probability; Lucius, ſaith he, was the Son of Coilus, Coilus of Marius, Marius of Arviragus. And what then? Some, he ſaith, would have him to be Praſutagus, who was King over the Iceni. But doth not (x) Tacitus ſay, that Praſutagus died before the Revolt of the Britains under Boadicea? And that he left Nero his heir, and his two Daughters, hoping thereby to ſecuring his Kingdom? If he were Arviragus, he was dead before the Revolt of the Iceni. And if Marius were his Son, how comes he never to be mention'd in the Story afterwards; no, not in that moſt remarkable Battel between his Mother and Suetonius Paulinus? But Hector Boethius calls Arviragus one of the Iceni, as though his authority were to be mention'd againſt Tacitus, who was the Geoffery of Scotland, ſo many and ſo improbable are his Fictions. (y) Baronius, after trying ſeveral ways to reconcile the Tradition of King Lucius with the Roman Story, concludes with that as the moſt probable, (z) That he was a King under the Roman Power in Britain, ſuch as Praſutagus was. But he was only King over the Iceni, and not over all Britain, and although among the Britains there were many Kings over particular Cities (as they then called the People under one Government) yet there was no one King over the whole Iſland. But in Caſes of great difficulty they pitched upon one as Supreme, as on Caſſibelan, upon the Invaſion of Cæſar: So that the old Britiſh Government was neither Popular as ſome pretend, nor under one Monarchy; but the People were govern'd by ſeveral petty Monarchs, as appears by the unqueſtionable Teſtimonies of (a) Diodorus Siculus, (b) Strabo, and (c) Pomponius Mela; Fert populos & Reges populorum, ſaith Mela; Olim Regibus parebant, ſaith (d) Tacitus; which prove both the Antiquity and Number of Britiſh Monarchs. And what (e) Dio ſaith of a Democratical Government among the Britains is only ſpoken of the Mæatæ and Caledonii, in their great Confuſion, when all the Reins of Government were caſt off, and the People did what they liſt, as Tacitus deſcribes them in his time, ſaying, That they were drawn off from their former obedience to their Kings, by the Heads of ſeveral Factions among them. So that although in the moſt ancient times here was Monarchical Government, yet it was not extended over all Britain, as the Monkiſh Tradition pretends concerning King Lucius, and I know not how many Predeceſſors of his, even from the coming of Brutus to his days. But neither our Religion, nor our Government need ſuch Fictions to ſupport them.

Suppoſing then that King Lucius ſucceeded Cogidunus, though not immediately, in the Government of that part of Britain committed to his care; I ſee no inconvenience in allowing, that King Lucius hearing of the Chriſtian Doctrine, either by the old Britiſh Chriſtians, ſuch as Eluanus and Medwinus are ſuppoſed to have been; or by ſome of M. Aurelius his Souldiers coming hither, after the great deliverance of the Roman Army by the Prayers of the Chriſtians (which had then lately happen'd and occaſion'd great diſcourſe every where, the Emperor himſelf, as (f) Tertullian ſaith, giving the account of it in his own Letters) might upon this be very deſirous to inform himſelf throughly about this Religion, and there being then frequent Intercourſe between Rome and Britain, and by reaſon of the Colonies that were ſettled, and the Governours and Souldiers paſſing to and fro, he might ſend Eluanus and Medwinus to Eleutherius to be fully inſtructed in this Religion; And either the ſame perſons alone, or two others with them (called Faganus and Duvianus commonly) coming into Britain, might have ſo great ſucceſs as to baptize King Lucius, and many others, and thereby inlarge the Chriſtian Church here.

The (g) old Book of Landaff gives a much more modeſt account of this whole matter than either Geoffrey of Monmouth, or any of his followers. "There we find only that King Lucius ſent Eluanus and Medwinus to Eleutherius the twelfth Biſhop of Rome, to deſire that he might be made a Chriſtian through his Inſtruction; Upon which he gave God thanks, that ſuch a Heathen Nation did ſo much deſire Chriſtianity; And then, by the Advice of the Presbyters of the “ City of Rome, they firſt baptized theſe Embaſſadors; and, being well inſtructed, they ordained them, making Eluanus a Biſhop and Medwinus a Teacher; And ſo they returned to King Lucius, who with the chief of the Britains were baptized; And then, according to the Inſtructions of Eleutherius, he ſettled the Eccleſiaſtical Order, cauſed Biſhops to be ordained, and the Chriſtian Religion to be taught. There is nothing in all this account but what ſeems to have great probability in it. The ſame account is in Capgrave, out of John of Tinmouth, in the Life of Dubricius, and this ſeems to have been the original Tradition of the Britiſh Church: Which Geoffery of Monmouth hath corrupted with his Flamines and Archflamines; and others afterwards made an Epiſtle for Eleutherius to King Lucius, but could not avoid ſuch Marks in the way of Writing as evidently diſcover the Impoſture; and when the Monks hands were once in, they knew not how to give over. For ſome of them carry Faganus and Diruvianus (as ſome call him) to Glaſſenbury; others make them Conſecrate the Church at Wincheſter, to which they ſay King Lucius had a particular kindneſs, and gave all the Lands and Privileges which the Flamines had, to the Biſhop and Monks. (A Gift that would never make them the richer or the ſafer.) Others make King Lucius to found St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter, the Church in Dover Caſtle, St. Martin's by Canterbury, St. Peter's in Cornhill, where the Metropolitan Church, they ſay, was placed by him, and Theanus made the firſt Biſhop, who was ſucceeded by Eluanus, who went on the Embaſſy to Eleutherius; and, beſides theſe, they make him to found and endow ſo many Churches, with ſuch unlikely Circumſtances, as hath made others queſtion, whether there was ever ſuch a Perſon in the World as King Lucius: That being the common effect of ſaying much more than is true, to make what is really true more doubtfull and ſuſpicious.

(g) Monaſtic. Angl. vol. 3. p. 188.

But there is one Difficulty yet to be cleared; For all this Story, in its beſt Circumſtances, ſeems to imply, that there was no Chriſtian Church here before. For, if there had been, what need he to have ſent as far as Rome to be inſtructed? unleſs the Biſhop of Rome were then known to be the Head of the Church, which were a ſufficient Reaſon for it. To this I anſwer, That if the Conteſt lay between theſe two things, Whether it be more credible, That Chriſtianity was planted here before King Lucius; Or, that King Lucius was baptized by order from Eleutherius; I ſhould very much prefer the former, becauſe the Authority of Gildas, as to the Britiſh Chriſtianity, is to be relyed on before the later Writers; and Gildas aſſerts the one; and although he had as much reaſon as Bede, or any after him, he never takes the leaſt notice of King Lucius and Eleutherius. And, if a Negative Argument will hold any where, it is where a perſon hath as much reaſon to know as any that follow him; and as great occaſion to diſcover what he knows; both which will hold in caſe of Gildas compared with Bede or later Writers. It were worth while for us to know whence Bede had his firſt Information of this matter; for he profeſſes to follow other Writers about the Britiſh Affairs, and in many places he follows Gildas exactly, but in this he paſſes by what Gildas ſaith about the Primitive Chriſtianity of Britain, and inſtead thereof puts in this Story of King Lucius. (h) Bale ſaith, that “ Eluanus Avalonius was a Diſciple to thoſe who were the Diſciples of the Apoſtles, and that he preached the Goſpel in Britain with good Succeſs; But

(h) Bal. de Script. Cent. 1. n 27.

“ King Lucius, being perſuaded by his Druids, who would not come “ to any reſolution; but to ſatisfie himſelf, leſt he ſhould be deceived “ by his Countrymen, he ſent Eluanus and Medwinus to Eleutherius. “ And Eluanus upon his return wrote a Book De Origine Eccleſiæ Britannorum, Of the firſt beginning of the Britiſh Church. And Pits is ſure to follow him where he hath no reaſon: But Leland never mentions this Book, nor the Writings of Medwinus Belgius, and of King Lucius himſelf, all relating to this matter: But (i) Leland only takes notice, “ that Eluanus and Medwinus were employ'd upon an Embaſſy “ to Eleutherius, that by his means he might become a Chriſtian, “ which, ſaith he, is very unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, unleſs he were “ firſt informed what Chriſtianity was, which he thinks was preached “ to King Lucius by them, being two of the old Britiſh Chriſtians. And there he relates “ how by chance he met with an old MS. of the “ Britiſh Affairs joyn'd with Geoffrey of Monmouth, wherein this Story “ is told exactly as it is in the Book of Landaff: and no mention is “ made of any other Perſons ſent back but thoſe that went. And, as far as I can judge, Bede follow'd this old Britiſh Tradition, only leaving out the Names of the Perſons ſent, and the Eſtabliſhment of the Britiſh Churches after the Baptiſm of King Lucius. For Bede ſaith as little as he well could that tended to the honour of the Britiſh Churches. So that according to this, which ſeems the trueſt account of this Embaſſy, Eluanus and Medwinus were Britiſh Chriſtians themſelves, and therefore ſent to Eleutherius, having been probably the Perſons employ'd to convince King Lucius; but he knowing the great Fame of Rome, and it being told him, not only that there were Chriſtians there, but a Biſhop in that City, the twelfth from the Apoſtles, had a deſire to underſtand how far the Britiſh Chriſtians and thoſe of Rome agreed; and he might reaſonably then preſume, That the Chriſtian Doctrine was there truly taught, at ſo little diſtance from the Apoſtles, and in a Place whither, as (k) Irenæus argues in this caſe, A reſort was made from all places, becauſe of its being the Imperial City. Theſe were reaſonable Conſiderations, which might move King Lucius to ſend this Embaſſy to Rome, and not any Opinion of St. Peter's having appointed the head of the Church there, of which there was no Imagination then, nor a long time after in the Britiſh Churches, as appears by the Conteſt of the Britiſh Biſhops with Auguſtine the Monk; of which in its due place.

If any credit were to be given to King (l) Arthur's Diploma to the Univerſity of Cambridge, this matter would be fully clear'd; For there it is expreſly ſaid, “ That King Lucius was converted by the preaching of the Doctors of Cambridge, for which reaſon he gave large “ Privileges to that Univerſity, which were confirmed by King Arthur. And in the MS. Annals of Burton it is ſaid, “ That Anno Dom. 141. nine of the Doctors and Scholars of Cambridge were baptized. I am not ignorant what Objections have been made by learned Antiquaries againſt both theſe Paſſages, and how hard it is to reconcile them to the Language and Hiſtory of that time; Nor that this Paſſage in the Annals of Burton was put into the MS. Copy by another hand, as the learned (m) Primate obſerved, by comparing the Copy of them in the Library of C. C. C. But on the other ſide it is juſtly pleaded, that in the Bull of Honorius I. bearing date Anno Dom. 624. 20th Febr. there is mention made of the Privileges granted to the Univerſity of Cambridge by Pope Eleutherius; and that withal he takes notice of Doctors and Scholars there. And that this Bull of Honorius is allowed to be authentick in the Bull of Eugenius IV. upon the Controverſie about Juriſdiction, between the Biſhop of Ely and the Univerſity of Cambridge, bearing date Anno Dom. 1433. 14 Cal. Oct. Which is a ſufficient Proof to all that rely on the Pope's Authority, that in the time of King Lucius and Eleutherius there might be a ſufficient number of learned Men in Cambridge to have inſtructed King Lucius in the Chriſtian Faith; And that it is not improbable, that Eluanus and Medwinus might be of that number, eſpecially conſidering that Camboritum, or, as many Copies have it, Camboricum, was a Roman Colony, and mention'd in the beſt Copies among the 28 Cities of Britain, and the Roman Colonies had their Schools of Learning, wherein the ſeveral Profeſſors of Arts and Sciences did inſtruct both the Roman and Britiſh Youth. Of which I may have occaſion to diſcourſe afterwards.

After this time, we meet with little concerning the Britiſh Churches, till the Perſecution of Diocleſian, in which they had a conſiderable ſhare, for the time it laſted here: For although the Names of no more are preſerved than only of St. Alban, Aaron and Julius; yet both (n) Gildas and (o) Bede ſay, that many more ſuffer'd Martyrdom then in Britain, as (p) Baronius acknowledgeth. And although Diocleſian being a Prince of infinite Ambition, as appear'd by his commanding himſelf to be worſhipped as God, and therefore had ſo great an Antipathy to Chriſtianity, that his whole Reign might be called, as (q) M. Velſerus ſaith, one perpetual Perſecution, yet he had ſo much Art, as to throw off the odium of it upon others; To which purpoſe he firſt made choice of Maximianus, a Brutiſh and Fierce Man, who ſtuck at nothing for the Shame or the Cruelty of it, as he is ſet forth by Eutropius and Victor; and therefore was a fit Inſtrument, as occaſion ſerved, to execute Diocleſian's Malice againſt the Chriſtians; which he did not fail to perform, as appear'd by the Thebean Legion which ſuffer'd in the firſt Expedition againſt the Bagandæ, for refuſing to take an Oath, to extirpate the Chriſtians as well as the Rebels, as (r) Sigonius and (s) Velſerus relate the Story. But the great Perſecution under Diocleſian, of which Gildas and Bede ſpeak, did not certainly begin till Anno Dom. 303. Diocleſian and Maximianus being one the eighth the other the ſeventh time Conſuls, as (t) Lactantius hath evidently made to appear: But in the next year, upon the Reſignation of theſe two, Galerius Maximianus and Conſtantius Chlorus were declared Emperors; and it is generally ſaid by the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that Conſtantius ſtopt the Perſecution in the Provinces under his Government. So that either the Perſecution in Britain muſt be before the other, or it could continue but a little time. To ſolve this, (u) Alford ſaith, there is no other way, but to make this Perſecution to have been in the third of Diocleſian and the firſt of Maximianus. At which time, (w) Baronius ſaith, a very ſharp Perſecution was begun againſt the Chriſtians at Rome. Which was about the time when Maximianus began his Expedition into Gaul againſt the Bagaudæ, and in his Paſſage over the Alps, the Thebean Legion ſuffer'd. The Circumſtances of which Story are ſo agreeable in all reſpects, that I ſee no reaſon to call in queſtion the truth of it, it being not only preſerved by Eucherius, but by Venantius Fortunatus, Helinandus, Beda, Uſuardus and Ado. But Maximianus made then no long ſtay in Gaul, and for ſeveral years after, both Diocleſian and he were ſo taken up in Warlike Expeditions, that they had no leiſure for a ſharp and long Perſecution. And I can however ſee no ground for any Perſecution in Britain about that time by Diocleſian or Maximian. For when he came againſt the Bagaudæ, Carauſius was employ'd to ſecure the Seas againſt the Franks and the Saxons; But, underſtanding Maximian's deſign to take him off, he watched his opportunity, and with a good Fleet and conſiderable Army comes for Britain, and takes poſſeſſion of the Government here, and Maximian had no Fleet left to purſue him hither. This Revolt of Carauſius happen'd within few years after Diocleſian and Maximian were joint Emperors, viz. Anno Dom. 286.

But Alford ſaith, the old Writer of St. Alban's Life pitches upon Anno Dom. 286. for this Perſecution. And a MS. Copy of Bede which he had met with agrees with that time. But he urges farther, that after the Rebellion of Carauſius, when Conſtantius was made Cæſar, the Provinces beyond the Alps were committed to him, and that was, Anno Dom. 292. And if there were no Perſecution under Conſtantius, this muſt be before he was Cæſar. But for any thing Alford ſaith, the Perſecution might have been under Carauſius, or Allectus, before Conſtantius came to the Poſſeſſion of Britain. For Carauſius, as appears by (x) Aur. Victor and (y) Eutropius, was let alone with the Government of Britain; which, ſaith (z) Oroſius, he enjoy'd ſeven years, and after him Allectus, three years more; So that for ſeveral years after Conſtantius his being Cæſar, he had no influence on the Affairs of Britain: At the end of thoſe ten years, Allectus being killed, and his Army routed by Aſclepiodotus, Conſtantius came over as appears by (a) Eumenius, in the very nick of time to preſerve the City of London from being pillaged by the Franks, and then he was received with wonderful joy by the Inhabitants, being delivered from the Tyranny they underwent in the times of Carauſius and Allectus; And after his Death Medals were coin'd in London to teſtifie the Cities gratitude to him; whereon was the Effigies of Conſtantius of one ſide, and on the other, a Temple between two Eagles, with this Inſcription, Memoria felix; and under the Temple P. L. N. Pecunia Londin. Notata, as ſome explain it. For by the Eagles and Inſcription it appears that theſe Coins were intended for the Apotheoſis of Conſtantius; And ſo Joſeph Scaliger and Camden underſtand them. (b) Zoſimus ſaith, That Conſtantius, while he lived, had his chief reſidence in Britain; And if a Perſecution happen'd here, he muſt be Acceſſory to it, which is contrary to what is conſtantly affirmed of Conſtantius. For (c) Euſebius ſaith, he never join'd with the other Emperors in deſtroying Churches. (d) Sozomen and (e) Caſſiodore ſay, That he gave full liberty to the Chriſtians, and that their Churches flouriſhed under him; And (f) Optatus ſaith, That the Donatiſts made their Application to Conſtantine, to appoint Judges out of Gaul, and give this Reaſon, Becauſe there was no Perſecution under his Father's Government. And accordingly the Council of Arles conſiſted of Biſhops chiefly out of Gaul and Britain.

That which upon the whole matter appears moſt probable to me, is, That the Perſecution was begun while Diocleſian and Maximianus had the Empire in their hands; and although Conſtantius and Galerius had the Titles of Cæſars; yet the ſupreme Government was in the others hands, as appears by what Oroſius ſaith of Diocleſian's uſage of Galerius, upon his return from the Perſian War; And by the Inſcriptions

tions in Spain (if they be authentick) produced by (g) Baronius, (h) Velſerus and (i) Gruterus. In one of which Diocleſianus and Maximianus are only mention'd; And this muſt be after the Perſecution, for there it is ſaid, Nomine CHRISTIANORVM DELETO. And in the other, SVPERSTITIONE CHRISTI VBIQ; DELETA. And there Diocleſian is only named Auguſtus, and Galerius as adopted by him. Baronius thinks ſuch Inſcriptions were ſet up every where, but time hath only preſerved thoſe in Spain. But if they were ſet up in Spain, under the Government of Conſtantius, it is an Argument, that while Diocleſian and Maximianus held the Empire, they did what they pleaſed in theſe matters: For although the name of Cæſar carried in it ſomething of ſupreme Authority, yet (k) Aurelius Victor, when he takes notice of the firſt beginning of the difference of the Titles of Auguſtus and Cæſar, He ſaith, Though they were both Titles of Sovereignty, yet they who enjoy'd them did not differ leſs in their Power than they did in their Titles. And therefore (l) Lactantius ſaith, when Diocleſian called Galerius by the name of Cæſar after his Perſian Victory, he cryed out, Quouſque Cæſar? How long ſhould he continue Cæſar? And the Impatience of this made him force Diocleſian to reſign the Empire, as Lactantius, who was upon the Place, aſſures us; Nay, when Diocleſian offer'd him, That all four ſhould be declar'd Auguſti, he refuſed for this reaſon, Becauſe he knew, while Diocleſian continued in Power, he ſhould have only the Name. And Lactantius farther ſaith, That the Edict againſt the Chriſtians was ſent to Conſtantius without asking his conſent; and he confeſſes, Conſtantius complied ſo far as to pull down their Churches. But his kindneſs, when declared Auguſtus, made them willing to forget the reſt. So that the Perſecution was general till their Reſignation; But upon Conſtantius being declared Auguſtus, it ceaſed in all theſe parts; in which, (m) Euſebius affirms, it did not laſt two years, although it continued ten years in the Eaſt. And within that time the Perſecution took away St. Alban, Aaron and Julius, and other Martyrs here, as Gildas and Bede relate, who give a more particular account of the Sufferings of the firſt, not without ſome mixture of Improbabilities or Interpolations; but, as to the reſt, we have nothing but their Names preſerved and the Places they belong to. The firſt is ſaid to have been a Roman Officer of the Municipium of Verulam, the firſt Britiſh Town which had Roman Privileges; and the other, Citizens of Caerleon, where there was a Roman Colony.

Conſtantius dying at York, his eldeſt Son, Conſtantine, was declared Cæſar by the Army in Britain. For although Conſtantius did what in him lay to ſecure the Succeſſion to him, as (n) Euſebius ſaith, yet that did not ſignifie much without the Concurrence of the Legions. And (o) Lactantius ſaith, That he commended him to the Souldiers, and ſo delivered the Empire to him. This Conſent of the Army is expreſs'd by (p) Eumenius, and by the Emperor (q) Julian; and Aurelius Victor ſaith, All that were preſent promoted his being Emperor; But he was not declared Cæſar by Galerius Maximianus till afterwards, as Baluzius hath clearly proved out of Lactantius and others, who, when he ſaw he could not help it, ſent him to the Purple Robe, Thus Conſtantine, being firmly ſettled in the Throne, took care in the firſt place of the Tranquility of theſe parts, where he was proclaimed Emperor, and, as Lactantius ſaith, The firſt thing he did was, to ſecure full Liberty to the Chriſtians. And now, we may well ſuppoſe, all that Gildas and Bede ſay, to have been accompliſhed, viz. That the Chriſtians rebuilt their Churches, deſtroy'd to the ground, and therein celebrated their Holy Sacraments, and kept ſolemn Feſtivals in memory of ſo great a Deliverance. And from this time we may date the flouriſhing condition of this Church, which before muſt labour under great difficulties; the Governours of Provinces before Conſtantius, and the Generality of the People, being ſet againſt the Chriſtians.

But the firſt Evidence we meet with of the ſettled Condition of the Britiſh Churches, is, the number of Biſhops which went from Britain to the Council at Arles, Anno Dom. 314. where we find three Biſhops ſubſcribing to it, Eborius, Biſhop of York; Reſtitutus, Biſhop of London; and Adelfius, de Civitate Colonia Londinenſium: So it is in (r) Sirmondus his beſt Copy. And although (s) Mr. Selden ſeems to queſtion the Antiquity of it, yet the other vouches it to be very good and ancient. But what then is the Civitas Colonia Londinenſium? The Learned (t) Primate thinks it to be Colcheſter; that being called in Antoninus Colonia. (u) Mr. Selden takes it to be Camalodunum, and ſo written Camalodon, which the ignorant Scribes made Col. Londinenſium: (w) Sir Henry Spelman likewiſe ſuppoſes it to be the old Colony of Camalodunum. But, I think, a far more probable ſenſe may be given of it, if we conſider the way of ſummoning Biſhops to Councils at that time: For it is unreaſonable in imagine that every Roman Colony or City ſent a Biſhop: For then every Council would have been as full as the Arabick Writers ſay the Council of Nice was (of which Mr. Selden hath diſcourſed at large) or at leaſt as (x) Commianus and (y) Ado thought this Council of Arles was, which they made to conſiſt of 600 Biſhops: An unreaſonable number to be called together on ſuch an occaſion, as the giving way to the reſtleſs importunity of the Donatiſts to have their Cauſe heard over again. It is not to be preſumed that Conſtantine would ſummon ſo great a number to make up a Court (Epiſcopale Judicium St. Auguſtine often calls it) wherein the main thing to be done was, to hear the Parties and give Judgment; And in the former Judgment 19 Biſhops were ſummoned. It is ſaid, (z) That St. Auguſtine makes the number of Biſhops at Arles to be 200. But I ſee no ſufficient ground to underſtand thoſe words of this particular Council; but of all the Biſhops which had condemned them in ſeveral Councils, among whom he reckons the Italian, Spaniſh and Gallick Biſhops, who met at Arles. But when I compare the Subſcriptions to that Council publiſhed out of the moſt ancient MS. with a Paſſage in Hilary, I am apt to believe, that excepting thoſe that were very near about Arles, there were no more than a Biſhop out of a Province with one or two Presbyters. So it is expreſly in the (a) Summons to Chreſtus Biſhop of Syracuſe in Sicily, (the only one remaining, and which (b) Baronius thinks was the ſame to the reſt) wherein he is required to come out of that Province, and to bring two Presbyters with him, as Valeſius ſhews againſt Baronius and Sirmondus the words are to be underſtood. And (c) Hilary, ſpeaking of the Councils of his time, ſaith, That one or two Biſhops were ſent for out of a Province, and he inſtanceth in the Council of Ancyra, and the great Council of Ariminum: So here we meet with Chreſtus out of the Province of Sicily, Quintaſius out of the Province of Sardinia, and ſo in moſt of the reſt, the diſtinct Provinces are ſet down out of which they came: And at that time there were 18 Provinces of Gaul and Britain, and ſo many Biſhops appear'd at Arles, beſides Marinus the Biſhop of the Place. But to ſupply the defect of ſome other Provinees there were more out of that Province wherein Arles ſtood than out of any other. In Britain there were then three Provinces according to the MS. Copy of Sextus Rufus ſaith Mr. Camden: therefore in all probability, ſince the other two Biſhops were out of the other two Provinces, Maxima Cæſarienſis and Britannia Prima; The third Biſhop was out of the third Province of Britannia Secunda, wherein there were two noted Colonies, the one called Colonia Divana in the Coin of Septimius Geta, Civitas Legionum in (d) Beda, now Cheſter; the other, Civitas Legionis ad Yſcham, where was a Colony of the 11th Legion, which Province is ſometimes called Britannia Secunda. And therefore this Biſhop Adelphius came ex Civit. Col. Leg. 11. which the ignorant Tranſcribers might eaſily turn to ex Civit. Col. Londin. The only Objection is that which is ſuggeſted by the Learned (e) Primate of Armagh, viz. That there were four Provinces of Britain at that time, and that Flavia Cæſarienſis was one of them; having its name from Conſtantine, who aſſumed the name of Flavius; But Goltzius his Copy deſerves not to be ſo much preferr'd before (f) Camden's; And the name of Flavia Cæſarienſis might either be taken from Flavius Valentinianus, as (g) Berterius thinks, or from Fl. Theodoſius, before whoſe time Camden ſaith he never met with Britannia Flavia.

There being then but three Biſhops preſent at the Council of Arles, is ſo far from being an Argument that there were no more in Britain, that it is rather an Argument to the contrary; ſince it was the Cuſtom to ſend but one or two out of a Province where they were moſt numerous. And I ſee no reaſon to queſtion a Succeſſion of Biſhops here from the firſt founding of a Chriſtian Church. To prove this, I ſhall not rely on the Teſtimony of the Anonymous (h) Greek Author of the Martyrdoms of Peter and Paul, who ſaith, St. Peter here ordained Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons; But upon the Reaſon of the Thing, there being no other Church in the Chriſtian World which derived from the Apoſtles, which had not a Succeſſion of Biſhops from them too; And we cannot trace the Hiſtory of other Churches farther than we can do that of their Biſhops. As for inſtance, The firſt Converſion of the Churches of Africa is much in the dark, but as ſoon as we read any thing conſiderable of them, we meet with a Council of Biſhops, viz. of (i) Agrippinus and his Brethren, out of the Provinces of Africa, Numidia and Mauritania, and he was not the immediate Predeceſſor of St. Cyprian, who ſuffer'd in the Perſecution of Valerian, Anno Dom. 258. And (k) Tertullian puts the proof of Apoſtolical Churches upon the Succeſſion of Biſhops from the Apoſtles: which were a ſenſleſs way of proceding, unleſs it were taken for granted, that whereever the Apoſtles planted Churches, they appointed Biſhops to take care of them. Although therefore, by the loſs of Records of the Britiſh Churches, we cannot draw down the Succeſſion of Biſhops from the Apoſtles time (for that of the Biſhops of London by Jocelin of Furnes is not worth mentioning) yet we have great reaſon to preſume ſuch a Succeſſion; When upon the firſt ſummoning a Council by Conſtantine three Britiſh Biſhops appear'd; one out of every Province; as they did in other Parts.

But ſome pretend to give a more punctual and exact account of the ſettling of our Church Government here, viz. That there were twenty eight Cities among the old Britains, That in theſe there were twenty five Flamins and three Archflamins, in whoſe places, upon the Converſion of the the Nation by King Lucius, there was the like number of Biſhops and Archbiſhops here appointed; And for this, beſides the Rabble of our Monkiſh Hiſtorians, who ſwallow Geoffrey of Monmouth whole without chewing; I find two of my Predeceſſors, Men conſiderable in their times, produced to the ſame purpoſe, viz. (l) Radulphus de Diceto, and Rad. Baldock. Others ſay, (m) That theſe twenty eight Cities were not all furniſhed with Biſhops in King Lucius his time, but that the honour of it belongs to him becauſe he began it: But this is making a new Story, and in effect denying the truth of the old Tradition. However I deny not, but that it is as certain that King Lucius ſettled Biſhops here, as that he was converted by Eluanus and Medwinus; For the ſame Authors deliver both. But how far his Power extended, and conſequently how many Cities had Epiſcopal Government then ſettled in them, is now impoſſible to be known. As to the twenty eight Cities among the Britains, the Tradition doth not depend upon the Credit of Geoffrey or Nennius; For Bede and before him Gildas ſay the ſame thing, viz. That there were ſo many Cities among the Britains, while the Romans had Power here, which I ſee no cauſe to doubt but they were Cities made by the Romans, or by the Britains in imitation of them, as I ſhall prove in another Diſcourſe. But that which follows from hence is, viz. That the Government here ſettled being in Roman Cities, the correſpondence muſt not be to the Britiſh Druids, but to the Roman Colonies. That there was ſome Subordination among the Druids is unqueſtionable. For Cæſar affirms, That there was a Prince of the Druids, and the laſt Age hath diſcovered a famous Urn of one Chyndonax, Chief of the Druids; concerning which whole (n) Books have been written, and ſeveral Diſcourſes publiſhed, without any great ſatisfaction to me; But it is not to any purpoſe to tell why, ſince I yield the thing it ſelf. And it is improbable there ſhould be a Prince of the Druids, without an intermediate Subordination, and the Druids being ſo far diſperſed, it was a reaſonable thing, That the ſuperior Druids ſhould have their particular Limits aſſigned them, that they might the better underſtand and give account of thoſe under them, and not interfere or intrench one upon another. As far then as we ſuppoſe them to be reaſonable and prudent, theſe things may juſtly be ſuppoſed concerning them, ſo that ſetting aſide the name of Flamins and Archflamins, for which there is no foundation at all (as to either among the Druids, and not for the latter word among the Romans) yet the thing it ſelf hath no ſuch abſurdity or improbability in it. But the Cities here being Roman, as I ſuppoſe, the Government muſt be ſuitable to that of Roman Colonies, and they that know any thing of the nature and conſtitution of them, do know that they exactly follow'd the Pattern of the City of Rome, having a Senate, Conſuls, Prætors, Cenſors, Ædiles, Quæſtors, &c. And, beſides the reſt, they had their ſeveral Flamins and Pontifices too. But there were many of theſe Flamins in each City or Colony; thence (o) Latinus Pacatus, in his Panegyriek to Theodoſius, mentions, Reverendos municipali purpurâ Flamines, inſignes apicibus Sacerdotes, ſpeaking of a Roman Colony; But there can be no reſemblance between a multitude of Flamins in a City, and one Biſhop over a Dioceſe. The Flamins were the Prieſts of ſome peculiar Deity, from whom they took their denomination, as may be at large ſeen in Gruter's Book of Roman Inſcriptions. But among them there was a certain order of Place and Dignity; for we read of a Primus Flamen in (p) Gruter.

But (q) Jac. Gutherius hath an Obſervation which will tend to clear this matter. For among the Roman Inſcriptions, we meet with one extraordinary of this kind, viz. (r) Flamini Divorum omnium; Now ſaith he, The name of Flamen was common to all the Prieſts in the Roman Cities; but the Flamen Divorum omnium was the chief Prieſt among them. And ſo there is no ſuch mighty abſurdity as hath been imagined in ſuppoſing theſe Flamins to be put down, and the Chriſtian Biſhops to ſucceed in their Places; Eſpecially if we could have made out that there were Flamines Provinciarum, as at firſt appearance ſeem'd very probable in the Roman Inſcriptions. And (s) Sertorius Urſatus ſeems to make no doubt concerning it in this Inſcription.

DIVO AUGUSTO

But it is an eaſie miſtake for a Flamen D. Aug. one of Auguſtus his Flamins in that Province. Of which ſort there are many Examples. But there are other (t) Inſcriptions wherein we read of,

FLAMINICA PROVINCIÆ LUSITANIÆ.

But all that Sertorius Urſatus infers from hence is, That there were Temples dedicated to Municipia and to Provinces, and theſe Temples had their Flamines and Flaminicæ. But this doth not prove, that the Flamins had any Juriſdiction over a Province; Which had been indeed to the purpoſe. Among the Romans, although there were none called Archflamines, yet there were Flamines majores & minores, as appears by Feſtus and others. The leſſer are thought by ſome to be called Veflamines in the Inſcriptions both of (u) Gruter and (w) Reineſius. Feſtus ſaith, the Majores Flamines were the Patricians; the Minores, the Plebeians: but the late Publiſher of Feſtus ſaith, That the Majores Flamines were the Dialis, Martialis and Quirinalis; the reſt of the fifteen who were added afterwards, were the Minores; The Flamen Martialis and Quirinalis were of the College of Pontifices, as appears by (x) Cicero: And the Pontifices themſelves were divided likewiſe into Majores and Minores, as appears both by Feſtus and the Inſcriptions: Theſe leſſer were at firſt Aſſeſſors in the College or Court of Pontifices; But afterwards became only Officers to them; And among theſe there was a Pontifex Maximus too: But, as Feſtus ſaith, he was only the firſt in the College: But all this relates only to the City. That which comes nearer to our buſineſs is the Conſideration of the Sacerdotes Provinciarum, as they are called in the (y) Theodoſian Code. (z) Jac. Gothofredus ſaith, The difference between the Flamins and theſe was; That the Flamins belong'd to particular Cities; But theſe had whole Provinces under their Care; and ſo in the Law, the Honor Flaminii was diſtinct from the Honor Sacerdotii; this latter is called Archieroſyne in the ſame Code; And the Title and Office ſtill continued in the time of Theodoſius M. And it is there deſcribed to be a Care that Divine Offices were performed in their Temples; and ſuch as theſe were (a) Sopelianus in Aſia, and (b) Chryſantius in Lydia, and (c) Arſacius in Galatia, to whom an Epiſtle of Julian is ſtill extant, giving him charge to look after his Office with great Care, and to warn and puniſh the inferior Prieſts if they neglected their Duty. So that we have now found out what did bear a great correſpondence among the Romans to our Biſhops and Archbiſhops.

But it ſtill remains a Queſtion, Whether they did not rather borrow this from the Chriſtians, than the Chriſtians from them? For Julian in that Epiſtle makes it his buſineſs to perſuade Arſacius to take all things commendable from the Chriſtians; and no doubt this was thought ſo by his Predeceſſors, who firſt ſet up this Sacerdotal Government of Provinces among them. And, if I miſtake not, it began much later than the firſt Settlement of Epiſcopacy in the Britiſh Churches; For (d) Euſebius ſaith, That Maximinus appointed not only Prieſts in the Cities, but ʼΑρχιερεῖς, Chief-prieſts in the Provinces, where Valeſius miſtakes his meaning; for he thinks all the Innovation of Maximinus was the appointing them himſelf, whereas they were wont to be choſen by the Decuriones in the Cities: But he ſpeaks of it as a new thing of Maximinus, to appoint ſuch an Order and Office among the Prieſts which had not been known before: And that which puts this matter out of doubt is, That (e) Lactantius, in his excellent Piece lately publiſhed out of a MS. by Baluzius, ſaith expreſly of Maximinus, Novo more Sacerdotes maximos per ſingulas Civitates ſingulos ex primoribus fecit, i. e. That by a new Cuſtom he appointed Chief Prieſts in the ſeveral Cities, of the greateſt Perſons in them, who were not only to do the Office of Prieſts themſelves; but to look after the Inferior Prieſts, and by their means to hinder the Chriſtians from their Worſhip, and to bring them to puniſhment: But, as though this were not enough, He appointed other Prieſts over the Provinces, in a higher degree above the reſt. Although then Valeſius aſſerted that ſuch were elder than Maximinus, yet Lactantius, whoſe authority is far greater, hath determined the contrary.

I am not ignorant that, long before Maximinus his time, (f) Tertullian mentions the Præſides Sacerdotales, but thoſe do not relate to this matter, but to the Spectacula, as appears by the place. (g) Some inſiſt on the Sacerdotes Provinciales in (h) Tertullian; but Rigaltius ſhews there ought to be a comma between them, it being very unlikely the Provincial Prieſts ſhould have Golden Crowns when thoſe at Rome had not. And in a (i) Canon of the African Code we find the Sacerdotes Provinciæ, but that Council was long after, Anno Dom. 407. And theſe ſeem to be no other than Advocates, who were to appear for the Cauſes which concerned the Temples and Sacrifices throughout the Province. According to which method, the African Biſhops there deſire, That the Churches might have Advocates too, with the ſame Privileges: Which Requeſt was granted by (k) Honorius; and was the firſt Introduction of Lawyers into the Service of the Church, who were called Defenſores Eccleſiarum, and were afterwards Judges in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes. But that which comes nearer to this matter is, the Authority of the Aſiarchæ, who in ſome Coins, mentioned by (l) Spanhemius, are ſaid to be Prieſts over thirteen Cities; And this in the Law is called (m) Sacerdotium Aſiæ: But theſe ſeem to have been no other than than thoſe who took care of the publick Solemnities in the common Aſſembly in Aſia, when the People met out of theſe Cities to perform them either at Epheſus or Smyrna, or any other of the Cities within this combination, as is obſerved by many (n) Learned Men. And although there were but one Chief at a time, yet the Office ſeem'd to have paſſed by turns through the ſeveral Cities; And he in whoſe City the Solemnities were to be kept, was the Preſident for that time, and had the Title of Aſiarcha. But (o) Alb. Rubenius ſhews from Ariſtides and Dio, That the Aſiarchæ had the Superintendency over the Temples and the Prieſts within the Community of the Aſian Cities; But theſe were only, he ſaith, For the Temples erected to the Cæſars out of the common Stock; The Temple of Diana at Epheſus belonging to the Ionian Community, and not to that of Aſia. Herodes Atticus is called in the Inſcription at (p) Athens, 'Αρχιερεὺς τῶν Σεβαστῶν, Cæſar's High-prieſt. But that ſeems to be only a Title, without Power. But it appears by the (q) Inſcription at Thyatira, That the Aſiarcha was called the High-prieſt of Aſia, and had Power to place Prieſts in the Cities under his Care. But ſtill this falls ſhort of ſuch Chief-prieſts in the Provinces as Maximinus appointed.

And thus I have endeavour'd to clear the Antiquity and Original Inſtitution of Epiſcopacy here, by ſhewing it was not taken up, according to the Monkiſh Tradition, from the Heathen Flamins and Archflamins; But came down by Succeſſion from the firſt planting of Apoſtolical Churches. For although we cannot deduce a lineal Succeſſion of Biſhops, as they could in other Churches, where Writings were preſerved, yet aſſoon as through the Churches Peace they came to have intercourſe with foreign Churches (as in the Council of Arles) they appeared with a proportionable number of Biſhops with thoſe of the other Provinces; And their Succeſſion was not in the leaſt diſputed among them, they ſubſcribed to the Sentence and Canons as others did. And what Canons did then paſs, did no doubt as much concern the Britiſh Churches to obſerve, as any other Churches whoſe Biſhops were there preſent. Which Canons were paſſed by their own Authority; For they never ſent to the Biſhop of Rome to confirm, but to publiſh them, as appears by the Synodical Epiſtle which they ſent to him; Their words are, Quæ decrevimus Communi Concilio, Charitati tuæ ſignificamus, ut omnes ſciant quid in futurum obſervare debeant. (r) Baronius had good luck to find out the neceſſity of the Pope's confirmation here; Whereas they plainly tell him, they had already decreed them by common conſent, and ſent them to him to divulge them, i. e. As (s) Petrus de Marca ſaith, As the Emperors ſent their Edicts to their Præfecti Prætorio. Was that to confirm them? It is true, they ſay, the Pope had a large Dioceſe; But if theſe words had implied ſo much as a Patriarchal Power over the Biſhops there aſſembled, how could they aſſume to themſelves this Power to make Canons; And only to ſignifie to him what they had done, and to deſire him to communicate theſe Canons to others? Would ſuch a Meſſage from a Council have been born, ſince the Papal Supremacy hath been owned? Nay, how ſaucily would it have looked in any Council within the Patriarchats of the Eaſt to have done ſo? But theſe Biſhops of Arles knew no other Style then, but Charitati tuæ; And they ſignifie to the Biſhop of Rome what they had already decreed, but not what they had prepared for him to confirm. And they are ſo far from owning his Authority in calling them together, That they tell him, They were aſſembled at the Emperors Command, and were ſo far from expecting Directions from him, that they tell him they had a Divine Authority preſent with them, and a certain Tradition and Rule of Faith. They wiſhed indeed, he had been preſent with them, and to have judged together with them. Was this to make him ſole Judge? or could they believe him at the ſame time to be their Supreme Head? They could have been glad of the Company of their Brother of Rome, as they familiarly call him; But ſince his Occaſions would not permit his Abſence from home, they acquaint him what they had done, and ſo ſend him an Abſtract of their Canons, as may be ſeen at large both in Sirmondus and Baronius. By this we ſee what Opinion the Britiſh Biſhops and their Brethren had of the Pope's Supremacy.

But now to their Canons; Thoſe may be reduced to three Heads; Either to the Keeping of Eaſter; Or to the Diſcipline of the Clergy; Or to Lay Communion.

(1.) As to Eaſter, That Council decreed, Can. 1. That it ſhould be obſerved on the ſame day and time throughout the World. And that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould give notice of the day, according to cuſtom. But this latter part was repealed, as Binius confeſſes, by the Council of Nice, which referr'd this matter to the Biſhop of Alexandria.

(2.) As to the Clergy, There were Canons which related to Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons. (1.) To Biſhops, and thoſe were four: (1.) That no Biſhop ſhould trample upon another, Can. 17. which Albaſpinæus well interprets of invading another's Dioceſe. (2.) As to travelling Biſhops, that they ſhould be allow'd to perform Divine Offices in the City they came unto, Can. 19. (3.) That no Biſhop ſhould Conſecrate another alone, but he ought to take ſeven with him, or at leaſt three, Can. 20. Which ſhews the number of Biſhops then in the Weſtern Provinces and ſo in Britain at that time. The Nicene Canon, Can. 4. takes notice only of three Biſhops as neceſſary to be preſent, becauſe many Eaſtern Provinces had not ſeven; as Chriſtianus Lupus obſerves on that Canon. In an African Council in Creſconius we find, That becauſe that two had preſumed to conſecrate a Biſhop, they deſire that twelve may be preſent; But Aurelius, Biſhop of Carthage, refuſed it for this reaſon, Becauſe in the Province of Tripolis there were but five Biſhops. Therefore when the Council of Arles appoints ſeven, it doth ſuppoſe theſe Provinces to have a greater number of Biſhops. (4.) That if any were proved to have been Traditores in the Time of Perſecution, i. e. to have given up the ſacred Books or Veſſels, or to have betray'd their Brethren, and this proved by Authentick Acts; Then they were to be depoſed. However their Ordinations are declared to be valid, Can. 13.

(2.) As to inferior Clergy; (1.) Excommunication is denounced againſt thoſe that put out money to uſe, Can. 12. (2.) That they were not to forſake the Churches where they were ordained, Can. 2. And Deprivation is threatned on that account, Can. 21. (3.) The Deacons are forbidden to celebrate the Lord's Supper, there called Offering, Can. 15.

(3.) As to Lay Communion: (1.) Thoſe that refuſe to continue in their Employment as Souldiers, now the Perſecution was over, were to be ſuſpended Communion, Can. 3. The words are de his qui arma projiciunt in Pace. Of which ſome do hardly make tolerable ſenſe. Binius ſaith it muſt be read in Bello. But nothing can be more contrary to Peace than War; How then ſhould ſuch a miſtake happen? Albaſpinæus ſaith, It is againſt thoſe who refuſe to be Souldiers in time of Peace: Baronius ſaith, It is againſt them that apoſtatize in time of Peace; But if a Metaphorical Senſe will be allow'd, that which ſeems moſt probable is, That many Chriſtians, now the Perſecution was over, neglected that Care of themſelves, and that Strictneſs of Diſcipline which they uſed before; And therefore ſuch are here threatned, if not to be thrown out, yet to be debarr'd Communion till they had recover'd themſelves. And much to this purpoſe Joſephus Egyptius and Joh. Antiochenus do underſtand the 12. Can. of the Council. of Nice. But if a Metaphorical Senſe be thought too hard; Then, I ſuppoſe, the meaning is, againſt thoſe who renounced being Souldiers, as much now in time of the Churches Peace, as under Perſecution, when they could not be Souldiers without committing Idolatry, as appear'd in the Perſecution of Licinius and others. Conſtantine, as (t) Euſebius, gave them all leave to forſake their Employment that would. But the Council of Arles might well apprehend, That if all Chriſtians renounced being Souldiers, They muſt ſtill have an Army of Heathens, whatever the Emperors were; And therefore they had reaſon to make ſuch a Canon as this, ſince the Chriſtians ever thought it lawfull to ſerve in the Wars; Provided no Idolatrous Acts were impoſed, which was frequently done on purpoſe by the Perſecutors, as Maximianus, Licinius, Julian, &c. And this I think the true meaning of this difficult Canon. (2.) For thoſe who drove the Chariots in Races, and acted on Theatres, as long as they continued ſo to do; There being ſo many Occaſions of Idolatry in both of them, They were to be caſt out of Communion, Can. 4. 5. (3.) That thoſe who were Chriſtians and made Governours of remote places ſhould carry with them the communicatory Letters of their own Biſhop, and not be debarr'd Communion, unleſs they acted againſt the Diſcipline of the Church. This I take to be the meaning of Can. 7. (4.) That thoſe who were received into the Church in their weakneſs ſhould have Impoſition of hands afterwards, Can. 6. (5.) That thoſe who brought Teſtimonials from Confeſſors ſhould be bound to take communicatory Letters from their Biſhop, Can. 9. (6.) That thoſe who found their Wives in Adultery, ſhould be adviſed not to marry again while they did live, Can. 10. (7.) That thoſe young Women who did marry Infidels ſhould for a time be ſuſpended Communion, Can. 11. (8.) That thoſe who falſly accuſed their Brethren ſhould not be admitted to Communion as long as they lived, Can. 14. (9.) That none who were excommunicated in one place ſhould be abſolved in another, Can. 16. (10.) That no Apoſtate ſhould be admitted to Communion in Sickneſs; But they ought to wait till they recover'd and ſhew'd amendment, Can. 22. (11.) That thoſe who were baptized in the Faith of the Holy Trinity ſhould not be rebaptized, Can. 8.

And this was the Canon which St. Auguſtine on all occaſions preſſed upon the Donatiſts, as Sirmondus and Launoy think; And therefore they ſuppoſe this Council to be called ſo often a Plenary and Univerſal Council, not from the number of Biſhops preſent, but from the Provinces out of which they came; And ſo it was the firſt General Council of the Weſtern Church.

CHAP. III.

Of the Succeſſion of the Britiſh Churches from the Council of Nice to the Council of Ariminum.

Great Probabilities that the Britiſh Biſhops were preſent in the Council of Nice.

How far the right of Election was devolved to the Biſhops.

Of the Authority of Provincial Synods there ſettled.

Particular Exceptions as to the Biſhops of Alexandria, Rome and Antioch from ancient Cuſtom.

They had then a Patriarchal Power within certain bounds.

No evidence that they were under the Roman Patriarchate.

The Patriarchal Rights examin'd; And from them the Pope's Patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches at large diſputed and overthrown.

What Authority granted by them to the Biſhop of Rome, and how far it extends.

Having deduced the Succeſſion of the Britiſh Churches down to the Appearance of the Britiſh Biſhops at the firſt Council of Arles, I now come to the famous Council of Nice; And although the Subſcriptions ſtill remaining which are very imperfect and confuſed in the beſt Copies, do not diſcover any of the Britiſh

tiſh Biſhops to have been there preſent, yet there are many Probabilities to induce us to believe that they were. For (1.) Conſtantine declares, that his Deſign was, to have as full an Appearance of Biſhops there from all parts as he could well get together. To that end he ſent forth an univerſal Summons for the Biſhops to come out of all Provinces, ἁπανταχόθεν is the word uſed by (a) Euſebius. And preſently after he ſaith Conſtantine's Edict was divulged πανταχοῦ, in all Provinces of the Empire. How can this be, If there were no Summons in the Provinces of Gaul and Britain? And to prevent all Objections, as to difficulty and charges of Paſſage, Euſebius adds, That he had given order to have the publick Carriages ready, and all Expences to be defrayed for them. To this purpoſe Tractoriæ were to be given them by the Emperor's Order, which ſecured their Paſſage and Proviſion in all Places; the form of which is exſtant in (b) Baronius. And the Claſſis Britannica lying near to Britain to ſecure theſe Coaſts from the Franks and Saxons, who were then troubleſome, (and over which Carauſius ſo lately was appointed Admiral to clear theſe Seas) the Biſhops here could not want conveniency to tranſport them. (2.) Conſtantine expreſſed great ſatisfaction in the Numbers that did appear from all parts. So that there is no reaſon to queſtion, That they did anſwer his expectation. For in his Epiſtle to the Church of Alexandria, (c) he ſaith, He had brought together a great number of Biſhops; But more fully in his Epiſtle to the Churches; That to the ſettlement of the Chriſtian Faith it was then neceſſary, that all the Biſhops ſhould meet together, or at leaſt the greateſt part: Therefore he had aſſembled as many as he could. But when it appears by the Council of Arles, what numbers of Biſhops there were in theſe Weſtern Provinces, how could Conſtantine uſe ſuch Expreſſions as theſe, if they were not ſummoned to appear? And (d) Euſebius ſaith, Thoſe that were ſummon'd did come according to appointment with great readineſs, not only for the ſake of the Council, but of the Emperor; And he after ſaith, That the moſt eminent Biſhops of all Churches, as well thoſe of Europe as Aſia and Africa did come to Nice. Did not Euſebius know of the Churches of Britain? Yes, moſt certainly, For he mentions their early converſion to Chriſtianity, as I have already ſhew'd; And in that very Book of the Life of Conſtantine, he mentions the Churches of Britain, as well as thoſe of Gaul and Spain: And there Conſtantine inſiſts upon the conſent of the Weſtern and Northern Churches about Eaſter, as well as the Southern and ſome of the Eaſtern. Now if their Conſent were ſo conſiderable as to add weight in this matter, It is not to be ſuppoſed they ſhould be left out, when he deſigned an Oecumenical Council, as far as it was in his power to make it ſo, which certainly extended to all the Provinces within the Empire. (3.) It is not probable the Churches of Britain ſhould be left out, conſidering Conſtantine's relation to Britain. For he was not only proclaimed Emperor here on the death of his Father; But, if the Panegyriſt who lived in that time may be believed, He was born here. For, comparing (e) Conſtantius and him together, he ſaith, That his Father deliver'd Britain from Slavery, Tu etiam Nobiles illic oriendo feciſti: The queſtion now is, Whether theſe words relate to his Birth, or to his being proclaimed Cæſar here? Livineius is for the latter, after (f) But I ſee no reaſon to decline the moſt natural and proper ſenſe, viz. That he brought ſuch a great honour to Britain by being born in it. (g) Eumenius, in another Panegyrick, applauds the happineſs of Britain, That had the firſt ſight ſight of Conſtantine Cæſar. This is likewiſe capable of both ſenſes; But he immediately falls into a high commendation of Britain, for its Temper, Fertility, Riches and Length of days. If this were Conſtantine's own Country, this was done like an Oratour; If not, to what purpoſe is all this? And then he parallels Britain with Egypt, where Mercury was born; Which ſhews that he ſpake of the Place of Nativity. Beſides, the former Panegyriſt made his Oration to Maximianus and Conſtantine together, upon his Marriage of Theodora his Daughter; But it is not ſo probable that he would to him ſo much own Conſtantine's being made Cæſar in Britain; For that was not according to the Rules of Government, in the Court of Maximianus and Diocleſian; for as Galerius told Diocleſian when he would have had four Auguſti; No, ſaith he, That is againſt your own Maxim, which is to have only two Auguſti, and for them to name two Cæſars. Therefore it is not likely, That the Oratour ſhould, to Maximianus his face, own him to be made Cæſar, without the conſent of thoſe who were then Auguſti: But if he ſpeaks of his being made Cæſar by Galerius, it is very doubtful whether he were then in Britain. (h) For Lactantius ſaith, he took time to conſider about it, and was very hardly brought to it: But (i) Nazarius, and (k) Praxagoras, both ſay, That Conſtantine went into Gaul ſoon after his Father's death; And therefore Gaul firſt ſaw him Cæſar, according to the conſtitution of the Empire at that time. So that this one Teſtimony of the Panegyriſt weighs more with me than ten Cedrenus's or Nicephorus's who ſay he was born in the Eaſt. But I produce this only as an argument of the improbability, That the Britiſh Churches ſhould be omitted by Conſtantine in the Summons to his Oecumenical Council; or, That they being ſummon'd ſhould neglect to go. (4.) They were certainly ſummon'd, and did go to the Councils of Sardica and Ariminum after, and to that of Arles before, and why ſhould we believe them left out in that of Nice? This argument alone prevailed with Mr. (l) Selden to believe them preſent at the Council of Nice. And we are now forced to make uſe of the beſt Probabilities, ſince Athanaſius his (m) Synodicon hath been ſo long loſt, wherein all their Names were ſet down who were then preſent; And that Catalogue of them, if it were diſtinct, which (n) Epiphanius had ſeen.

There being then ſo much reaſon to believe the Britiſh Biſhops preſent in the Council of Nice, we have the more cauſe to look into the Conſtitution of the Eccleſiaſtical Government there ſettled, that ſo we may better underſtand the juſt Rights and Privileges of the Britiſh Churches. After the Points of Faith and the time of Eaſter were determined; The Biſhops there aſſembled made twenty Canons for the Government and Diſcipline of the Church, in which they partly re-inforced the Canons of the Council of Arles, and partly added new. Thoſe that were re-inforced were, (1.) Againſt Clergy-mens taking the cuſtomary Uſury then allow'd, Can. 17. (2.) Againſt their removing from their own Dioceſe, Can. 15. which is here extended to Biſhops; and ſuch removal is declared null. (3.) Againſt Deacons giving the Euchariſt to Presbyters, and in the preſence of Biſhops, Can. 18. (2.) As to Lay Communion; The Canon againſt re-baptizing is re-inforced by Can. 19. wherein thoſe only who renounced the Trinity are required to be re-baptized, and the Canon againſt being excommunicated in one Church, and received into Communion in another, Can. 5. whether they be of the Laity or Clergy.

For the New Canons about Lay Communion, they chiefly concerned the Lapſed in times of Perſecution. As (1.) If they were only Catechumens, that for three years they ſhould remain in the loweſt Form, not being admitted to join in any Prayers of the Church, but only to hear the Leſſons read, and the Inſtructions that were there given, Can. 14. (2.) For thoſe that were baptized, and fell voluntarily in the late Perſecution of Licinius, They were for three years to remain among thoſe who were admitted onely to hear, for ſeven years to continue in the ſtate of Penitents, and for two years to join only with the People in Prayers, without being admitted to the Euchariſt, Can. 11. (3.) For thoſe Souldiers who (in that Perſecution when Licinius made it neceſſary for them to ſacrifice to Heathen Gods if they would continue in their Places) firſt renounced their Employments, and after by Bribery or other means got into them again, for three years they were to be without joining in the Prayers of the Church, and for ten years to remain in the ſtate of Penitents; But ſo as to leave it to the Biſhop's Diſcretion to judge of the ſincerity of their Repentance, and accordingly to remit ſome part of the Diſcipline, Can. 12. (4.) If perſons happen'd to be in danger of Death before they had paſſed through all the methods of the Churches Diſcipline, they were not to be denyed the Euchariſt; But if they recover, they were to be reduced to the ſtate of Penitents, Can. 13. But there was one Canon added of another nature, which concerned Uniformity, and that is the laſt of the Genuine Canons. It had been an ancient Cuſtom in the Chriſtian Church to forbear kneeling in the publick Devotion on the Lord's Day, and between Eaſter and Whitſontide, but there were ſome who refuſed to obſerve it; And therefore this Canon was made to bring all to an Uniformity in that Practice, Can. 20.

But there are other Canons which relate more eſpecially to Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, and thoſe either concern the Diſcipline of the Clergy, or the Government of the Church.

(1.) For the Diſcipline of the Clergy, they are theſe.

(1.) None who had voluntarily caſtrated themſelves were to be admitted into Orders, Can. 1. For it ſeems Origen's Fact, however condemned by ſome, was as much admired by others, and (o) Chriſtianus Lupus thinks the Sect of the Valeſii, who caſtrated all, came from him; But I do not find that Origen did propagate any Sect of this kind; And Epiphanius makes one Valens the Authour of it; However this great Council thought fit to exclude all ſuch from any Capacity of Church Employments; But it is generally ſuppoſed, and not without reaſon, that the Fact of Leontius, a Presbyter of Antioch, (p) caſtrating himſelf becauſe of his ſuſpicious Converſation with Euſtolia, gave the particular Occaſion to the making this Canon. (2.) None who were lately Catechumens, were to be conſecrated Biſhops or ordained Presbyters, Can. 2. For however it had happen'd well in ſome extraordinary Caſes, as of St. Cyprian before, and others after this Council, as St. Ambroſe, Nectarius, &c. yet there was great reaſon to make a ſtanding Rule againſt it. (3.) None of the Clergy were to have any Woman to live in the Houſe with them, except very near Relations, as Mother, or Siſter, &c. Can. 3. For ſome, pretending greater Sanctity, and therefore declining Marriage, yet affected the familiar Converſation of Women, who made the ſame pretence. For (q) Budæus hath well obſerved that Συνείσακτος is a Companion of Celibacy; So that when two Perſons were reſolved to continue unmarried and agreed to live together, one of theſe was Συνείσακτος to the other. And (r) Tertullian, writing againſt ſecond Marriages, ſeems to adviſe this Practice, Habe aliquam Uxorem ſpiritualem; adſume de Viduis Eccleſiæ, &c. And it ſoon grew into a Cuſtom in Africa, as appears by (s) St. Cyprian who writes vehemently againſt it, and ſhews the Danger and Scandal of it. And that this Converſation was under a Pretence of Sanctity appears by (t) St. Jerom's words, ſpeaking of ſuch Perſons, Sub nominibus pietatis quærentium ſuſpecta conſortia; and again, Sub nomine Religionis & umbra Continentiæ. But elſewhere he calls it Peſtis Agapetarum, for it ſpread like the Plague, and was reſtrained with great Difficulty; And at laſt Laws were added to Canons, theſe being found ineffectual. (4.) If any perſons were admitted looſely and without due Examination into Orders, or upon Confeſſion of lawful Impediments had Hands notwithſtanding laid upon them, ſuch Ordinations were not to be allowed as Canonical, Can. 9. which is more fully expreſſed in the next Canon as to one Caſe, viz. That if any lapſed perſons were ordained, whether the Ordainers did it ignorantly or knowingly, they were to be deprived, Can. 10. (5.) If any among the Novatians returned to the Church, and ſubſcribed their Conſent to the Doctrine and Practice of it, their Ordination ſeems to be allowed. Juſtellus, and ſome others think a new Impoſition of Hands was required by this Canon; If any of the Novatian Clergy were admitted into the Church. And ſo Dionyſius Exiguus and the old Latin Interpreter do render it. But Balſamon, Zonaras and others underſtand it ſo, as that the former Impoſition of Hands, whereby they were admitted into the Clergy were hereby allow'd. If the words of the Canon ſeem to be ambiguous, and their Senſe to be taken from the Practice of the Nicene Fathers in a parallel Caſe, then they are rather to be underſtood of a new Impoſition of Hands. For in the Caſe of the Meletians who were ordained in Schiſm too, they determined in their Synodical Epiſtle that they ſhould be received μυστικωτέρα χειροτονία, with a more ſacred Impoſition of Hands; But it is not agreed whether this implies a Re-ordination or not. (u) Valeſius thinks it doth, but others take it only for a ſimple Benediction, or the Laying on of Hands upon Reconciliation to the Church. And (w) Godfrey Hermant hath at large proved Re-ordination in this Caſe to have been againſt the ſenſe of the Church; wherein he hath the advantage of Valeſius: As is evident to any one that reflects on the Occaſion of the Luciferian Schiſm; which began upon the Council of Alexandria's allowing the Ordination of the Arian Biſhops. And it would be very ſtrange if Schiſm were more deſtructive to Orders than plain Hereſie. But the Novatian Biſhop was to have no Juriſdiction where there was one of the Catholick Church; Can. 8.

Among the Canons which relate to the Settlement and Polity of the Church, theſe three are very material. (1.) About Election and Conſecration of Biſhops. (2.) About Provincial Synods. (3.) About the Bounds of Juriſdiction. For the ſeventh Canon is but a Complement to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, giving him the honour of a Metropolitane without the Juriſdiction.

(1.) About Election and Conſecration of Biſhops. The Canon is, That a Biſhop ought chiefly to be conſtituted by all the Biſhops in the Province; But if this be too difficult, either through urgent Occaſions, or the length of the way, yet three muſt be preſent for that purpoſe, and have the

Conſent of the abſent under their Hands, and ſo to make the Conſecration. But the Confirmation of all things done in the Province muſt be reſerved to the Metropolitane, Can. 4. By this Canon the Government of the Church came now to be ſettled under Conſtantine, and with his Approbation. And here we find, That every Province had a number of Biſhops within it ſelf, who were to take care of the Eccleſiaſtical Government of it, but ſo as the conſent of the Metropolitane were obtained: So that the Rights of Metropolitans, as to the chief Eccleſiaſtical Government of every Province, are hereby ſecured; For the laſt Clauſe doth not merely refer to the Conſecration of Biſhops; But takes in that, with other Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of the Province. The only difficulty lies in the firſt Clauſe, What is meant by the Biſhops of the Province, conſtituting a new Biſhop; Whether the Right of Election is hereby devolved to them, or whether it be only the Right of Conſecration upon the Election of the People? Which is therefore here fit to be enquired into, becauſe the ancient Practice of the Britiſh Churches may from hence be gathered; which we may juſtly preſume was agreeable to the Nicene Canon. And becauſe the ſignification of the Greek word is ambiguous, we ſhall firſt ſee, what Senſe the Greek Writers do put upon it. Balſamon interprets καθίστασθαι by ψηφίζεσθαι which is chuſing by Suffrage; And he in plain terms ſaith, by this Canon, the Right of Election was taken from the People, and given to the Biſhops of the Province. And it is not Balſamon alone, as ſome imagine, that was of that Opinion, but Zonaras, Ariſtenus, Matthæus Blaſtares, as any one may find. But we are told, If they are all of that mind, they are greatly miſtaken, becauſe this Council, in their Synodical Epiſtle to thoſe of Alexandria and Egypt, declare their Judgment, (x) That if any Biſhops deceaſe, others reconciled to the Church may be admitted in their room, if they be worthy, and the People do chuſe them, καὶ ὁ Λαὸς αἱροῖτο. One would think by this, That the Council of Nice had put this matter wholly into the Peoples hands, but if we look into that Synodical Epiſtle, we ſhall find it much otherwiſe. For the caſe was this. The Council declares their tenderneſs towards thoſe that had been made Biſhops and Prieſts in the Meletian Schiſm, allowing their Orders upon due Submiſſion, but not to exerciſe any Juriſdiction to the prejudice of thoſe in Poſſeſſion; But if any Biſhops died, thoſe Meletian Biſhops might ſucceed, but with theſe three Proviſoes. (1.) That they be judged worthy; By whom? By the People? No certainly, For then there had been no need of the following Clauſe, but this Judgment belonged to the Biſhops of the Province, according to this Canon. (2.) If the People chuſe them? What People? The Meletian party? No; They are excluded, becauſe of their being in Schiſm, from having any thing to doe in the Choice, altho' they were admitted to Communion. For they are forbidden before προχειρίζεσθαι ἢ ὑποβάλλειν ὀνόματα, to put up the Names of the Perſons to be choſen, or to hold up their hands; And ſo all Right of Suffrage was taken from them on the account of their Schiſm; So that what right of choice was in the People, it was only in the ſound and untainted Party, and, after all, it was no more but a Nomination by the People; For the true Right of Election was ſtill in the Biſhops. For (3.) all this ſignified nothing without the conſent of the Biſhop of Alexandria, which immediately follows the other. And is it a fair thing to mention that Clauſe onely in the middle, and to leave out the

the two other which reduce it to a bare Nomination, and the Meletian party excluded too? Would thoſe who contend among us for popular Elections like them upon theſe terms? It is one thing for the People to propoſe or nominate Perſons to be choſen; And another for them to have the Right of Election: And it is one thing for a Perſon choſen to have the conſent of the People, and another for them to have the Power to reject him, becauſe he doth not pleaſe them: And again, it is one thing for the People to be allowed to enjoy ſome Privileges till the Inconveniences of them have made them to be taken away by juſt Laws: And another for them to challenge ſuch a right as inherent in themſelves, and without which there lies no obligation on them to ſubmit. If theſe things were better underſtood, it would allay ſome mens heats about theſe matters; For granting that in the Time of the Council of Nice, the People had the liberty of propoſing names, or objecting againſt the Perſons to be choſen; And although their conſent were generally deſired, yet all this doth not put the Right of Election in them; For all that they could do ſignified nothing without the Conſent of the Biſhops and Metropolitane; and none are properly ſaid to chuſe but thoſe upon whoſe Judgment the Determination depends, the reſt do but propoſe and offer Perſons to be choſen. So that the utmoſt the People could have by this Canon was a Right of Nomination; Which upon Seditions and Tumults was juſtly alter'd: And there can be no Plea for reſuming it, unleſs it be proved to be a divine and unalterable Right, which can never be done, nor is it ſo much as pretended by thoſe who ſeem to court the Peoples favour, by pleading for popular Elections at this day from the Precedents of former Times.

But I will not deny the People then had a farther Right of Exception againſt the Perſons choſen, but therein they were conſidered as Witneſſes, and not as Judges: If their Exceptions were juſt and well proved, the Biſhops as Judges were to proceed canonically againſt them, and then they went to a new Nomination, but ſtill the Judgment reſted in the provincial Synod. So in the 16 Canon in the Council of Antioch it is provided, That although all the People chuſe one actually a Biſhop, yet if he takes Poſſeſſion of his See without a perfect provincial Synod, the Metropolitane being preſent, he is to be caſt out. This Canon doth more fully explain the fourth Canon of the Council of Nice; for here the Caſe is put of the Peoples choice, which is there only implied: And here it is put concerning one actually a Biſhop, and ſo needing no new Conſecration, but being out of employment in his own See, by ſome extraordinary accident, is choſen into another by conſent of the People. Now if the People had there the Power of Election, what hindred this Biſhop, from being fully poſſeſſed of his Biſhoprick? And yet this Canon determines, that ſuch a one was to be caſt out, if he did not come in, by the full conſent of the Metropolitane and a provincial Synod; And to ſhew the force of this Canon, by virtue of it, Baſſianus was rejected from being Biſhop of Epheſus, by the general (y) Council of Chalcedon, where 630 Biſhops are ſaid to have been preſent. The Caſe was this, Baſſianus was conſecrated Biſhop of Evaza, by Memnon Biſhop of Epheſus, but it was againſt his Will, and he never went thither. Baſilius, who ſucceeded Memnon, ſends another Biſhop to that City in a provincial Synod, but leaves Baſſianus the dignity of a Biſhop; Baſilius being dead, Baſſianus is choſen by the People of Epheſus, (y) Concil. Chalced. Act. 11.

Epheſus, and enthronized by Olympius without a Provincial Synod. But after four years, Stephanus is put in his room, becauſe he came not in canonically. The Caſe was heard at large by the Council of Chalcedon, and this Canon of Antioch was alledged againſt him, and ſo he was thrown out by the Council. From whence I infer; (1.) That the choice of the People at that time was not allowed, but the main force of Election lay in the Provincial Synod. And ſo Maximus Biſhop of Antioch, Julianus Coenſis, Diogenes Cyzicenſis declare that it belonged to the Biſhops of the Province to appoint a new Biſhop, as being moſt competent Judges, and this was the way to prevent diſorder in the City. (2.) That the Biſhops appointing was not mere ordaining or conſecrating, as ſome ſay. For this Canon of Antioch ſpeaks of a Biſhop already conſecrated, and ſo likewiſe the 12 Canon of Laodicea is to be underſtood; The ſame caſe being ſuppoſed which is mention'd in the Canon of Antioch. And if he were unconſecrated before, the Loadicean Canon refers the whole matter, as far as I can diſcern, as to the Capacity and fitneſs of the Perſon, to the Provincial Synod. And if the following Canon 13. be underſtood of Biſhops, the Conſequence will be, that the People will be wholly excluded from their Election, till it can be made appear, that at that time the generality of the People were ſhut out, and the Election reſtrained to the Common Council; which is contrary to the Examples brought for Popular Elections, as appears by the inſtance of Alexandria in the choice of Athanaſius, where the whole multitude is mention'd, and the Suffrages of the whole People, and afterwards the Plebis Vulgique Judicium in St. Jerom, the Vota Civium in Leo is as much ſpoken of as the Honoratorum Arbitrium; and by the ſame reaſon, any of the People may be excluded, the reſt may; or at leaſt it ſhews, that the People have no inherent and unalterable Right, without which all other Pretences ſignifie nothing, where Law and Cuſtoms have determined the contrary. And that the Cuſtoms even then differ'd appears from St. Jerom ad Ruſticum, where he mentions either the People or the Biſhop chuſing.

(2.) Another Canon is, about the frequency of Provincial Synods. For in the fifth Canon, it is Provided, That no perſon excommunicated by one Biſhop, ſhould be received into Communion by another; according to the Council of Arles; but then no Proviſion was made for the Caſe of Appeals; If any Perſon complain'd, that he was unjuſtly excommunicated, which it is natural for men to do. For this purpoſe, the Nicene Council decrees, That Provincial Synods be held twice a year, in Lent and Autumn, which was confirmed by many other (z) Canons. And at theſe all ſuch Cauſes were to be heard and determined, and Perſons excommunicated were to be held ſo by all, unleſs the Provincial Synod repealed the Sentence. And although the caſe of Biſhops be not here mention'd; Yet the African Fathers with great reaſon ſaid, it ought to be underſtood, Since Cauſes are to be heard within the Province, and no Juriſdiction is mention'd by the Council of Nice, beyond that of a Metropolitane, thoſe only excepted whoſe Rights are ſecured according to the Preſcription then in uſe in the following Canon. For if any other ſuperiour Authority had then been known, that was the proper place to have inſerted it, where the right of Appeal is determin'd, that being the moſt plauſible Pretence for removing Cauſes to a ſuperiour Court. And it is impoſſible that the Nicene Fathers ſhould have ſtopt at Provincial Synods, if they had known or believed, that Chriſt had appointed appointed a Vicar upon Earth, who was to be Supreme Judge in all Eccleſiaſtical Matters; For it would have been as abſurd as if our Judges ſhould declare, that all Cauſes are to be determin'd in the Country Courts, when they know there are ſuperiour Courts of Judicature appointed in Weſtminſter-hall.

It hath been thought a matter of ſome difficulty to ſtate the difference between the Rights of a Patriarch and a Metropolitane. But there are two things chiefly, wherein the diſtinction lies, viz. a greater extent of Juriſdiction founded on the Conſecration of Metropolitane Biſhops in ſeveral Provinces; and a Power of receiving Appeals, or, Judicium in majoribus cauſis, even after Provincial Synods have determined them. And ſince in matters of Appeal, there muſt be a ſtop ſomewhere, the only queſtion before us is, Where the Council of Nice fixed it. I ſay, in a Provincial Synod by this Canon; for I am certain, it takes notice here of no Eccleſiaſtical Judicatory beyond this. In matters of Faith, or upon extraordinary Occaſions, by the Summons of an Emperor, or a general Concurrence of Chriſtian Princes a general Council is the higheſt Court; But in the ſtanding and ordinary Method of Proceeding, (where there have been no ancient Privileges to the contrary, of which the following Canon is to be underſtood) a Provincial Synod is the laſt Court of Appeal, according to the Council of Nice. So that all foreign Juriſdiction is excluded by this Canon; And the Britiſh Churches had a full Power within themſelves to end all Cauſes that did ariſe within their own Provinces. And it was mere uſurpation in any Foreign Biſhops to interpoſe in any differences in the Britiſh Churches, Becauſe the Council of Nice had circumſcribed the Liberty of Appeals to Provincial Synods. And this was it which made the African Fathers ſo ſtout in defence of their juſt Rights, againſt the manifeſt incroachments of the Biſhop of Rome; and the Britiſh Churches had as great Privileges and as juſt Rights in theſe matters as the African Churches.

(3.) About ſettling the ancient Bounds of Juriſdiction as to Patriarchal Churches in the famous ſixth Canon. Which hath been the occaſion of ſo many warm Debates. In the former Canon, the Nicene Fathers fixed the general Right of Appeals; And in this Canon they ſettle the particular Bounds of Patriarchal Juriſdiction, according to ancient Cuſtom: So that none ought to violate the Privileges which Churches had hitherto enjoy'd. The Words are, "Let ancient Cu-" ſtoms prevail, for the Biſhop of Alexandria to have Juriſdiction over" Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis; Becauſe the Biſhop of Rome hath a like" Cuſtom; Likewiſe in Antioch, and other Provines, let the Privileges of Churches be preſerved; Let no man be made a Biſhop with-" out the conſent of his Metropolitane. If Differences ariſe, let the" Majority of Votes determine. In this Canon there are three things principally deſign'd. (1.) To confirm the ancient Privileges of ſome of the greater Sees; as Rome, Alexandria and Antioch. (2.) To ſecure the Privileges of other Churches againſt their encroachments upon them. (3.) To provide for the quiet eſtabliſhment of Metropolitane Churches, which laſt is ſo plain that it will need no farther diſcourſe; But the other two are of great conſequence to our deſign. (1.) To confirm the ancient Privileges of ſome of the greater Sees; which had gotten the extent of more than a bare Metropolitane Power to themſelves, as is plain in the caſe of Alexandria, which ſeems to have been the occaſion of this Canon. Not merely from the Schiſm of Meletius (as is commonly thought) thought) which the Council took care of another way, in the (a) Synodical Epiſtle to the Churches of Egypt. But becauſe ſo large a Juriſdiction as had been exerciſed by the Biſhops of Alexandria, and Rome, and Antioch, ſeem'd repugnant to the foregoing Canon about Provincial Synods. It is true that Meletius after the Schiſm did conſecrate Biſhops in Egypt, in oppoſition to the Biſhop of Alexandria; But the queſtion between them was, not concerning the Bounds of Juriſdiction, but about the Validity of Meletius his depoſition by Peter of Alexandria; Which Meletius, not regarding, fell into a Schiſm, and, to maintain this Schiſm, he conſecrated near Thirty Biſhops, as appear'd by the liſt he gave in to Alexander, after the Council of Nice extant in (b) Athanaſius. Whereby it is evident, That Meletius his Schiſm could not be the Occaſion of this Canon; For that Schiſm did not at all relate to the ſeveral Provinces of Egypt here mention'd, which would have continued, if the Biſhop of Alexandria's Authority had been confined to a ſingular Province, and what ſtop could it put to the Schiſm, to ſay, his Authority extended over all the Roman Provinces in Egypt? For, the queſtion was, Who had the Authority? not, How far it extended? But, upon the former Canon about Provincial Synods, there was a very juſt occaſion, to add this concerning the Biſhops of Alexandria and Rome: For if no Salvo had been made for them, as to the largeneſs of their Juriſdiction, the next thing had been for all the provincial Synods to have immediately caſt off all reſpect to them; except only thoſe of their own Province. Now in Egypt here are three diſtinct Provinces mention'd as ſubject to the Biſhop of Alexandria, viz. Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis; And ſo the Nicene Fathers reckon them in their Epiſtle to the Churches of Egypt, and in theſe (c) Athanaſius mentions an hundred Biſhops; But ſometimes he names only Egypt and Libya, as in his Epiſtle to the African Biſhops; ſometimes Egypt, and the two Libya's; and in both comprehending Thebais under Egypt; and ſometimes he names Thebais; and ſeveral times, as it is here, only Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis. Which, as Juſtellus ſaith, comprehend the whole Egyptian Dioceſe; But (d) Ammianus Marcellinus reckons them otherwiſe, viz. Egypt, Thebais and Libya, to which Poſterity, he ſaith, added Auguſtamnica and Pentapolis: But Pentapolis was not comprehended under Libya, being always a diſtinct Province, and by the Diviſion of Auguſtus, was under the Proconſul of Crete, by the Name of Cyrenaica. However (e) Epiphanius takes in Libya, Pentapolis, Thebais, Ammoniaca and Mareotis: And ſaith plainly, That all the Provinces of Egypt were under the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Alexandria. And this, he ſaith, was the Cuſtom before the Council of Nice. For he ſpeaks of the quarrel between Peter, Biſhop of Alexandria, and Meletius, then Biſhop of Thebais; of whom he ſaith, That he was next to the Biſhop of Alexandria, but in ſubjection to him, all Eccleſiaſtical matters being referred to him. For it is the Cuſtom for the Biſhop of Alexandria to have the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over all Egypt. By which it is plain, that the Biſhop of Alexandria had then a true Patriarchal power by ancient Cuſtom, i. e. an Eccleſiaſtical Authority over the Biſhops in ſeveral Provinces, anſwering to the Power which the Præfectus Auguſtalis had over them in the Civil Government. It is not at all material whether the name of Patriarch or Dioceſe (in that ſenſe as it takes in the extent of Patriarchal Juriſdiction) were then in uſe, for it is the thing we enquire after, and not the uſe of words: And if the Biſhop of Alexandria had at that time the Power of Conſecration of Biſhops, of calling ling Councils, of receiving Appeals throughout all Egypt, no men of Senſe can deny, that he had a true Patriarchal Power. I grant he had no Metropolitanes then under him in the ſeveral Provinces. But, what then? the manner of Adminiſtration of the Patriarchal power might be different then, from following times; but the extent of the power is the thing in queſtion. Either then the Biſhop of Alexandria had a barely Metropolitical power or Patriarchal. If barely Metropolitical, then it could not reach beyond one Province; If it extended to more Provinces, with full Juriſdiction, then it was Patriarchal. And it is a wonder to me, ſome learned men in their warm Debates about this Canon could not diſcern ſo plain a Truth. But it is often ſaid, That there were no ſuch things as Patriarchs at this time in the Church, nor any Dioceſes here taken notice of, as they imply an Union of ſeveral Provinces under a Patriarchal Juriſdiction. Suppoſe there were not under thoſe Names; but a Juriſdiction over ſeveral Provinces there was in the Biſhop of Alexandria: Which is a true Patriarchal power; and Appeals were brought to him out of the ſeveral Provinces, as appears not only by the plain Teſtimony of Epiphanius in the caſe of Meletius, but by the Juriſdiction exerciſed by Dionyſius over Pentapolis, long before the Council of Nice. And (f) Athanaſius ſaith, The Care of thoſe Churches then belong'd to the Biſhop of Alexandria. If it be ſaid, That there were then no Metropolitanes under the Biſhop of Alexandria, but he was the ſole Metropolitane, and therefore this was no Patriarchal, but a Metropolitane power. I anſwer, (1.) This doth not ſolve the difficulty, but rather makes it greater; becauſe it doth more overthrow the Metropolitane Government of the Church here ſettled by the Council of Nice. For then there were ſeveral Provinces without Metropolitanes; How then could the Canons here made be ever obſerved in them, as to the Conſecration of Biſhops and Provincial Synods? (2.) I do confeſs there was ſomething peculiar in the caſe of the Biſhop of Alexandria. For all the Provinces of Egypt were under his immediate care, which was Patriarchal as to Extent, but Metropolitical in the Adminiſtration. And ſo was the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Rome at that time, which is the true reaſon of bringing the Cuſtom of Rome to juſtifie that of Alexandria. For as it is well obſerved by (g) Chriſtianus Lupus, The Biſhop of Rome had then no Metropolitanes under him within the Provinces ſubject to his Juriſdiction; and ſo all Appeals lay immediately from the ſeveral Biſhops to him. And therein lay the exact parallel between the Biſhops of Rome and Alexandria. So that, I do not queſtion, but the firſt part of this Canon, was brought in as a Proviſo to the former, which put the laſt reſort into Provincial Synods. For Alexander, Biſhop of Alexandria, could not but think himſelf extremely concerned in this matter, and although he prevailed againſt Arius in matter of Doctrine, yet if he had gone home ſo much leſs than he came thither, having great part of his Authority taken from him by Provincial Synods, this would have weakned his Cauſe ſo much in Egypt, that for his ſake the Nicene Fathers were willing to make an Exception as to the general Rule they had laid down before; Which proved of very ill conſequence afterwards: For upon this encouragement, others in following Councils obtained as large Privileges, though without pretence of Cuſtom; and the Church of Rome, though but named occaſionally here, to avoid envy, yet improved this to the utmoſt advantage; And the Agents of the Biſhop of Rome had the impudence in the (h) Council of Chalcedon to falſifie the Title of this Canon, and to pretend a Supremacy owned by it, which was as far from the intention of this Council as a limited Patriarch is from being Head of the Church. And it is impoſſible for them with all their Arts and Diſtinctions they have uſed, to reconcile this Canon with an univerſal and undoubted Supremacy in the Biſhop of that Church. For it would be like the ſaying that the Sheriff of Yorkſhire ſhall have Juriſdiction over all three Ridings, becauſe the King of England hath power over all the Nation. What Parallel is there between theſe two? But if the Clauſe be reſtrained to his Patriarchal power; then we are certain the Council of Nice did ſuppoſe the Biſhop of Rome to have only a limited power within certain Provinces; Which according to Ruffinus, who very well underſtood the Extent of the Biſhop of Rome's Juriſdiction, was only to the Suburbicary Churches; Which is the greater Dioceſe mention'd by the Council of Arles, it ſo very much exceeding the Dioceſe of any Weſtern Biſhop beſides; And it is obſervable, that (i) Athanaſius, as he calls Milan the Metropolis of Italy, i.e. of the Italick Dioceſe, ſo he calls Rome the Metropolis of Romania, i.e. of the Roman Dioceſe. But the Council of Nice fixing the laſt Appeal to Provincial Synods in other Places, utterly overthrows a patriarchal as well as unlimited Juriſdiction; where ancient Cuſtom did not then prevail.

(2.) This Canon was deſigned to ſecure the Privileges of other Churches. For that is the general nature of Exceptions to make the Rule more firm in caſes not excepted. So that all Churches are to enjoy their juſt Rights of having the laſt reſort to Provincial Synods, that cannot be brought within theſe Exceptions allow'd by the Council of Nice. And here we fix our Right as to the Britiſh Churches, that they were not under any Patriarchal Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Rome before the Council of Nice, i. e. That he never had the Authority to conſecrate the Metropolitanes or Biſhops of theſe Provinces; That he never called them to his Councils at Rome; That he had no Appeals from hence; That the Britiſh Biſhops never owned his Juriſdiction over them, and therefore our Churches were ſtill to enjoy their former Privileges of being govern'd by their own Provincial Synods. It was upon this ground, the Cyprian Biſhops made their Application to the Council of Epheſus; Becauſe the Biſhop of Antioch did invade their Privileges contrary to the Nicene Canons pretending to a Right to conſecrate their Metropolitane, which they knew very well was a deſign to bring their Churches in ſubjection to him. The Council upon hearing the Cauſe declared their opinion in favour of the Cyprian Privilege; and not only ſo, but declared it to be a common Cauſe that concerned other Churches which were bound to maintain their own Rights againſt all Uſurpations; And that no Biſhops ſhould preſume to invade anothers Province; And if they did uſurp any authority over them, they were bound to lay it down, as being contrary to the Canons; Savouring of Worldly ambition; and deſtructive of that Liberty which Jeſus Chriſt hath purchaſed for us with his own Bloud. And therefore the Council decreed, That every Province ſhould enjoy its own Rights pure and inviolable, which it had from the beginning, according to the ancient Cuſtom. This important Canon is paſſed over very ſlightly by Baronius and others, but (k) Carolus à Sancto Paulo ſaith it proceeded upon a falſe ſuggeſtion, although the Biſhops of Cyprus do moſt ſolemnly avow the truth of their ancient Privilege. (l) Chriſtianus Lupus imputes the Decree to the Partiality of the Council againſt the Biſhop of Antioch; although he confeſſes, they inſiſted upon the Nicene Canons. Which even (m) Leo I. in his eager Diſputes with Anatolius Biſhop of Conſtantinople pleads for as inviolable, and as the Standard of the Rights of Churches. And by the Decree of the Council of Epheſus, all Churches are bound to ſtand up for their own Rights againſt the Uſurpations of foreign Biſhops.

But (n) Joh. Morinus apprehending the force of this conſequence, makes it his buſineſs to overthrow it, by ſhewing that this was a particular and occaſional thing, and therefore not to be made an Example to other Churches. A two-fold occaſion he aſſigns; Firſt, the difficulty of paſſage by Sea from Cyprus to Antioch, eſpecially in Winter, when it was very poſſible a Metropolitane might die, and rather than live ſo long without one, they choſe to ſet up one themſelves; Another is the forty years Schiſm in the Church of Antioch, between Euzoius, Meletius and Paulinus. But theſe are onely ſlight and frivolous Evaſions. For the Cyprian Biſhops never alledged the firſt Inconveniency, nor did the Biſhop of Antioch the ſecond: No, not when Alexander was unanimouſly choſen, as Morinus confeſſeth, and made his Complaint of the Cyprian Privilege to Innocentius I. as may be ſeen by his 18 Epiſtle; To whom the Pope gave an ignorant Anſwer, as appears by Morinus himſelf: For he pretends that the Cyprian Biſhops had broken the Nicene Canons, in conſecrating their own Metropolitane, becauſe, ſaith he, The Council of Nice had ſet the Church of Antioch, not over any Province, but over the Dioceſe; By which he muſt mean the Eaſtern Dioceſe, within which Cyprus was comprehended: But there is not one word of the Dioceſe in the Nicene Canons, and theſe things are referr'd to ancient Cuſtoms, as Morinus acknowledgeth; And he ſaith, the Dioceſe of the Orient, as diſtinguiſhed from Aſiana and Pontica was not ſettled at the Time of the Nicene Council. And yet he brings the Teſtimony of Innocentius to diſprove the Allegation of the Cyprian Biſhops; when he confeſſes, that he was ſo miſtaken in the Nicene Canons, on which he grounds that Right; And the Cyprian Biſhops had the Nicene Canons to plead for themſelves, as the general Council of Epheſus thought, who underſtood them far better than Innocentius ſeems to have done. If what he ſaith had been true, it is not to be thought that the Council of Epheſus would have determin'd in favour of the Cyprian Biſhops. But Morinus urges againſt them, (1.) That they named onely three Biſhops, Troilus, Sabinus and Epiphanius. But do they not aver that it had been always ſo from the Apoſtles time? (2.) That no one pleaded for the Biſhop of Antioch. What then? If they were ſatisfied of the truth of their Allegation, the Nicene Council, had already determin'd the caſe. (3.) They only do it conditionally, if it were ſo: But they enjoy'd their Privilege by virtue of it; which ſhews it could not be diſproved. (4.) The Cyprian Privilege was granted in Zeno's Time, upon finding the Body of St. Barnabas. But it is evident they enjoy'd it before; by the Decree of the Council of Epheſus. And it was not properly a Privilege; For that implies a particular exemption; But it was a Confirmation of their juſt Rights: and not onely as to them, but as to all provincial Churches. So that this Decree is the Magna Charta of Metropolitane Churches, againſt any Incroachments upon their Liberties: And ſo the Council thought it, when it appoints all Metropolitanes to take Copies of it, and voids all Acts that ſhould be made againſt it.

It is neceſſary now to enquire, whether the Biſhop of Rome had a patriarchal Power over the Britiſh Churches, before the Council of Nice: And the onely way to doe that, is to examine the ſeveral patriarchal

Rights which were allowed in the Church. And if the Marks of none of them do appear; We have reaſon to conclude, he had no patriarchal Power. For however ſome urge the Converſion of Britain by Eleutherius as a Pretence to the Biſhop of Rome's Authority, yet, allowing it to be true, no man of underſtanding can pretend to derive a patriarchal Power from thence, unleſs there were a concurrence of Juriſdiction from that time. Neither were it of force, if Saint Peter himſelf had preached the Goſpel here; and ſettled the Biſhops of theſe Churches. For, by the ſame reaſon, there could have been no Patriarchates at Antioch or Alexandria, (where he is ſuppoſed to have placed Saint Mark) but if notwithſtanding, the Biſhops of thoſe Churches had a true patriarchal Power; Then ſo might the Metropolitanes of the Britiſh Churches have their proper Rights. Although St. Peter himſelf had founded theſe Churches. (o) Morinus ſaith, The patriarchal Power conſiſted in theſe four things. (1.) In the Conſecration of Metropolitanes, and the Confirmation of other Biſhops. (2.) In calling Councils out of the ſeveral Provinces under his Juriſdiction. (3.) In receiving Appeals from provincial Synods. (4.) In the Delegation of perſons with authority from him to act in the ſeveral Provinces. The firſt is that upon which the reſt are founded: As we ſee in the caſe of the Biſhop of Antioch and the Biſhops of Cyprus; For if he could have carried the Point of Conſecration of the Biſhop of Conſtance, he knew all the reſt would follow. In the Patriarchate of Alexandria it appears by the Epiſtles of (p) Syneſius, That the Biſhops of Pentapolis, although then under a Metropolitane of their own, yet had their Conſecration from the Biſhop of Alexandria. When Juſtinian advanced the Biſhop of Juſtiniana prima to the dignity of a Patriarch, by giving him power over ſeven Provinces, he (q) expreſſes the patriarchal Power by this; That all the Biſhops of thoſe Provinces ſhould be conſecrated by him, and conſequently be under his Juriſdiction, and be liable to be called to his Council, as Juſtinian elſe-where determines: And when the (r) Biſhop of Juſtinianopolis removed from Cyprus thither, he not onely enjoy'd the Cyprian privilege there, but was allow'd for a Patriarch by the Council in Trullo, and conſequently, the Conſecration of the Biſhops in the Province of Helleſpont belong'd to him.

And when the patriarchal Power was ſettled at Conſtantinople, that was the chief thing inſiſted upon, at leaſt as to Metropolitanes. The firſt attempt the Biſhop of Conſtantinople made towards any true patriarchal Power (for all that the (s) Council of Conſtantinople gave him was a mere honorary Title) was the conſecrating Biſhops in the Dioceſes of Aſiana, and Pontica, and Thracia: And this was charged on St. Chryſoſtome as an Innovation in the Synod (t) ad Quercum, i. e. in the Suburbs of Chalcedon. And his (u) actings in the Council at Epheſus, and Conſecrating of many Biſhops in that Dioceſe, could not be juſtified by the Canons of the Church: The beſt excuſe is what (w) Palladius makes, viz. That his going into Aſia, was upon the great importunity of the Biſhops and Clergy there: For what (x) Morinus ſaith, That he did this by the Pope's Authority, is ridiculous; It being not once thought of by St. Chryſoſtome or his Friends. And for a Biſhop of Conſtantinople to act by Authority from the Biſhop of Rome, was then as abſurd, as for the Czar of Muſcovy to act by Commiſſion from the Emperour of Germany. For it is plain, That one ſtood upon equal Privileges with the other; As fully appears by the Council of Chalcedon, and the warm Debates which follow'd it, between the two Sees. And what could have ſerv'd Leo's turn better againſt Anatolius, than to have produced St. Chryſoſtome's Delegation from one of his Predeceſſours? But in the Council of Chalcedon, where the Right of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople was at large debated, this Act of St. Chryſoſtome was alledged as a remarkable Precedent to prove a patriarchal Power: And there (y) a Canon was paſſed, That the Metropolitanes of thoſe three Dioceſes ſhould be conſecrated by the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, which was the eſtabliſhment of his patriarchal Authority over them. Upon this Pope Leo inſiſted on the Council of Nice and the Canons there made, and pleaded ſtrongly, That this was an unjuſt Invaſion of the Rights of thoſe Churches which ought to be inviolably preſerved. And we deſire no better Arguments againſt the Pope's pretended patriarchal Power over theſe Weſtern Churches, than what Leo inſiſted on for the Dioceſes of Aſia, Pontus and Thrace, againſt the patriarchal Power of the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. For we plead the very ſame things; That all Churches ought to enjoy the Rights of provincial Synods: And that no Perſon can be excuſed in violating the Nicene Canons. But if it be pretended, That the Biſhop of Rome had always a patriarchal Power over the Britiſh Churches; Let any one Inſtance be given of it: Let them tell us when he conſecrated the Metropolitanes or Biſhops of the three Provinces of Britain; or ſummon'd them to his Councils; or heard their Cauſes; or received Appeals from hence; or ſo much as ſent any one Legate to exerciſe Authority in his Name; And if they can produce nothing of this kind, there is not then the leaſt appearance of his patriarchal Power.

We do not deny that the Biſhop of Rome had any patriarchal Power in thoſe times; But we ſay, It was confined within the Roman Dioceſe; As that did comprehend the Churches within the Suburbicary Provinces; And within theſe he exerciſed the ſame Authority that the Eaſtern Patriarchs did, i. e. He conſecrated Biſhops, called Synods and received Appeals, which are the main patriarchal Rights. But if we go beyond theſe Provinces, (z) Petrus de Marca himſelf is extremely put to it to prove the Exerciſe of a patriarchal Power; He confeſſes the matter is not clear either as to Conſecrations or Councils, but he runs to References, Conſultations and Appeals in greater cauſes; And yet he (a) confeſſes, as to Appeals (which onely do imply a juſt Authority) There is no one certain evidence of them before the Council of Sardica. So that by the confeſſion of the moſt learned and judicious of thoſe who plead for the Pope's being Patriarch of the Weſt, No proper Acts of patriarchal Power can be proved beyond the Roman Dioceſe, before the Council of Nice. And the ſame (b) learned Archbiſhop doth grant, that the Biſhop of Rome did not conſecrate even in Italy out of the Roman Dioceſe, as appears by the Biſhops of Milan and Aquileia; Nor in Africa, nor in Spain, nor in Gaul. And, after theſe Conceſſions, it is impoſſible to prove the Biſhop of Rome Patriarch of the Weſtern Churches. Which ſome late Writers of that Church have been much concerned at, and have endeavour'd to ſhew the contrary. (c) Chriſtianus Lupus hath written a Diſſertation on purpoſe; But the greateſt thing he ſaith to prove it is, That to affirm, that the Biſhop of Rome had no ſuch Authority, is an Euſebian and Schiſmatical Errour, and came firſt from the Council of Philippopolis; yet he grants, That in the Weſtern p. 790. Provinces, the Metropolitanes did conſecrate their Suffragans, and they their Metropolitanes. But all this, he ſaith, was done by ſpecial privilege. But where is any ſuch privilege to be ſeen? It is evident by the Nicene Canons, every Province had its own juſt Rights for theſe things. And if there were any privilege, it muſt be produced on the other ſide. He doth not deny, That (d) Leo diſown'd having any thing to doe in the Conſecration of the Gallican Biſhops, in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Vienna, or that (e) Hincmarus ſaith, The Tranſalpine Biſhops did not belong to the Conſecration or Councils of the Biſhop of Rome. And therefore Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes were to be heard and determin'd by provincial Synods: But he thinks to bring off all at laſt, by ſaying, (f) That theſe were privileges indulged, becauſe of diſtance from Rome. Which is a mere Shuffle, without any colour for it, unleſs ſuch privileges could be produced, for otherwiſe it will appear to be common Right. And yet this is the main, which a late Authour, (g) Emanuel à Schelſtraet hath to ſay about this matter. But this hath been the common Artifice of Rome; Where any Biſhops inſiſted on their own Rights and ancient Cuſtoms, and Canons of Councils, to pretend that all came from privileges allow'd by the See of Rome; And the Defenders of it are now ſhamefully driven to theſe Arts, having nothing elſe left to plead for the Pope's Uſurpation. But this laſt (h) Author (the preſent Keeper of the Vatican Library, which makes ſo great a noiſe in the World for Church Records) having endeavour'd, in a ſet Diſcourſe, to aſſert the Pope's patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches, I ſhall here examine the ſtrength of all that he produceth to that purpoſe. He agrees with us in determining the patriarchal Rights, which he ſaith lie in theſe three things: (1.) In the Right of Conſecration of Biſhops and Metropolitanes. (2.) In the Right of ſummoning them to Councils. (3.) In the Right of Appeals. All which he proves to be the juſt and true patriarchal Rights from the ſeventeenth Canon of the eighth General Council. And by theſe we are contented to ſtand or fall.

(1.) As to the Right of Conſecration of Biſhops and Metropolitanes throughout the Weſtern Churches. He confeſſes, That ſuch a Right was not exerciſed, Becauſe the Metropolitanes in the ſeveral Provinces were allow'd to conſecrate the Biſhops belonging to them, upon the Summons of the provincial Synod; And for this he produces the fourth Canon of the Council of Nice. Here then is a plain allowance of the Metropolitane Rights by this General Council; But how doth this prove the Patriarchal? Or rather, is it not a plain derogation from them? No, ſaith he, The patriarchal Rights are preſerved by the ſixth Canon. I grant it; But then it muſt be proved, That the patriarchal Rights of the Biſhop of Rome, did at the time of the Council of Nice extend to all the Weſtern Churches, which I utterly deny. Yet I grant farther, That the Biſhop of Rome had all the patriarchal Rights, within the Provinces, which were then under his Juriſdiction, and were therefore called the Suburbicary Churches. But theſe were ſo far from taking in all the Weſtern Churches, that they did not comprehend the Provinces of Italy properly ſo called: But he offers to prove out of Gratian, and from the Teſtimony of Pelagius, Biſhop of Rome, That by reaſon of the length of the way, the Biſhops of Milan and Aquileia did conſecrate each other. But is ſuch Authority ſufficient to prove that the Biſhops of Milan and Aquileia were of old ſubject to the Roman Patriarchate? We have nothing to prove this, but the bare word of one who was too much concerned cerned to be a competent Witneſs; and too much alone to be a ſufficient Witneſs in this matter. The length and difficulty of the way was no hindrance afterwards for obtaining the Pope's conſent for the Conſecration of the Biſhop of Milan, as appears by the Inſtance of Gregory produced by him; Why then ſhould that be alledged as the Reaſon before? For the Ways were not one jot ſhorter or eaſier to paſs. But if we compare the Election and Conſecration of St. Ambroſe at Milan, with that of Deusdedit in St. Gregory's Time; We ſhall ſee an apparent difference in the Circumſtances of them. For at the firſt there was a provincial Synod by the Emperour's appointment, as (i) Theodoret relates it, who referr'd the choice to the Emperour; But he declining it, and the City falling into great heats about it, St. Ambroſe was of a ſudden choſen, being then Governour of the Province, and ſo was Inthronized, by the Biſhops there preſent. Not one word here of the conſent of the Biſhop of Rome required, or ſo much as mention'd; And yet Pope Damaſus was as ready to aſſert any thing that looked like a Right of his See, as Pelagius or Gregory. But at that time St. Ambroſe, at Milan, had as great Authority as Damaſus at Rome; And the Italick Dioceſe was as conſiderable as the Roman. If the length and difficulty of the Way were the true Reaſon why St. Ambroſe did not go to Rome; yet why no Meſſenger ſent? Why no Agent from the Pope to declare his conſent? But then the Extent of the Roman Dioceſe was better underſtood, wherein all the Biſhops were to receive Conſecration from the Biſhop of Rome, having no Metropolitane of their own; But this did not reach ſo far as Milan. This Roman Dioceſe was truly patriarchal, having ſeveral Provinces under it, and was therein peculiar and made a Precedent for the Biſhop of Alexandria, all the other Weſtern Churches being then govern'd by their ſeveral Biſhops and Metropolitanes. (k) Jac. Leſchaſſier thinks that five of the eleven Provinces of Italy made up this Dioceſe; I mean the Provinces of Auguſtus, and not of Conſtantine; And within theſe were about ſeventy Biſhops who belonged to the Conſecration of the Biſhop of Rome, having no other Metropolitane; And with this, as he obſerves, the old Notitia of the Vatican, produced by (l) Baronius, agrees; wherein the Suffragans of the Biſhop of Rome are ſaid to be the Biſhops of Campania, the Marſi, Tuſcia, Umbria and Marchia: Which Notitia is the ſame with the Provinciale Romanum, publiſhed by (m) Miræus, and compared by him with four MSS. wherein are ſet down all the Biſhops of the Roman Province, as it is there called. (n) Ferd. Ughellus reckons up ſeventy Biſhops of thoſe who were immediately under the Biſhop of Rome's Juriſdiction, and had no Metropolitane over them; Theſe were within the Provinces of Latium, Valeria, Tuſcia, Picenum and Umbria; which neither anſwering exactly to the Juriſdiction of the Roman Prefect, nor to that of the Vicarius Urbis; We are not to judge of the Extent of this Dioceſe from that of the Civil Government, but from ancient Cuſtom, to which the Council of Nice doth expreſly attribute it. In the Diurnus Romanus, lately publiſhed by (o) Garnerius out of an ancient Manuſcript, there is one Title, De Ordinatione Epiſcopi Suburbicarii à Romano Pontifice, where the whole Proceſs, as to the Conſecration of a new Biſhop, is ſet down, but from thence it appears, that none but the Suburbicary Biſhops belonged to his Conſecration. We freely grant then, That the Biſhop of Rome had a patriarchal Power over ſeveral Provinces: as the Biſhop of Alexandria was allowed to have by the Council of Nice in imitation of him; And that within this Dioceſe he did exerciſe this as a patriarchal Right to conſecrate Biſhops within thoſe ſeveral Provinces, as the Biſhop of Alexandria did: But we deny that ever the Biſhop of Rome did exerciſe this part of his Patriarchal power beyond the foremention'd Provinces.

But to prove the larger Extent of the Pope's Power as to Conſecrations the Epiſtle of Siricius to Anyſius Biſhop of Theſſalonica (p) is urged, whom the Pope makes his Legate in the Part of Illyricum, and charges him, that no Conſecrations ſhould be allowed which were made without his conſent: And the ſame appears by the Epiſtles of Boniface to the Biſhops of Theſſaly and Illyricum, and of Leo to Anaſtaſius. All which are publiſhed together by Holſtenius out of the Barberine Library; or rather out of his Tranſcripts by Card. Barberine (but (q) Hieron. Alexander cites a Paſſage out of the ſame Collection as in the Vatican Library) but from whenceſoever it came, the Objection ſeems to be the more conſiderable, becauſe, as (r) Holſtenius in his Notes obſerves, (s) Blondel had denied that it could be proved by any Monument of Antiquity, That the Biſhop of Theſſalonica was Legate to the Pope before the time of Leo.

But, to give a clear account of this matter, Leo himſelf, in his Epiſtle to Anaſtaſius, derives this Authority no higher than from Siricius, who gave it to Anyſius Biſhop of Theſſalonica, certa tum primum ratione commiſit, ut per illam Provinciam poſitis, quas ad diſciplinam teneri voluit, Eccleſiis ſubveniret. Siricius immediately ſucceeded Damaſus, who died according to (t) Holſtenius, 11 Dec. 384. Three years after the Council of Conſtantinople had advanced that See to the Patriarchal dignity; which gave great occaſion of Jealouſie and Suſpicion to the Biſhops of Rome, that being the Imperial City as well as Rome; And (u) Socrates obſerves, That from that time Nectarius the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, had the Goverment of Conſtantinople and Thrace, as falling to his ſhare. This made the Biſhops of Rome think it high time to look about them, and to inlarge their Juriſdiction, ſince the Biſhop of New Rome had gained ſo large an acceſſion by that Council; And to prevent his farther incroachments Weſtwards, his Dioceſe of Thrace bordering upon Macedonia, the ſubtileſt Device they could think of, to ſecure that Province and to inlarge their own Authority, was, to perſwade the Biſhop of Theſſalonica to act as by Commiſſion from the Biſhop of Rome: So that he ſhould enjoy the ſame Privileges which he had before. And being back'd by ſo great an Intereſt, he would be better able to conteſt with ſo powerfull a Neighbour as the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. And if any objected, That this was to break the Rules ſettled by the Council of Nice; They had that anſwer ready; That the Biſhop of Conſtantinople began: and their Concernment was, to ſecure the Rights of other Churches from being invaded by him; By which means they endeavour'd to draw thoſe Churches bordering on the Thracian Dioceſe, firſt to own a Submiſſion to the Biſhop of Rome as their Patriarch; which yet was ſo far from giving them eaſe, which ſome it may be expected by it, that it only involved them in continual Troubles, as appears by that very Collection of Holſtenius. For the Biſhops of Conſtantinople were not negligent in promoting their own Authority in the Provinces of Illyricum, nor in withſtanding the Innovations of the Biſhop of Rome. To which purpoſe they obtained an Imperial Edict to this day extant in both (w) Codes, which ſtrictly forbids any Innovation in the Provinces of Illyricum, cum, and declares, That if any doubtful Caſe happen'd, according to the ancient Cuſtom and Canons, it was to be left to the provincial Synod, but not without the advice of the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. The occaſion whereof was this, Perigenes being rejected at Patræ, the Biſhop of Rome takes upon him to put him into Corinth, without the conſent of the provincial Synod: This the Biſhops of Theſſaly, among whom the chief were, Pauſianus, Cyriacus and Calliopus, look upon as a notorious Invaſion of their Rights; and therefore in a provincial Synod they appoint another Perſon to ſucceed there. Which Proceeding of theirs is heinouſly taken at Rome, as appears by (x) Boniface's Epiſtles about it, both to Rufus of Theſſalonica, whom he had made his Legate, and to the Biſhops of Theſſaly, and the other Provinces. But they make Application to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, who procures this Law, in favour of the ancient provincial Synods, and for reſtraint of the Pope's Incroachments, but withall, ſo as to reſerve the laſt reſort to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. At this Boniface ſhews himſelf extremely nettled, as appears by his next Epiſtle to Rufus, and incourages him, to ſtand it out to the utmoſt; And gives him Authority to excommunicate thoſe Biſhops, and to depoſe Maximus, whom they conſecrated according to the ancient Canons. But all the Art of his management of this Cauſe lay, in throwing the Odium of it upon the Ambition of the Biſhop of Conſtantinople; And thus the Contention between the Biſhops of the two Imperial Cities proved the deſtruction of the Ancient Polity of the Church, as it was ſettled by the Council of Nice.

It is ſaid by (y) Petrus de Marca and Holſtenius, that all this attempt of Theodoſius was to no purpoſe; Becauſe afterwards the Biſhops of Macedonia ſubmitted to the Pope's Power; And that Reſcript was revoked by another of Theodoſius publiſhed in the Roman Collection. It cannot be denied, That for ſome time the Biſhop of Rome prevailed, but it appears, that it was not long, by the ſad Complaint made to Boniface II. of the Prevalency of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople in thoſe parts made by Stephen, Biſhop of Lariſſa, the Metropolis of Theſſaly, and his Brethren Theodoſius, Elpidius and Timotheus: And our (z) Author himſelf confeſſes, that it appears by the Notitiæ, That theſe Provinces were at laſt wholly taken away from the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Rome, and made ſubject to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople.

From which account of the matter of Fact we have theſe things very obſervable. (1.) That there was no Precedent could be produced as to the Pope's interpoſing in their Conſecrations before the time of Siricius. It is true, Damaſus his Epiſtle to Acholius is mention'd ſometimes by the following Popes; But any one that reads both his Epiſtles in the (a) Roman Collection will find, that neither of them do relate to this matter: And the former is not only directed to Acholius, but to ſeveral other Biſhops; And the Deſign of it is, To adviſe them to take care, that a worthy perſon be put into the See of Conſtantinople in the approaching Council; And to the ſame purpoſe is the following Epiſtle to Acholius. But what is this to the Pope's Power about Conſecrations in the Provinces of Illyricum? And how was Acholius more concern'd than Euridicus, Severus, Uranus, and the reſt of the Biſhops? (2.) That the Biſhop of Rome's interpoſing in their Conſecrations was diſliked and oppoſed as an Innovation by the Biſhops of thoſe Provinces. Which appears by the Epiſtles of Pope Boniface about the Caſe of Perigenes: For by the Canons of the Church, the Conſecration and Deſignation of the Biſhops of the Province was left to the provincial Synods: And therefore they did not underſtand on what account the Biſhop of Rome ſhould interpoſe therein. (3.) That the Law of Theodoſius was principally deſigned to reſtore the Canonical Diſcipline and the Authority of provincial Synods. For the words are, Omni innovatione ceſſante, vetuſtatem & Canones priſtinos Eccleſiaſticos, qui nunc uſque tenuerunt, per omnes Illyrici Provincias ſervari præcipimus. Which cannot be well underſtood of any other Canons than ſuch as relate to the Eccleſiaſtical Government of Provinces, and not of any peculiar Cuſtoms there, as Gothofred miſtakes the meaning of them: And in caſe any difference did ariſe, it was to be left Conventui ſacerdotali ſanctóque Judicio, i. e. To the provincial Synod, and not to any Legate of the Biſhop of Rome; Whoſe incroachment was that Innovation which was to be laid aſide: as is now plain by the Roman Collection, without which this Law was not rightly underſtood, as appears by the ſeveral attempts of Baronius, Peron and Gothofred. (4.) That although by the means of Honorius, upon the importunity of the Biſhop of Rome this Reſcript was recalled by (b) Theodoſius: Yet the former only was enter'd into the Codes both of Theodoſius and Juſtinian; which hath all the formality of a Law, being directed to the P. P. of Illyricum, and hath the date by Conſuls annexed; but the Revocation is only a Reſcript from Theodoſius to Honorius, and refers to an Edict ſent to the P. P. of Illyricum; which not appearing, the other being enter'd into the Code, gives great ground to believe that this Revocation was voided, and the former ſtood as the Law; Which ought rather to be preſumed to be the Act of Juſtinian himſelf, the Privileges of Conſtantinople being concerned herein, than merely the Pique of Trebonian and the Collectors of the Laws againſt the Roman See, as (c) Holſtenius ſuggeſts. So that from this whole matter it appears what Oppoſition the Pope's interpoſing in foreign Conſecrations met with, not only from the Biſhops of thoſe Provinces, but from the Imperial Laws.

But let us now ſee what Patriarchal Authority, as to Conſecrations, the Biſhops of Rome exerciſed in theſe more Weſtern Churches. As to Gaul, our (d) Author confeſſeth, That the Biſhops of Rome did not challenge the practice of Conſecrations to themſelves, as appears by the Words of Leo to the Biſhops of the Province of Vienne, which he produces. Non Nobis Ordinationes veſtrarum Provinciarum defendimus: (for ſo he underſtands theſe Words of Conſecrations, although they are capable of another meaning, viz. That he did not take upon him to manage the Affairs of the Gallican Churches, but only took care that they ſhould do it themſelves according to the Canons, which was Leo's Pretence in that (e) Epiſtle) but then he diſtinguiſheth between the Right it ſelf, and the Exerciſe of it, which may be parted with by particular privileges granted, but the Right it ſelf may be ſtill reſerved; And the ſame he after ſaith in general of the (f) Weſtern Provinces, wherein he can trace no Footſteps of the practice, and therefore concludes, it muſt be from privileges granted by the Biſhops of Rome by reaſon of diſtance, which the Patriarch of Alexandria would not grant. But we are now proving the Right by the Practice, and therefore it is unreaſonable to alledge a Right without it; For this way of proving is ridiculous; viz. to prove that the Pope had patriarchal Rights, becauſe he did exerciſe them; And then to ſay, Though he did not exerciſe them, yet he had them; And ſo to prove that he had them, becauſe we was Patriarch arch of the Weſt. Yet this is in truth the way of proof this late Author uſeth; He ſheweth from Lupus, That all Conſecrations of Metropolitane and provincial Biſhops belong to the Patriarch: Then to prove a patriarchal Power, it is neceſſary to prove, that all the Conſecrations within the Provinces do belong to that See. But how doth this appear as to the Weſtern Provinces? Did all the Conſecrations of Biſhops within them belong to the Biſhops of Rome? If not, then they were not within the Roman Patriarchate: If they did, we expect the proof of it by the practice. No, he confeſſeth, the practice was different; But ſtill they had the patriarchal Right. How ſo? Yes, ſaith he, That is plain, becauſe the Biſhop of Rome was Patriarch of the Weſt. This way of proving may be good againſt De Marca, who had granted the Pope to be the Weſtern Patriarch; but it is ridiculous to thoſe that deny it.

But he attempts ſomething farther, viz. (g) That the Biſhop of Rome had, before the Council of Nice, the power of depoſing Biſhops in Gaul, as appears by Martianus of Arles depoſed by Stephanus. This (h) Martianus had openly declared himſelf of the Novatian Party; at which Fauſtinus, Biſhop of Lyons, and other Biſhops in Gaul were very much troubled, and expreſſed their Reſentments of it, but he ſlighted their Cenſures of him: Both parties made Applications to St. Cyprian, and Martianus deſired to preſerve Communion with him; But he was utterly rejected there for joining in the Novatian Schiſm. But it ſeems, by St. Cyprian's Epiſtle, he had ſtill hopes not to be condemned at Rome, altho' the Schiſm began there. For, ſaith he, How ill would it look, after Novatian himſelf had been ſo lately and univerſally rejected, to ſuffer our ſelves to be deceived by his Flatterers? St. Cyprian and his Collegues were in no danger, for they had already detected and condemned him, therefore this muſt be underſtood of Stephen, which is the Reaſon he preſſes him ſo hard, and with ſome Authority to diſpatch his Letters to the People of Arles to chuſe another Biſhop in the place of Martianus, Dirigantur in Provinciam & ad Plebem Arelatæ conſiſtentem à te Literæ, &c. And a little before he tells him, He ought to ſend his mind at large to their Brethren the Biſhops of Gaul, That they ought not ſuffer him to inſult over their Fraternity, &c. And the Reaſon he gives for this Freedom which he uſeth with him is, Becauſe they held the Balance of the Government of the Church in common among them; And, being ſeveral Paſtours, they took care of the ſame Flock, who ought all to join in condemning ſuch a Follower of Novatian, and thereby preſerve the Reputation of their Predeceſſors, Cornelius and Lucius, who were glorious Martyrs: and he eſpecially who ſucceeded them. And ſo, not doubting his compliance, in a friendly manner he deſires him, to let him know who ſucceeded Martianus at Arles, that he might know to whom to write. I appeal to any Man of common Senſe, whether this looks like the Application made to the Weſtern Patriarch, to whom St. Cyprian himſelf owed ſubjection as ſuch. For when the Biſhops of Rome began to challenge a patriarchal Power over the Churches of Theſſaly, they expected Application to be made to them in a Style ſuitable to that Dignity, as is very remarkable in the (i) Roman Collection; As in the Petition of Stephanus, Biſhop of Lariſſa, the Metropolis of Theſſaly, Domino meo ſancto ac beatiſſimo & revera venerando Patri Patrum, & Archiepiſcopo atque Patriarchæ Bonifacio data ſupplicatio à Stephano exiguo: And in the very ſame Style Elpidius, Stephanus and Timotheus. Theſe write like men that knew their diſtance, and what Authority the Biſhop of Rome then challenged; But the meek and humble St. Cyprian ſeems to ſtand upon equal Terms with the Biſhop of Rome, or rather, as if he were upon the higher Ground, he takes upon him to tell him his duty, and rather checks him for his neglect in it, than owns any Authority in him ſuperiour to his. So that if any patriarchal Power be to be inferr'd from this Epiſtle, it would be much rather, that St. Cyprian was Patriarch of the Weſt, than the Biſhop of Rome; ſince he is rather ſuperiour, who directs what another ſhould do, than he who doeth what is directed; And if from hence it follows, That the execution of the Canons was in the Biſhop of Rome, it will likewiſe follow, that the directing that execution was in the Biſhop of Carthage.

But we are told, (k) that, even in Africa, no Conſecrations were allow'd, without the conſent of the Biſhop of Rome: This is great News indeed, of which the African Code gives us no information: But (l) Holſtenius finds it in an Epiſtle of Siricius or of Innocentius, (which he pleaſes, for the ſame Rules are in both) only in the Canon Law it is taken from Innocentius, and the true Senſe is given of it, Extra conſcientiam Metropolitani Epiſcopi, nullus audeat ordinare Epiſcopum: But what is this to the Roman Patriarchate? And our Author doth not ſeem to rely upon it; But he alledges a Paſſage in Optatus, that Eunomius and Olympius, two Biſhops, were ſent to Carthage to conſecrate a Biſhop in the place both of Cecilian and Donatus: And Albaſpinæus ſaith, they were ſent by the Pope's Authority. But this Obſervation of his he hath not from (m) Optatus, by whom it rather appears, that they were ſent by the Emperour, who ſtopt Cecilian at Brixia. And no one that reads the Paſſages about Milthiades at that time, and how Conſtantine joined Marinus, Maternus and Rheticius in Commiſſion with him, can ever imagine, that the Biſhop of Rome was then eſteemed the Patriarch of the Weſt; and, as ſuch, to have had Juriſdiction over the Biſhops of Africa.

The laſt (n) Attempt to prove the Pope's patriarchal Power, as to Conſecration in the Weſtern Churches, is from his Authority of giving Palls to the Metropolitanes. Which he proves from Gregory's Epiſtles, as to the Biſhops of Arles and London; And from an Epiſtle of Boniface, Biſhop of Mentz, wherein, he ſaith, it was agreed in France, That the Metropolitanes ſhould receive Palls from the Roman See. But how far are we now gone from the Council of Nice and the Rules of Church-polity then eſtabliſhed? We do not deny, that the Biſhops of Rome did aſſume to themſelves in following Ages a more than patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches: But we ſay there are no footſteps of it in the Time of the Council of Nice; And that what Power they gained, was by Uſurpation upon the Rights of Metropolitanes and provincial Synods then ſettled by general conſent of the Biſhops of the Chriſtian Church. But this Uſurpation was not made in an Inſtant, but by ſeveral Steps and Degrees, by great Artifice and Subtilty, drawing the Metropolitanes themſelves, under a Pretence of advancing their Authority, to betray their Rights. And among the Artifices of the Court of Rome this of the Pall was none of the leaſt; For by it the Popes pretended to confirm and inlarge the privileges of Metropolitanes, which hereby they did effectually overthrow, as though they received them merely from the Favour of the Biſhop of Rome, which did undoubtedly belong to them by ancient Right. But that this was a mere Device to bring the Metropolitanes into dependence on the Court of Rome, appears by the moſt ancient Form of ſending the Pall in the (o) Diurnus Romanus, where it is finely called, the ſhewing their unanimity with St. Peter. But what the Nature and Deſign, and Antiquity of the Pall was, is ſo fully ſet forth by (p) Petrus de Marca, and (q) Garnerius, that I ſhall ſay no more of it: Only that from hence the ancient Rights of the Metropolitane Churches do more fully appear, becauſe it was ſo long before this Badge of Subjection was received in theſe Weſtern Churches; For the Synod which Boniface mentions, wherein the Metropolitanes conſented to receive Palls from Rome, was not till the middle of the 8th. Century: And great Arts and Endeavours were uſed in all the Weſtern Churches, before they could be brought to yield to this real Badge of the Pope's patriarchal Power over them. Which is particularly true of the Britiſh Churches which preſerved their Metropolitane Rights, as long as their Churches were in any tolerable condition; And that without ſuffering any diminution of them from the Pope's patriarchal Power: As will farther appear in this Diſcourſe.

(2.) The next patriarchal Right to be examined, is that of calling Biſhops within their Juriſdiction to Councils. It is truly obſerved by (r) de Marca, That thoſe who received Conſecration from another, were bound by the ancient Diſcipline of the Church to attend to his Councils; And in the Senſe of the old Canon Law, (s) thoſe two Expreſſions, To belong to the Conſecration, or to the Council, were all one. And ſo every Metropolitane had a Right to ſummon the Biſhops of his Province, and the Primates or Patriarchs, as many as received Conſecrations from them. Thus the Biſhop of Rome's patriarchal Council conſiſted of thoſe within his own Dioceſe or the Suburbicary Churches. Where there being no Metropolitanes, the Roman Council did much exceed others in the number of Biſhops belonging to it: Thence Galla Placidia relates, how ſhe found the Biſhop of Rome compaſſed about with a great number of Biſhops which he had gather'd out of innumerable Cities of Italy, by reaſon of the Dignity of his Place. Its ſeems then no Biſhops of other Weſtern Churches were ſummon'd to the Roman Councils. But the Biſhops of Sicily were then under the Italian Government, and reckon'd with the Italian Biſhops. It may be queſtion'd, whether in Ruffinus his Time they were comprehended within the Suburbicary Churches. But in Leo's Time the Biſhops of Rome had inlarged their Juriſdiction ſo far, as to ſummon the Biſhops of Sicily to their Councils. This is evident from Leo's Epiſtle to all the Biſhops of Sicily, where he charges them every year to ſend three of their Number to a Council in Rome; And this he requires in purſuance of the Nicene Canons; From whence it ſeems probable, That the Biſhop of Rome did by degrees gain all the Churches within the Juriſdiction of the Vicarius Urbis as his patriarchal Dioceſe. For Sicily was one of the ten Provinces belonging thereto. But our (t) Author ſaith, That the Council of Nice ſpeaks there only of provincial Councils, and not of patriarchal. What then? Was Sicily within the Roman Province, conſidering the Biſhop of Rome merely as a Metropolitane? That is very abſurd, ſince Sicily was a Province of it ſelf, and as ſuch, ought to have had a Metropolitane of its own: And ſo all the other neighbour Provinces to Rome; whereas we read of none there; but as far as the Biſhop of Rome's Juriſdiction extended, it was immediate, and ſwallow'd up all Metropolitane Rights. I know (u) Petrus de Marca thinks there were Metropolitanes

within the Suburbicary Churches; But I ſee no Authority he brings for it beſides the Nicene Canon and the Decrees of Innocentius and Leo which relate to other Churches. But any one that carefully reads the Epiſtles of Leo to the Biſhops within thoſe Provinces, and compares them with thoſe written to the Biſhops without them, will, as (w) Queſnel hath well obſerved, find ſo different a ſtrain in them, that from thence he may juſtly infer, that there were no Metropolitanes in the former, but there were in the latter. When he (x) writes to the Biſhop of Aquileia he takes notice of his provincial Synod, and directs the Epiſtles of general concernment to the Metropolitane; as he doth not only to him, but to (y) the Biſhop of Ravenna too. And when (z) Euſebius, Biſhop of Milan, wrote to him, he gives an account of the provincial Council which he held. But there is nothing like this, in the Epiſtles ſent to the Biſhops within the ten Provinces, no mention is therein made of Metropolitanes, or of any provincial Synods. But here we find the Biſhops of Sicily in common ſummon'd to ſend three of their number to an annual Council at Rome. From whence I conclude, That the Pope's patriarchal Council lay within the compaſs of theſe Suburbicary Churches. I do not deny but upon occaſion there might be more Biſhops ſummon'd to meet at a Council in Rome; As when (a) Aurelian gave the Biſhops of Italy leave to meet at Rome in the Caſe of Paulus Samoſatenus. And when they met with Julius, in the Caſe of Athanaſius, and ſuch like Inſtances of an extraordinary Nature and very different from the fixed canonical Councils; which were provincial elſe-where, but in the Roman Dioceſe they were patriarchal; yet they extended no farther than to the Biſhops within the Suburbicary Churches. And whoſoever conſiders the Councils of Italy in St. Ambroſe's Time, publiſhed by (b) Sirmondus, will find that the Biſhops of the Italick Dioceſe did not think themſelves obliged to reſort to Rome for a patriarchal Council. And, which is more obſervable, the latter of them extremely differs from Damaſus about the ſame matter; which was the Conſecration of Maximus to be Biſhop of Conſtantinople. For (c) Damaſus, in his Epiſtle to Acholius, &c. bitterly exclaims againſt the ſetting up Maximus, as though all Religion lay at ſtake, and admoniſhed them at the next Council at Conſtantinople to take care that a fitter Perſon be choſen in his room: And the ſame he re-inforces in another Epiſtle to Acholius alone. But (d) St. Ambroſe, and the Biſhops of Italy with him, in a Conciliar Addreſs to Theodoſius, juſtifie the Conſecration of Maximus, and diſlike that of Gregory and Nectarius. Now in this Caſe I deſire to know, whether this Council own'd the Biſhop of Rome's patriarchal Power? For (e) Em. à Schelſtraet following Chriſtianus Lupus, ſaith, That in the Pope's patriarchal Power is implied, that the Biſhops are only to conſult and adviſe, but the determination doth wholly belong to the Pope as Patriarch; And that the Biſhop of Alexandria had the ſame power appears by the Biſhops of Egypt declaring they could not do any thing without the Biſhop of Alexandria. Let us then grant, That the Biſhop of Rome had the ſame Authority within his patriarchal Dioceſe, doth not this unavoidably exclude the Biſhops of the Italick Dioceſe from being under his Patriarchate? For if they had been under it, would they have, not barely met, and conſulted, and ſent to the Emperour without him, but in flat oppoſition to him? And when afterwards the Weſtern Biſhops met in Council at Capua, in order to the compoſing the Differences in the Church of Antioch, altho' it it were within the Roman Patriarchate, yet it being a Council of Biſhops aſſembled out of the Italick Dioceſe as well as the Roman, the Biſhop of Rome did not preſide therein, but St. Ambroſe; as appears by (f) St. Ambroſe his Epiſtle to Theophilus, about the proceedings of this Council; For he ſaith, He hopes what Theophilus and the Biſhops of Egypt ſhould determine in that Cauſe about Flavianus, would not be diſpleaſing to their Holy Brother, the Biſhop of Rome. And there follows another (g) Epiſtle in St. Ambroſe which overthrows the Pope's patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches by the confeſſion of the Pope himſelf. For that which had paſſed under the name of St. Ambroſe is now found by (h) Holſtenius to be written by Siricius, and is ſo publiſhed in the Roman Collection, and ſince in the (i) Collection of Councils at Paris. This Epiſtle was written by Siricius to Anyſius and other Biſhops of Illyricum, concerning the Caſe of Bonoſus, which had been referr'd to them by the Council of Capua, as being the neighbour Biſhops, and therefore, according to the Rules of the Church, fitteſt to give Judgement in it. But they, either out of a complement or in earneſt, deſired to know the Pope's opinion about it. So his Epiſtle begins, Accepi literas veſtras de Bonoſo Epiſcopo, quibus, vel pro veritate, vel pro modeſtia, noſtram ſententiam ſciſcitari voluiſtis. And are theſe the Expreſſions of one with patriarchal Power, giving anſwer to a Caſe of difficulty which canonically lies before him? But he afterwards declares, he had nothing to do in it, ſince the Council of Capua had referr'd it to them, and therefore they were bound to give Judgment in it. Sed cum hujuſmodi fuerit Concilii Capuenſis judicium——advertimus quod nobis judicandi forma competere non poſſit. If the Biſhop of Rome had then patriarchal Power over all the Weſtern Churches, how came he to be excluded from judging this Cauſe by the Proceedings of the Council of Capua? Would Pope Siricius have born this ſo patiently and ſubmiſſively, and declined meddling in it, if he had thought that it did of Right belong to him to determine it? If the Execution of the Canons belongs to the Biſhop of Rome as the Supreme Patriarch, how comes the Council of Capua not to refer this matter immediately to him, who was ſo near them; But, without ſo much as asking his Judgment, to appoint the hearing and determining it to the Biſhops of Macedonia? We have no reaſon to queſtion the ſincerity of this Epiſtle which Card. Barberine publiſhed as it lay with others in Holſtenius his Papers taken out of the Vatican, and other Roman MSS. by the expreſs Order of Alexander VII. And altho' a late (k) Advocate for the Pope's Power in France againſt De Marca, hath offer'd ſeveral Reaſons to prove this Epiſtle counterfeit, yet they are all anſwer'd by a (l) Doctor of the Sorbon. So that this Epiſtle of Siricius is a ſtanding Monument, not only againſt the Pope's abſolute and unlimited Power, but his patriarchal out of his own Dioceſe.

But to juſtifie the Pope's patriarchal Power in calling the Weſtern Biſhops to his Council at Rome, we have ſeveral (m) Inſtances brought; As of ſome Gallican Biſhops preſent at the Council under Damaſus; Wilfrid, an Engliſh Biſhop under Agatho a Legate from the Council held in Britain; with Felix of Arles and others; and ſome others of later times. But what do extraordinary Councils, meeting at Rome, prove, as to the Biſhop of Rome's being Patriarch of the Weſtern Churches? Do the Weſtern Councils, meeting at Milan, Arles, Ariminum, Sardica, or ſuch Places, prove the Biſhops of them to be all Patriarchs? Theſe things are are not worth mentioning, unleſs there be ſome circumſtance to ſhew that the Biſhop of Rome called the Weſtern Biſhops together by his patriarchal Power, for which there is no evidence brought. But there is a very great difference between Councils aſſembled for Unity of Faith or Diſcipline from ſeveral Dioceſes, and provincial Synods, and patriarchal Councils called at certain times to attend the patriarchal See, as is to be ſeen in the (n) Diurnus Romanus, where the Biſhops, within the Roman Patriarchate, oblige themſelves to obey the Summons to a Council at Rome, at certain fixed times, as Garnerius ſhews; which, he ſaith, was three times in the year. But he adds, this extended no farther than to the Biſhops within the Suburbicary Churches, who had no Primate but the Biſhop of Rome, and ſo this was a true patriarchal Council.

(3.) But the laſt Right conteſted for, is, that of Appeals in greater Cauſes. By which we underſtand ſuch Application of the Parties concerned as doth imply a Superior Juriſdiction in him they make their reſort to, whereby he hath full Authority to determine the matters in difference: For otherwiſe Appeals may be no more than voluntary Acts in the Parties, and then the Perſon appealed to hath no more Power than their Conſent gives him. Now in the Chriſtian Church, for preſervation of Peace and Unity, it was uſual to adviſe in greater Caſes with the Biſhops of other Churches, and chiefly with thoſe of the greateſt Reputation, who were wont to give their Judgment, not by way of Authority, but of Friendly correſpondence; not to ſhew their Dominion, but their Care of preſerving the Unity of the Church. Of this we have a remarkable Inſtance in the Italick Council, of which St. Ambroſe was Preſident, who did interpoſe in the Affairs of the Eaſtern Church; not with any pretence of Authority over them, but merely out of Zeal to keep up and reſtore Unity among them. They knew very well how ſuſpicious the Eaſtern Biſhops were of the Weſtern Biſhops meddling in their matters ever ſince the Council of Sardica (of which afterwards) but they tell them, it was no new thing for the Weſtern Biſhops to be concerned when things were out of order among them. (o) Non Prærogativum, ſay they, vindicamus examinis, ſed Conſortium tamen debuit eſſe communis arbitrii. They did not challenge a Power of calling them to account, but they thought there ought to be a mutual Correſpondence for the general good, and therefore they received Maximus his Complaint of his hard uſage at Conſtantinople. Will any hence infer, that this Council or St. Ambroſe had a Superior Authority over the Patriarch of Conſtantinople? So that neither Conſultations, Advices, References, nor any other Act which depends upon the Will of the Parties, and are deſigned only for a common good, can prove any true patriarchal Power. Which being premiſed, let us now ſee what Evidence is produced from hence for the Pope's patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches. And the main thing inſiſted upon is, (p) The Biſhop of Rome's appointing Legates in the Weſtern Churches to hear and examine Cauſes, and to report them. And of this, the firſt inſtance is produced of the ſeveral Epiſtles of Popes to the Biſhops of Theſſalonica in the Roman Collection. Of which a large account hath been already given: And the firſt beginning of this was after the Council of Sardica had out of a Pique to the Eaſtern Biſhops and Jealouſie of the Emperor allow'd the Biſhop of Rome the Liberty of granting a re-hearing of Cauſes in the ſe- veral Provinces, which was the pretence of ſending Legates into them; And this was the firſt conſiderable ſtep that was made towards the advancing the Pope's Power over the Weſtern Churches. For a preſent (q) Doctor of the Sorbon confeſſeth, that in the ſpace of 347 years, i.e. to the Sardican Council, No one Inſtance can be produced of any Cauſe wherein Biſhops were concerned, that was ever brought to Rome by the Biſhops that were the Judges of it. But if the Pope's patriarchal Power had been known before, it had been a regular way of proceeding from the Biſhops in provincial Synods to the Patriarch. And withall, he ſaith, before that Council no inſtance can be produced of any Judges Delegates for the review of Judgment paſſed in provincial Synods: And whatever Privilege or Authority was granted by the Council of Sardica to the Biſhop of Rome, was wholly new, and had no Tradition of the Church to juſtifie it; And was not then received either in the Eaſtern or Weſtern Churches. So that all the Pleas of a patriarchal Power, as to the Biſhop of Rome, with reſpect to greater Cauſes muſt fall very much ſhort of the Council of Nice. As to the Inſtance of Marcianus of Arles, that hath been anſwered already; And as to the Depoſition of Biſhops in England by the Pope's Authority in later Times, it is of no importance, ſince we do not deny the matter of Fact, as to the Pope's Uſurpations; But we ſay, they can never juſtifie the exerciſe of a patriarchal Power over theſe Churches by the Rules eſtabliſhed in the Council of Nice.

But it is ſaid, That the Council of Arles, before that of Nice, attributes to the Biſhop of Rome, Majores Diœceſes, i.e. according to De Marca, all the Weſtern Churches; But in anſwer to this, I have already ſhew'd how far the Weſtern Biſhops at Arles were from owning the Pope's patriarchal Power over them, becauſe they do not ſo much as deſire his Confirmation of what had paſſed in Council; But only ſend the Canons to him to publiſh them. But our Author and Chriſtianus Lupus ſay, that ſuch is the Patriarch's Authority, That all Acts of Biſhops in Council are in themſelves invalid without his Sentence, which only gives Life and Vigour to them; As they prove by the Patriarch of Alexandria. But if the Biſhop of Rome were then owned to be Patriarch over ſeven or eight Dioceſes of the Weſt, according to De Marca's expoſition; how came they to ſit and make Canons, without the leaſt mention of his Authority? So that either they muſt deny him to be Patriarch, or they muſt ſay he was affronted in the higheſt manner by the Weſtern Biſhops there aſſembled. But as to the expreſſion of Majores Diœceſes, it is very queſtionable, whether in the time of the Council of Arles, the diſtribution of the Empire by Conſtantine into Dioceſes were then made, and it ſeems probable not to have been done in the time of the Council of Nice, Dioceſes not being mentioned there, but only Provinces; And if ſo, this Place muſt be corrupt in that expreſſion, as it is moſt certain it is in others; And it is hard to lay ſo great weight on a place that makes no entire ſenſe. But allowing the expreſſion genuine, it implies no more than that the Biſhop of Rome had then more Extenſive Dioceſes than other Weſtern Biſhops; Which is not denied, ſince even then he had ſeveral Provinces under his immediate Government, which no other Weſtern Biſhop had.

(r) St. Baſil's calling the Biſhop of Rome, Chief of the Weſtern Biſhops, implies nothing but the dignity of his See, and not any patriarchal Power over the Weſtern Churches.

(r) Schelſtraet. ib. n. 77.

It muſt be a degree of more than uſual ſubtilty to inſer Damaſus his patriarchal Power over the Weſt, (s) becauſe St. Jerome joins Damaſus and the Weſt together, as he doth Peter and Egypt: Therefore Damaſus had the ſame Power over the Weſt which Peter had over Egypt. It ſeems St. Jerome's language about the different Hypoſtaſes, did not agree with what was uſed in the Syrian Churches, and therefore ſome charged him with falſe Doctrine; he pleads for himſelf, that the Churches of Egypt, and the Weſt, ſpake as he did, and they were known then neither to favour Arianiſm nor Sabellianiſm; And, to make his Allegation more particular, he mentions the names of the Patriarch of Alexandria and the Biſhop of Rome. But a Cauſe extremely wants Arguments which muſt be ſupported by ſuch as theſe.

(s) Id. n. 78.

If (t) St. Auguſtine makes Innocent to preſide in the Weſtern Churches; he only thereby ſhews the Order and Dignity of the Roman See; but he doth not own any Subjection of the Weſtern Churches to his Power, ſince no Church did more vehemently withſtand the Biſhop of Rome's Incroachments than the Churches of Africa did in St. Auguſtine's time; As is notorious in the buſineſs of Appeals, which tranſaction is a demonſtration againſt his patriarchal Power over the African Churches. And the Biſhop of Rome never inſiſted on a patriarchal Right, but on the Nicene Canons wherein they were ſhamefully baffled.

(t) Id. n. 79.

It cannot be denied that (u) Pope Innocent, in his Epiſtle to Decentius Eugubinus, would bring the Weſtern Churches to follow the Roman Traditions, upon this pretence, That the Churches of Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Sicily, and the Iſlands lying between were firſt inſtituted either by ſuch as were ſent by St. Peter or his Succeſſors. But whoſoever conſiders that Epiſtle well, will not for Innocent's ſake lay too much weight upon it. For, Is it reaſonable to think, that the double Unction, the Saturday Faſt, the Eulogiæ ſent to the ſeveral Pariſhes in Rome, were Apoſtolical Traditions which all the Weſtern Churches were bound to obſerve, becauſe they were firſt planted by thoſe who were firſt ſent from Rome? But the matter of Fact is far from being evident, for we have great reaſon to believe, there were Churches planted in the Weſtern Parts, neither by St. Peter nor by thoſe who were ſent by his Succeſſours. Yet let that be granted; What connexion is there between receiving the Chriſtian Doctrine at firſt by thoſe who came from thence, and an Obligation to be ſubject to the Biſhops of Rome in all their Orders and Traditions? The patriarchal Government of the Church was not founded upon this, but upon the ancient Cuſtom and Rules of the Church; as fully appears by the Council of Nice. And therefore the Churches of Milan and Aquileia though in Italy, the Churches of Africa though probably the firſt Preachers came from Rome, never thought themſelves bound to follow the Traditions or obſerve the Orders of the Roman Church, as is very well known both in St. Cyprian's and St. Auguſtine's times. But if the Pope's power be built on this ground, what then becomes of the Churches of Illyricum? Was the Goſpel brought thither from Rome? And, as to the Britiſh Churches, this very Plea of Innocent will be a farther evidence of their exemption from the Roman Patriarchate; ſince Britain cannot be comprehended within thoſe Iſlands which lie between Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa and Sicily, which can only be underſtood of thoſe Iſlands which are ſituate in the Mediterranean Sea.

(u) Id. n. 80.

And if no Inſtance can be produced of the Biſhop of Rome's patriarchal Juriſdiction over the Britiſh Churches, why ſhould not we claim the ſame benefit of the Nicene Canons which Leo urges ſo vehemently in ſuch a parallel Caſe? Neither can it be ſaid, that afterwards, Subjection and Conſent makes a juſt patriarchal Power; for neither doth it hold as to the Britiſh Churches, whoſe Biſhops utterly refuſed to ſubmit to Auguſtine the Monk; And if it doth, all the force of Leo's Arguments is taken away. For there were both Preſcription pleaded, and a Conſent of the Biſhops of the Dioceſes concerned in the Council of Chalcedon. But Leo ſaith, the Nicene Canons are beyond both theſe, being dictated by the Spirit of God, and paſſed by the common Conſent of the Chriſtian Church; And that it was a Sin in him to ſuffer any to break them. Either this is true or falſe. If falſe, how can the Pope be excuſed who alledged it for true? If true, then it holds as much againſt the Biſhop of Rome as the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. And as to the Preſcription of 60 years, he ſaith, the Canons of Nice were before, and ought to take place, if the practice had been never ſo conſtant, which he denies. Nay, he goes ſo far as to ſay, Though the numbers of Biſhops be never ſo great that give their conſent to any alteration of the Nicene Canons, they ſignifie nothing, and cannot bind. Nothing can be more emphatical or weighty to our purpoſe than theſe Expreſſions of Pope Leo, for ſecuring the Privileges of our Churches, in caſe no patriarchal Power over them can be proved before the Council of Nice. And it is all the reaſon in the World, That thoſe who claim a Juriſdiction ſhould prove it, eſpecially when the Acts of it are ſo notorious that they cannot be conceal'd; as the Conſecration of Metropolitanes, and matters of Appeals are, and were too evident in latter Times, when all the World knew what Authority and Juriſdiction the Pope exerciſed over theſe Churches. I conclude this with that excellent Sentence of Pope Leo, PRIVILEGIA ECCLESIARUM SANCTORUM PATRUM CANONIBUS INSTITUTA, ET VENERABILIS NI-

Quoniam diſpenſatio mihi credita eſt, & ad meum tendit reatum, ſi paternarum regulæ Sanctionum, quæ in Synodo Nicæna ad totius Eccleſiæ Regimen, Spiritu Dei inſtruente, ſunt traditæ me, quod abſit, connivente violentur. Leo ad Marcian. Aug. Ep. 78. c. 3.

CÆNÆ SYNODI FIXA DECRETIS, NULLA POSSUNT IMPROBITATE CONVELLI NULLA NOVITATE VIOLARI. The Privileges of Churches which were begun by the Canons of the Holy Fathers and confirmed by the Council of Nice can neither be deſtroy'd by wicked Uſurpation nor diſſolved by the Humour of Innovation.

In the next great Council of Sardica, which was intended to be general by the two Emperours Conſtans and Conſtantius, it is commonly ſaid, that (w) Athanaſius expreſly affirms the Britiſh Biſhops to have been there preſent. But ſome think this miſtake aroſe from looking no farther than the Latin Copy in Athanaſius, in which indeed the words are plain enough to that purpoſe; but the ſenſe in the Greek ſeems to be the ſame. For Athanaſius pleads his own Innocency from the ſeveral Judgments which had paſſed in his Favour. Firſt, by 100 Biſhops in Egypt; next, by above 50 Biſhops at Rome; thirdly, in the great Council at Sardica, ἐν ᾗ, in which, as ſome ſay, above 300 Biſhops out of the ſeveral Provinces there mention'd conſented to his Innocency. But here lies an inſuperable difficulty, for * Athanaſius himſelf elſe-where affirms, that there were but 170 Biſhops in all there preſent; and therefore it is impoſſible he ſhould make 300 there preſent. Which ſome have endeavour'd to reconcile, by ſaying, the latter was the true number preſent; but the former of thoſe Biſhops ſcattered up and down who did agree in the Sentence which paſſed in favour of Athanaſius: But then the Greek here cannot be underſtood of thoſe preſent in Council; and, on the other ſide, if it be not ſo underſtood, then the words do not prove what he deſigns, viz. that he was acquitted in the Sardican Council; in which, although the number were not ſo great, I ſee no reaſon to exclude the Britiſh Biſhops.

It is true, that in the (x) Synodical Epiſtle of that Council, only Italy, Spain and Gaul are mention'd; and ſo likewiſe in the (y) Subſcriptions. But it is well obſerved by (z) Bucherius, that Athanaſius reckons up the Britiſh Biſhops among thoſe of Gaul. And (a) Hilary, writing to the Gallican Biſhops of Germania prima and Germania ſecunda, Belgica prima, Belgica ſecunda, Lugdunenſis prima, Lugdunenſis ſecunda, Provincia Aquitanica and Provincia Novempopulana; after he hath diſtinctly ſet down theſe, he then immediately adds, And to the Biſhops of the Provinces of Britain. Which makes me apt to think, that about that time, the Biſhops of Britain were generally joyn'd with thoſe of Gaul, and are often comprehended under them where they are not expreſly mention'd. And, to confirm this, (b) Sulpicius Severus, ſpeaking of the Summons to the Council of Ariminum, mentions only of theſe Weſtern Parts Italy, Spain and Gaul; But afterwards ſaith, That the Biſhops of Britain were there preſent. So that Britain was then comprehended under Gaul, and was ſo underſtood at that time; as Sicily was under Italy, as (c) Sirmondus ſhews. And Sextus Rufus doth put down the deſcription of Britain under that of Gaul, as (d) Berterius hath obſerved. For otherwiſe, who could have thought that Athanaſius had meant the Biſhops of Britain, when he reckons up only the Provinces of Gaul? But he declared that they were preſent with the Gallican Biſhops.

But it hath been urged with great appearance of Reaſon, that ſince the Britiſh Biſhops were preſent at the Council of Sardica, The Britiſh Churches were bound to obſerve the Canons of it; and Appeals to the Biſhop of Rome being there eſtabliſhed, they were then brought under his Juriſdiction, as Patriarch of the Weſtern Churches. To give a clear account of this, we muſt examine the Deſign and Proceedings of that Council. The occaſion whereof was this; Athanaſius, Biſhop of Alexandria, being depoſed for ſome pretended miſdemeanours by two Synods of Eaſtern Biſhops, and finding no redreſs there, by the prevalency of the Arian Faction, makes Application to the Weſtern Biſhops, and to Julius Biſhop of Rome, as the chief of them, and earneſtly deſires that his Cauſe might be heard over again, bringing great Evidence from the Biſhops of Egypt and other places, that he never had a fair Hearing, but was run down by the Violence of the Euſebian party at Tyre and Antioch. The Biſhop of Rome communicating this with the Weſtern Biſhops, as at large appears by Julius his Epiſtle in Athanaſius, he, in their name as well as his own, ſends to the Eaſtern Biſhops, That this Cauſe might be heard before indifferent Judges: And to that end, that they would come into theſe Parts, and bring their Evidences with them. This they decline; Upon which, and a fuller Examination of the matter, they receive Athanaſius, Marcellus and others into Communion with them. This gives a mighty diſtaſte to the Eaſtern Biſhops; at laſt the two Brothers, Conſtantius and Conſtans, agree, there ſhould be a general Council called at Sardica, to hear and determine this matter. The Biſhops meet; But the Weſtern Biſhops would have the reſtored Biſhops admitted to Communion, and ſit in Council; This the Eaſtern Biſhops utterly refuſe; and upon that withdrew to Philippopolis; And declare againſt their Proceedings at Sardica, as repugnant to the Nicene Canons: The Weſtern Biſhops continued ſitting, and made new Canons to juſtifie their own Proceedings. This is the true ſtate of the matter of Fact; as far as I can gather it out of the authentick Writings on both Sides. For the one ſide inſiſts upon the Juſtice of re-hearing a Cauſe, wherein there was ſo great ſuſpicion of foul dealing; And the other, that the matters which concerned their Biſhops, were not to be tried over again by others at a diſtance; And that this was the Way to overthrow the Diſcipline of the Church, as it had been ſettled by the Council of Nice and the ancient Canons of the Church. It is apparent by the Synodical Epiſtle of the Greek Biſhops who withdrew to Philippopolis, That this was the main Point inſiſted on by them; That it was the bringing a new Law into the Church; For the Eaſtern Biſhops to be judged by the Weſtern; The ancient Cuſtom and Rule of the Church being; That they ſhould ſtand or fall by their own Biſhops. The Weſtern Biſhops on the other ſide pleaded, That this was a Cauſe of common concernment to the whole Church; That there had been notorious partiality in the management of it; That Athanaſius was condemned, not for any pretended miſcarriages ſo much, as for his Zeal againſt Arianiſm; That the Cauſe was not heard in Egypt, where he was charged, but at a great diſtance, and therefore in common Juſtice, it ought to have a new hearing by the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops together. But the Eaſtern Biſhops finding that the Weſtern would not forſake the Communion of Athanaſius and the reſt, they look'd on the Cauſe as prejudged, and ſo went away. However the other proceeded to the clearing the Biſhops accuſed, which they did by a Synodical Epiſtle, and then made ſeveral Canons, as againſt Tranſlations from mean Biſhopricks to better, Can. 1. and uſing uſing Arts to procure them, Can. 2. Againſt placing Biſhops in ſuch places where a ſingle Presbyter would ſerve, and the abſence of Biſhops at Conſecrations, Can. 6. Againſt their unſeaſonable Applications to the Court, Can. 7. 8, 9, 20. Againſt being made Biſhops per Saltum, Can. 10. Againſt their Non-reſidence, Can. 11, 12. Againſt receiving thoſe who were excommunicated by others, Can. 13. About the Appeal of Presbyters, Can. 14. Againſt taking Presbyters out of anothers Dioceſe, Can. 15. Againſt their Non-reſidence, Can. 16. About the Reception of baniſhed Biſhops, Can. 17. About Eutychianus and Muſæus, and the perſons ordained by them, Can. 18, 19.

But the main Canons of this Council are the third, fourth and fifth, which concern the re-hearing of the Cauſes of Biſhops; And the intereſt the Biſhop of Rome was to have therein. For the right underſtanding whereof we are to conſider the ſeveral ſteps and methods of Proceeding therein eſtabliſhed. (1.) That the Cauſes of Biſhops in the firſt Inſtance were ſtill to be heard and determin'd by the Biſhops of the Province; That is plain by the firſt part of Can. 3. Which forbids any Biſhop in caſe of difference with another, to call Biſhops out of a neighbour Province to hear it. This was agreeable to the Nicene Can. 5. Herein it is ſuppoſed that they reflect on the Council of Antioch's Proceedings againſt Athanaſius; But the Council of Antioch did not proceed upon St. Athanaſius in the firſt Inſtance, but upon this ground, viz. That being depoſed in the Council of Tyre, he afterwards returned to the Biſhoprick of Alexandria, without being firſt reſtored by a greater Synod. But this ſeems to have been very hard uſage of ſo great a man; For they firſt made the Canons themſelves, Can. 4. 12. and out of them they framed an Article, by virtue whereof they deprived Athanaſius. And herein lay the Art of the Euſebian party, for if they had framed the Canon ſo as it is extant in (e) Palladius, it would never have paſſed the Council; For it was not a Council of mere Arians, as is commonly thought, but of many (f) Orthodox Biſhops, together with them in ſome things were over-reached by the Artifices of the Euſebian Party; And they did not meet purpoſely againſt Athanaſius; But 97 (g) Biſhops were ſummon'd by the Emperor to meet at the ſolemn Dedication of the great Church at Antioch called Dominicum Aureum; (h) as they had done before on the like occaſion at Jeruſalem; And (i) Euſebius ſaith, Such Aſſemblies of Biſhops were frequent at ſuch times. Theſe, being meet together, framed ſeveral Canons, for the better Ordering and Government of the Churches, out of which, being paſſed by general Conſent, the Euſebians, who hated Athanaſius, framed ſufficient Articles againſt him. For, by the fourth Canon, if a Biſhop, being depoſed by a Synod, doth officiate, he is never to be reſtored; By the twelfth, If a Biſhop depoſed, makes Application to the Emperor, and not to a greater Council of Biſhops, he is not to be reſtored. But now Athanaſius, being depoſed by the Tyrian Synod, was reſtored upon his Application to the Emperor, without any Synod called to that end, and did execute his Office as Biſhop of Alexandria; and for this reaſon, the Council of Antioch confirmed his Depoſition.

A (k) late Author goes about to prove, That the Canon againſt Athanaſius did not paſs the Council of Antioch, but that it paſſed an Aſſembly of 40 Euſebians, when the reſt were gone: But this is incredible (as (l) Baronius his Conceit is ridiculous, who takes the 36 Manſions that Antioch was diſtant from Alexandria for 36 Arian Biſhops) and there is no Teſti-

Teſtimony of Antiquity to prove it. But there is no reaſon to imagine any other Canon againſt Athanaſius beſides theſe two, for they effectually did his buſineſs. That which Palladius ſaith, That in the Canon it was ſaid, whether the Biſhop were depoſed juſtly or unjuſtly is very improbable; But that which gave occaſion for him to ſay ſo was, becauſe the ancient Canon called Apoſtolical 28 had in it the word δικαίως, juſtly, which they left out, the better to effect their Deſign; That ſo the merits of the Cauſe might not be enquired into. But there was an Error in the firſt Inſtance committed, not by the Council of Antioch, but by that of Tyre; unleſs the extraordinary Summons of that Council by the Emperor's Command, as (m) Euſebius ſaith, be a diſpenſation, as to the regular Proceedings in common Caſes; But there was ſcarce any thing regular in the Proceeding of that Council; For, according to the Rules of the Church, this Cauſe ought to have been heard in Egypt, by the Biſhops there; And they juſtly complain of the Neglect of this in their (n) Synodical Epiſtle; And (o) Liberius made a reaſonable Propoſition to Conſtantius; That a Council might be ſummoned at Alexandria; That this Cauſe, which had given ſo much diſturbance, ſhould be heard upon the Place, all Parties being preſent. Which was the beſt Expedient at laſt; But the moſt natural way was to have begun there; And therefore the Sardican Council did very well to reduce the Nicene Canon about proceeding within the Province in the firſt Inſtance.

(2.) If the Party be grieved at the Sentence paſſed againſt him, then that there be a re-hearing of it granted, Can. 2. This the Council of Antioch allow'd, Can. 12. by a greater Synod of Biſhops, but takes away all hopes of Reſtitution from him that made his Appeal to the Emperor. The meaning of the Canon is, not to exclude an Addreſs for a greater Synod; but an Appeal, to have the Emperor reverſe the Sentence, without any farther hearing by another Aſſembly of Biſhops. So that the final reſort was hereby ſettled in a greater Council, from which no Appeal ſhould lie. This Canon is ſuppoſed to be particularly deſign'd againſt Athanaſius; But I do not find that he made Application to the Emperor to be reſtored with a Non-obſtante to the Sentence of the Tyrian Council; But to have a more indifferent hearing by another Council. So the Biſhops of Egypt teſtifie in their Synodical Epiſtle extant in Athanaſius; But their Proceeding againſt him at Antioch was, becauſe after this he took Poſſeſſion of his See without another Sentence of a greater Synod; But the great difficulty is, to reconcile this Canon with the fifteenth of the ſame Council, which takes away all Liberty of Appeal from the unanimous Sentence of a provincial Synod. (p) Petrus de Marca, a Man of more than ordinary Sagacity in theſe matters, was ſenſible of this appearance of Contradiction; and he ſolves it thus, That no Appeal is allow'd from a provincial Synod, Can. 15. But notwithſtanding, by Can. 12. there is a Liberty of proceeding by way of Petition to the Emperor, for a re-hearing the Cauſe by a greater Synod. And in this Caſe the Emperor was to be Judge, whether it were fit to grant another hearing or not, and although by this Canon, in the Caſe of a general Conſent, no neighbour Biſhop could be called in; as they might in caſe of Difference by Can. 14. Yet if the Emperor thought they proceeded partially, he might either join Biſhops of another Province with them, or call a more general Council out of the Province, as Conſtantine did at Tyre. This was the undoubted Right of the Emperors, to call together Aſſemblies of Biſhops for what Cauſes they thought expedient. But (q) Socrates expreſly preſly ſaith, That no Appeal was allow'd by the Canons of the Church; For ſpeaking of Cyril of Jeruſalem's being depoſed, he ſaith, he appealed to a greater Court of Judicature, which Appeal Conſtantius allow'd; but then he adds, That he was the firſt and only perſon who, contrary to the Cuſtom and Canons of the Church, made ſuch an Appeal. H. Valeſius contradicts Socrates, becauſe of the Appeal of the Donatiſts to Conſtantine from the Council of Arles. But this is nothing to the purpoſe; for the Actions of the Donatiſts were not regarded; And beſides, their Appeal was to Conſtantine, to hear the Cauſe himſelf; But here Cyril appealed to a greater number of Biſhops, according to the Canon of Antioch. And then appear'd at the Council of Seleucia to have his Cauſe heard. (r) Baronius is much puzzled with this Expreſſion of Socrates, becauſe it would take away Appeals to the Pope; But the Eaſtern Biſhops never underſtood any ſuch thing; And Cyril made his Appeal to a greater Synod. The Canons of Sardica, which Baronius quotes, were not received and ſcarce known in the Eaſtern Church. Athanaſius fled to the Weſtern Biſhops, becauſe he was ſo ill uſed in the Eaſt, not becauſe of any Authority in the Biſhop of Rome to receive Appeals. But Cyril went according to the Canons of Antioch, making application to Conſtantius to be heard, by a greater Synod. (s) Sozomen ſaith, that Conſtantius recommended the Cauſe of Cyril to the Council of Ariminum. But that cannot be, ſince (t) he expreſly forbad the Weſtern Biſhops in that Council to meddle with the Cauſes of the Eaſtern Biſhops; And declares, whatever they did in that matter ſhould have no effect. Therefore the Council to which Conſtantius referred this Cauſe, muſt be that of Seleucia, which was aſſembled at the ſame time. Which ſeeming to take off from the Right of provincial Synods eſtabliſhed in the Council of Nice, Socrates condemns as uncanonical, and ſaith, He was the firſt that proceeded in this method of ſeeking to the Emperor for a greater Council.

But then, (3.) The Council of Sardica made an Innovation in this matter. For although it allows the liberty of a re-hearing, yet it ſeems to take away the Power of granting it from the Emperor, as far as in them lay, and gives it to Julius, Biſhop of Rome, for the honour of St. Peter; And, if he thought fit, he was to appoint the Neighbour Biſhops of the Province to hear it, and ſuch Aſſeſſours as the Emperor was wont to ſend. To which was added, Can. 4. That no Biſhop ſhould enter into the vacant Biſhoprick upon a Depoſition, and application for a new hearing; till the Biſhop of Rome had given Sentence in it: But then, Can. 5. it is ſaid, That if the Cauſe be thought fit to be re-heard, Letters are to be ſent from him to the neighbour Biſhops to hear and examine it. But if this do not ſatisfie, he may do as he ſees cauſe. Which I take to be the full meaning of Can. 5. And this is the whole Power which the Council of Sardica gives to the Biſhop of Rome.

Concerning which we are to obſerve, (1.) That it was a new thing; for if it had been known before, that the ſupreme Judgment in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes lay in the Biſhop of Rome, Theſe Canons had been idle and impertinent. And there is no colour in Antiquity for any ſuch judicial Power in the Biſhop of Rome, as to re-hearing of cauſes of depoſed Biſhops before theſe Canons of Sardica; So that (u) Petrus de Marca was in the right, when he made theſe the foundation of the Pope's Power. And if the Right of Appeal be a neceſſary conſequent from the Pope's Supremacy; Then the non-uſage of this practice before, will overthrow the claim of Supremacy. In extraordinary Caſes, the great

Biſhops of the Church were wont to be adviſed with; as St. Cyprian, as well as the Biſhop of Rome, in the Caſes of Baſilides and Marcianus; But if ſuch Inſtances prove a Right of Appeals, they will do it as much for the Biſhop of Carthage as of Rome. But there was no ſtanding Authority peculiar to the Biſhop of Rome given or allow'd before this Council of Sardica. And the learned Publiſher of (w) Leo's Works hath lately proved at large, That no one Appeal was ever made from the Churches of Gaul, from the beginning of Chriſtianity there to the Controverſie between Leo, and Hilary of Arles, long after the Council of Sardica. But ſuch an Authority being given by a particular Council upon preſent Circumſtances, as appears by mentioning Julius Biſhop of Rome, cannot be binding to poſterity, when that limited Authority is carried ſo much farther, as to be challenged for an abſolute and ſupreme Power founded upon a Divine Right, and not upon the Acts of the Council. For herein the difference is ſo great, that one can give no colour or pretence for the other. (2.) That this doth not place the Right of Appeals in the Biſhop of Rome, as Head of the Church; But only transfers the Right of granting a re-hearing from the Emperor to the Biſhop of Rome. And whether they could do that or not is a great Queſtion; But in all probability Conſtantius his openly favouring the Arian Party was the occaſion of it. (3.) That this can never juſtifie the drawing of Cauſes to Rome by way of Appeal; becauſe the Cauſe is ſtill to be heard in the Province, by the neighbour Biſhops, who are to hear and examine all Parties, and to give Judgment therein. (4.) That the Council of Sardica it ſelf took upon it to judge over again a Cauſe which had been judged by the Biſhop of Rome, viz. The Cauſe of Athanaſius and his Brethren. Which utterly overthrows any Opinion in them, That the ſupreme Right of Judicature was lodged in the Biſhop of Rome. (5.) That the Sardican Council cannot be juſtified by the Rules of the Church, in receiving Marcellus into Communion. For not only the Eaſtern Biſhops in their Synodical Epiſtle ſay, That he was condemned for Hereſie by the Council at Conſtantinople in Conſtantine*'s time, and that* Protogenes of Sardica and others of the Council had ſubſcribed to his Condemnation; But (x) Athanaſius himſelf afterwards condemned him; And (y) St. Baſil blames the Church of Rome for admitting him into Communion: And (z) Baronius confeſſes, that this brought a great diſreputation upon this Council, viz. the abſolving one condemned for Hereſie, both before and after that Abſolution. (6.) That the Decrees of this Council were not univerſally received, as is moſt evident by the known Conteſt between the Biſhops of Rome and Africa about Appeals. If theſe Canons had been then received in the Church, it is incredible that they ſhould be ſo ſoon forgotten in the African Churches; For there were but two Biſhops of Carthage, Reſtitutus and Genethlius between Gratus and Aurelius. (a) Chriſtianus Lupus profeſſes he can give no account of it. But the plain and true account is this, There was a Deſign for a General Council; But the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops parting ſo ſoon, there was no regard had by the whole Church to what was done by one ſide or the other. And ſo little notice was taken of their Proceedings, that (b) St. Auguſtine knew of no other than the Council of the Eaſtern Biſhops; and even (c) Hilary himſelf makes their Confeſſion of Faith to be done by the Sardican Council. And the calling of Councils was become ſo common then, upon the Arian Controverſies; And the Depoſition of Biſhops of one ſide and the other were ſo frequent, that the remoter Churches very little concerned themſelves in what paſſed amongſt them. Thence the Acts of moſt of thoſe Councils are wholly loſt, as at Milan, Sirmium, Arles, Beziers, &c. only what is preſerved in the Fragments of Hilary, and the Collections of Athanaſius, who gathered many things for his own vindication. Which was ſo inexcuſable a piece of Ignorance or Forgery, that all the Tricks and Devices of the Advocates of that See, have never been able to defend.

THE Succeſſion of the Britiſh Churches being thus deduced from their original to the times of the Chriſtian Emperors, it will be neceſſary to give an account of the Faith and Service which were then received by them.

And it is ſo much the more neceſſary to enquire into the Faith of the Britiſh Churches, becauſe they are charged with two remarkable Hereſies of thoſe times, viz. Arianiſm and Pelagianiſm; and by no leſs Authority than that of (a) Gildas and (b) Bede. (a) Gild. Epiſt. p. 12.

The Charge of Arianiſm is grounded upon the univerſal ſpreading of that Hereſy over the World, as Bede expreſſes it, and therefore to ſhew how far the Britiſh Churches were concerned, we muſt ſearch into the Hiſtory of that Hereſie, from the Council of Nice to the Council of Ariminum, where the Britiſh Biſhops were preſent. (b) Bed. l. 1. c. 8, 10, 17.

It is confidently affirmed by a late (c) Writer, That the Arian Faction was wholly ſuppreſt by the Nicene Council, and all the Troubles that were made after that were raiſed by the Euſebians, who were as forward as any to anathematize the Arians, and all the Perſecutions were raiſed by them, under a pretence of Prudence and Moderation; That they never in the leaſt appear'd after the Council of Nice in behalf of the Arian Doctrine, but their whole fury was bent againſt the word ὁμοούσιος and Athanaſius; That in the times of Conſtantius and Conſtans the Cauſe of Arius was wholly laid aſide by both Parties, and the only Conteſt was about the word (c) R. & L. Part. 1. p. 354. p. 374. p. 415.

ὁμοούσιος; That the Euſebian Cauſe was not to reſtore Arianiſm, but to piece up the Peace of the Church by comprehending all in one Communion, or p. 468. by mutual forbearance.

But if it be made appear, that the Arian Faction was ſtill buſie and active after the Nicene Council; that the Conteſt about ὁμοούσιος was with a deſign to overthrow the Nicene Faith; that the Euſebians great buſineſs was, if poſſible, to reſtore Arianiſm; then it will follow, that ſome Mens hatred of Prudence and Moderation is beyond their Skill and Judgment in the Hiſtory of the Church: and the making out of theſe things will clear the Hiſtory of Arianiſm to the Council of Ariminum.

But, before I come to the Evidence ariſing from the Authentick Records of the Church, it will not be unpleaſant to obſerve, that this very Writer is ſo great an Enemy to the deſign of Reconcilers, that it is hardly poſſible, even in this matter, to reconcile him to himſelf. For, he tells us, that the moſt conſiderable Euſebians in the Weſtern p. 484. Churches, viz. Valens, Urſacius, and their Aſſociates had been ſecret p. 508. Arians all along; that the word Subſtance was left out of the third Sirmi- p. 510. an Creed, to pleaſe Valens and his Party; who being emboldned by this Creed whereby they had at length ſhaken off all the Clogs that had been hitherto faſten'd on them to hinder their return to Arianiſm, moved, at the Council at Ariminum, that all former Creeds might be aboliſhed, and the Sirmian Creed be eſtabliſhed for ever. Doth this conſiſt with the Arian Factions being totally ſuppreſt by the Council of Nice, and none ever appearing in behalf of the Arian Doctrine after; and the Euſebians never moving for reſtoring Arianiſm, but only for a ſort of Comprehenſion and (d) R. & L. Part. 2. p. 3. Toleration? In another place he ſaith, (d) the Euſebians endeavoured to ſupplant the Nicene Faith, though they durſt not diſown it. And was the Arian Faction then totally ſuppreſt while the Euſebians remained? p. 4. Theſe are the Men whom he calls the old Euſebian Knaves; And for the Acacians, he ſaith, when they had got the Maſtery, they put off all Part. 1. p. 528. diſguiſe, and declared for Arianiſm. Is it poſſible for the ſame Perſon to ſay, that after the Nicene Council, they never appeared in behalf of the Arian Doctrine in the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches; and yet, When they put off their Diſguiſe, they declared for Arianiſm? What is this but appearing openly and plainly for the Arian Doctrine? And if we believe ſo good an Author as himſelf, their Conteſt after the Council of Nice was ſo far from being merely about the word ὁμοούσιος, that he frequently ſaith, that Controverſie did take in the whole Merits of the Cauſe, as will appear from his own words in ſeveral p. 358. places. As when he ſpeaks of the Council of Nice, he ſaith, “The “whole Controverſie was reduced to the word Conſubſtantial; which “the Euſebians at firſt refuſed to admit, as being no Scripture word, “but without its admiſſion, nothing elſe would ſatisfie the Council, “and good reaſon they had for it, becauſe to part with that word “after the Controverſie was once raiſed, would have been, to give “up the Cauſe; for it was unavoidable, that if the Son were not of “the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, he muſt have been made out of “the ſame common and created ſubſtance with all other Creatures; “and therefore when the Scriptures give him a greater Dignity of “Nature than to any created Being, they thereby make him of the “ſame uncreated Subſtance with the Father; ſo that they plainly aſ“ſert his Conſubſtantiality, though they uſe not the word. But when “ the Truth it ſelf was denied by the Arian Hereticks and the Son of God thruſt down into the rank of created Beings, and defined to be a Creature made of nothing, it was time for the Church to ſtop this Hereſie, by ſuch a Teſt as would admit of no Prevarication; which was effectually done by this word; and, as cunning and ſhuffling as the Arians were, they were never able to ſwallow or chew it, and therefore it was but a weak part of the Euſebians to ſhew ſo much zeal againſt the word, when they profeſſed to allow the thing; For if our Saviour were not a meer Creature, he muſt be of the ſame uncreated Subſtance with the Father, becauſe there is no middle between created and uncreated Subſtance; ſo that whoever denied the Conſubſtantiality could not avoid the Hereſie of Paulus Samoſatenus, which yet the Arians themſelves profeſſed to defie; for if he were a meer Creature, it is no matter how ſoon, or how late he was created.

And therefore it is not to be imagined that the Euſebians ſhould really believe the Conſubſtantiality of the Son, and yet ſo vehemently oppoſe the uſe of the word. Would any Men of common ſenſe, who did believe the Bread and Wine in the Euchariſt to be turned into the very Body and Blood of Chriſt, ſet themſelves with all their force and intereſt to overthrow the term of Tranſubſtantiation? So, if the Euſebians did believe the Son of the ſame Subſtance with the Father, to what purpoſe ſhould they cabal ſo much as they did all the Reign of Conſtantius, to lay aſide the word ὁμοούσιος; If it be ſaid, It was by way of Comprehenſion, to take in diſſenting Parties: then it is plain they were really diſſenting Parties ſtill, and conſequently did not differ only about the Uſe of a Word, but about the Subſtance of the Doctrine. And as thoſe who do believe the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, are for the Uſe of the Word; and thoſe who believe it not, would not have the Word impoſed; ſo it was in all the Councils under Conſtantius, thoſe who chiefly oppoſed the Word Conſubſtantial, did it, becauſe they liked not the Doctrine; and thoſe who contended for it, did it, becauſe they knew the Doctrine was aimed at under the Pretence of laying aſide an unſcriptural Word. And the ſame Author tells us from St. Hilary, “ the Conſequence of ſhutting out the Word ὁμοούσιος was, p. 484. that it muſt be decreed either that the Son was a Creature made out of nothing, or out of another Subſtance uncreated and diſtinct from the Divine Nature. And when he gives an account of the Council of Seleucia, held at the ſame time with that of Ariminum, he ſaith, They brake into two Parties, of the Acacians, who defied the Council of p. 520. Nice and all its Decrees, and the old Euſebians, who pretended to ſtick only at the Word Conſubſtantial: and upon their Appeal to the Emperor, there are theſe two things remarkable. 1. That thoſe who were for laying aſide all diſcriminating Words were Arians of the higheſt ſort, p. 522. viz. Aetians, who held the Blaſphemy of Diſſimilitude. 2. That thoſe who were for retaining the word Subſtance went on this Ground, That if God the Son exiſt neither from nothing nor from any other ſubſtance, then he muſt be of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. Which was the very Argument, he ſaith, approved by the Council of Nice for ſetling the word p. 524. ὁμοούσιος. This is a ſufficient Argument to me, that thoſe who from the Council of Nice did chiefly oppoſe that Word, did it with a Deſign to overthrow the Doctrine of the Son's being of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. Which will more fully appear by a brief deduction of the Arian Hiſtory from the Council of Nice to that of Ariminum; not from modern Collections, but from the beſt Writers about that time.

The Arian Faction finding themſelves ſo much overvoted in the Council of Nice, that they deſpaired to carry any thing there by fair means; betook themſelves to fraudulent Arts, hoping thereby to hinder either the paſſing or the executing any Decree againſt them. At firſt, they endeavoured to blind and deceive the Council by ſeeming to profeſs the Orthodox Faith, but they made uſe of ſuch ambiguous Forms of Words as might ſerve their ends, by couching an Heretical Senſe under a fair appearance of joining in the ſame Faith with the reſt. (e) (f) This being diſcovered by the more ſagacious Defenders of the old Chriſtian Faith, they at length fixed upon the term ὁμοούσιος as the only effectual Teſt to diſcriminate the Arians from others; and when they had uſed their utmoſt skill and endeavour to keep this Teſt from paſſing, and found they could not prevail, they bethought themſelves of another way to keep the Faction alive, although the Hereſie might ſeem at preſent to be totally ſuppreſt. And that was, by ſuffering Arius and his two faſt Friends, Secundus and Theonas, to be condemned by the Council, and to be baniſhed by the Emperor; but the chief Heads of the Faction, Euſebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice, with others, reſolved upon an Expedient to clear themſelves, and yet to keep up the Faction; which was, by ſubſcribing the Confeſſion of Faith, and denying to anathematize Arius and his Followers. This is plain from the Epiſtle of Euſebius and Theognis, extant in (g) Socrates and (h) Sozomen, wherein they own their Subſcription to the Decree of Faith, but declare, That they utterly refuſed to ſubſcribe the Anathema againſt Arius and his Adherents; becauſe they did not believe them guilty of the Hereſie charged upon them; as they found both by Writing and Converſation with them. This Epiſtle was written by them during their Baniſhment, in order to their return to their Biſhopricks, from which they had been driven by Conſtantine's own Order; and the Reaſon of it is given in his Epiſtle to the Church of Nicomedia, viz. (i) for communicating with the Arians whom he had cauſed to be removed from Alexandria for their Hereſie and Diſturbance of the Peace of the Church there; and the ſame Account is given of it in the Synodical Epiſtle of the Biſhops of Egypt extant in (k) Athanaſius. Which ſhews their Reſolution to keep up the Faction in ſpite of the Council of Nice: For if they had any regard to the Decree there paſt, they would not have preſumed to have communicated with thoſe who were expreſly anathematized by the Council; and had very hardly eſcaped it themſelves, as Conſtantine there upbraids them in his Epiſtle. But, upon this notorious Contempt, they were depoſed from their Biſhopricks, and ſent into Baniſhment; where they grew very uneaſie, and reſolved upon any Terms to be reſtored; knowing that if they continued there, the Faction was indeed in danger to be wholly Suppreſt: And, for that end, they wrote that ſubmiſſive Letter to the leading Biſhops, promiſing an univerſal Compliance upon their Reſtauration. And the main ground they built their Hopes upon, was, becauſe Arius himſelf upon his ſubmiſſion was recalled; as they declare in the end of that Epiſtle.

Which Intrigue was carried on by (l) (m) a ſecret Arian, Chaplain to Conſtantia, the Emperor's Siſter, recommended to the Emperor at her Death; who, being received into Favour, whiſper'd into his Ear very kind things concerning Arius and his Adherents; adding, that they were unjuſtly baniſh'd, and that the whole Controverſie was nothing but a Pique which the Biſhop of Alexandria had taken againſt one of his Presbyters, for having more Wit and Reputation than himſelf; and that it would become Conſtantine, in point of Honour and Juſtice, to recall Arius, and to have the whole matter examined over again. Upon this Arius is ſent for, and bid by the Emperor to ſet down his Confeſſion of Faith plainly and honeſtly; which is extant in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, under the Name of Arius and Enzoius, and was framed in ſuch a ſpecious manner, as made the Emperor believe that Arius was indeed of the ſame Mind with the Nicene Fathers, only leaving out the word Conſubſtantial. But he would not undertake to determine himſelf, whether he ſhould be received into Communion upon this; but he referr'd the whole matter to the Biſhops then met at Jeruſalem; who, ſaith Sozomen, unanimouſly approved this Confeſſion of Faith, and wrote a Circular Letter upon it for receiving Arius and his Adherents into Communion; notwithſtanding the peremptory Decree of the Council of Nice to the contrary. Which Epiſtle is extant in (n) Athanaſius who looks on it as the firſt Blow given to the Authority of the Council of Nice; And he underſtands it of that Arius, who was Author of the Hereſie, and not of the other Arius, as ſome modern Writers do.

And here, Athanaſius ſaith, they began to open their Deſign in favour of the Arian Hereſie, which till then they had concealed. For they knew that work was not to be done at once; but this was a good ſtep towards the leſſening the Authority of the Nicene Council; which being once removed, the Faction did not queſtion they ſhould be able to ſet up Arianiſm ſpeedily. They were not ſo plain hearted to declare preſently for what they aimed at; nor to put it to the Vote, whether the Nicene Faith ſhould be deſtroyed or not. For that, having the great Advantage of ſo publick a Settlement, and ſuch a general Conſent of the Chriſtian World, it was not to be overthrown at once, nor by open violence, but to be taken in pieces by degrees; and the generality were to be cheated into Arianiſm, under other pretences and inſinuations. And the firſt thing was, to perſuade the World, that the Arians had been hitherto miſunderſtood, and their Doctrine miſrepreſented by ſuch factious and buſie Men as Athanaſius, and a few others, therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary to weaken the Authority of the Council, as being influenced by a ſmall number of Men who overſwayed the reſt; Neither was it ſafe to begin with the Matter of Faith, for that would give too great an Alarm; but it was a much more plauſible way to bring the Arians into Communion, as being much miſrepreſented and not owning the Doctrines which the Athanaſian Party did charge them with, and being once joined in Communion together, it would be fit to lay aſide all Terms of Diſcrimination, as tending to Faction; eſpecially ſuch as were lately ſet up, to put a diſtinction between the Arians and others. And when theſe things were done by other Councils, the Authority of the Council of Nice would fall to the Ground, and, as they ſuppoſed, the Nicene Faith together with it. But ſuch Deſigns could not be carried on ſo ſecretly and ſubtilly, but the wiſer ſort ſuſpected what was doing, as Athanaſius ſaith; p. 891. and therefore they ſoon called another Council at Antioch, where they made made vehement Proteſtations to the contrary. We, ſay they, are no followers of Arius; for, being Biſhops, how can we follow a Presbyter? As though the World could be deceived by ſuch pitifull Reaſonings. But after they declare, That they embraced none but the ancient Faith, but withall confeſs they had received Arius to Communion; and then make a Profeſſion of their Faith very agreeable to that of Arius and Euzoius, delivered to Conſtantine; wherein they aſſert the Coeternity of the Son with the Father, but leave out his being of the ſame Subſtance. But fearing this would not give ſatisfaction, they added another, wherein they owned (o) the Son to be God of God, Lord of Lord, the unchangeable Image of his Deity, Subſtance, Will, Power and Glory: but after, they expreſs themſelves more fully, when they ſay, they believe three diſtinct hypoſtaſes and an unity of conſent; which overthrows the Nicene Faith, it being built on the unity of Subſtance and not of Will. It cannot be denied, that the crude expreſſions of Arius in the firſt Heat of the Controverſie were here rejected, viz. that there was a time before the Son was, or that he was a Creature like other Creatures; for they knew theſe expreſſions would not then be born, and therefore they were forced to refine Arianiſm to the utmoſt degree, to make it paſs down the better, till the prejudice againſt it by the Council of Nice were wholly removed. To which end they ſet forth ſeveral other Confeſſions of Faith to prevent the ſuſpicion of what they aimed at; but theſe were in the time of Conſtantius.

I return therefore to the Reign of Conſtantine, which excellent Prince (p) would ſuffer no alteration to be made in the Nicene Faith in his time; and therefore the Secret Arians were forced to great diſſimulation and hypocriſie, and to carry on their deſign under other pretences. So (q) Theodoret ſaith, That Euſebius and his Party outwardly complied in the Council of Nice out of fear; and he applies to them the ſaying of the Prophet, This People honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. And elſewhere he ſaith, (r) The Arians in the Council ſubſcribed to the Nicene Faith, that being in Sheeps clothing, they might devour like ravening Wolves. (s) Sozomen ſaith, It was reported that Euſebius and Theognis, after their return from Baniſhment, corrupted the Perſon to whom the Subſcriptions of the Council of Nice were committed, and raſed out their own Names; and then openly declared againſt the Son's being of the ſame Subſtance with the Father: and that even to Conſtantine himſelf. But that doth not ſeem credible to me. It being much more probable, which (t) Socrates relates, viz. That Euſebius and Theognis having recover'd the poſſeſſion of their Churches upon their return from Baniſhment had frequent acceſs to the Emperor, who honoured them as his Converts; and under that Pretext of embracing the Nicene Faith, did more miſchief than otherwiſe they could have done: and ſo made a very great Diſturbance in the Church: which he imputes partly to their love of Arianiſm, and partly to their hatred of Athanaſius: but the latter, as Athanaſius at large proves, was on the account of the former.

For, it being their Deſign to introduce Arianiſm, without owning it, next to their leſſening the Authority of the Council of Nice, the moſt effectual means they could think of was, by all poſſible Arts, to blacken and render odious, thoſe Perſons who moſt vigorouſly defended the Nicene Faith. And from hence began the great quarrel againſt Euſtathius, Biſhop of Antioch, and Athanaſius. As to the former, he gives an Account in the Fragment of a Homily extant in (u) Theodoret,

" what ſhuffling the Arians uſed in the Council of Nice to preſerve their Biſhopricks; and, for that Reaſon, ſubſcribed to the Decree of Faith; and ſo, having eſcaped the Cenſures they deſerved, they did ſometimes ſecretly, ſometimes openly, propagate the Opinions there condemned. One of their great Arts, he ſaith, was to decline ſuch as well underſtood the Controverſie, and made it their buſineſs to oppoſe them. And ſo Euſtathius himſelf found to his ſorrow. For, Euſebius of Nicomedia and his Party, meeting together at Antioch, whom (w) Theodoret expreſly calls the Arian Faction, they there proceeded to the depoſing Euſtathius, upon the Accuſation of an infamous Perſon ſuborned to that purpoſe, and afterwards prevailed with Conſtantine to baniſh him; which being done, Theodoret ſaith, There was a Succeſſion of Biſhops, who were ſecret Arians, as of Eulalius, Euphronius and Flaccillus; and that was the Reaſon the Orthodox Party then ſeparated themſelves, and were called Euſtathians. (x) Socrates and (y) Sozomen confeſs, that the quarrel about Arianiſm was renew'd ſoon after the Council of Nice both in Egypt and in Bithynia, Helleſpont and Conſtantinople. But Socrates ſaith, It was begun about the word ὁμοούσιος, which was indeed the Pretext of the Quarrel, but the true Ground was Arianiſm. Socrates, being a Man not throughly verſed in theſe Matters, blames both ſides, for contending about they knew not what; both agreeing in the ſame Doctrine, and yet not agreeing among themſelves. But he did not penetrate into the depth of the Arians Deſigns, as Theodoret, a Man of far greater Judgment and Learning did. And he proves from Euſtathius, an eminent Biſhop of that time, and one preſent in the Council of Nice, that Arianiſm lay at the bottom; and that they complied at firſt only out of Fear, but had the ſame hatred to the true Faith they ever had; but after the Council they durſt not ſo openly ſhew it. (z) Sozomen ſaith, the Arian Party charged thoſe who aſſerted Chriſt of the ſame Subſtance with the Father (as the Council of Nice had determined) with Sabellianiſm and Blaſphemy; and the followers of the Nicene Faith charged the others with Idolatry and Innovation; as aſſerting three diſtinct Gods as to Subſtance, when the Council had declared the Son of the ſame Subſtance with the Father. And he ingenuouſly confeſſeth, that it was generally believed that Euſtathius was depoſed at Antioch for adhering to the Nicene Faith, and declaring himſelf againſt the Arian Party then prevailing in the Eaſt.

Who finding ſuch ſucceſs in their firſt attempt on Euſtathius, they next proceed againſt Athanaſius, the other great Champion of the Council of Nice. They (a) had conceived an inveterate hatred againſt him for his great zeal and activity in that Council, but their rage brake forth, after they heard that he ſucceeded Alexander in the See of Alexandria. Euſebius of Nicomedia was his mortal Enemy, who was removed to be near the Court, (though againſt the Canons;) yet he brake through all, thereby to have opportunity to fill the Emperor's Mind with Jealouſies and Suſpicions of all thoſe that oppoſed them, and eſpecially of Athanaſius. And (b) Socrates gives the true Reaſon of the great Spite againſt Athanaſius, viz. that unleſs he were removed, there was no hopes of the Arian Doctrine prevailing: which he there confeſſes was the thing the Euſebians aimed at. And now they thought ſuch a Snare was laid for Athanaſius, which it was hardly poſſible for him to eſcape. For, upon Arius his Submiſſion, they adviſe Conſtantine to ſend him to Alexandria, there to be received by Athanaſius, as the only way to put an end to all the Diſturbances of the Church. Away goes Arius with the Emperor's Command to Athanaſius: Who, according to their imagination, (c) refuſing to admit him, being anathematized by the Council, as the (d) firſt Broacher of a dangerous Hereſie, they eaſily exaſperated the good Emperor againſt him, as a ſeditious and turbulent Perſon; and ſo plied him with one Accuſation upon another; that at laſt Conſtantine ſent for him to appear before him upon an Information againſt him of no leſs than Treaſonable Practices. But upon a full hearing of the Matter by the Emperor himſelf, (e) he was acquitted, and ſent back with Marks of his Favour and vindication of his Innocency; in an Epiſtle to the People of Alexandria, part of which is extant in (f) Sozomen and (g) Theodoret, but at large in (h) Athanaſius. One would think this ſhould have diſcouraged his Enemies from any farther Proſecution of him; but theſe Euſebians were Men of reſtleſs, ambitious, implacable Spirits, that ſcrupled no means to compaſs their ends, which they thought they could never do, unleſs they could blaſt the Reputation of Athanaſius. To this end, they laid a moſt malitious deſign againſt him. Firſt, (i) they draw in the (k) Meletian Party in Egypt to join with them; who hoped to get their ends one upon the other afterwards; but at preſent they were willing to join together againſt their common Enemy; for ſo Athanaſius was accounted by them. And (l) Euſebius promiſed the Meletians great favour at Court, if they would manage the buſineſs againſt Athanaſius: which they undertook; and by their means ſo many Complaints were brought againſt Athanaſius to the Emperor, that he was forced for the general Satisfaction, to appoint a Council at Tyre, which was according to the Euſebians deſire, where things were managed with ſo little regard to Juſtice or common Honeſty, that, after he had plainly cleared himſelf as to the main Accuſations, he yet found they were reſolved to condemn him; and therefore he privately withdrew from thence to the Imperial Court, to acquaint the Emperor with the horrible Partiality there uſed. Upon (m) this he writes a very ſmart Letter to them, and requires them to come ſpeedily to him, (n) to give him an account of their violent Proceedings. They ſend a ſelect Number of their Party to Court with Euſebius of Nicomedia in the Head of them, who there quit all the Accuſations brought againſt Athanaſius at Tyre, and ſtart a new one which touched the Emperor in a very tender part, viz. That he had threatned to hinder the bringing Corn from Egypt to Conſtantinople; which was in effect to threaten the ſtarving his beloved City; which nettled the Emperor ſo much, that it tranſported him beyond his uſual Temper, and immediately he gave order for baniſhing Athanaſius into Gaul. Not long after Conſtantine died, but before his death, ſaith (o) Theodoret, he gave order for the recalling Athanaſius, to the great regret of Euſebius of Nicomedia then preſent.

Let any one now judge, whether in Conſtantine's time the Arian Faction were wholly ſuppreſt; and whether Euſebius and his Party were men that only pretended to Prudence and Moderation; Who made uſe of the moſt malitious, unjuſt, abominable means, to ſuppreſs the chiefeſt Oppoſers of the Arian Faction? What will not ſuch men ſay to ſerve a turn, who dare to tell the World, That the Euſebians were no leſs Enemies to the Arians than to the orthodox, and that it is a great and common Miſtake, that Euſebius was the ring-leader of the Arian Faction? If it be a Miſtake, others have it from Athanaſius, and it is hard to believe that man ever read (p) Athanaſius his Writings, who dare ſay the the contrary. All the Biſhops of Egypt in their Synodical Epiſtle from Alexandria charge the (q) Euſebians with a reſtleſs deſire to promote Arianiſm; and affirm, that their malicious proſecution of Athanaſius was for no other end; that their Councils were called with a Deſign to overthrow that of Nice; that they had written againſt them as Arians; that the Euſebians joined with the Meletians only for the ſake of Arianiſm; that the Perſons ſent by the Council of Tyre into Egypt were Arians, and therefore declared Enemies; and whatever their pretences were, nothing but the advancing Arianiſm lay at the bottom. Were ſo many Biſhops guilty of ſo groſs a Miſtake, who had certainly greater opportunity of knowing, and skill in judging the Men and their Deſigns than the moſt quick-ſighted Perſon of our Age can have? It would be endleſs to recite all the paſſages in Athanaſius his Apology, and Epiſtles, and Diſcourſes of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, to prove that the Euſebians carried on the Arian Deſign, ſince a great part of them is ſpent in the proof of it. But we are told, with confidence enough, that the Synod of Alexandria, in their Synodical Epiſtle, do not in the leaſt accuſe the Euſebians of Arianiſm, but only of holding Communion with them, i. e. with the Arians. This cannot but ſeem ſtrange to any one that will be at the pains to peruſe that excellent Epiſtle. And even in that page, it is expreſly ſaid, (r) their violent and malicious proceedings againſt Athanaſius were on purpoſe to diſcourage others from daring to oppoſe Arianiſm; and this with a particular deſign to introduce that Hereſie. Could any Men be thought to take ſo much pains to ſet up a Doctrine they had no kindneſs to? i. e. Would any but ſecret Arians endeavour to ſet up Arianiſm? Unleſs we ſuppoſe them ſuch Tools to be made uſe of by others to do their buſineſs, and then to be laid aſide. But the Euſebians were no ſuch mean Politicians; for they were at the top of buſineſs, having all the advantages and opportunities to carry on their own ends; and therefore we have all the Reaſon in the World to conclude them ſecret Arians, who were at ſo much trouble to leſſen the Credit of the Oppoſers of Arianiſm: Which they look'd on as one of the moſt effectual means to introduce it. And although they did not openly declare themſelves in behalf of the Arian Doctrine, after the Council of Nice; which had been to hinder their own Deſign, in the time of Conſtantine; yet they made uſe of all the Methods which bad Men do to carry on their ends; viz. by falſe Inſinuations, lying Pretences, and all manner of malicious Proceedings againſt thoſe who ſtood in their Way; as is moſt notorious in the caſe of Athanaſius.

After the Death of Conſtantine we are told, that all the Councils under Conſtantius that are commonly accounted Arian, have as fully and clearly condemned Arianiſm, as the Nicene Council it ſelf; It is true, they could not digeſt the Word ὁμοούσιος; but otherwiſe, as for the whole Scheme of Arianiſm, they have in all their Creeds anathematized it with all clearneſs and fulneſs of Expreſſion. This is ſomewhat ſtrange Doctrine for one who pretends to have read Athanaſius, who hath taken ſo much pains to lay open the juggling of the Arian Faction in all thoſe Councils; and, one would think, by this manner of Writing, ſuch a Man took a particular pleaſure in contradicting him. For in his (s) Book of the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, he ſaith, none of the Councils under Conſtantius could be brought to anathematize the Arian Hereſie, as the Council of Nice did. He ſaith, that Conſtantius himſelf was an Arian Heretick, and

p. 839. and that his chief Deſign in all thoſe Councils was, to take away the force
p. 874 of the Council of Nice. He ſaith indeed, they were not ſuch Fools to own this, but this was the true Reaſon of all the Councils they called, and the diſturbance p. 870. they made, to the great Scandal of the Chriſtian World. Nay, he
p. 874. ſaith, that in all their Councils they never once mention'd the Arian Hereſie as an evil thing: and if any Hereſies were mention'd, the Arian was excepted, which the Nicene Council anathematized; and they received with great kindneſs ſuch as were known to be Arians; which is an Argument that the calling theſe Councils was not for eſtabliſhing the Truth, but for overthrowing the Council of Nice. And to ſhew what Conſtantius his
p. 907. own Mind was, he obſerves, that when he came to die he would be baptized by none but Euzoius, who had been ſeveral times depoſed for Arianiſm; and he there affirms, that Conſtantius continued an Arian to the laſt. As
p. 909. to the Word ὁμοούσιος about which ſo much ſtir was made, he takes notice, that all the offence that was taken at it, was by the Arians; and the true Cauſe was, becauſe it ſtruck at the root of their Hereſie. And as to the Word Subſtance, he wonder'd they ſhould ſo vehemently oppoſe it, when themſelves confeſſed, the Son was from the Father; for either he muſt be from ſomething without him, or ſomething within him diſtinct from his Subſtance, or he muſt be of the Subſtance of the Father; or they muſt make the Word and the Son to be no real Subſtance, but mere Names; and ſo they did not really believe what they expreſſed. And he farther ſhews, that no other way
p. 910. of ſpeaking doth ſufficiently expreſs the Difference between the Son of God and his Creatures; which are only the effects of God's Will. From whence p. 914. he concludes, that the oppoſition to theſe Terms, whatever was pretended, was from a diſlike of the Doctrine eſtabliſhed in the Council of Nice. For if it had been a mere doubt about the ſignification of the Words, they ought
p. 915. to have explained their own ſenſe, and withall to have condemned the Arian Hereſie.

It cannot be denied that there were ſome who agreed in the Subſtance of the Doctrine with the Council of Nice, but yet diſliked the ibid. Term ὁμοούσιος; as to theſe Athanaſius confeſſes them to be Brethren; as long as they acknowledged the Son not to be a Creature, nor to be from another Subſtance diſtinct from the Father. And among theſe he reckons
p. 916. Baſilius of Ancyra; whoſe Doctrine he doth not ſeem to diſlike, provided that to the ſimilitude of Subſtance in the Son they add his being of the Subſtance of the Father. And in this ſenſe the τὸ ὁμοιούσιον comes to the ſame with the τὸ ὁμοούσιον. There were two great Arguments, there uſed againſt the Term ὁμοούσιος; The firſt was, that it implied a Partition or Diviſion of the Divine Subſtance, as a Son among Men is ſaid to be of the ſame Subſtance with his Father, but ſo, as that there is a Diviſion of the ſame common Nature in the ſeveral individuals. To this Athanaſius anſwers, “That the Divine Generation muſt not be apprehended “ like the humane; but our Conceptions of God muſt be agreeable “ to the Divine Nature; and therefore we muſt not imagine “ the Son of God to be of the Subſtance with the Father, after the “ ſame manner that the Son of Man is. For, as he is the Son, ſo he “ is the Word and Wiſdom of the Father: and the internal Word “ or Conception in Man is no diviſible part of himſelf; but leſt the “ Notion of Word ſhould ſeem to deſtroy his real Subſiſtence, therefore “ the Notion of Son is added in Scripture to that of Word; that we “ may know him to be a living Word and ſubſtantial Wiſdom. So that “ when we ſay, the Son is conſubſtantial to the Father, we underſtand

“ it not by way of Diviſion, as among Bodies, but abſtracting our “ Minds from all corporeal things, we attribute this to the Son of “ God, in a way agreeing to the Divine Nature, and mean by it, that “ he is not produced by his Will as the Creatures are, nor merely his “ Son by Adoption; but that he is the true Eternal Son of God; by “ ſuch an emanation as Splendour from Light, or Water from the “ Fountain. And therefore when they interpreted the Term Son in a “ way agreeable to the Divine Nature, he wonders they ſhould ſtick ſo “ much at the word Conſubſtantial, which was capable of the ſame “ Interpretation. The ſecond Objection was, That thoſe who condemned the Samoſatenian Hereſie, rejected the Word ὁμοούσιον. In anſwer to this, Athanaſius ſhews, “ That the Word was ſo much uſed and allowed p. 918. “ in the Chriſtian Church before the Samoſatenian Hereſie was “ heard of, that when Dionyſius of Alexandria was accuſed to Dionyſius of Rome, for rejecting it; the Council thereupon was ſo much “ concerned, that the Biſhop of Rome wrote their ſenſe to the Biſhop “ of Alexandria about it, he returns an Anſwer, wherein he owns all “ the ſenſe contained under it, as appears by his Epiſtle in Athanaſius; “ but for thoſe who oppoſed Paulus Samoſatenus, he ſaith, they took “ the Word in a corporeal ſenſe, as if it implied a diſtinct Subſtance “ from the Father; But, ſaith he, thoſe who condemned the Arians “ ſaw farther into this matter; conſidering that it ought not to be “ applied to the Divine Nature as it is to corporeal Subſtances; and “ the Son of God not being a Creature, but begotten of the Subſtance of the Father; therefore with great Reaſon they uſed the “ Word ὁμοούσιον, as being moſt proper to expreſs the Senſe of the “ Chriſtian Church againſt the Arian Hereſie; as he ſhews there p. 920. 921. “ at large.

From theſe paſſages of Athanaſius it appears that there was a third Party then in the Church diſtinct from the Niceniſts and the Euſebians. The former would by no means yield to any relaxation of the Council of Nice; becauſe they evidently ſaw that this Deſign was carried on by thoſe who made it their buſineſs under that pretence to introduce Arianiſm, who were the Euſebians. But there were others extremely concerned for the Peace of the Church, and on that account were willing to let go the Term ὁμοούσιον, hoping the Doctrine might be ſecured by other Expreſſions; and this facility of theirs gave the greateſt advantage to the Euſebian Party in all their Councils, who continually almoſt over-reached and out-witted them, under the pretence of Accommodation. For by this Artifice they gained their Votes, and when they had them, made uſe of them merely to ſerve their own Deſigns; as appears by the Account the Hiſtorians give of the management of the Arian Affairs under the Reign of Conſtantius.

(t) Socrates ſaith, that immediately after the death of Conſtantine, (t) Socr. l. 2. c. 2. Euſebius and Theognis, the Heads of the Arian Faction, apprehended it now to be a convenient ſeaſon for them to throw down the Nicene Faith, and to ſet up Arianiſm; and to this purpoſe they endeavoured to hinder Athanaſius from returning to Alexandria. But firſt they gained the Eunuchs and Court-favorites, then the Wife of Conſtantius himſelf, to embrace l. 2. c. 26. Arianiſm: and ſo the Controverſie of a ſudden ſpread into the Court, Camp, Cities and all Places of the Eaſt; (for the Weſtern Churches continued quiet during the Reign of Conſtans, to whoſe ſhare all the Weſtern Provinces in a ſhort time fell.) After the Death of Alexander, der, Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the two Parties openly divided in the

c. 6. Choice of a Succeſſour; the one chuſing Paulus, and the Arians, Macedonius; this nettled Conſtantius, who coming to Conſtantinople calls a Council of Arian Biſhops, who depoſe Paulus, and ſet up Euſebius of Nicomedia; who preſently falls to work, going with the Emperor to Antioch, where, under the pretence of a Dedication, as is obſerved in the precedent Chapter, a Council of ninety Biſhops was aſſembled;
c. 8 but the Deſign was, ſaith Socrates, to overthrow the Nicene Faith. Here they made ſome Canons to enſnare Athanaſius (of which before.) As to the matter of Faith, they durſt not openly propoſe the nulling the Council of Nice; but they gained this great Point, That the Matters of Faith might be diſcuſſed after it, and ſo they ſet open the Gate for New Councils which by degrees might eſtabliſh the Arian Hereſie.

(u) Soz. l. 3. c. 1. (u) Sozomen ſaith, that after the death of Conſtantine the ſecret Arians began to ſhew themſelves more openly; among whom Euſebius and Theognis eſpecially beſtirr'd themſelves to advance Arianiſm. He agrees with Socrates as to the ſpreading of it in the Court and elſewhere; and in the other particulars, to the Council at Antioch; but he ſaith, they
c. 5. framed their Confeſſion of Faith in ſuch ambiguous Terms, that neither Party could quarrel with the Words. But they left out any mention of the Subſtance of Father and Son, and the Word Conſubſtantial; and ſo in effect overthrew the Council of Nice.

This is that Confeſſion of Faith, which the Council in Iſauria called (w) Athanaſ. de Synod p. 904. p. 895. (w) the Authentick one made at Antioch in the Dedication. But it was not ſo Authentick but they thought good to alter it; and ſome Months after ſent another to Conſtans to explain themſelves more fully; whereby they reject thoſe who ſaid, the Son was made of Nothing or of another Hypoſtaſis, and not from God. Who could imagine theſe to have been any other than very ſound and orthodox Men? Eſpecially when three years after, they ſent a larger Confeſſion of Faith into the Weſtern Parts for their own Vindication, wherein they anathematize thoſe who held three Gods, or that Chriſt was not God, or that he was begotten of any other Subſtance beſides God, &c. But that there was juggling under all this appears, becauſe, as Athanaſius obſerves, they were ſtill altering their Forms; for this again was changed ſeveral times at Sirmium, before they reſolved upon that which was to be carried to the Council of Ariminum. And although the difference in the matters of Faith as delivered by them ſeem'd now very nice and ſubtle, yet they were irreconcilably ſet againſt the Council of Nice and all that adhered to it. Which was a plain Evidence that they concealed their Senſe under ambiguous Words, or that they ſaw it neceſſary at preſent to ſeem Orthodox, that ſo they might the better ſet aſide the Council of Nice; which being once effected, it would be an eaſie matter to ſet up Arianiſm, which was the thing they deſigned.

This Intrigue was not diſcovered fully till after the Council of Ariminum, but was certainly carried on all along by the Euſebian Party, who without theſe Artifices could never have deceived the Eaſtern Biſhops, who joined with them till they more openly declared themſelves in the Council of Seleucia; and then the difference was not between the Acacians and Euſebians, as ſome have weakly conjectured, but between the old Euſebians, who now appear'd to be Arians under the Name of Acacius, and the Followers of Baſilius of Ancyra, who ſtuck chiefly at the word ὁμοιούσιος; of whom Athanaſius ſpeaks before. Now to draw in theſe Men, and to hold them faſt, who had great ſway in the Eaſtern Churches, the Euſebians were forced to comply in words with them, and in all probability to ſuffer them to draw up theſe Creeds, provided only that they left out the Nicene Decree and Anathema's, which would do their buſineſs at laſt. So that the Euſebians were forced to the utmoſt Diſſimulation and Hypocriſie, to be able to carry on the Arian Deſign in the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches. But whatever their Words and Pretences were, their Actions ſufficiently manifeſted their Intentions. For they ſet themſelves with the utmoſt violence againſt all who conſtantly adhered to the Council of Nice, and openly favoured and preferr'd all the declared or ſecret Friends to Arianiſm. They cauſed Athanaſius to be baniſhed a ſecond time from Alexandria, and appointed Gregory in his Place, who continued there, ſaith (x) Theodoret, with great Cruelty for ſix years, and then was murthered himſelf by the Alexandrians; but that ſeems to have been a miſtake for George of Cappadocia, who ſucceeded him. For (y) Athanaſius ſaith, he died a natural death; but he at large deſcribes the horrible Perſecution both of the Clergy and Laity then in Egypt, who would not comply with the Arians; for his buſineſs was to ſet up Arianiſm, as Athanaſius ſaith. After his Death, Conſtantius finding ſo little ſucceſs of thoſe violent Courſes, ſends for Athanaſius with great earneſtneſs to come to him; and gives him free Liberty to return to Alexandria; and ſolemnly ſwears to him, he would never more receive any Calumnies againſt him; and writes ſeveral Letters on his behalf: and one very kind one to himſelf after the death of his Brother Conſtans, who was a true Friend to Athanaſius: and then his greateſt Enemies courted him, and begg'd his Pardon for what they had done; being forced to it by the violence of the Torrent againſt him: and even Urſacius and Valens, two warm Men of the Euſebian Party, publickly recanted what they had done againſt him, without his ſeeking, and then anathematized the Arian Hereſie. But this was done while Conſtans was alive, and ſo great a Number appeared in the Weſtern Churches on his ſide; but Conſtans being dead, the Euſebian Party perſuade Conſtantius, to take heart once more and to try what he could do to reſtore Arianiſm; then Valens and Urſacius recant their recantation, and lay it all on the Fear of Conſtans; and now to ſhew the Emperor's zeal for Arianiſm, the publick allowance is taken from Athanaſius and his Party, and given to the Arians; and the Magiſtrates threatned, if they did not communicate with them; and not only the People baniſhed that refuſed, but the Biſhops were ſummoned to appear in the Courts and were there told, they muſt immediately ſubſcribe or loſe their Places. But all this while Toleration was granted to all but to the followers of the Council of Nice. And thus all Places were fill'd with Tumult and Diſorder, and the People forced their Biſhops to the Tribunals for fear of being puniſhed themſelves. And the Reaſon of his Violence was, becauſe the Arian Hereſie was ſo much hated by the People, and they hoped by this means to bring them to own it. Heraclius, the Emperor's Lieutenant, declared in his Name, that Athanaſius was to be caſt out, and the Churches given to the Arians; and required the People to receive ſuch a Biſhop as he ſhould ſend, viz. George of Cappadocia, a violent Arian. But the tragical Account of all the Perſecutions, which the orthodox Chriſtians then underwent in Egyt, from from theſe Men of Prudence and Moderation is at large ſet down by Athanaſius himſelf; and in the concurrent Teſtimony of the People of Alexandria; ſo that nothing ſeems to have been more violent and cruel in the Heathen Perſecutions than was acted under Syrianus and Heraclius in Egypt. And that it was wholly for the ſake of Arianiſm, Athanaſius evidently proves by this Argument, That if a Man were guilty of never ſo great Crimes, if he profeſſed himſelf an Arian, he eſcaped; but if he p. 810. were an Oppoſer of Arianiſm the greateſt Innocency could not protect him.

811. But this was not the Caſe of Egypt alone, but in other Places, The beſt Qualification for a Biſhop was to ſtand well inclined to Arianiſm; as p. 812. Athanaſius affirms. But otherwiſe, though the Perſons were never ſo well deſerving; one fault or other was found with them to caſt them out: So, ſaith he, it was with Euſtathius, Biſhop of Antioch, a Man famous for his Piety and Zeal, yet becauſe he appeared againſt Arianiſm, feigned Accuſations are brought againſt him, and he is ejected with his Clergy, and none but favourers of Arianiſm placed in their room; and the like Examples he brings at Laodicea, Tripolis, Germanicia, Sebaſtea, Hadrianople and many other places; inſomuch that a conſiderable Biſhop ſcarce any where appear'd againſt Arianiſm, but they found ſome pretence or other to put him out, and where they could alledge no other Cauſe, p. 813. they ſaid, It was the Pleaſure of Conſtantius. But their dealing with Paulus, the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, was very remarkable. He being choſen by the Anti-Arian Party, and ſtanding in the Way of Euſebius of Nicomedia, whoſe heart was ſet upon that Biſhoprick, being ſo near the Imperial Court, he firſt procured Paulus his Baniſhment to Pontus, then he was ſent in Chains to Singara of Meſopotamia, thence to Emeſa, thence to Pontus, thence to Cucuſus, where he was at length ſtrangled by the Euſebian Party, as Athanaſius ſaith, he had it from the Perſons there preſent. But although Macedonius who ſucceeded at (z) Soz. l. 4. c. 2. Conſtantinople were of a temper violent enough, as (z) Sozomen ſhews, (a) Theod. l. 2. c. 6. yet (a) Theodoret obſerves, that even he was expelled Conſtantinople, becauſe he would not hold the Son of God to be a Creature; For, although he denied Chriſt to be Conſubſtantial with the Father; yet he aſſerted him to be like the Father in all things, and made the Holy Ghoſt to be a Creature; by which he ſeem'd to deny the Son to be ſo, and there could not keep the Favour of the Arian Party, which then governed all in the Eaſtern Churches; but yet in ſuch a manner, as by no means, yet to declare for Arianiſm. And therefore Theodoret takes notice, that after the c. 25. death of Leontius, Eudoxius was the firſt who pulled off his Vizard, and declared openly for Arianiſm; but Leontius his way was, to promote only thoſe in the Church, he was before hand ſure of, and to ſuffer no other to come into Orders, by which means, ſaith he, moſt of the Clergy were Arians, and the People ſtill continued ſound in the Nicene Faith, till Eudoxius his Perſecution began.

This was the miſerable Condition of the Eaſtern Churches under the Prudence and Moderation of the Euſebian Party; but the Weſtern Churches continued quiet and very little diſturbed with the Arian Hereſie while Conſtans lived; who was ready, not only to maintain the true Faith in his own Dominions, but to give his Aſſiſtance for the Relief of thoſe who ſuffer'd in the Eaſtern Parts. Which was the Reaſon of the calling of the Council of Sardica by conſent of both Emperors, although that happen'd only to widen and inlarge the Breach. However the Sardican Council had ſuch effect in the Weſtern Parts, as to the buſineſs of Athanaſius, that as (b) Athanaſius tells Conſtantius, Valens and Urſacius, two very buſie Factors in the Arian Cauſe, freely own the malicious Intrigue that was carried on in the proſecution of him. The firſt Council of Milan is ſuppoſed by (c) Petavius, to be called the ſame year that of Sardica ended. But (d) Sirmondus thinks it very improbable there ſhould be two Councils in one year; and therefore he believes it rather to have been the year before: which is the more probable Opinion. This Council of Milan was aſſembled on the occaſion of ſeveral Biſhops there meeting to wait on the Emperor Conſtans in order to a General Council, to put things in order in the Chriſtian Church, which the Arian Faction had ſo much diſturbed. While they were there the four Eaſtern Biſhops arrived, with the long Confeſſion made at Antioch, and deſire the Weſtern Biſhops concurrence with them in it. Theſe expreſs their diſlike of any New Confeſſion of Faith, eſpecially after the Nicene; but, ſince they were ſo free of their Anathema's at the end of their Confeſſion, they deſired them to make ſhort Work of it, to anathematize the Arian Hereſie; which they utterly refuſed to do, and ſo diſcover'd the Juggle of that ſeeming orthodox Confeſſion. This appears by Liberius his Epiſtle in the Collection of Church Records in (e) Hilary's Fragments; in which he tells Conſtantius, that theſe four Biſhops were ſo far from anathematizing the Arian Hereſie then in order to Peace, that upon being preſſed to do it, they roſe up in a Rage and left the Council. From hence the Weſtern Biſhops ſmelt their Deſign, however cover'd over with fair Pretences of Peace and Reconciliation. Which they farther diſcover'd by their own Legates, whom they ſent into the Eaſt, who made this Offer to the Biſhops there, that they would accept of their own Terms of Accommodation, provided, they would but condemn the Arian Hereſie, which upon conſultation they refuſed to do. Upon theſe plain Diſcoveries, the Weſtern Biſhops could eaſily ſee through all their propoſals for Peace; being only made with a Deſign to make them betray the Faith. So that as long as Conſtans lived the Arian Faction could make little or no impreſſion on the Weſtern Churches; but he being ſoon after taken off by the Treachery of Magnentius, Captain of his Guards; and the whole Empire falling to Conſtantius upon his Victory over Magnentius, a ſudden alteration here happen'd about theſe Matters. Valens and Urſacius who had ſo ſolemnly retracted their former unjuſt Sentence of Athanaſius, now lay it upon their fear of Conſtans, and appear in the Head of the Arian Faction, and with them, as (f) Severus Sulpicius ſaith, the two Pannonia's declared for Arianiſm. And now they having an Emperor to their mind, reſolve to loſe no time, but carry things on with a mighty violence, and baniſh all who would not ſubſcribe to the condemning Athanaſius. For this ſtale Pretence muſt ſtill be made uſe of to deceive the People and to make way for Arianiſm; and yet this prevailed ſo far, that, as Hilary ſaith, in the Preface to his Fragments, the People wondred what made ſo many Biſhops go into Baniſhment, rather than condemn one; and the Deſign of thoſe Fragments is, to ſhew that the Matter of Faith lay at the bottom of all this violence againſt Athanaſius. Which proceeded ſo far, that in the Council called at Arles, Paulinus, Biſhop of Triers, was for oppoſing the condemning Athanaſius, and deſiring the Matters of Faith might firſt be ſettled, depoſed by the Council and baniſhed by the Emperor. And ſo great then was the Power of Fear upon them, that ſome of thoſe very Perſons, who had clear'd Athanaſius at the Council of Sardica, dica, did now ſubſcribe to his condemnation; among whom was Vincentius of Capua the Pope's own Legate; as (g) Athanaſius himſelf confeſſes. Not long after, Conſtantius ſummons another Council at Milan; where, (h) Socrates and (i) Sozomen ſay, above three hundred Weſtern Biſhops were aſſembled: Here again the Arian Faction made a great outcry about Athanaſius; but Dionyſius, Biſhop of Milan, and Euſebius of Vercelles, laid open the Deſign ſo far as to make the Council be broken up and themſelves to be baniſhed by the Emperor's Edict. While the Emperor continued at Milan, Liberius, Biſhop of Rome, was ſummon'd to attend upon him there, in order to his Baniſhment, if he did not condemn Athanaſius; (k) Theodoret hath preſerved the moſt material paſſages that happen'd between them; One whereof is, that if Conſtantius really deſigned the Peace of the Church, the firſt thing was to be a general Subſcription of the Nicene Faith, after which other things would more eaſily be compoſed. But this would not be hearkned to; and ſo Liberius was baniſhed; but afterwards he unworthily complied not only to the Condemnation of Athanaſius, but he profeſſed his conſent to the Sirmian Creed, as appears by his Epiſtle in (l) Hilary's Fragments; for which Hilary beſtows his Anathema's very freely upon him. But it is of late pleaded on behalf of Liberius, that he ſubſcribed only to the firſt Sirmian Confeſſion in the Council againſt Photinus which was expreſs againſt the Arian Hereſie. Whereas Hilary (who, I think, knew this matter ſomewhat better) ſaith in ſo many Words, Hæc eſt perfidia Ariana, i.e. that what he ſubſcribed, contained in it the Arian Hereſie. But where doth Hilary or any one elſe ſay, that Liberius only ſubſcribed the firſt Confeſſion of Sirmium, and upon that was reſtored? Nay, (m) Sozomen ſaith, that Conſtantius at firſt required him in terms to renounce the Son's being Conſubſtantial to the Father: but afterwards they joined together the Confeſſion againſt Paulus Samoſatenus and Photinus, with that of Antioch at the Dedication, and to theſe Liberius ſubſcribed. So that he ſtruck in wholly with the Arian Faction which undermined the Authority of the Council of Nice, and he betray'd the Faith, if he did not renounce it. The Eudoxians at Antioch, he ſaith, gave out that both Oſius and Liberius had renounced the Nicene Faith, and declared the Son to be unlike the Father: but Liberius clear'd himſelf by rejecting the Doctrine of the Anomæans, i.e. the open and profeſſed Arians; and this Urſacius, Valens and Germinius then at Sirmium were willing to accept of, having a farther Deſign to carry on in theſe Parts, which was like to be ſpoiled by the Anomæans appearing ſo openly and unſeaſonably in the Eaſt. And for the ſame Reaſon, they were willing to call in that which Hilary calls the Blaſphemy of Oſius and Potamius, as being too open and giving Offence to the Followers of Baſilius of Ancyra in the Eaſt. For now the Emperor having baniſhed ſo many Biſhops and ſtruck ſo much terrour into the reſt, thought it a convenient time to ſettle the Church-affairs to his mind in theſe Weſtern Parts, and to that end he ſummoned a General Council; but juſtly fearing the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops would no more agree now than they did before at Sardica; he appoints the former to meet at Seleucia in Iſauria, and the latter at Ariminum; whoſe Number, ſaith (n) Severus Sulpicius, came to above four hundred, and to the ſame purpoſe (o) Sozomen. When they were aſſembled, Valens and Urſacius acquainted them with the Emperor's good Intentions in calling them together, and as the only Expedient for the Peace of the Church,

Church, they propoſed, that all former Confeſſions of Faith ſhould be laid aſide, as tending to diſſention; and this to be univerſally received, which they had brought with them from Sirmium; where it was drawn up by ſeveral Biſhops, and approved by the Emperor. Upon the reading this New Confeſſion of Faith, wherein the Son is ſaid to be like the Father, according to the Scriptures, and the Name of Subſtance agreed to be wholly laid aſide: the Biſhops at Ariminum appeared very much unſatisfied; and declared, they were for keeping to the Nicene Faith without alteration; and required of the Arian Party there preſent to ſubſcribe it, before they proceeded any farther; which they refuſing to doe, they forthwith (p) excommunicated and depoſed them, and proteſted againſt all Innovations in matters of Faith. And of theſe Proceedings of theirs, they ſend an account by ſeveral Legates of their own, wherein they expreſs their Reſolution to adhere to the Nicene Faith, as the moſt effectual (q) (r) (s) Bar againſt Arianiſm and other Hereſies; and they add, that the removing of it would open the Breach for Hereſie to enter into the Church. They charge Urſacius and Valens with having once been Partakers of the Arian Hereſie, and on that account thrown out of the Church; but were received in again upon their Submiſſion and Recantation: but now they ſay, in this Council of Ariminum, they had made a freſh Attempt on the Faith of the Church, bringing in a Doctrine full of Blaſphemies; as it is in Socrates; but in Hilary's Fragments it is only, that their Faith contained multa perverſæ Doctrinæ; which ſhews that they looked on the Sirmian Creed as dangerous and heretical. And in the ſame (t) Fragments it appears by the Acts of the Council, that they proceeded againſt Valens, Urſacius, Germinius and Caius as Hereticks and Introducers of Hereſie; and then made a ſolemn Proteſtation, that they would never recede from the Nicene Faith.

Their ten Brethren whom they ſent to Conſtantius to acquaint him with the Proceedings of the Council, he would not admit to ſpeak with him: For he was informed beforehand by the Arian Party how things went in the Council, at which he was extreamly diſpleaſed, and reſolved to mortifie the Biſhops, ſo as to bring them to his Will at laſt. He (u) ſends word to the Council how much his Thoughts were then taken up with his Eaſtern Expedition, and that theſe Matters required greater freedom of Mind to examine them than he had at ſuch a time; and ſo commands the Legates to wait at Hadrianople till his Return. The Council perceived by this Meſſage that his Deſign was to weary them out, hoping at laſt, as (w) Theodoret expreſſes it, to bring them to conſent to the demoliſhing that Bulwark which kept Hereſie out of the Church, i. e. the Authority of the Council of Nice. To this ſmart Meſſage the Council returned a reſolute Reply, That they would not recede from their former Decree; but humbly beg leave to return to their Biſhopricks before Winter; being put to great hardſhips in that ſtrait Place. This was to let the Emperor know how he might deal with them, and he ſends a charge to his Lieutenant, not to let them ſtir till they all conſented. And in the mean time effectual means were uſed with their Legates in the Eaſt to bring them to terms; an account whereof we have in (x) Hilary's Fragments, which were to null all the former Proceedings, and to receive thoſe who were there depoſed, to Communion. Which being done, they were ſent back to decoy the reſt of the Council; who at firſt were very ſtiff, but by degrees they were ſo ſoftned, (y) Athan. ad Afric. p. 934.

It is time now to conſider, how far thoſe Churches can be charged with Arianiſm, whoſe Biſhops were there preſent and conſented to the Decrees of this Council. It is a noted Saying of (z) St. Jerome on this Occaſion, that the World then groaned and wondered at its being become Arian. Which a late Authour ſaith, is a paſſage quite worn out by our Innovators. Whom doth he mean by theſe Innovators? The Divines of the Church of England, who from time to time have made uſe of it? Not to prove an Apoſtaſie of the Catholick Church from the true Faith; which no Man in his Wits ever dream'd of, but from hence to overthrow the pretended Infallibility of General Councils, or ſuch as have been ſo called. And notwithſtanding the opprobrious Name of Innovators (which, as we find in thoſe of the Church of Rome, often belongs to thoſe who give it to others) it is very eaſie to prove, that this one Inſtance of the Council of Ariminum doth overthrow not only the Pretence to the Infallibility of General Councils, but the abſolute binding Authority of any, till after due examination of the Reaſons and Motives of their Proceedings. For it is apparent by the whole Series of the Story, as I have faithfully deduced it, that the whole Deſign of the Arian Party was to overthrow the Authority of the Council of Nice; which they were never able to compaſs by a General Council till this of Ariminum, agreeing as they declared with the Eaſtern Biſhops. So that here was a Conſent both of the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, the Council of Ariminum being approved by (a) (b) (c) a Council at Conſtantinople the ſame Year. What is now to be ſaid, when the Biſhops aſſembled in Council both in the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches did effectually as far as their Decrees went, overthrow the Nicene Council? If it be ſaid, that the Council of Ariminum decreed nothing poſitively againſt the Nicene Faith; we are to conſider, that the reverſing the Decree of the Nicene Council was in effect overthrowing the Faith thereby eſtabliſhed; And ſo St. Hierome ſaith, Tunc Uſiæ Nomen abolitum eſt, tunc Nicenæ Fidei damnatio conclamata eſt. And then theſe Words follow, Ingemuit totus Orbis & Arianum ſe eſſe miratus eſt: and if nothing would ever be able to ſtop out the Arian Hereſie but the Nicene Faith, as is confeſſed; and this Council took away the Authority of that Council, then it at leaſt made way for the introducing Hereſie, and left all Men to be Hereticks that had a mind to be ſo. And ſo St. Hierome ſaith, Valens and Urſacius after the Council boaſted, that they never denied the Son to be a Creature, but to be like other Creatures: from whence (d) St. Ambroſe takes it for granted, that Chriſt's being a Creature did paſs for good Doctrine in the Council of Ariminum. But we are told, that St. Jerome only complains of the World's being cheated and trepan'd into Arianiſm by the Biſhops being ſo weakly over-reached and outwitted by an handful of Arians. Doth not St. Jerome plainly ſay, the Name of Subſtance was there laid aſide, and the Council of Nice condemned? And could this be a mere Cheat and Trepan to thoſe who were ſo much aware of it, as to declare at firſt, they would never give way to it, it, becauſe they ſaw the danger of it; and to renew their Proteſtations againſt it, after the Emperor's ſevere Meſſage to them about it? So that, whatever it was, it could be no Cheat or Trepan in thoſe who made ſuch Decrees at firſt, depoſed the Arian Biſhops, ſent ſuch Meſſages to the Emperour as they did. Which is a plain Demonſtration, that they ſaw and knew what they did; and underſtood the Conſequences of it. But they were frighted into this Conſent at laſt. I grant they were ſo, but what then becomes of the Infallibility of Councils, if mere Fear can make ſo many Biſhops in Council act and declare againſt their Conſciences? If in ſuch Meetings, the Perſons were capable of being ſway'd by any particular biaſs, from aſſerting the Truth, what Security can there be as to Mens Faith from their Authority, any farther than we can be ſecure they were not influenced by any Temporal Hopes or Fears? So that we are not barely to reſpect the Definitions of Councils, but to examine the Motives by which they were acted in paſſing thoſe Decrees; and if it appear, they did act freely and ſincerely, and deliver the general ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church, from the beginning, as it was in the Caſe of the Nicene Council, then a mighty regard ought to be ſhewed to the Decrees of it; but if Partiality, Intereſt, Fear, or any other ſecular Motive be found to ſway them in their Debates and Reſolutions, then every particular Church is at liberty to refuſe their Decrees, and to adhere to thoſe of more free and indifferent Councils. And this was the Caſe here, as to the Council of Ariminum, if the Church had been abſolutely tied up to the Decrees of Councils, however paſt, there had been an utter Impoſſibility of reſtoring the true Chriſtian Faith; for there was no ſuch Council aſſembled to reverſe the Decrees of it; but in every Church, the baniſhed Biſhops being returned, not long after, upon the death of Conſtantius, they took care to ſettle the true Faith in the Weſtern Churches, by leſſer Aſſemblies of the ſeveral Biſhops. A remarkable Inſtance whereof appears in (e) Hilary's Fragments, where we find the Gallican Biſhops met at Paris, renouncing the Council of Ariminum, and embracing the Nicene Faith. The like we have Reaſon to believe was done in the Britiſh Churches, becauſe in Jovian's time, (f) Athanaſius particularly takes notice of the Britannick Churches, as adhering to the Nicene Faith; and (g) St. Jerome, and (h) St. Chryſoſtome, ſeveral times mention their agreeing with other Churches in the true Faith. Which is a ſufficient Argument to clear them from the Imputation of Arianiſm, which did no otherwiſe lie upon them, than as they had Biſhops preſent in the Council of Ariminum.

For (i) Severus Sulpicius, ſpeaking of the Care Conſtantius took to provide Lodging and Entertainment for the Biſhops at Ariminum, out of the publick Charge, he ſaith, their Biſhops refuſed to accept it, only three out of Britain, not being able to maintain themſelves, made uſe of the publick Allowance, rather than be chargeable to their Brethren. Which, he ſaith, he heard Gavidius their Biſhop blame them for; but he rather thinks it a commendation for them, in the firſt place to have been ſo poor; and next, that they choſe not to be burthenſome to their Brethren, but rather to live on the Emperor's Charge. This had been better ſaid of any Place, than at the Council of Ariminum, where the Emperor's Kindneſs was a Snare to their Conſciences; unleſs it be ſaid, That the Emperor took greater advantage by their bearing their own Charges, to make them ſooner grow weary of ſtaying there; and that if the reſt had followed the Example

Example of the Britains, the Emperor might have been weary before them. But how came the Britiſh Biſhops to be ſo poor above the reſt, who were not only able to live at their own Charges, but to ſupply their Brethren? Which ſhews as much the plenty of the reſt, as it doth the poverty of the Britains. What became of all the Endowments of the Britiſh Churches by King Lucius? The Britiſh Hiſtory publiſhed by (k) Geoffrey of Monmouth ſaith, That King Lucius gave not only all the Lands which belonged to the Heathen Temples to the Churches built by him; but added very much to them with many Privileges. The ſame is ſaid from him by moſt of our Monkiſh Hiſtorians, whoſe Authority is no greater than Geoffrey's, from whom they derive their Information; only inlarging it as occaſion ſerves; As Thomas Rudburn doth very particularly for the Church of Wincheſter, who makes the old Lands of the Flamins to be twelve Miles compaſs about the Town; And King Lucius added, he ſaith, to the New Church, all the Suburbs of the City, with the Privilege of Dunwallo Molmutius, i. e. of a Sanctuary. Methinks then the Britiſh Biſhops, might have been in as good a condition as the reſt of their Brethren at Ariminum; unleſs their Lands were taken away in the Perſecution of Diocleſian, as Rudburn ſeems to intimate, which is all as true, as that Monks continued there from Lucius to the ſecond year of Diocleſian; which was a long time before his Perſecution began; or there were any ſuch Monks in the World. But it ſeems ſtrange, that the Britiſh Biſhops ſhould be then under ſuch Poverty, when Liberius, in his Conference with Conſtantius, told him, The Churches were able to bear the Charges of their Biſhops in going to Councils, without the publick Carriages. For even before Conſtantine's time, they had Endowments, beſides the voluntary Oblations of the People, which in great Churches were very conſiderable. But that there were certain Endowments beſides, appears both by the Edicts of Maximinus and Conſtantine. By that of Maximinus, not only Houſes, but the Lands which belong'd to the Chriſtians, whether ſeized into the (l) Emperor's hands, or in the Poſſeſſion of any City, or given, or ſold, are all commanded to be reſtored. And that this doth not relate to their private Poſſeſſions, but to the publick Revenue of their Churches, will appear by the following Edict of Conſtantine and Licinius; which in the firſt place commands all their Churches to be reſtored; and then is added, becauſe the Chriſtians are known, not only to have thoſe Places where they aſſemble, but others, which likewiſe of Right belong to their Body, i. e. their Churches. For ſo the Words of the Edict in (m) Lactantius are. (Sed alia etiam habuiſſe noſcuntur ad jus corporis eorum, id eſt, Eccleſiarum non hominum ſingulorum pertinentia) Theſe are commanded to be reſtored, without any delay or diſpute. Which is again inforced by another Edict of Conſtantine to Anulinus extant in (n) Euſebius with the former, and there are mention'd Houſes, Gardens, or whatſoever Poſſeſſions they had. Thoſe who would have nothing more meant by theſe Expreſſions, but ſome Fields and Gardens rather than Lands, may conſider that when the Church had plentiful Poſſeſſions, they were called by no other Names. So St. (o) Ambroſe, (Agri Eccleſiæ ſolvunt Tributum.) And in another Law of (p) Conſtantine directed to the Provincials of Paleſtine to the ſame purpoſe, and with as full and large Expreſſions; And howſoever they became alienated, the preſent Poſſeſſors were to be ſatisfied with the mean Profits; But by all means he commands a Reſtitution to be made, not only to particular Perſons, ſons, but to the Churches too. But if the Endowments of Churches were not then conſiderable, what need ſo many Edicts for the Reſtauration of them? But Conſtantine did not only take ſo much care to reſtore what the Churches had before, but in caſe there were no Heirs at Law to the Martyrs and Confeſſors, he beſtows their Lands and Goods on the Churches. And after this, about four years after the Council of Nice, he publiſhed the famous Conſtitution ſtill extant in the (q) Theodoſian Code; wherein a full Liberty is given to all ſorts of Perſons to leave what they thought fit by Will, to the Catholick Churches of Chriſtians. And this, as Gothofred ſaith, was the true Donation of Conſtantine, for, by means of this Law, Riches flowed into the Church, and eſpecially at Rome. For although, as (r) Paulus ſaith, by an Edict of M. Aurelius, the Collegia licita, Societies allow'd by the Laws, were capable of receiving Legacies and Eſtates, yet by the (s) Laws of the Empire, the Chriſtians were no legal Society to that purpoſe before: And by a late Conſtitution of Diocleſian, Societies were excluded from receiving Inheritances without a ſpecial Privilege; yet now, by this Law, all thoſe Bars being removed, Riches came in ſo faſt in ſome Places, that there needed new Conſtitutions to ſet bounds to ſo great liberality.

And the Privileges which Conſtantine gave to the (t) Clergy of exemption from publick Services, drew ſo many to take Orders, eſpecially in Corporations, where the Services were very burthenſome; That Conſtantine was forced to publiſh Edicts to reſtrain the Numbers of them; which were not intended, to hinder Perſons of Eſtate and Quality from entring into Orders, as ſome have ſuggeſted, but only ſuch whoſe Eſtates were liable to the publick Services, as thoſe who were (u) Decuriones origine, and not merely incolatu were; who bore all the Offices, and did the publick Duties, having Lands given them on purpoſe in the firſt Settlement of Colonies which were called Prædia Reipublicæ, as (w) Pancirol obſerves; And therefore Conſtantine had reaſon to forbid ſuch entring into Orders to the Prejudice of the Government. And ſo the Title of the Conſtitution is, De ordinatione Clericorum in Curiarum & Civitatum præjudicium non facienda. Which was at that time a very juſt and reaſonable Conſtitution. But afterwards Men of great Honour and Dignities came into the Council, as not only St. Ambroſe, at Milan, who was the Conſular Governour over Liguria, and Æmilia, and St. Paulinus, a Roman Senator, behind none in Birth, ſaith (x) St. Ambroſe, having a great Eſtate in Aquitania, was made Prieſt at Barcelona, and Biſhop of Nola, but many Examples of this kind were in one Age in the Gallican Church, as (y) Honoratus, Biſhop of Arles, of a Senatorian and Conſular Family; St. Hilary, of Arles, of a very Noble Family, and born to great Riches; Sidonius Apollinaris, whoſe Father and Grandfather were Præfecti Prætorio Galliarum, and himſelf married to the Daughter of the Emperor Avitus, made Præfectus Urbi, & Patricius, one of the greateſt Perſons and Wits in Gaul, was made (a) Biſhop of Auvergne; St. (b) German, Biſhop of Auxerre, was of Noble Parents, and Governour of a Province; St. (c) Ruricius, Biſhop of Limoges, deſcended from the Annician Family, as Venantius Fortunatus ſaith, which was of that Fame at Rome, that St. (d) Hierome ſaith, Very few of it miſſed the Conſulſhip, and two Brothers of it were Conſuls together, as Claudian ſaith, a thing never ſeen before or ſince. From this Family (e) Arnoldus Wion proves that the Emperors of Germany are deſcended. And of this ſame Family another Ruricius ſucceeded his Grandfather in the ſame Biſhoprick.

But,

But, beſides that general Law which gave Permiſſion to others to give liberally to Churches, Conſtantine of his own Revenue allow'd a proportion of Corn to be given to the Clergy of the greater Cities; Of which (f) Athanaſius ſpeaks, when he ſaith, Conſtantius took it away from him, and his Clergy, and gave it to the Arians; But the Gift it ſelf was continued all the time of Conſtantius; Then it was taken away by (g) Julian, and in part reſtored by Jovian..

It is then no wonder that the Biſhops at Ariminum refuſed the publick allowance, being maintained by the Revenues of their Churches; But it ſeems the Britiſh Churches were not then in ſo Rich a condition to maintain their Biſhops ſo long abroad; For Conſtantine, drawing all the Wealth and Trade of the Empire Eaſtward, for the greater Advancement of his New City; And this Country having been ſo long haraſſed with Wars, and ſcarce recovered from the Effects of them; (For the Scots and Picts had been very troubleſome to them, both in the times of Conſtans and Conſtantius; the (h) former came himſelf over into Britain to ſuppreſs them; and the latter ſent Lupicinus his General, who arrived at London about the time the Council of Ariminum was diſſolved) and therefore in a time of ſuch Confuſion in the Britiſh Province, it is not ſtrange that theſe Churches ſhould not be in ſo plentifull a condition as thoſe which were the Seat of Trade and Government. And (i) Ammianus Marcellinus obſerves, that the Provincial Biſhops lived in a much meaner condition than thoſe of the greater Cities, eſpecially of Rome; And, although a Heathen, he very much commends them for their Temperance, Humility and Modeſty.

But Arianiſm was not the only Hereſie the Britiſh Churches were charged with; For (k) Gildas from hence makes every following Hereſie to find a paſſage hither; among which the chief was Pelagianiſm. And (l) Bede doth inſinuate, That Pelagius, being a Britain, and, ſpreading his Doctrine far and near, did corrupt theſe Churches with it; which ſome (m) late Writers, having taken up, have affirmed, that both Pelagius and Cæleſtius, after their Repulſe at Rome, came over to Britain, and diſperſed their Doctrine here. (n) Leland ſadly laments the Condition of the Church of God, that had no ſooner recover'd it ſelf from Arianiſm, but a new Hereſie ſprung up to diſturb the Peace, and infect the minds of Chriſtians; But as Egypt brought forth the Author of the former Hereſie, ſo did Britain the Author of this, which took his name from hence; And is ſuppoſed to have been Morgan in Britiſh, which by his converſation at Rome he turned into Pelagius; And (o) St. Auguſtine ſaith, He was commonly called Pelagius Brito, to diſtinguiſh him, as he ſuppoſed, from another Pelagius of Tarentum. Leland obſerves, that ſome made him a Britain, as being born in that Bretagn which was called Aremorica, on the Continent. But I do not find that it had then loſt its name of Aremorica. The firſt time we find the name of Britannia given to that Country, is in the (p) Subſcription of Manſuetus to the Council of Tours, where he is named Epiſcopus Britannorum, after which time it was frequently called Britannia Ciſmarina, Minor, Celtica, &c. (q) Dempſter (not a Jeſuit, but a Lawyer) takes it very ill of Browerus, the Jeſuit, that he makes Pelagius a Scot: But not as Dempſter underſtands him. For (r) he explains himſelf, That he meant one that came out of Ireland, and therefore was Scoticæ Originis. For which he quotes St. Jerome. But Archbiſhop (s) Uſher hath obſerved, That he ſpeaks there, not of Pelagius, but of Cœleſtius, whom he makes the

Cerberus to Pluto, (according to his uſual way of complementing his Adverſaries.) But both, he thinks, came out of the Britiſh Iſlands. The late (t) Publiſher of Marius Mercator, endeavours to ſhew, That our learned Primate was herein miſtaken; And that St. Jerome doth not ſpeak of Cœleſtius, but of Pelagius himſelf; And that by Pluto he means Ruffinus dead in Sicily three years before St. Jerome*'s writing theſe Words*; But notwithſtanding he did ſtill bark through Pelagius his Mouth, whom he compares to a great Scotch Maſtiff, from which Country he is derived in the Neighbourhood of Britain. If theſe Words relate only to Ruffinus and Pelagius, it is certain that St. Jerome would have it believed, That Pelagius came out of Ireland. That which makes it moſt probable, that he means them is, That in the Preface to his (u) Commentaries on Ezekiel, he mentions the death of Ruffinus, and then ſaith, he hoped now he ſhould be quiet to go on with his Commentaries on the Scriptures; But not long after he complains, That there were others, which in his Room open'd their Mouths againſt him. In the beginning of his Commentaries on Jeremiah, which he undertook after he had finiſhed thoſe on Ezekiel, he mentions one who carped at his Commentaries on the Epheſians, and calls Grunnius, (i. e. Ruffinus) his Forerunner; And ſaith, he was, Scotorum pultibus prægravatus, made fat with Scotch Flummery. All this agrees very well with Pelagius, whom (w) Oroſius deſcribes as a very corpulent Man; But there is one thing which makes the former Opinion not improbable, which is, That St. Jerome himſelf takes ſo much notice, that Pelagius at that time wrote little or nothing about theſe matters, but Cœleſtius was the Man who appeared, eſpecially in the two main Points about Original Sin, and the Poſſibility of Perfection: (x) In his Epiſtle to Cteſiphon, he ſaith, That the Author of the Sect ſtill held his Peace, and his Diſciples wrote for him; Magiſtrorum ſilentia profert rabies Diſcipulorum. Methinks Rabies agrees well enough with Cerberus, and here it is meant of the Diſciple Cæleſtius, and not of Pelagius; Which Expreſſion anſwers very well to the other. Mutus Magiſter latrat per Albinum Canem. And he ſpeaks as if he deſigned to draw him from his cloſeneſs and retirement; Which doth far better agree to the mute Perſon, than to the barking Cerberus. There is then no Improbability, that Cæleſtius and Pelagius, may be both meant; But if any other Country hath a mind to challenge Cæleſtius to themſelves, I think, they may be allow'd to put in their Claim notwithſtanding theſe Expreſſions. But it is very unworthy in the ſame (y) Author, to prove Pelagius to have been an Iriſh Scot, and at the ſame time to charge his Vices on the Britiſh Nation. He cannot deny, That Pelagius had a great natural ſharpneſs of Wit, ſince St. Auguſtine and his other Adverſaries allow it; But then he ſaith, it was fierce and contentious, after the faſhion of his Country; and which he could not ſhake off by his long Converſation at Rome. He grants that his Exhortations to Piety were vehement and earneſt, but written in an uncouth and imperious Style, more Gentis, according to the humour of his Nation. But why muſt the Britiſh Nation be reproached for the particular faults of Pelagius? It is a very ill way of confuting Pelagius, to attribute Mens Vices and Vertues to their Countries; And is contrary both to the diſcretion of a Philoſopher, and to the Grace of a Chriſtian; Pelagius might have had the ſame temper if he had been ſo happy as to have been born in a Neighbour Country; And I do not ſee how his Way of writing doth affect the Britiſh Churches; Where the Chriſtians might be very wiſe and humble, notwithſtanding this ſevere and unjuſt Character of the Britiſh Nation; Which (as all National Reproaches) is not ſo great a Reproach to any as to him that gives it. But the greateſt Adverſaries to Pelagius, did not give him ſo ill a Character; St. (z) Auguſtine ſaith, he had the eſteem of a very Pious man, and of being a Chriſtian of no mean rank. Was this Pro more Gentis too? And of his Learning and Eloquence St. Auguſtine gives ſufficient Teſtimony, in his Epiſtle to Juliana, the Mother of Demetrias, to whom Pelagius wrote an Epiſtle highly magnified for the Wit and Elegance of it. But Garnerius will not allow that Pelagius was able to write it himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of his Diſciples Cœleſtius and Annianus. But why ſhould this be ſo hard a thing for a Man whom he confeſſes to have had a great deal of Natural Wit, and (a) St. Auguſtine ſaith, He lived long, yea, very long in Rome, and kept the beſt Company there? Could a Britain never attain to ſo much Purity of the Roman Language as to write an Epiſtle to the Envy of thoſe meliore ſolo prognatorum, as he ſpeaks, who were born in more happy ſoils? What mean ſuch unbecoming reflexions, on the Country of Pelagius; when himſelf confeſſes he had ſo much Mother Wit? And one would think of the two, that is the better ſoil which produceth more Wit than Words.

Our Monkiſh Hiſtorians make Pelagius not only a Monk at Bangor, but the Abbot there; So the Author of the Polychronicon, and John of Tinmouth; Leland takes it from them; To whom Bale adds, That he was made Biſhop in the Eaſt; But without any Authority. (b) Leland ſaith, That he went over into Aremorica, to viſit his Countrymen who were newly ſettled there, being carried over by Maximus. Gildas ſeems to imply, That Maximus was originally a Britain, when he calls him Germen plantationis ſuæ; But Bede takes no notice at all of his Country. The Saxon Annals, Fabius Ethelwerd, Huntingdon, and others ſay, he was born in Britain; But (c) Zoſimus affirms, That he was a Spaniard, and took it ill that he was no more prefer'd, when his Countryman Theodoſius was made Emperor; However this were, it is certain that he was declared Emperor in Britain, and that he went out of Britain with the Forces here; And that Gratian's Legions revolted to him; upon which he fled, and was killed; And that Maximus, being unſatisfied with Gratian's ſhare of the Empire, went into Italy againſt Valentinian, and was after four years deſtroyed at Aquileia; But in all the Proceedings of Maximus, I ſee no ground for the ſettling the Colonies of Britains in Aremorica. For he landed at the Mouth of the Rhine, ſaith Zoſimus, and was well received by the Roman Legions there-abouts. What occaſion then was there for his coming againſt the Aremorici: Or, if he had driven them out, had he nothing to do with his Souldiers, but to people Countries with them? But we find the Aremorici in quiet poſſeſſion of their Country after this time. So that we ſee no reaſon at all for Pelagius to go to his Countrymen in Aremorica: From thence Leland carries him to all the Places of Learning in Gaul; As there were many at that time; And while he was thus paſſing up and down, he met with Julianus of Campania, whoſe Wit and Learning recommended him to Pelagius. But this cannot hold, For Pelagius lived a long time in Rome before his Hereſie was diſcovered; After the diſcovery of it, many years paſſed before Julian appeared in it; And in the laſt Work of (d) St. Auguſtine, juſt before his death, He calls Julian a young man; Although he had been a Biſhop in Campania, at a Place called Æcula- num, thence his Title was Epiſcopus Eclanenſis. The Town ſtood, ſaith (e) Holſtenius, near Mirabella; But ſince its Deſtruction, the See was removed to Frigento, and the Biſhop called Epiſcopus Frequentinus. If Pelagius, paſſing through Gaul, made ſo long a ſtay in Rome, as St. Auguſtine ſaith, before he was ſuſpected of Hereſie, there is no probability at all in the Monkiſh Tradition of his being Abbat of Bangor. And there is not much more of Bangor's being ſo famous a Monaſtery at that time, or of Pelagius his being a Monk therein: For the Britiſh Monaſteries were no elder than St. Patrick's time, as I may have occaſion to ſhew afterwards. And even at Rome it ſelf the Monaſtick State had not been long known there, being brought out of the Eaſt by Athanaſius and Euſebius of Vercelles. And in Pelagius his time, thoſe were called Monks at Rome, who had no Office in the Church, but yet retired from the common Employments of the World for Sacred Studies and Devotion; and where any Number of theſe lived together, that was called a Monaſtery; Such was the Monaſterium Pinneti, mention'd by (f) Ruffinus, not far from Rome; Probably a Houſe of Melania; whither they were wont to retire in times of greater Devotion. Garnerius confeſſes that Pelagius was no otherwiſe a Monk, than as thoſe were then called ſo who led ſtricter Lives than others within their own Houſes; of which Number he reckons Pammachius, Paulinus, Melania, Demetrias and others at that time, to whom Pelagius was well known, and much eſteemed by them, before his Hereſie was diſcover'd. The chief Employment of theſe Perſons, next to their Devotions, was the Study of the Scriptures, as appears by St. Jerome's Epiſtles; And ſome grave Perſon made it his buſineſs to inſtruct his Diſciples therein: So St. Jerome did at Bethlehem; So Ruffinus did Pammachius, Melania and her Family; And ſo Pelagius did at Rome, where he had Scholars whom he brought up, as appears both by Cæleſtius, and Julianus whom he inſtructed very young, and by Timaſius and Jacobus. From this Employment it was that he wrote his ſhort Commentaries on St. Paul's Epiſtles, and his Epiſtles to Melania and Demetrias; But after he was accuſed of Hereſie, his time was ſpent in Vindication of himſelf, in Africa, Aſia and Rome; and after many Bandyings to and fro from want of underſtanding the meaning of Pelagius, he was, beſides the Councils in Africa, at laſt condemned in a Council at Antioch, under Theodotus, as (g) Marius Mercator ſhews; And from thence forward, he ſpent the Remainder of his Life in Obſcurity, dying ſomewhere in the Eaſt.

From whence it appears, that there is no probability, that Pelagius and Cæleſtius ſhould come back to Britain, to ſpread their Hereſie here. For he complain'd of his Age, when he ſet forth his Commentaries at Rome, about Anno Dom. 404. And he was certainly in the Eaſt at the Council of Dioſpolis, Anno Dom. 415. from whence he ſent Cæleſtius to Rome, but abode there himſelf with Albina, Pinianus and Melania; and wrote Letters to clear himſelf firſt to Innocentius, and then to Zoſimus, who was ſo well ſatisfied therewith, that he wrote a ſharp Letter to the African Biſhops (who had condemned him) in his Vindication; ſeverely taxing his Accuſers; Although there were Hereſie in that Confeſſion which Cæleſtius tendred to Zoſimus, and which he eſteemed Orthodox. And (h) St. Auguſtine is fain to make uſe of all his Wit to bring the Pope off from approving of Hereſie. (i) Henr. de Noris confeſſeth that he was circumvented by the Pelagians. But it was in a matter of Fact, ſaith (k) Janſenius; What, when he denied Original Sin in that very Paper he deliverd in to Zoſimus! (l) Cappellus thinks it better to deny Zoſimus his Letter; but therein he is condemned by (m) Petavius, and others who have lately written about this matter, and ſay, that Cappellus his Opinion is ſingular and falſe, being contradicted by the Teſtimonies of Marius Mercator, Facundus Hermianenſis and St. Auguſtine: And one of them blames the Pope for too great eaſineſs; and the other for too great haſtineſs, and doth think, that the buſineſs of Appeals, then conteſted by the African Biſhops ſtuck in the Pope's Stomach, which made him willing to take this Occaſion to rebuke them. But the African Fathers proceeding ſmartly againſt the Pelagians, notwithſtanding Zoſimus his Letter, made him to comply too, in condemning both Cæleſtius and Pelagius, notwithſtanding his former Epiſtle. So that upon the whole matter, Pelagius and Cæleſtius, by their own natural Wit, had, in all probability been too hard for a whole Succeſſion of Popes, Innocentius, Zoſimus and Xyſtus, had not the African Fathers interpoſed, and freely told them what the true Doctrine of the Church was. For (n) they offer'd to ſubſcribe Innocentius his Epiſtles. Zoſimus was very well ſatisfied, and thought them peeviſh and unreaſonable that were not. (o) Xyſtus was their Patron at Rome, before the African Biſhops appear'd ſo reſolute in the Cauſe. And had it not been for them; for all that I can ſee, Pelagianiſm had ſpread with the Approbation of the Roman See.

But notwithſtanding it was at laſt condemned at Rome, and Imperial Conſtitutions publiſhed againſt it; Yet it found a Way over into the Britiſh Churches, by the means of one Agricola, the Son of Severianus, a Pelagian Biſhop, as (p) Proſper informs us. It appears by the Reſcript of (q) Valentinian III. Anno Dom. 425. There were ſeveral Pelagian Biſhops in Gaul. And the ſevere Execution of the Edict there was probably the occaſion of this Agricola's coming over hither and ſpreading that Doctrine here. (r) Bale and (s) Pits run into many Miſtakes about this Agricola. (1.) They call him Leporius Agricola, and then confound the two Stories of Leporius and Agricola together: For after his Preaching Pelagianiſm, they mention his Converſion and Recantation by St. Auguſtine's means. Now there was one Leporius of whom (t) Caſſian and (u) Gennadius ſpeak, that was a Diſciple of Pelagius, who was driven out of Gaul by Proculus, Biſhop of Marſeilles, and Cylinnius of Forum-Julii, and ſo went into Africa, where being convinced by St. Auguſtine, he publiſhed his Recantation extant in (w) Sirmondus his Gallican Councils, and elſewhere; And Aurelius, Auguſtinus and Florentius, gave an account of it to the Biſhops of Provence; But there is no Pelagian Error there mention'd, but ſomething of Neſtorianiſm: And by Leontius ſucceeding Cylinnius in his See, before Anno Dom. 420. It follows, that Leporius recanted before the Pelagian Hereſie was ſpread into theſe Parts; And therefore this Leporius could have nothing to do in it: Beſides, it ſeems probable that this Leporius, after his Recantation, continued in Africa; For one Leporius, a Presbyter, is (x) mention'd in the Election of Eradius in the See of Hippo, Anno Dom. 426. and (y) St. Auguſtine ſaith, he was a Stranger, (2.) Bale makes him the Son of Severus Sulpicius, a Pelagian Prieſt in Britain: But Proſper and Bede ſay, he was the Son of Severianus, a Biſhop. It is true (z) Gennadius charges Severus Sulpicius with Pelagianiſm in his old Age; But if he died, as the

(a) Sammarthani ſay, Anno Dom. 410. Pelagianiſm was not known to the World then; And (b) Guibertus Abbas frees him from the imputation of it: But this Severus never was a Biſhop, and therefore could not be the Father of Agricola, (3.) They both make him a Monk of Bangor; which had need to have been a large Place to receive all that they ſend thither. (4.) They ſay he did write againſt one Timotheus, a Britiſh Heretick; two Books, ſaith Bale; but one, ſaith Pits; Which ariſes from a Miſtake of Sigebert's Copy, where Britannia is put for Bithynia, as our Learned Archbiſhop Usher hath obſerved: And Pits ſeemed to have ſome miſtruſt of this, for he doth not affirm his ſpreading his Doctrine in Britain as the other doth.

But Pelagianiſm was not ſpread here by Agricola alone; for (c) Proſper, ſpeaking of Celeſtine's care to root it out of Britain, he ſaith, It had taken Poſſeſſion here by the Enemies of God's Grace, Solum ſuæ originis occupantes, returning to the Soil from whence they ſprang: So that there were more than one, and thoſe Britains who, being infected with that Hereſie themſelves did return hither to infect others. From hence (d) ſome have thought that Cæleſtius at leaſt, if not Pelagius, did come hither, being driven out of Italy by Celeſtine; as Proſper relates: which Janſenius thought not improbable: But it now appears by the Commonitorium of Marius Mercator delivered to Theodoſius in the Conſulſhip of Dionyſius and Florentius, i. e. Anno Dom. 429. That Cæleſtius did return into the Eaſt, and was baniſhed from Conſtantinople by the Emperor's Edict; From whence it follows, That Cæleſtius came not into theſe Parts; nor do we read what became of him after the Council of Epheſus, wherein he was condemned by 275 Biſhops, as the ſame Marius Mercator ſhews. Whoſe account of theſe things, being a Perſon of that time, and active in this Cauſe, hath clear'd ſeveral things, which were much in the dark before.

But whoſoever they were who brought Pelagianiſm hither, it appears by Proſper that they were Britains, and had too great Succeſs here by the ſpreading of Pelagianiſm. But care was taken by the ſounder part to get it out; and therefore, diſtruſting their own ſufficiency to deal with ſuch ſubtile Adverſaries, they ſend for help, ſaith (e) Bede, to the Biſhops of Gaul; Who called a great Council, and unanimouſly choſe Germanus and Lupus, two Biſhops of great Reputation, to come over on purpoſe. They readily undertook the Employment, and performed it with great Succeſs, as it is at large related by (f) Conſtantius and Bede. It is afirmed by a late (g) Author, That the Acts of the Council which ſent Germanus and Lupus are ſtill in being, with the Inſtructions given them at their coming hither; If ever they come to light, they will very much clear this intricate part of the Hiſtory of the Britiſh Churches. For there is now fifteen years difference among Writers about the time of their coming. Proſper ſaith it was, Anno Dom. 429. But Sigebert, as (h) Sirmondus obſerves, places it, Anno Dom. 446. To which he thinks Bede's Relation doth beſt agree; And Sirmondus himſelf puts it that year Aetius III. and Symmachus were Conſuls, in the 21 of Valentinian III. and 5 of Leo I. If this Computation of the time be true, then it is impoſſible that St. German ſhould be ſent hither by Celeſtine, as Proſper affirms; For Xyſtus was Pope after Celeſtine, Anno Dom. 432. And it is incredible, That if he had been ſent hither by Commiſſion from him, neither Conſtantius in his Life of St. German, who lived ſo near that time; nor the Author of the Life of St. Lupus Trecenſis; nor Bede ſhould take any notice of it. But they all mention the particular Application made by the Britains to the Gallican Biſhops for their Aſſiſtance; and their meeting in Council on purpoſe, and chuſing, and diſpatching St. German and Lupus, without any intimation of Celeſtine. (i) Baronius and (k) Janſenius go about to reconcile theſe things, by ſaying, Either that the Pope approved him whom the Council choſe; Or that the Pope left it to the Council to chuſe; But neither of theſe will hold. For Proſper ſaith, That Celeſtine ſent him, Vice ſuâ, in his own Name and ſtead; Which is very different from appointing a Council to chuſe one to be ſent: And Conſtantius ſaith, That immediately they went; Which ſhews they did not ſtay for the Pope's Approbation. And withal, the kindneſs was not ſo great at that time between Celeſtine and the Gallican Biſhops, That either he ſhould ſend to them to appoint; or they ſhould wait for his direction in this matter. For Proſper and Hilary had made great Complaints of them at Rome, as favouring Pelagianiſm too much. And, among theſe, Hilary, Biſhop of Arles; was the chief. For (l) Proſper complains of him particularly in his Epiſtle to St. Auguſtine, which was ſent to him, Anno Dom. 428, or 429. as the late Editors of St. Auguſtine's Epiſtles conclude; So that Hilary was Biſhop of Arles at that time before St. Auguſtine's death, Anno Dom. 430. After his death, the ſame Proſper and another Hilary join in a Complaint to Celeſtine, and went to Rome on purpoſe; as appears by his (m) Anſwer, who therein reproves the Biſhops of Gaul, for giving too much countenance to ſome Presbyters who vented new Doctrines, viz. Caſſian and his Followers; and who reflected on the Memory of St. Auguſtine. It is not therefore any ways probable that the Gallican Biſhops, having been complained of ſo long before St. Auguſtine's death, that he wrote a Book in anſwer to them before he died, ſhould be intruſted by Celeſtine to chuſe Perſons to go over into Britain to confute Pelagianiſm, when he ſuſpected them, from Proſper's Information, to be too much inclined to it. It ſeems therefore moſt likely that St. German and Lupus were ſent by a Council of Gallican Biſhops, without the Pope's Concurrence, ſince Conſtantius, who certainly knew all the circumſtances of this matter, ſaith nothing at all of it. And this St. German was ſo great with Hilary, Biſhop of Arles, that he joined with him in the depoſing Chelidonius (for which Pope Leo was ſo incenſed againſt him) as Honoratus affirms in his Life: which was no new acquaintance, but of ſo long ſtanding, that if Hilary of Arles were at that time ſuſpected at Rome, St. German would hardly have been pitched upon by Celeſtine for his Legate into Britain.

I wonder how (n) Baronius and (o) Voſſius came to miſtake the Hilary who joined with Proſper, for Hilary Biſhop of Arles; Since this Hilary never was a Diſciple of St. Auguſtine's, as the other was; And he was certainly Biſhop of Arles, after St. Auguſtine's death, when Celeſtine mentions the other Hilary as preſent with Proſper at Rome, when they informed againſt the Biſhops of Gaul. For Honoratus ſucceeded Patroclus in the See of Arles; Proſper ſaith, that Patroclus was killed, Anno Dom. 426. Honoratus continued but two years in the See: And ſo Hilary might well be newly Biſhop of Arles, when Proſper and the other other Hilary ſent to St. Auguſtine, as plainly appears by their Epiſtle; So that Semipelagianiſm did not, as Archbiſhop (p) Uſher ſuppoſes, then begin in Gaul, when St. Germanus and Lupus were here employ'd againſt Pelagianiſm, but was begun before, and embraced by thoſe very Biſhops who ſent them hither; Who for their own Vindication appear'd zealous againſt Pelagianiſm, and were therefore willing to embrace this opportunity to ſend two of their Number into Britain. And it is the more ſtrange, that ſo Learned a Perſon ſhould fall into this miſtake, when he had ſo fully proved, as (q) Holſtenius confeſſes, That Hilary, Biſhop of Arles, did favour the Semipelagians; and it is certain that Proſper did complain of him to St. Auguſtine (if the Copies be not corrupt, as he ſhews they are not) before St. German's Voyage into Britain. For St. Auguſtine received the Complaint time enough to write his two Books of Predeſtination and Perſeverance, in anſwer to it, after his Book of Retractions, and before his elaborate Work againſt Julian, and therefore they are probably ſuppoſed to be written, Anno Dom. 428. If we then yield that St. German's coming hither was when Proſper ſaith, Anno Dom. 429. yet we find that Semipelagianiſm had prevailed among the Gallican Biſhops before that time, or elſe there was no cauſe at all for Proſper's Complaint.

And to make it appear yet more improbable, that Celeſtine ſhould ſend St. Germanus and St. Lupus; We are to conſider, that Lupus was Brother to Vincentius Lirinenſis, and were both of the ſame Society. Which Vincentius was a great Stickler in the Semipelagian Cauſe, as all the Members of that Society that were conſiderable were engaged in it; And when the Pope wrote ſo ſmartly againſt the Accuſers of St. Auguſtine's Doctrine, it is very unlikely he ſhould pitch upon one of that Society moſt ſuſpected for it, and whoſe Brother appeared ſo early and ſo warmly in it; Not only by the Objections under his Name in Proſper; But by the whole Deſign of his Commonitorium; Which, if I miſtake not, was levell'd againſt thoſe who went about to broach a new Doctrine about Predeſtination, as they ſaid, under St. Auguſtine's Name. And they who carefully read over that Diſcourſe, and conſider the drift of it, will find I am not miſtaken: But (r) Baronius is, when he would clear the Author of the Commonitorium from favouring thoſe who impugned St. Auguſtine's Doctrine about Predeſtination; Which was quite another thing from favouring Pelagianiſm, which Caſſianus, Fauſtus, and this Vincentius all profeſſed to abhor.

But what ſhall be ſaid to Proſper, who affirms, that Celeſtine ſent St. German? (1.) (s) Proſper, in his undoubted Work againſt Caſſian, doth not affirm it. For there he only ſaith, That Celeſtine took care to free Britain from Pelagianiſm. Why is not the Miſſion of St. German here mention'd, when it had been moſt ſeaſonable againſt the chief of the Semipelagians? No doubt Proſper would not have loſt this Opportunity of magnifying Celeſtine's Care, by ſending Biſhops of ſo great Reputation. Eſpecially, if theſe Biſhops were not Semipelagians; But if ſo, why doth he not mention them in that Work as ſuch, when he complains how much Semipelagianiſm did prevail, and even among their Biſhops? (2.) The Proſper publiſhed by Pithæus never mentions it, which he thought to be the genuine Chronicon of Proſper. (t) Hadrianus Valeſius concludes one or the other not to be genuine; ſince they differ in point of time, and it is not probable the ſame Man would write two ſeveral Books about the ſame matter with ſuch Diverſity. (u) Bucherius thinks it impoſſible the ſame Perſon ſhould write both; yet both paſs under the Name of Tyro Proſper; and ſo he ſaith the ancient MS. of it, which he had (which was like that (w) Pontacus calls Lodunenſe) had that Name in the Title of it; But Pontacus his had the Title of Proſper Aquitanus, where he is ſaid to be Epiſcopus Regini, and great debate hath been, whether he was Biſhop of Regium Lepidum in Italy; or of Regium (Rez) in Gaul; But (x) Sirmondus proves, he was neither one nor the other; By the Teſtimonies of Gennadius, Victorius, Marcellinus, and others; And by Fauſtus immediately ſucceeding Maximus in that See: And ſo leaving no room for Proſper between them. But there was a Proſper Biſhop of Orleans at that time; and another Proſper, Biſhop of Regium Lepidum in Italy, as (y) Ughellus ſhews, which might occaſion the Miſtake; But, beſides theſe, (z) Sirmondus tells us, there was another Proſper in Gaul who wrote a Chronicon too, and ended at the ſame time with Tyro Proſper; with this difference, that the one was only an Appendix to St. Jerome, the other an entire Chronicon, as Gennadius expreſſes it. Which is ſuppoſed to be that publiſhed by Labbe out of ſeveral MSS. But (a) thoſe who have carefully examin'd it have found ſuch a difference in the Computation uſed in the ſeveral parts of it, That they cannot think them written by the ſame Author; And therefore conclude that publiſhed by Pithæus to be the genuine Chronicon of Proſper, as far as it reaches; And that the firſt Part, which ſhould make it entire, is not yet diſcover'd. So that it remains uncertain whether this Paſſage be in the true Proſper or not. Our (b) Learned Primate of Armagh was of Opinion, That the Chronicon publiſhed by Pithæus was not written by Proſper, but by Gennadius; becauſe Boſton of Bury ſaith, That Gennadius added a Chronicon to St. Jerome. And, I confeſs, the Paſſage in it about the Hereſie of the Prædeſtinati doth better agree with Gennadius than Proſper; And for that Reaſon Sirmondus hath found out another Proſper. But the Preſident (c) Mauguin ſaith, it was counterfeited by the Semipelagians in Proſper*'s Name*; And that there is no mention in any Authors of another Proſper who publiſhed a Chronicon, which ended at the time the true Proſper did, viz. Anno Dom. 444. Sirmondus ſaith, All the ancient Copies had the Name of Proſper upon it. And it is ſo quoted by Sigebert; But if he had a mind to paſs for the other Proſper, he would never have differ'd ſo materially as he doth from him. So that this whole matter is very dark and obſcure yet. (3.) Suppoſe it be granted that Proſper wrote ſo, yet there is greater Reaſon to believe Conſtantius than Proſper in this matter. For Conſtantius was not only living in that Age, but a Perſon of great Reputation, as appears by Sidonius Apollinaris his Epiſtles to him; and one that wrote with great fidelity, ſaith (f) Baronius; And therefore it cannot be ſuppoſed that he ſhould not expreſly ſet down by whom St. German was ſent into Britain. Beſides, Conſtantius is not alone; but the Author of the Life of St. Lupus gives the ſame account; and ſo doth Bede, (with whom Paulus Diaconus, Freculphus, Erricus and Ado Viennenſis agree) And he places their coming after the Reign of Theodoſius; And therefore it was impoſſible that Celeſtine ſhould ſend them.

St. Germanus and Lupus being thus employ'd by the Biſhops of Gaul, in a ſolemn Conference at (g) Verulam they diſputed with the Pelagians; and had ſo great Succeſs therein; and by their Preaching up and down in many places, That they left the Britains well ſettled, as they ſuppoſed, in the ancient Faith. But no ſooner were they returned, but ſome of the Pelagians got ground again; which occaſion'd another Meſſage to St. German, who then took with him (h) Severus, Biſhop of Triers; And then they prevailed ſo far as to procure the baniſhment of theſe Heretical Teachers, according to the Edict of Valentinian; And from thence forward Bede obſerves that the Britiſh Churches continued ſound and orthodox.

But here it will be proper to conſider how juſtly two Britiſh Biſhops have been charged with Pelagianiſm; the one is Faſtidius, and the other Fauſtus.

As to Faſtidius, (i) Leland confeſſes, that his memory had been loſt, but for the mention which Gennadius makes of him (k); who ſaith of him, that he was Britannorum Epiſcopus; And wrote a Book to one Fatalis, De vita beata, wherein the Doctrine was very ſound and good. (l) Trithemius highly commends him, as a man of great Wit and Eloquence, an excellent Preacher, and very pious Man. (m) Bale ſaith, that, being made Biſhop, he preached over all Britain, and was, as is reported, Metropolitane of London: What Bale ſpeaks upon report, (n) Pits affirms with confidence, that he was Archbiſhop of London. (o) Archbiſhop Uſher thinks, they had no other ground for this, but a different reading in Gennadius, Britanniarum Epiſcopus. From whence they concluded, He muſt be Archbiſhop of London, that being, as they ſuppoſed, the Metropolis of Britain; but he rather inclines to the opinion of Berterius; That York was then the Metropolis of Britain; not only becauſe it was a Roman Colony, but becauſe the Prætorium and Emperor's Palace was there. But theſe Arguments are not ſufficient to overthrow London's being the chief Metropolis of the Roman times. For every Province had its Metropolis; And the ſuperiority of one Metropolis above another depended on the Reſidence of the Roman Governour, the Vicarius Britanniarum. I grant that, in the time of the Wars with the Northern Britains, York was the chief Seat of the Emperor when he was here, as in the times of Severus and Conſtantius; but that was for the conveniency of attending the Wars, and being near to give Directions and ſend Supplies. But the Preheminence of Places in the Roman Account did depend more upon the Civil than the Military Officers; Theſe being more uncertain than the other, and where the Supreme Court of Judicature was, that was the chief Metropolis, and that was where the Supreme Governour of thoſe Provinces had his Reſidence. Thus every Province had a Preſident in the Metropolis; but where there was a Superiour Officer over theſe Preſidents, as the Vicarius Britanniarum was over the five Provinces, the Place of his reſidence was the higheſt Metropolis, becauſe the Preſidents Courts were in Subordination to his, whether they were Conſular or Preſidial; and therefore the ſolemn Conventus out of the Provinces were appointed there. Of theſe things we have a clear inſtance in the Caſe of Arles, whereby the Conſtitution of (p) Honorius, the ſeven Provinces, over which that was the Metropolis, were to have an annual Aſſembly there, where the chief Magiſtrate reſided; and the Reaſons there given are, the great conveniency of that City being upon the River Rhoſne, both for other buſineſs and trading into all parts.

The ſame Reaſons will hold to make London the chief Metropolis in the Roman times, becauſe of its admirable ſituation for Trade and Commerce, and the opportunity of ſending into, or receiving Diſpatches from the foreign Provinces and the Emperor's Court where ever it was. So that I ſee no reaſon to queſtion London's being the chief Metropolis among the Romans. The Argument from York's being a Colony ſignifies nothing after Antoninus gave the Jus Civitatis to the whole Empire; and London was a Colony before York, (as I may ſhew elſewhere) and of a higher nature, when it was called (q) Auguſta, which ſhews that it was then the Imperial City of Britain, that name being given to no other City in Britain beſides. And it is obſerved by the learned (r) Marc. Velſerus, That thoſe Cities which had the Title of Auguſta conferred upon them, where the Capita Gentium, the chief Metropoles of the Provinces; And ſince by the general Rule of the Church, the Eccleſiaſtical Government did follow the Civil, There is no reaſon to queſtion, but if Faſtidius were then Biſhop of London, he was the chief Metropolitane over the Churches of Britain.

But whether Faſtidius were Metropolitane, or only a Britiſh Biſhop, his Doctrine is of late charged to be inclinable to Pelagianiſm. For Holſtenius found in an ancient MS. the Book Faſtidius wrote De Vita Chriſtiana with his name to it, and ſo publiſhed it; but it is not directed ad Fatalem, but to a certain Widow. In this Book a late (s) Auguſtinian hath diſcovered, as he thinks, ſome Tincture of Pelagianiſm; but to any candid Reader his Exceptions will appear very frivolous, and there is ſo much of true Primitive Chriſtianity in the reſt of it, as makes good the Character which Gennadius and Trithemius give of him. Out of which Book, and no great one, Bale hath made four, one De Vita Chriſtiana, a ſecond De Doctrina Spiritûs, a third De Viditnate ſervanda, a fourth, Admonitiones Piæ. Pits keeps the ſame number, but leſt he ſhould ſeem to take all out of Bale, he alters the Title of one of them; And becauſe Gennadius ſaith his Doctrine was Deo digna, therefore Pits, very artificially, makes the Title of his ſecond Book to be De Doctrina Deo digna vel ſpirituali. Boſton of Bury makes him the Author of two Books, by miſtaking Gennadius; but as far as we can find, there is but one exſtant. (t) Dempſter hath found Faſtidius to have been born upon the Mountains of the Weſtern parts of Scotland, and he makes him Author of a fifth Book called Chronicon Scotorum, which is a Strain beyond Pits. He poſitively affirms that he lived An. Dom. 440. Trithemius ſaith, about An. Dom. 420.

As to Fauſtus, his Caſe is much harder. That he was originally a Britain I find not denied by any; For although (u) Facundus calls him a Gaul, yet that was becauſe of his being a Biſhop ſo long there, as Sirmondus obſerves; he being Ortu Britannus, habitaculo Regienſis, as (w) Alcimus Avitus ſaith, in his Epiſtle to Gundobadus, King of the Burgundians, to whom, he ſaith, Fauſtus was known. In his (x) Epiſtles to Ruricius, Fauſtus ſpeaks of his living in a State of Baniſhment, and the Comforts he found in it; This our Learned (y) Primate underſtood of his living out of his own Country; But (z) Hen. de Noris, of a Baniſhment by Euaricus an Arian King then in Gaul, which he ſuppoſes he underwent for writing againſt the Arians. If he had produced any Teſtimony of ſuch Baniſhment, there might have been Reaſon to have underſtood his Expreſſion ſo; But ſince there is none, and his Words are general as to his Country; I ſee no cauſe to take them in any other ſenſe. For Men do not uſe to call that their Country where they live as Strangers, and he ſpeaks of the kindneſs of Ruricius ſo to him, that he did Patriam in peregrinatione facere, which cannot well bear any other ſenſe, than that he made up the want of his own Country to him. (a) Sirmondus grants he was a Britain, but he adds, he was one of thoſe Britains who dwelt upon the Loir, i. e. in the parts of Aremorica. There is no queſtion, but in the time of Fauſtus, there were great numbers of Britains there; for (b) Jornandes ſaith, That Riothamus, their King or General, went with 12000 Britains againſt Euricus, King of the Viſigoths. Which Riothamus (c) Sidonius Apollinaris writes to, and mentions the Britains with him; But it may be juſtly a queſtion, whether there were any Colonies of Britains on the Continent, before Fauſtus his birth; For Fauſtus was made Abbat of Lerins, before the Saxons came firſt into Britain; For he was Abbat when St. Capraſius died, as the Author of his Life affirms, which was about An. Dom. 430. But their coming was not till An. Dom. 449. and it will be hard to make out any Settlement of the Britains on the Loir before. It is then moſt probable that Fauſtus went at firſt out of Britain into Gaul, where he attained to a wonderfull Reputation both for Piety and Learning. He was worſhipped as a Saint, ſaith (d) Noris, in the Church of Riez, and his Name was preſerved in the Calender of the Gallican Church. Molanus was the firſt who durſt adventure to ſtrike out his name; Baronius follow'd him, but upon admonition reſtored it, as (e) Bollandus obſerves, who likewiſe takes notice, that he was called a Saint by Cl. Robertus, by Ferrarius, and by Pet. Galeſinius, in his Martyrology, who adds, that his Books are piouſly and learnedly written, and that Miracles are ſaid to be wrought by him. It is certain, he was a Perſon in mighty eſteem in his own time, as appears by the Paſſages of (f) Sidonius Apollinaris, of (g) Ruricius, and others, concerning both his Eloquence, Learning and Piety. Of whom Sidonius Apollinaris gives that excellent Character, that he had learnt to ſpeak better than he was taught, and to live better than he ſpake: He was Biſhop of Riez, An. Dom. 462. for at that time he was joined with Auxanius in determining the Controverſie between Leontius of Arles and Mamertus of Vienna. But nothing can more manifeſt the eſteem he was then in among the Gallican Biſhops, than that in the Council of Arles he was pitched upon as the fitteſt Perſon to draw up their ſenſe in the great Points then ſo much agitated about Predeſtination and Grace, as appears by his Preface to Leontius. At this Council thirty Biſhops were preſent, and there Lucidus preſented his Recantation of the Errors he held about Predeſtination, and after this Fauſtus wrote his Books of Grace and Free-will, to which, he ſaith, another Council at Lyons cauſed ſome things to be added. In theſe Books it is thought that, under a Pretence of confuting thoſe Errors, he ſets himſelf againſt St. Auguſtine's Doctrine, as ſeems clear by one Expreſſion in his firſt Book; That if it be true, that ſome are predeſtinated to Life, and others to Deſtruction, ut quidam Sanctorum dixit, non judicandi naſcimur, ſed judicati: But theſe words may refer to what follows, as well as to what went before, As a certain holy Man hath ſaid, We are not born to be judged, but we are judged before we are born. According to which Doctrine, ſaith Fauſtus, There can be no Equity in the day of Judgment.

It hath been a great Queſtion among ſome Learned Men, whether there were any Perſons who drew ill Conſequences from St. Auguſtine's Doctrine, and were therefore oppoſed by Fauſtus and others, or whether it were the mere Doctrine of St. Auguſtine that was ſo oppoſed by them, and urged with thoſe Conſequences as following from it. I ſee no Reaſon to deny, that the Semipelagians did charge the followers of St. Auguſtine with the ſame things which are made the Opinions of thoſe who are called the Predeſtination Hereticks by Sigebert, Gennadius, Hincmarus, and others. But yet that there were certain Perſons who did own ſuch bad Conſequences as the overthrowing the Liberty of Man's Will and the Neceſſity of our Endeavours, will appear from theſe two Reaſons. (1.) St. Auguſtine's Doctrine was ſo miſunderſtood by ſome in his Life-time, as appears by the Controverſie amongſt the Adrumetine Monks. The Caſe was this, Florus, one of that Society, going to Uzala, a City dear Utica, between Hippo and Carthage, where Euodius was then Biſhop, a Friend of St. Auguſtine's, there met with (h) St. Auguſtine's large Epiſtle to Sixtus againſt the Pelagians, which being ſent home, and Florus himſelf going to Carthage, before his return they were fallen into great Heats upon the Occaſion of that Epiſtle. Some of them, as (i) St. Auguſtine himſelf ſaith, did ſo preach up the Grace of God, as to deny Free-will, and conſequently to ſay, That God in the day of Judgment would not render to men according to their Works; Others ſaid, That our Free-will was aſſiſted by the Grace of God, that we may know and do the things that are right; That the Lord, when he comes to render to every Man according to their Works, may find our Works good, which he hath prepared that we may walk in them. And they, ſaith he, who judge thus do judge rightly. Therefore thoſe who thought otherwiſe did miſtake his Doctrine; For, as he ſaith, If there be no Grace, there can be no Salvation; If there be no Free-will, there can be no day of Judgment. To what purpoſe is all this, if ſome of theſe did not ſo miſunderſtand his Doctrine as to overthrow all Liberty of Will in Mankind? And ſo (k) Euodius, in his Anſwer to thoſe Adrumetine Monks ſhews, That there is ſtill Free-will in us, but wounded by the Fall, and only recoverable by the Grace of Chriſt. (l) Janſenius grants that they did miſunderſtand St. Auguſtine*'s Doctrine, thinking that Free-will was wholly deſtroyed by it; And that no Man ought to be reproved when he doth amiſs, but that others ought to pray that he may have Grace to do better.* But the Preſident (m) Mauguin will not allow this; For he ſaith, That St. Auguſtine was at firſt falſely informed of the ſtate of the Controverſie among them by Creſconius and Felix; But after Florus his coming he found they were Semipelagians who miſunderſtood his Doctrine. But to what purpoſe then doth (n) St. Auguſtine take ſuch pains to prove even in the Book he wrote after the coming of Florus, That there is Free-will ſtill left in Mankind? Liberum itaque arbitrium confitendum nos eſt habere, & ad malum, & ad bonum faciendum. Not ſo as to exclude the neceſſity of Divine Grace, as he proves at large, but yet in ſuch a manner as to ſhew its conſiſtency with Divine Commands, and the juſt Reproof and Puniſhment of thoſe who do amiſs. Which ſhews plainly, That he thought there were ſome ſtill who miſinterpreted his Doctrine, not barely to object againſt it, but to make ill uſe of it. Therefore (o) Noris had no Reaſon to conclude that the Error of the Adrumetine Monks was Semipelagianiſm. (2.) It appears evidently from the Caſe of Lucidus, and the Councils of Arles and Lyons. I grant that the Objections mentioned by Proſper and Hilary were made by the Semipelagians, and not by any Predeſtination Hereticks at that time in Gaul; and therein (p) Sir-

Sirmondus was certainly miſtaken, as he was likewiſe, when he ſaith, that the Epiſtle of Celeſtine was againſt the latter, and not againſt the former. But it appears by Fauſtus his Epiſtle to Lucidus that there were ſome who did ſo aſſert Predeſtination as to make all Mens Endeavours vain and uſeleſs; And this dangerous Error he renounced in his Recantation delivered to the Council of Arles. (q) Manguin is very hard put to it, when he ſaith, That all theſe things were the mere invention of Fauſtus; whom he makes to be Countryman with Pelagius and Cæleſtius, and to have ſucked in the Poiſon of Pelagianiſm with his Milk. He grants that he was famous for his Wit, Eloquence and Philoſophy; But eſpecially for a profound cunning, which (r) Iſidore mentions in him; From whence he endeavours to prove by many Arguments, That theſe Councils and Epiſtles were all forged by Fauſtus. But he is ſo far from perſuading Learned Men to be of his Mind, That (s) Noris himſelf confeſſeth he can never aſſent to it; And although it be looked on as part of the cunning of Fauſtus, that he deſigned to convey his Books ſo privately to his Countrymen the Britains, as appears by the Epiſtle of Sidonius Apollinaris to him, yet it is utterly incredible that he ſhould forge two Councils, and ſet down the Names of ſeveral Biſhops as preſent in them, with whom Sidonius Apollinaris was particularly acquainted, and yet he not diſcover the Cheat and Impoſture. But the Janſeniſts yield, that both thoſe Councils were held about An. Dom. 475. But they ſay, that the Biſhops were partly Semipelagians, partly deceived by Fauſtus who was ſo; And Noris doth not deny, that there were other Perſons who were then charged with thoſe Opinions which Lucidus held. But, he ſaith, they were not many nor conſiderable enough to make a Sect; And that they did not willingly yield thoſe Conſequences. But not knowing how to anſwer the Semipelagians, they were forced to aſſert them; Which their Adverſaries therefore charged them with as their own Opinions. Which ſeems no improbable Account of thoſe called Predeſtinations. It cannot be denied, that Fauſtus his Books were ſeverely cenſured after his death, not only by the Scythian Monks at Conſtantinople, among whom Joh. Maxentius was the chief; but by the African Biſhops who were then Exiles in Sardinia, by whom Fulgentius was employ'd to write againſt them. But Poſſeſſor, one of the African exiled Biſhops, being then at Conſtantinople, and finding great Heats about Fauſtus his Books, ſends to Pope Hormiſdas, to know his Judgment about them; Which he did at the requeſt of Vitalianus and Juſtinianus two of the greateſt Men in the Emperor's Court. He returns a cautious Anſwer as to Fauſtus; Which, by the way, ſhews how little Credit is to be given to the Decree of Gelaſius about Apocryphal Books, for therein Fauſtus his Books are condemned. But if this had been done by Gelaſius, is it probable that Hormiſdas, his Succeſſor, would have ſtuck ſo much at it as Maxentius ſaith that he did? But he refers them for the ſenſe of the Church to St. Auguſtine, and Proſper, and Hilary; And the Definitions of his Predeceſſors. Maxentius rails againſt this Anſwer, as unſatisfactory and next to heretical, and ſets St. Auguſtine's Sayings againſt thoſe of Fauſtus. Afterwards Cæſarius, Biſhop of Arles, not only wrote againſt Fauſtus his Doctrine, but by his means chiefly it was condemned in the Second Council of Orange: Which aſſerted the Neceſſity of Preventing Grace; The denying whereof was the main Error charg'd on Fauſtus, not ſo much as to good Works for (t) Janſenius hath at large proved, That the Semipelagians did yield the Neceſſity of Internal Grace as to them;) but Fauſtus and Caſſian and Gennadius denied it as to Faith or Good Inclinations.

But to return to St. Germanus and his Companions into Britain; If we give Credit to our Antiquaries, they did other Kindneſſes to the Britiſh Churches beſides the confuting Pelagianiſm, whereof two are moſt conſiderable. (1.) The Inſtitution of Schools of Learning among the Britains. (2.) The Introduction of the Gallican Liturgy into the uſe of theſe Churches.

(1.) As to Schools of Learning, none were more famous among the Britains than thoſe of Dubricius and Iltutus, who are both ſaid to have been the Diſciples of St. German. The Anonymous Author of the Chronicle in (u) Leland ſaith, that St. Germanus and Lupus, having rooted out Pelagianiſm, conſecrated Biſhops in ſeveral parts of Britain, and among the reſt they placed a Cathedral at Landaff, and made Dubricius Archbiſhop, who diſpoſed of his Diſciples to ſeveral Churches; He made Daniel Biſhop of Bangor, and ſent Iltutus to a Place from him called Llan Iltut, or the Church of Iltutus. (w) Camden ſaith, to this day it is called Llantuit, where the Foundations of many Houſes are ſtill to be ſeen; Near the Place called Bovium in the Itinerary, now Boverton. But there is another Place near Nidum or Neath, whoſe name comes very near it Llanyltad. The (x) old Regiſter of Landaff, after it hath mentioned the frequent Meſſages the Britains ſent to the neighbour Biſhops of Gaul for aſſiſtance againſt the Pelagians, and the coming of Germanus and Lupus ſent by them, it adds, that they conſecrated Biſhops in many Places, and made Dubricius Archbiſhop over all the Britains, Dextralis partis Britanniæ, Of the right hand part of Britain. With which John of Tinmouth and Capgrave agree. What this Right hand part of Britain was at the time of the Conſecration of Dubricius is not ſo eaſie to underſtand; Archbiſhop (y) Uſher takes it for South Wales; it being the cuſtom of the Britains to call the South the Right hand ſide; ſo Aſſerius Menevenſis calls Suſſex the Region of the Right hand Saxons. But it is obſervable that (z) Aſſerius there makes Demetia, or South Wales, to be but a part of what he calls Dextralis pars Britanniæ. For when he ſaith in general, That all the Countrey of the Right hand of Britain ſubmitted to King Alfred, he then inſtanceth particularly in Hemeid King of Demetia, and Houil, and other Kings of Guent, by which North Wales is as much underſtood as South Wales is by the other. And therefore I rather think Dubricius was made Archbiſhop over all the Britains in thoſe Parts; For (a) Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis ſaith, The Biſhop of Caerleon had ſeven ſuffragan Biſhops under him: And (b) Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, That Dubricius was made Archbiſhop of Caerleon, (although he might have a Seat at Landaff, as the Regiſter of that Church affirms, by the Gift of Mauricius.) But it appears that he had then Archiepiſcopal Power; And poſſibly, upon the Diſturbance of thoſe times, the See might for a time be removed to Landaff; From whence it was again removed by St. David to the Town bearing his Name. But the Biſhops of Landaff who ſucceeded were ſo unſatiſfied with it; That the Regiſter of that Church ſaith, That from Oudoceus the ſecond from Dubricius, (for he ſucceeded Theliaus in that See) They choſe rather to be Conſecrated by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, than by their own Metropolitan of St. David's, as appears by the Proteſtation made by the Biſhop of Landaff to Calixtus II. in the Council of Rhemes, Anno Dom. 1119. But I confeſs, it doth not ſeem very probable that a Britiſh Biſhop ſhould ſhould go for Conſecration to Auguſtine the Monk or his Succeſſors; For the Britiſh Biſhops did all look on them as Intruders; And if any ſhould have done it, how would they have been received by the Britiſh Churches at that time? It is therefore far more probable, either that they went over to the Britiſh Archbiſhop, at Dol in Britannie, or that there was a Succeſſion preſerved for ſome time of the Archbiſhops of London among the Britains, after the retirement of Theonus and Thadiocus, the two other Metropolitans of London and York, who, as (c) Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, did withdraw when their Churches were deſtroyed by the Saxons, with many of their Clergy into Wales; where as long as that Succeſſion continued they might exerciſe ſome parts of their Function, leaving the main to the Archbiſhop of Caerleon, to whom of right it belonged; And Ranulphus ſaith; That Province extended as far as the Severn, and ſo took in Cheſter, Hereford and Worceſter; But before Dubricius was ſo much advanced, the Authors of his Life ſpeak of the great number of Scholars which flock'd to him from all Parts of Britain; Not the Rude and Vulgar only, but Perſons of greateſt Reputation, among whom they name St. Thelians, Samſon, Aidanus, and many others. Two Places they mention, where he received and inſtructed his Diſciples, one at Hentlan, on the River Wye, where they ſay he had a thouſand Students with him, whom he brought up in humane and divine Literature. And the other was at Moch-rhos, where he had a Place for Study and Devotion.

Iltutus by (d) Vincentius, and the (e) Author of the Life of Samſon is ſaid poſitively to have been a Diſciple of St. Germanus; And the (f) Author of the Life of Gildas ſaith, That in the School of Iltutus many Noblemens Sons were brought up, among whom he reckons as the chief Sampſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of the Britains, viz. at Dol in Britannie; Paulus, Biſhop of the Oxiſmii, the moſt Northern of the Aremorici (which Biſhoprick is ſince divided into three, Treguier, St. Pol de Leon and St. Brieu) and Gildas, called Sapiens, of whom afterwards: Leland to theſe adds David and Paulinus: And ſaith, his School flouriſhed like an Univerſity among the Britains. (g) Bollandus and Henſchenius make a very probable Conjecture, That when St. German came into Britain, and found the decay of Learning to have been the great occaſion of the ſpreading of Pelagianiſm he appointed Dubricius and Iltutus to undertake the Education of the Britiſh Clergy; And that by theſe means, as Bede ſaith, theſe Churches continued afterwards pure and free from this Hereſie. Which was a wiſe and ſeaſonable Inſtitution; And hereby we ſee the Britiſh Churches were not defective in Learning in their loweſt Condition, when the Britains were forced to leave their Habitations, and to fly into Corners.

Of which, beſides theſe Nurſeries of Dubricius and Iltutus, we have a famous Inſtance in the Monaſtery of Banchor, which even (h) Bede ſaith, was furniſhed with learned Men at the coming of Auguſtine into England. This Banchor was diſtant but ten or twelve Miles from Cheſter, as (i) Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis, and Bradſhaw, in his Life of St. Werburg, ſay. (k) Leland in his Itinerary deſcribes the Place as ſtanding in a Valley, and having the compaſs of a walled Town, and two Gates remaining half a Mile diſtant from each other. (l) Camden ſuppoſes it to be the Bomium in Antoninus, being ten Miles diſtant from Deva, *i. e. as to them;) but Fauſtus and Caſſian and Gennadius denied it as to Faith or Good Inclinations.

But to return to St. Germanus and his Companions into Britain; If we give Credit to our Antiquaries, they did other Kindneſſes to the Britiſh Churches beſides the confuting Pelagianiſm, whereof two are moſt conſiderable. (1.) The Inſtitution of Schools of Learning among the Britains. (2.) The Introduction of the Gallican Liturgy into the uſe of theſe Churches.

(1.) As to Schools of Learning, none were more famous among the Britains than thoſe of Dubricius and Iltutus, who are both ſaid to have been the Diſciples of St. German. The Anonymous Author of the Chronicle in (u) Leland ſaith, that St. Germanus and Lupus, having rooted out Pelagianiſm, conſecrated Biſhops in ſeveral parts of Britain, and among the reſt they placed a Cathedral at Landaff, and made Dubricius Archbiſhop, who diſpoſed of his Diſciples to ſeveral Churches; He made Daniel Biſhop of Bangor, and ſent Iltutus to a Place from him called Llan Iltut, or the Church of Iltutus. (w) Camden ſaith, to this day it is called Llantuit, where the Foundations of many Houſes are ſtill to be ſeen; Near the Place called Bovium in the Itinerary, now Boverton. But there is another Place near Nidum or Neath, whoſe name comes very near it Llanyltad. The (x) old Regiſter of Landaff, after it hath mentioned the frequent Meſſages the Britains ſent to the neighbour Biſhops of Gaul for aſſiſtance againſt the Pelagians, and the coming of Germanus and Lupus ſent by them, it adds, that they conſecrated Biſhops in many Places, and made Dubricius Archbiſhop over all the Britains, Dextralis partis Britanniæ, Of the right hand part of Britain. With which John of Tinmouth and Capgrave agree. What this Right hand part of Britain was at the time of the Conſecration of Dubricius is not ſo eaſie to underſtand; Archbiſhop (y) Uſher takes it for South Wales; it being the cuſtom of the Britains to call the South the Right hand ſide; ſo Aſſerius Menevenſis calls Suſſex the Region of the Right hand Saxons. But it is obſervable that (z) Aſſerius there makes Demetia, or South Wales, to be but a part of what he calls Dextralis pars Britanniæ. For when he ſaith in general, That all the Countrey of the Right hand of Britain ſubmitted to King Alfred, he then inſtanceth particularly in Hemeid King of Demetia, and Houil, and other Kings of Guent, by which North Wales is as much underſtood as South Wales is by the other. And therefore I rather think Dubricius was made Archbiſhop over all the Britains in thoſe Parts; For (a) Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis ſaith, The Biſhop of Caerleon had ſeven ſuffragan Biſhops under him: And (b) Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, That Dubricius was made Archbiſhop of Caerleon, (although he might have a Seat at Landaff, as the Regiſter of that Church affirms, by the Gift of Mauricius.) But it appears that he had then Archiepiſcopal Power; And poſſibly, upon the Diſturbance of thoſe times, the See might for a time be removed to Landaff; From whence it was again removed by St. David to the Town bearing his Name. But the Biſhops of Landaff who ſucceeded were ſo unſatisfied with it; That the Regiſter of that Church ſaith, That from Oudoceus the ſecond from Dubricius, (for he ſucceeded Theliaus in that See) They choſe rather to be Conſecrated by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, than by their own Metropolitan of St. David's, as appears by the Proteſtation made by the Biſhop of Landaff to Calixtus II. in the Council of Rhemes, Anno Dom. 1119. But I confeſs, it doth not ſeem very probable that a Britiſh Biſhop ſhould go for Conſecration to Auguſtine the Monk or his Succeſſors; For the Britiſh Biſhops did all look on them as Intruders; And if any ſhould have done it, how would they have been received by the Britiſh Churches at that time? It is therefore far more probable, either that they went over to the Britiſh Archbiſhop, at Dol in Britannie, or that there was a Succeſſion preſerved for ſome time of the Archbiſhops of London among the Britains, after the retirement of Theonus and Thadiocus, the two other Metropolitans of London and York, who, as (c) Matt. Weſtminſter ſaith, did withdraw when their Churches were deſtroyed by the Saxons, with many of their Clergy into Wales; where as long as that Succeſſion continued they might exerciſe ſome parts of their Function, leaving the main to the Archbiſhop of Caerleon, to whom of right it belonged; And Ranulphus ſaith; That Province extended as far as the Severn, and ſo took in Cheſter, Hereford and Worceſter; But before Dubricius was ſo much advanced, the Authors of his Life ſpeak of the great number of Scholars which flock'd to him from all Parts of Britain; Not the Rude and Vulgar only, but Perſons of greateſt Reputation, among whom they name St. Theliaus, Samſon, Aidanus, and many others. ſembling our Colleges than the Egyptian Monaſteries, where Men were brought up to Ignorance and Labour as much as to Devotion. Wherein the Benedictines followed them according to their firſt Inſtitution: For St. Benedict himſelf not only deſpiſed Learning, as the Writers of his Life ſay; But he takes no care about it in the Rule of his Order; And when (m) Boniface gave an account to Zachary of his ſetting up a Benedictine Monaſtery at Fulda, he ſets the Monks out by their Abſtinence and hard Labour with their own Hands, without Servants. It is true that (n) Trithemius ſpeaks much of the Schools of Learning in the Benedictine Monaſteries, but not before Anno Dom. 890. which was after the (o) Conſtitutions of Charles the Great, who appointed Schools for inſtructing Youth both in Monaſteries and Cathedrals; Which gave the firſt Countenance and Encouragement to Learning at that time; And (p) Lupus Ferrarienſis ſaith, That the reviving of Learning was then owing to him: But although theſe Conſtitutions extended no farther than to Grammar Schools; yet from hence, thoſe who were inclined to Learning in the Monaſteries applied themſelves more to it; and by degrees gained a great Reputation by it, as Rabanus Maurus at Fulda, whoſe eſteem drew Lupus thither, and many others; Which example prevailing, and the Monks finding ſuch reſort to increaſe their Wealth as well as Reputation, as (q) Aub. Miræus obſerves; from that time the Monaſteries were deſirous to have ſome of their Number to be eminent for Learning, which had been before ſo much neglected by them, as wholly beſides the Rule of their Order. But the Monaſteries of the Weſtern Churches before St. Benedict's time, ſuch as that of St. Ambroſe, St. Euſebius of Vercelles, St. Auguſtine in Africa, St. Martin in Gaul, were chiefly intended as Nurſeries to the Church, and the Perſons educated therein, were brought up with a deſign to do the Church Service afterwards. This method of Education taking ſo much in other Churches (as in Gaul, where ſo many eminent Biſhops were taken out of the Monaſtery of Lerins, according to the Rule of Capraſius,) St. German who was ſo well acquainted with St. Honoratus, St. Hilary of Arles, and others of that Education, might probably be the firſt Inſtrument of ſetting up this way in the Britiſh Churches. And to confirm this, St. Patrick, who carried over this Monaſtick Education into Ireland, ſpent many Years under the Diſcipline of St. German, as (r) Probus and (s) Jocelin the Writers of his Life do agree. And thoſe who have written of St. German have mention'd him as one of his Diſciples, as (t) Erricus of Auxerre. And (u) William of Malmesbury ſaith, he was not only a Diſciple of St. German, but being made Biſhop by Celeſtine, he was ſent by St. German into Ireland. And in the Iriſh Monaſteries there were Schools like thoſe of Dubricius and Iltutus for the breeding of Youth in Learning. For therein, as Rouſe an Antiquary in Edward IV. time ſaith, The Maſters did teach, Secundum formam Studiorum antiquorum, according to the ancient Method of Learning; Which our learned (w) Primate underſtands of joining the Studies of humane Learning with divine; of which he produces an Inſtance in a MS. of the Library of Worceſter; Being a Commentary of an Iriſh Biſhop upon Martianus Capella's Aſtrology which he read to his Diſciples in the Monaſtery of St. Remigius in Down. And the Author of the Opus Tripartitum of the Life of St. Patrick ſaith, That he ſet up at Armagh Summum ſtudium literale. Which in the Language of that time is the ſame with an Univerſity, only this is a Law-term, and implies a Legal Society incorporated for the Profeſſion of Learning, which the (x) Civilians tell us, None but the Supreme Authority of a Nation can do. In this School at Armagh, Caradoc of Lancarvan in his Life of Gildas ſaith, That he was a Profeſſor, Studium regens & prædicans in Civitate Ardmaca. But the Anonymous Author of his Life publiſhed out of an ancient MS. by Joh. à Boſco (y) ſaith, That Gildas, going over into Ireland in the time of Ammeric, i. e. about An. Dom. 566. found both Religion and Learning much decay'd there, and that he built many Churches and Monaſteries, and brought up many Noble Mens Sons therein. In his younger days, he ſaith, Gildas went to Iren, and viſited the Schools of many Learned Men, and enquired their Opinions in Philoſophical and Divine matters.

Some queſtion hath been made by Learned Men, what this Author means by Iren; The moſt eaſie and obvious ſenſe is to take it for Ireland, where there were ſo many Schools of Learning in the Monaſteries of St. Patrick's Foundation; And Iris is uſed by (z) Diodorus Siculus for Ireland: And (a) Ierne in the Book de Mundo, and Apuleius; and the Inhabitants are called Irenſes by (b) Ordericus Vitalis: and the Country is called Erin by the Inhabitants, as Archbiſhop (c) Uſher obſerves; But the marginal Note of Joh. à Boſco hath led ſome quite out of their way in ſeeking for this Place; Which is, That Iren was an Univerſity then in Great Britain; And from hence they have proceeded to prove our famous Univerſity of Oxford to be meant by it; (d) Firſt, Iren, ſay they, was miſtaken for Icen, and that for Ychen, and Ychen for Rydychen, and Rydychen in the Britiſh Tongue ſignifies the ſame with Vadum Boum, and that is the ſame with Oxford. I cannot think Learned Men write theſe things any otherwiſe than as Sports of Wit, which are intended for the diverſion, and not for the conviction of the Reader. As likewiſe, when the ſame Authors produce out of Conſtantius his Life of St. German, Regionis illius Univerſitas, to prove the Antiquity of their Univerſity. But that Paſſage in the Copy of Aſſerius, printed by Camden is more material, viz. That St. German ſtaid half a year in Oxford, and approved the Orders made by Gildas, Melkin, Nennius and Kentigern. I know what Heats have been about this Paſſage among very Learned Men. For my part, I ſee no cauſe to miſtruſt the ſincerity of Archbiſhop Parker in the Edition of his very ancient Copy, where this Paſſage was not to be found; And I do not queſtion Camden's Fidelity in publiſhing Aſſerius out of ſome other Copy; But it had been fair to have given an Account whence he had it, and for what Reaſons he inſerted it in another Edition of Aſſerius; and why he preferred the Savilian Copy before the other. But I cannot but wonder that theſe Learned Men have taken no more notice of the Inconſiſtency of this Paſſage with the Hiſtory of thoſe times. For theſe Perſons all lived a conſiderable time after St. German, as it were eaſie to prove, if it were worth the pains. For Gildas was not born till at leaſt forty four years were paſt after St. German's death: which thus appears; He ſaith he was born the year of the Victory of Aurelius Ambroſius over the Saxons at the Mons Badonicus, which was forty four years after they came hither, An. Dom. 449. And by comparing St. German's Embaſſy to Valentinian at Ravenna, where he died, we ſhall find that St. German was dead the year before the Saxons arrival, An. Dom. 448. As the (e) Samarthani ſhew. But againſt this there is a conſiderable Objection from what (f) Bede ſaith, That the Saxons and Picts joined together ther after St. German*'s coming, which occaſion'd a Victory by ſinging* Alleluiah according to St. German*'s direction*; and it is ſo much ſtronger, in that the very ſame Expreſſions are in Conſtantius. But this may be eaſily ſolved by thoſe that conſider the frequent Incurſions the Saxons made on the Britains before they were ſent for over, as appears by the Comes Litoris Saxonici per Britanniam, appointed to ſecure the Coaſts from the Saxons; and that Gildas therefore wonders the Britains ſhould ſend for the Saxons, of whom they were ſo much afraid before: And when the Roman forces were withdrawn, no doubt they did more boldly and frequently diſturb them.

Beſides, (g) Conſtantius ſaith in St. German's Life, that he ſucceeded St. Amator in his See, and continued therein thirty years and twenty five days. But St. Amator died An. Dom. 418. as our Learned (h) Primate hath proved, becauſe the Calends of May on which he died were that year, as Conſtantius ſaith, the fourth day of the Week, which agrees to 418. If it be ſaid, That this Paſſage of Aſſerius is meant of an Elder Gildas, called Gildas Albanius, whoſe Life the ſame excellent Antiquary ſuppoſes to be written by Caradoc of Lancarvan; I anſwer, that when he comes to fix the times in his Chronological Index, he doth overthrow his own Suppoſition: For Caradoc, by his own confeſſion, makes Gildas contemporary with King Arthur, and he is ſaid by him to be born An. Dom. 493. And therefore Caradoc's Gildas can be no elder than the Gildas Badonicus. Although therefore the want of skill may make Caradoc ſet his Gildas elder than he ought to have done; yet whoſoever will compare that Life publiſhed by Joh. à Boſco with the other by Caradoc, will find that they were deſigned for the ſame Perſon. And therefore Leland, with far more judgment, mentions but one Gildas; but Bale and Pits make more; but it is their Vanity to multiply Authors as well as Books. St. Kentigern was baptized aſſoon as he was born, by Seruanus, one of the Diſciples of Palladius, whoſe Miſſion had the ſame date with the firſt coming of St. Germanus and Lupus; And therefore it is not very probable that St. German ſhould ſee the Orders of Gildas and Kentigern, much leſs thoſe of Melkin and Nennius, whoſe Ages fall ſo far ſhort of the others.

But although St. German's being at Oxford cannot be proved by ſuch obſcure and incoherent Paſſages as this; yet I doubt not but by the Evidence already produced, he did take care to advance Learning and Piety in the Britiſh Churches whereſoever he came: Both which were falling very much to decay upon the irruption of the barbarous Nations. While the Roman Empire flouriſhed there was care taken for the encouragement of Learning, eſpecially in greater Cities. At Rome by the Conſtitution of Valentinian we may ſee the Orders then made for the Regulation of Students there; as for entring their Names who came thither out of the ſeveral Provinces by the Magiſter Cenſus, with the Teſtimonials from the Governours of Provinces, of the Place of their Birth and Quality, who then were to declare what Studies they deſigned to follow, and an account was to be given of their Lodgings: And particular Officers were appointed called Cenſuales to make an Inſpection into their Lives, that they did avoid all Clubs called there Conſociations, or frequent appearing at the Sports, or affecting unſeaſonable and publick Entertainments. If any were found faulty, they were to be chaſtiſed, and ſent away home, but none were permitted to ſtay after twenty at Rome, and an account of theſe things was to be be taken monthly, and given in to the Præfectus Urbis, and return'd to the Emperor every year; as appears by the (i) Conſtitution it ſelf in the Theodoſian Code. By which we find, That Rome it ſelf was then the chief Univerſity of the Empire, to which Students reſorted from all the Provinces, and the Emperor thought it not below his Cognizance to have notice ſent him of the Numbers, Qualities and Behaviours of the Students; But leſt the Splendor and Vanities of Rome ſhould tempt them to forſake the Service of their Country, they were not permitted to ſtay there after twenty years of Age; For then, not having the Difficulties of the Language to conquer which they were uſed to while Children, at fifteen they were thought fit to be inſtructed in other Studies, and five or ſix years was all the time this Law allow'd them to proſecute them under the Maſters at Rome. Where, beſides an infinite number of private Teachers in that vaſt City, there were publick Profeſſors appointed, who had their Schools within the Area of the Capitol, which were called Auditoria publica, as we may reaſonably infer from the (k) Conſtitution of Theodoſius; where the Exedræ of the Portico's of the Capitol at Conſtantinople are appointed to make Auditoria for the publick Profeſſors there: And Conſtantinople follow'd the Pattern at Rome. Theſe Exedræ were, as (l) Vitruvius deſcribes them, Places of Capacity within the Portico's, with Seats round, in which the Rhetoricians, and others, were wont to diſcourſe; Or, according to (m) Cicero, they were Cellæ ad colloquendum aut meridiandum, ſuch as Craſſus had at Tuſculum, and Cotta at Rome, where thoſe great Men were wont to ſit for their diverſion and diſcourſe with each other: And the Greek Gloſſary renders Exedra, a School; ſuch a one (n) Strabo deſcribes in the Muſæum at Alexandria, which conſiſted of a Walk, an Exedra, and a great Houſe where the Learned Men did all live and eat together upon a publick Allowance, under the Government of a Perſon appointed by their Kings, and after by the Cæſars. This Muſæum was adjoining to the Palace, and near it was the famous Library of Ptolemy Philadelphus: For that was in Bruchio, as (o) Epiphanius ſaith, and was diſtinct from the other Library afterwards in Serapeo mentioned by (p) Ammianus Marcellinus. This Bruchion was a Region of the City, as Epiphanius ſaith; And ſome will have its Name from the Πυρȣχεῖον, the Granary of Alexandria being there, and by contraction it was called Πρȣχεῖον. So the MS. of (q) Euſebius mention'd by Valeſius hath it. But (r) Salmaſius would have the name taken from the Stores laid in there for the College of Learned Men in the Muſæum, which Ammianus Marcellinus calls Præſtantium hominum domicilium; And this Πυρȣχεῖον, he ſaith, is the ſame with Πρυτανεῖον, and Euſtathius ſaith, The one ſignified the ſame at Alexandria, which the other did at Athens; And, he obſerves, that it was accounted a great favour in the Emperors to grant any Learned Man τὴν ἐν Μȣσείῳ σίτησιν, i. e. a Fellowſhip in the College. So (s) Athenæus mentions it as the kindneſs of Hadrian to Pancrates the Poet, for flattering Antinous; That he gave him a Right of Commons in the Muſæum: As he did likewiſe to Dionyſius the Sophiſt, and Polemon, and Nicetas Smyrnæus, as Philoſtratus in their Lives relates. Ariſtonicus wrote the Hiſtory of the Muſæum at Alexandria, and of the Philoſophers and Learned Men who flouriſhed in it, and the manner of their living there; Out of whom (t) Photius ſaith that Sopater borrow'd part of the twelfth Book of his Miſcellanies. But this Book being loſt, as likewiſe thoſe of Callimachus and Alcidamas, no particular account can be given of the Hiſtory of it. Only in general we know, that the moſt Learned Perſons in their ſeveral Profeſſions were invited thither, and had there all the Encouragements which Freedom from Care, good Air, (for the Muſæum was celebrated for that by Strabo) ſutable Society and an excellent Library could give them; the Keepers whereof were men of the greateſt Reputation, as Demetrius Phalereus, Zenodotus Epheſius, Eratoſthenes, Apollonius, Ariſtonymus, Chæremon, Dionyſius, &c. In this Muſæum it was that (u) Hadrian propoſed Queſtions to the Profeſſors; and in it were Ἀγῶνες inſtituted, or Sports, by Philadelphus to Apollo and the Muſes, after the finiſhing his Library, and Rewards given to thoſe that overcame in the Opinions of the five Judges appointed for that purpoſe. From hence came the Commiſſiones and Agones Sacri among the Romans, at which Judges were appointed; Among whom (w) Horace mentions Metius Tarpa for one. Theſe were ſometimes performed in the Capitol, as (x) Rycquius obſerves, i. e. in the Portico's where the Exedræ were like thoſe at Conſtantinople. What the Number of publick Profeſſors was at Alexandria and Rome is not certainly known, but at Conſtantinople their Number is determin'd by a (y) Conſtitution of Theodoſius. In the Publick Schools called there Auditorium Capitolii and Auditorium noſtrum, there were to be for the Latine Tongue three Orators, and ten Grammarians; For the Greek five Sophiſts, and ten Grammarians; One Profeſſor of Philoſophy and two of Law. Theſe had had their diſtinct Schools allotted them called Publicæ Magiſtrationes and Cellæ in the Law; And all others were forbidden to teach in publick, either within the Capitol, or elſewhere, upon pain of Infamy for the Fact, and Baniſhment out of the City. The Emperor Valens, by another Conſtitution, appointed for the Publick Library at Conſtantinople ſeven Antiquaries to look after the Books, four Greek and three Latine, who were to have a publick allowance; So that there was a Bibliotheca Palatina there as well as at Rome, and both in probability were near the Capitol, where the Profeſſors taught; For that at Rome was called Bibliotheca Capitolina, concerning which Joh. (z) Sarisburienſis ſaith, It was reported that Gregory the great cauſed it to be deſtroyed, out of a fear, that Heathen Learning ſhould abate Mens Love to the Scriptures; which was a very fooliſh and ſuperſtitious fear. For Men know better how to value the Scriptures by it. And he did ill then to fetch the Soul of Trajan out of Purgatory (but I hope one Story is no truer than the other) for he founded the Bibliotheca Ulpia, which was next to the Palatina; and Victor ſaith, There were twenty ſeven more publick Libraries in Rome. If this Story be true, Gregory rather follow'd the Steps of Julian than of Conſtantine; for the one envied Learning to the Chriſtians as much as the other promoted it, Victor's Epitome ſaith of Conſtantine, that he did, Nutrire artes bonas, præcipuè ſtudia Literarum; And his (a) Conſtitutions ſtill extant do ſhew the great kindneſs he had for Learning and Learned Men; granting great Privileges and publick Salaries to the Profeſſors of Learning in the ſeveral Cities of the Empire But Julian, finding that Chriſtianity did ſpread by the Learning of the Chriſtians, he firſt drew the choice of publick Profeſſors to himſelf, by making his Approbation neceſſary after the Judicium Ordinis and Decretum Curialium, and ſo excluded the Chriſtians. Afterwards (b) he expreſly declared, He would endure none to interpret Heathen Authors, who argued againſt their Religion: But no Conſtitution appears in the Code beſides the

the former tending that Way. Upon this Proæreſius, ſaith (c) St. Jerome, left the Chair at Athens, although he had a particular Indulgence by Julian. And (d) Oroſius adds, That the Chriſtian Profeſſors of Learning almoſt univerſally forſook their Places: But both mention an expreſs Edict of Julian's to that purpoſe. Some Writers ſpeak of another Edict forbidding Chriſtian Children to learn; But I can find no Edict to that purpoſe. And it ſeems to me to have been only a Conſequence of the former; Since Chriſtian Parents would not ſend their Children to be taught by Heathens, having ſeen the ſad effect of it in the Apoſtacy of Julian, under his Heathen Tutors, Mardonius, Maximus and Jamblichus.

But by this Edict we find how univerſally Learning was then diffuſed through the Provinces of the Roman Empire, which was in a great meaſure due to Antoninus Pius, of whom (e) Jul. Capitolinus ſaith, That he appointed Honours and Penſions to Rhetoricians and Philoſophers through all the Provinces; which were confirmed and inlarged by the ſeveral Edicts of Conſtantine to that purpoſe, already mention'd. And (f) Fr. Baldwin takes particular notice of his Zeal to promote Learning. In Gaul (g) St. Jerome mentions the Florentiſſima Studia Galliarum; And Conſtantius, in the Life of St. German, the Auditoria Galliarum; after which, he ſaith, he went to Rome as the chief Univerſity, eſpecially for Law; thence (h) Sidonius Apollinaris calls it Domicilium Legum, and St. (i) Auguſtine ſaith, he went thither to ſtudy the Laws. But other Profeſſions flouriſhed elſewhere; as at Carthage, (k) Salvian ſaith, There were Profeſſors of all Arts and Sciences: And at Sicca Veneria in Africa, Arnobius was Profeſſor of Rhetorick. Near Lyons in Gaul the 60 Cities had dedicated an Altar to Auguſtus, where the Rhoſne and the Arar meet, there Caius Caligula appointed Prizes to be plaid both in Greek and Latine Eloquence; And not that only, but Philoſophy was there taught; Thence (l) Odilo, Abbat of Clugny, about Anno Dom. 1020. calls Lyons of old the Mother and Nurſe of Philoſophy. In the time of Diocleſian and Maximianus, the Nobility of Gaul were brought up to Learning at Auguſtodunum (Autun,) and there Eumenius was both Rector and Profeſſor, as appears by his Speech to Conſtantius, where (m) he celebrates ſo much the Scholæ Mænianæ, Quondam pulcherrimo opere & ſtudiorum frequentiâ celebres; which having ſuffer'd very much in the Rebellion of the Bagandæ under the latter Claudius; he was extremely concerned to have them rebuilt, which is the deſign of his excellent Oration. But long before, in Tiberius his time, (n) Tacitus ſaith, The Sons of the Nobility did there, Liberalibus ſtudijs operari, improve themſelves in Learning. (o) Euſebius mentions in the time of Nero, Statius Urſulus of Tholouſe, a famous Profeſſor of Rhetorick. And (p) Auſonius reckons up many of thoſe who had been famous there and at Bourdeaux, and other Places. But to ſpare our pains in particular Places, there is extant in the Theodoſian Code an (q) Edict of Gratian, requiring all the chief Cities of theſe Parts of the Roman Empire to ſettle and maintain in them Profeſſors of Learning, both of the Greek and Roman Languages. This Edict was directed to the Præfectus Prætorio Galliarum, and was commanded to be obſerved through all his Dioceſe, which Gothofred reſtrains to the Provinces of Gaul, excluding Britain, for which I ſee no reaſon; Since (r) Auſonius who was himſelf in that Office in Gratian's time, comprehends the Britains under his Juriſdiction. And the Notitia Imperii places the Provinces of Britain under him him after Gratian's time. Which Notitia he thinks was made about Anno Dom. 426. By virtue of which Edict we are to ſearch for the ancient Schools of Learning among the Britains, in the chief Cities of the Provinces at that time; eſpecially at London, which was the Caput Gentis, being Auguſta, or the Imperial City, and ſo at York and Caerleon. So that the Britiſh Churches, as long as the Roman Power continued here, had the ſame advantages for Learning which they had in other Provinces; But when the Roman Forces were withdrawn, and nothing but Miſeries and Deſolation follow'd; then St. German's Care proved a moſt ſeaſonable Relief to them in providing ſuch Schools as thoſe of Dubricius and Iltutus, for the breeding up of Perſons qualified for the Service of the Church; as far as the Miſeries of thoſe times would permit.

The laſt thing to be conſidered is, The publick Service of the Britiſh Churches. And in an ancient MS. in the Cotton Library, about the Original of Divine Offices, Germanus and Lupus are ſaid to have brought into the uſe of the Britiſh Churches, Ordinem Curſûs Gallorum. By which (s) Archbiſhop Uſher underſtands the Gallican Liturgy. For Curſus in the Eccleſiaſtical uſe of the Word is the ſame with Officium Divinum, as Dominicus Macer, in his late Hierolexicon ſhews; thence Curſum celebrare, is, to perform Divine Offices; And ſo the Word Curſus is often uſed in (t) Fortunatus his Life of St. German, Biſhop of Paris, and in our (u) Saxon Writers: But this Curſus Gallorum is there diſtinguiſhed from the Curſus Orientalis, and the Curſus Ambroſii, and the Curſus Benedicti (which little differs, he ſaith, from the Curſus Romanus.) And this was that which Germanus and Lupus had learnt in the Monaſtery of Lerins, where it was uſed by Caſſianus and Honoratus, as the Author of that Book affirms, which I find to have been the ſame which (w) Sir H. Spelman commends for its great Antiquity. And that Author derives the Gallican Liturgy from St. John by Polycarp and Irenæus; Which MS. Mabillon was inclined to think to have been the Book which Gregorius Turonenſis wrote de Curſibus Eccleſiaſticis, but for the quoting the (x) Life of Columbanus and Attala, which was not written till after his Death.

This will oblige us to enquire, what the Gallican Liturgy at this time was, and how far different from the Roman. It is agreed on all hands, that there was a material difference between them, but wherein it lay is not ſo eaſily underſtood. When Gregory ſent Auguſtine the Monk into England, to ſettle the Saxon Churches, and he was conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of Arles, one of the Queſtions, (y) Auguſtine propoſed, was, ſince there was ſuch difference between the Offices of the Roman and Gallican Churches, which he ſhould follow? Gregory anſwered, That he ſhould chuſe what he thought moſt proper for the Engliſh Church. Which implies, That there was a diverſity ſtill between them; And that the Pope did not oblige him to follow the Example of the Roman Church; chiefly, I ſuppoſe, Becauſe the Queen, being a Chriſtian before, and uſing the Gallican Liturgy in the Publick Service, and her Biſhop being of the Gallican Church, it would have given great Offence to them to have had it taken away; as likewiſe to all the Britiſh Churches which had been accuſtomed to it. If the Books of Muſæus mention'd by (z) Gennadius were extant, we ſhould eaſily underſtand wherein the difference lay. For, he being a Presbyter of the Church of Marſeilles, and a Man learned in the Scriptures, was deſired by Venerius, the Biſhop there, to draw up a Form of Publick Service, conſiſting of two Parts, viz. The Morning Service, and the Communion Service. The firſt he finiſhed in the time of Venerius, and is highly commended by Gennadius for its Order, Uſefulneſs and Decency. The ſecond, in the time of Euſtathius his Succeſſor, which he likewiſe commends for its great weight and exactneſs. And there was great Reaſon at that time, to bring the Church-Service into Order, becauſe Caſſian and others endeavour'd to introduce the Monaſtick Cuſtoms which he had obſerved in Egypt and elſewhere, as appears by the deſign of his Monaſtick Inſtitutions, eſpecially the ſecond and third Books, which he dedicated to Caſtor, Biſhop of Apta Julia, at the ſame time that Venerius was Biſhop of Marſeilles, where Caſſian lived. This Muſæus was therefore employ'd to draw up the moſt convenient Order for the Publick Service, from whence we may be able to judge of the Difference in both Parts between the Gallican and Roman Offices.

I begin with the firſt, viz. the Morning Service, which conſiſted of Leſſons, Hymns and Pſalms, agreeable to the Leſſons, and ſhort Collects after them.

In the Church of Rome, for a long time, viz. for above 400 Years, they had nothing before the Sacrifice, as the old Ritualiſts agree, beſides the Epiſtle and Goſpel; then Celeſtine appointed the Pſalms to be uſed; or as (a) Walafr. Strabo and Micrologus ſay, cauſed Antiphonæ to be made out of them and ſung. The Epiſtle was conſtantly taken out of St. Paul, as Walafr. Strabo proves out of the Pontifical Book; in proceſs of time, he ſaith, other Leſſons were taken out of the Old and New Teſtament, agreeably to the time; Which might be borrow'd from the Gallican Church; as other Inlargements of their Offices by the Ritualiſts Confeſſion were, and in probability the Diſtribution of the Leſſons was firſt begun by Muſæus, which we have digeſted according to the Roman Cuſtom in the Lectionarius, publiſhed by Pamelius, by ſome attributed to St. Jerome. After the Leſſons follow'd the Reſponſoria, or Proper Hymns, for ſo (b) Iſidore ſaith, they were called, becauſe, one ſinging, the whole Choire did anſwer; and (c) Rhabanus Maurus calls ſuch an Anthem, Reſponſorius Cantus; and theſe differ'd from the Antiphonæ, becauſe in them the whole Choire ſung each Verſe alternatim: But (d) Rupertus thinks, they had their Name becauſe they anſwered to the Leſſons, being ſung immediately after them; for the refreſhment of the Hearer's Mind, ſaith (e) Amalarius. But, beſides the Leſſons and Hymns, he methodiz'd the Pſalms, ſo as to be read agreeably to the times and the Leſſons; and not in the Order wherein they ſtand; which ſeems to have been peculiar to the Gallican Church. The moſt ancient Cuſtom of the Church, as (f) Menardus proves from Juſtin Martyr, and others, was to begin the publick Service with the Leſſons. And (g) St. Ambroſe, in one Place, ſeems to mention no more in his Church at Milan beſides the Leſſons and the Sermon, before his expounding the Creed to the Competentes; But in the ſame Epiſtle he ſpeaks of the Pſalms that were read in the Morning Service: And (h) elſewhere of the People's anſwering to the Pſalms; and it is generally ſaid by the ancient Ritualiſts, that St. Ambroſe brought into the uſe of the Weſtern Church the Cuſtom of Singing the Pſalms Verſe by Verſe in turns by both ſides of the Choire; ſo (i) Iſidore, (k) Rhabanus, (l) Walafridus Strabo, and (m) Radulphus Tungrenſis: And ſo Paulinus in his Life

Life ſaith, he brought up the Uſe of Antiphonæ, in the Weſtern Church. And (n) Sigebert adds, that he took it from the Greeks. And (o) St. Auguſtine ſets down the occaſion of it, viz. When the People at Milan were perſecuted by the Arians, and reſolved to abide in the Church. And therefore to keep them well employ'd he thought upon this Cuſtom of the Eaſtern Churches; Which not only continued there, but from thence ſpread into other Churches, not without oppoſition in ſome Places; as (p) St. Auguſtine confeſſes, it met with ſome at Carthage; But withal he ſaith, he wrote in Vindication of it. In the Eaſtern Church it was of ancient uſe, if (q) Socrates ſay true; for he ſaith, it begun upon a Divine Viſion to Ignatius, at the Church of Antioch. But (r) Theodoret ſaith, Flavianus and Diodorus brought it up there; But the Words of Theodorus Mopſueſtenus in (s) Nicetas ſeem to intimate, that they took this Cuſtom from the Syriack Churches; However Theodoret attributes the beginning of Singing the Pſalms of David in that manner in the Greek Churches to them; From whence he ſaith it ſpread into other Parts. But we find by (t St. Baſil, it was very hardly received in the Church of Neocæſarea, becauſe it was not introduced by Gregory, who firſt ſettled the Church there. Neither, ſaith he, were the Litanies, which they then uſed, brought in by him: And for that Cuſtom of Singing, he ſaith, it was practiſed in the Churches of Egypt, Palæſtine and Syria, as far as Euphrates. But it came later into the Weſtern Church. (u) Card. Bona ſaith, That Damaſus firſt commanded it to be uſed in all Churches by his Apoſtolical Authority; But (w) Card. Baronius ſaith, It is a plain Falſhood which the Pontifical Book affirms of Damaſus his appointing the Pſalms to be ſung in all Churches, and he adds, that the Epiſtles of St. Hierome and Damaſus about it are counterfeit. Yet thoſe are the Authorities which, as appears by (x) Pamelius, the ancient Ritualiſts rely upon. All that Baronius will allow to be done in the time of Damaſus, was, that St. Jerome*'s Pſalter was then introduced at* Rome. And yet we are told, (y) that to this day, the old Tranſlation of the Pſalter is uſed in St. Peter's, and is called, Pſalterium Romanum in the Rule of St. Francis, which he forbids to be uſed in Divine Service; But the ſame is only uſed in the Ambroſian Office. And (z) Card. Bona obſerves, that St. Gregory compoſed the Antiphonæ at the Introitus, and at the Reſponſoria, &c. out of the old Verſion, before St. Jerome's time; Of which he gives this reaſon, That the People at Rome were ſo accuſtomed to it, that they would not learn the New Teſtament of St. Jerome; And the ſame Author (a) obſerves likewiſe, That the old Italick Verſion was not only uſed in Rome, but in all the Suburbicary Churches, and other Churches, Gaul only excepted. And from thence St. Jerome's Tranſlation was called Verſio Gallicana, becauſe it was immediately received into the uſe of the Gallican Churches. So that I ſee not how Baronius can make good his own Aſſertion, That St. Jerome*'s Tranſlation of the Pſalter was introduced by* Damaſus. But the uſe of Alleluja by St. Jerome's means, as (b) St. Gregory ſaith, was brought from the Church of Jeruſalem. Which Baronius thinks is rather to be underſtood of ſome particular manner of uſing it. But how he can juſtifie the ancient uſe of the Singing Pſalms at Rome, either before or after Damaſus his time till Celeſtine was Pope, I cannot imagine, if the Pontifical Book ſay true, for that expreſly affirms, that Celeſtine appointed David*'s Pſalms to be ſung* Antiphonatim before the Sacrifice, and that it was not done before, but only the Epiſtles of St. Paul and the holy Goſpel were read. Which Words are repeated by Alcuinus, Amalarius, Rhabanus Maurus,

Maurus, Walafridus Strabo, Berno Augienſis, and ſeveral other Ritualiſts and Hiſtorians, as may be ſeen in (c) Pamelius his Collection, and (d) Caſſander's, beſides the Authors themſelves; But (e) Baronius ſaith, the uſe of the Singing the Pſalms was from the beginning in the Roman Church; which we are to take upon his Word, for he brings no proof of it. It is true, that (f) St. Auguſtine ſaith, That we have the Precept and Example of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, for ſinging in our Aſſemblies. But he ſpeaks not of David's Pſalms, nor of the Church of Rome. And he ſaith, The Cuſtoms of Churches were very different about this matter. In the Churches of Africa, he ſaith, They confined themſelves to the Prophetical Hymns, for which they were upbraided by the Donatiſts, as too grave and formal; But he allows Singing to be one of the Solemn Parts of Divine Service, with which he joins Reading the Leſſons, Preaching and Prayer; either aloud by the Biſhop, or in common, by the Deacon's giving notice. (g) Juſtin Martyr mentions the Hymns of the Church, without declaring whether they were compoſed or inſpired; And ſo do (h) Pliny and (i) Tertullian in ſome Places. But in his (k) Apology he ſaith, both were uſed. (l) Euſebius mentions the Hymns compoſed by Chriſtians which proved the Divinity of Chriſt; And (m) the great eſteem the Hymns of Nepos were in; and (n) the complaint againſt Paulus Samoſatenus for laying aſide the Hymns made to the Honour of Chriſt. The Council of (o) Leodicea firſt reſtrained the uſe of private Hymns in the Churches Service, the Greek Canoniſts underſtand this Canon of Apocryphal Pſalms, ſuch as Salomon's Pſalter publiſhed by La Cerda out of the Auſpurg MS. which he highly magnifies, and almoſt believes to be genuine; But if this Canon be extended to all humane Compoſitions; it was never received in the Weſtern Church, wherein the Hymns of St. Hilary, St. Ambroſe, Prudentius, and others have been generally uſed. And the Ambroſian Hymns were received into the Service of the Gallican Church, as appears by the ſecond Council at (p) Tours; And (q) Caſſander obſerves, that not only thoſe made by St. Ambroſe, but others in imitation of him, were called by his name; Which (r) Walafridus Strabo confirms; But among thoſe the Te Deum is not reckon'd by Caſſander, neither is it of the Ambroſian Compoſition, for thoſe Hymns ended their Sentence every fourth Verſe, as he obſerves, Te Deum is commonly ſaid to have been made by St. Ambroſe, and St. Auguſtine, at his Baptiſm, and to prove it, the Ritualiſts quote the Chronicle of Datius, Biſhop of Milan. But (s) Gavantus obſerves, that the Learned Men of Milan deny that there is any ſuch thing as a Chronicle of Datius among them. (t) Mabillon ſent to them to enquire particularly about it, and they return'd Anſwer, That they had no ſuch thing, But that there was ſuch a Title put upon a Book written by other Authors. In an old Collection of Hymns, and an old Latine and French Pſalter mention'd by (u) Archbiſhop Uſher this Hymn is attributed to St. Nicetius. And there were two of that name in the Gallican Church; The former of which, might probably be the Author of it. The one was Biſhop of Triers, and ſubſcribed to the Council of Auvergn, An. Dom. 535. highly commended for his Eloquence and Sanctity by (w) Gregorius Turonenſis, (x) Fortunatus and others; And the other of great fame too and Biſhop of Lyons, who ſubſcribed to the Council there An. Dom. 567. But againſt this latter there is a ſtrong Objection from the mention of this Hymn in the Rule of St. Benedict, c. 11. who died, according to Baronius, Anno Dom. 543. It is likewiſe mention'd in the Rule of (y)

Cæſarius, drawn up by Tetradius, c. 21. who died about the ſame time; And in the Rule of (z) Aurelianus, who was preſent in the Council of Lyons, An. Dom. 549. in the time of Sacerdos, Predeceſſor to Nicetius. But I ſee no reaſon againſt the former Nicetius, ſince (a) Menardus confidently affirms there is no mention of this Hymn in any Writers before. And therefore we may look on this Hymn, as owing its Ooriginal to the Gallican Church.

Beſides, (b) Caſſian takes notice that in the Gallican Churches, Gloria Patri, &c. was ſaid by the People at the end of every Pſalm. But Walafridus Strabo obſerves, That at Rome they uſed it rarely at the end of the Pſalms; but more frequently after the Reſponſoria. From hence the three Cardinals, (c) Bellarmine, (d) Baronius and (e) Bona all conclude thoſe Ritualiſts miſtaken who make Damaſus the Author of adding the Gloria Patri, &c. to the end of every Pſalm*: And that the Epiſtle under the name of St.* Jerome to him about it is notoriouſly falſe, and withall they ſay, that the other Ritualiſts are miſtaken who attribute it to the Council of Nice; Becauſe then there would not have been ſuch difference in the uſe of it in ſeveral Churches. In the Æthiopick Euchariſtical Office of the 318 Fathers at the Council of Nice, beſtow'd on me by my worthy Friend, Doctor Caſtle, this Hymn it ſelf is not uſed; But the Office conſiſts chiefly of a Lofty and Divine Paraphraſe upon it. In the Liturgy of Dioſcorus it is uſed in the middle of the Prayers. It is evident from (f) St. Baſil's Diſcourſe concerning it, that the Hymn it ſelf was of ancient uſe in the Eaſtern Church; but he doth not ſay in what part of the Churches Service it was uſed; But (g) Caſſian ſaith, over all the Eaſt, it was uſed only to conclude the Antiphona. By which he underſtands a Hymn between the Pſalms; Walafridus Strabo obſerves great diverſity in the uſe of it in the Weſtern Churches; Some put it, he ſaith, into all Offices; Some at the end of every Pſalm; Some at every breaking off the longer Pſalms; Some after the Reſponſals; But the uſe in general was univerſally approved, only the Greeks found fault with the Latines for putting in the middle, Sicut erat in principio, but the uſe thereof was required in all the Gallican Churches in the time of (h) Cæſarius, Archbiſhop of Arles (as (i) Uniformity was required by other Councils.) Cardinal Bona, following Baronius, makes that Council much elder which required the uſe of this Hymn, and ſoon after the Council of Nice; But that cannot be, if the Subſcriptions in Sirmondus be true; and he obſerves that miſtake in Baronius to have riſen from miſunderſtanding a Paſſage of Ado Viennenſis. So that the Morning Service of the Gallican Churches conſiſted chiefly in Leſſons, Hymns and Pſalms of St. Jerome's Tranſlation, with Gloria Patri at the end of every Pſalm. The Latine Tongue being yet the common Language of the Roman Provinces.

But are we to ſuppoſe, that they met together for the Worſhip of God without any Prayers? I anſwer; that they had then two ſorts of Prayers in their Aſſemblies.

(2.) A concluding Collect, which was the Common Prayer, wherein they all joined.

(1.) That they had ſuch private Prayers in their Aſſemblies I prove from (k) Caſſian, who reproves the Cuſtom of ſome in the Gallican Churches, who fell to their private Devotions on their Knees, before the Pſalm was well ended. But, he ſaith, the Egyptian Monks uſed to ſpend ſome time in the Prayer to themſelves ſtanding, and then fall down for a ſhort ſpace in a way of Adoration, and preſently riſe up again, continuing their Devotions ſtanding. All which is capable of no other ſenſe; but that between the Pſalms a time was allow'd in the Gallican Churches as well as Egyptian Monaſteries, for private Devotions in the publick Aſſemblies. (l) Gregor. Turonenſis ſaith, That in the Gallican Churches the Deacon did Silentium indicere; and the Prieſt did it by the (m) Mozarabick Liturgy, which Eugenius Robleſius underſtands only of making the People attentive; Which I grant was part of the Deacon's Office and Deſign in commanding Silence, as appears by ſeveral paſſages in the ancient Liturgies both Greek and Latin. But there was a farther meaning in it, and that the People were for a time there to attend to their own private Prayers, appears not improbable to me on theſe Conſiderations. (1.) Gregory Turonenſis ſaith, in the Place before mentioned, That the King took that time to ſpeak to the People, who immediately break forth into a Prayer for the King; Not that any Collect was then read for him, for that was not the proper time for it; but it being a time of ſecret Prayers, they were ſo moved with what the King ſaid, that they all pray'd for him. (2.) Among the Heathens, when they were bidden favere Linguis, yet then (n) Briſſonius ſaith, They made their private Prayers; And as the Deacons commanding Silence ſeems to be much of the ſame Nature, it is not probable that the Chriſtians ſhould fall ſhort of their Devotions. (3.) The great Argument to me, is the ſmall number of Collects in the Ancient Churches; For the Chriſtians ſpent a great deal of time in the publick Service, on the Lord's-days, and the Stationary days; But all the other Offices could not take up that time, there being no long Extemporary Prayers, nor ſuch a multitude of tedious Ceremonies in all Parts, as the Roman Breviary and Miſſal introduced, and the Collects of greateſt Antiquity, being very few and ſhort, it ſeems moſt probable, that a competent part of the time was ſpent in private Devotions. A remainder whereof is ſtill preſerved in the Office of Ordination of Prieſts in our Church, whereby ſilence is commnaded to be kept for a time, for the Peoples ſecret Prayers. And the ſame Cuſtom was obſerved at the Bidding of Prayers, which was a direction for the People what to pray for in their (o) private Devotions; After which follow'd the Lord's-prayer as the concluding Collect. But either that or another was ſtill uſed after theſe ſilent Prayers, and that is the true ancient Reaſon of the Name: For (p) Micrologus ſaith, The name Collecta was, becauſe the Prieſt therein did, Omnium Preces colligere, or, as (q) Walafridus Strabo ſaith, Neceſſarias omnium Petitiones compendioſâ brevitate colligere. This was diſtinct from the Prayer made ad Collectam, before the People went to the Stationary Churches; Of which Onuphrius Panvinius and Fronto in his Calendarium Romanum have ſaid enough. But as to the Gallican Churches, the (r) Council of Agde ſhews that after the other Offices were performed in the Morning and Evening Service, the People were to be diſmiſſed by the Biſhop Collectâ Oratione, i. e. With a concluding Collect.

(2.) As to the Communion Service (s) Gennadius ſaith, That Muſæus compoſed a large Volume of the Sacraments, with ſeveral Offices according to the Seaſons, with a diverſity of Leſſons, and Pſalms, and Anthems, and Prayers and Thankſgivings. This Book is called, Liber Sacramentorum, and ſo is Gregory's, ſaith (t) Menardus in ſeveral MSS. and the old Miſſal publiſhed by Illyricus is called Ordo Sacramentorum; Which was the Name given to the Books of Liturgick Offices, which were called Sacramenta, both by St. Ambroſe and St. Auguſtine, as Menardus ſhews. (u) Cardinal Bona confeſſes, That there is undoubted Evidence, that the old Gallican Liturgy, differ'd from the Roman; And (w) Charles the Great, not only ſaith, That there was ſuch a difference in the Celebration of the Divine Offices; But that the Gallican Churches were very unwilling to change theirs for the Roman. Matthias Flacius Illyricus (not Flavius, as Le Cointe pretends to correct his Name) having found an ancient MS. Miſſal, and diſcerning ſeveral different Prayers in it from the Roman Miſſal, thought this to have been the ancient Gallican Miſſal, wherein he is followed by (x) Le Cointe, who hath printed it at large in his Annals; with an Epitome of it publiſhed by Menardus out of an ancient Copy. But (y) he ſhews that Illyricus his Copy could not be of that Antiquity he pretends, viz. Before the time of Gregory the Great: There being ſeveral things in it not of that Age; Which were not in the old Miſſal of 986. and were in another of later date; To which Le Cointe returns no Anſwer; But becauſe this differs from the Roman Miſſal, he concludes it muſt be the Gallican; Whereas, upon peruſing it, it will appear rather to be a Supplement to the Roman Miſſal for the Devotion of thoſe that celebrate it, conſiſting chiefly of private Prayers to be uſed by them before Celebration, and during the Singing of the Several Hymns: For the common parts of the Office, as the Introitus, Epiſtola, Graduale, Evangelium, Offertorium, Secreta, Præfatio, Communio, & Poſt-communio, are only referr'd to, and not ſet down; Whereas if this had been the Gallican Miſſal, all thoſe parts would have been ſet down rather more diſtinctly than others. (z) Card. Bona thinks it not to have been before the end of the tenth Century, about which time ſeveral ſuch private Miſſals were made. But he concludes, that certainly this was not the old Gallican Miſſal: What it was, he thinks hard to determine, and I think ſo too; If ſuch Authors as Hilduinus muſt be relied on. It is true, he mentions the old Miſſals which contained the Gallican Liturgy from the firſt reception of the Chriſtian Faith, till the Roman Miſſal was received; But he is an Author of no Authority, and quotes theſe Miſſals for a thing notoriouſly falſe, viz. the Martyrdom of Dionyſius Areopagita in Gaul. And he pretends, that Innocentius, Gelaſius and Gregory, all endeavour'd to alter the Gallican Liturgy, which continued in uſe till Pepin's time: So that from Hilduinus no certain Note can be taken. It is much more material which (a) Berno Augienſis ſaith, That in the Archives of their Monaſtery, he found an old Miſſal wherein the Offices were very differently ordered from what they were in the Roman. And he mentions one remarkable particular of the Roman Miſſal, which is,

(1.) The Difference I ſhall obſerve in the Communion Service, viz. That the Creed was not ſaid nor ſung at Rome after the Goſpel, of which he ſaith, They gave this Reaſon, becauſe the Roman Church was never infected with Hereſie; which, he ſaith, the Emperor Henry I. was ſo little ſatisfied with, that he never ceaſed, till they had introduced it at Rome; which, ſaith (b) Baronius, was done An. Dom. 1014. but he ſeems not pleaſed that the former Cuſtom was broken. Before that time, none that ſpeak of the Cuſtoms of the Roman Miſſal ever mention the Creed, as may be ſeen in Alcuinus, Amalarius, Rabanus, and others. And this cannot be underſtood barely of the Conſtantinopolitane or Nicene Creed, as (c) Menardus well proves, becauſe then Berno would have ſpoken more diſtinctly. And the Athanaſian Creed, as far as we can trace it, was firſt uſed in the Gallican Churches, and that uſe firſt mention'd by Abbo Floriacenſis in ſome Fragments ſent by Nicolaus Faber to (d) Baronius. But whoſoever conſiders the univerſal Silence about that Creed before, and compares it with the Profeſſion of Faith in the firſt Canon of the fourth Council of Toledo, which then took ſo many of the Gallican Offices into the Service of the Spaniſh Churches, will ſee Reaſon to believe that this Creed was originally of a Gallican Compoſition, and thence was carried into Spain upon the Converſion of the Goths from Arianiſm, wherein ſeveral Expreſſions are taken out of St. Auguſtine's Works. Ruffinus ſhews, That thoſe that were to be baptized did at Rome repeat the Creed; but that is another thing from its uſe in the Liturgy, which both Baronius and (e) Bona confeſs was ſo lately introduced at Rome. So that here we have one conſiderable difference of the Roman Offices from thoſe of other Churches; For (f) Iſidore ſaith, That the Nicene Creed was then uſed in the Gothick Churches in the time of Sacrifice, as the Church Service was then called; For that it had no Relation to that which is called the Sacrifice of the Maſs, appears by Concil. Aurel. 3. can. 29. Where we find the name of Sacrifice applied to the Evening Service, Sacrificia Matutina Miſſarum, ſive Veſpertina; And ſo (g) Caſſian uſes Sacrificia Veſpertina in alluſion to the Cuſtom of Sacrificing among the Jews. And (h) Honaratus, in the Life of St. Hilarius of Arles, calls it Sacrificium Veſpertinæ Laudis. And Miſſa was then uſed for the publick Service, as (i) Caſſander and others ſhew. In the Rule of St. Benedict, Miſſæ are to be taken for the concluding Collects at the Canonical Hours. (k) Caſſian uſeth Miſſa for any publick meeting at Prayers, thence he ſpeaks of Miſſa Nocturna, and Miſſa Orationum, and Miſſa Canonica, for the Nocturnal Office among the Monks; And in the Concil. Agath. c. 30. We read of Miſſæ Veſpertinæ. But afterwards the name was appropriated to the moſt ſolemn part of publick Worſhip, viz. The Communion Service. In which the Creed was appointed by the third Council of Toledo, c. 2. in all the Churches of Spain and Gallæcia; or as ſome Copies have it, of Gallia; Which is confirmed by an Edict of Reccaredus to that purpoſe; which extended to that Part of Gallia Narbonenſis, then under the Gothick Power; Where a (l) Council met under Reccaredus, about the ſame time. In which Gloria Patri was decreed to be uſed at the end of every Pſalm; which was obſerved by the other Gallican Churches in Caſſian's time. It ſeems very probable, that the Spaniſh Churches did follow the Cuſtoms of the Gallican in other parts of the Divine Offices as well as this; Which appears by the Paſſage in the Epiſtle of Carolus Calvus produced by (m) Card. Bona, where ſpeaking of the ancient Gallican Offices before the Introduction of the Roman, he ſaith, He had ſeen and heard how different they were by the Prieſts of the Church of Toledo, who had celebrated the Offices of their Church before him. Which had ſignified nothing to this matter, unleſs the Gothick and Gallican Offices had then agreed. I do not ſay that the old Gallican Service can be gather'd from all the Parts of the Mozarabick Liturgy, as it was ſettled by (n) Card. Ximenes, in a Chapel of the Church of Toledo; or as it is performed on certain days at Salamanca, becauſe many Alterations might be in thoſe Offices as well as others in ſo long time; And ſuch no doubt there were, as (o) Mariana confeſſeth, by the length of time; although it did bear the Name of Leander and Iſidore. For (p) Julianus Toletanus is ſaid to have review'd the whole Office, and to have alter'd and added many things, things, and Johannes Cæſarauguſtanus and Conantius, and after them Petrus Ilerdenſis, and Salvus Abbaildenſis, beſides ſuch whoſe Names are not preſerved; But ſo far as we can trace the ancient Cuſtoms of the Gothick Miſſal we may probably infer what the Cuſtoms of the Gallican Churches at that time were, and thereby ſhew the difference between them and the Roman Offices. As beſides this of the Creed.

(2.) The Prophetical Leſſons were always to be read by the Rules of the Mozarabick Liturgy: And accordingly three Books were laid upon the Altar in the Gallican Churches, as (q) Gregorius Turonenſis obſerves, That of the Prophets, and of the Epiſtles, and of the Goſpels. But nothing but the Epiſtle and Goſpel were read at Rome, as is ſhew'd already; Which manifeſts that the Book under St. Jerome's Name, called the Lectionarius or Comes muſt be counterfeit; Becauſe therein Leſſons out of the Prophets are ſet down: And the Authorities of Berno Augienſis, Micrologus and Radulphus Tungrenſis, which are the beſt (r) Pamelius could find, are not great enough againſt ſo plain Evidence to the contrary, to prove this Lectionarius to have been made by St. Jerome. And he confeſſes that Amalarius ſeveral times only mentions the Auctor Lectionarii without St. Jerome's Name, who lived a good while before them. But in this the Roman Church had its peculiar Rites; for, in the Church of Milan, firſt a Leſſon out of the Prophets was read before the Epiſtle, as appears by (s) Sulpicius Severus, And in the Greek Church, St. (t) Baſil ſaith, That Leſſons out of the Old as well as the New Teſtament were read By the (u) Council of Laodicea, all the Canonical Books were appointed to be read. Zonaras obſerves, on the 16th Canon of that Council, That before this Council there were nothing but Prayers before the Conſecration: But therein he was certainly miſtaken; For (w) Juſtin Martyr ſhews, That the Leſſons were read long before, and that out of the Prophets as well as Apoſtles. But Balſamon and Ariſtenus reſtrain this Canon only to Saturdays; And it enjoins the reading of the Goſpels then, which was not accuſtomed before. There being no Religious Aſſemblies in thoſe Parts on that day: But by the ſame Canon we find, That where the Goſpels were read, other Scriptures were appointed to be read too. It is obſerved by (x) Dominicus Macer, that at the Leſſons of the Old Teſtament the Greeks do ſit; but ſtand at thoſe out of the New. (y) Sozomen reckons it as a peculiar Cuſtom of Alexandria, That the Biſhop did not riſe up at the Goſpels: And Nicephorus * Calliſthus ſaith, It was contrary to the Practice of all other Churches.

(3.) After the Goſpel, the Sermon follow'd in other Churches; But in the old Roman Offices, there is no mention at all of any Sermon to the People. (z) Card. Bona ſaith, That it hath been the uninterrupted Practice of the Church from the Apoſtles times to our own, for the Sermon to follow after the Goſpel: And he doth ſufficiently prove the Antiquity of it from the Teſtimonies of Juſtin Martyr and Tertullian, and the general Practice of it in other Churches, eſpecially the Gallican; But he offers no Proof, that it was obſerved in the Church of Rome. But (a) Sozomen obſerves it as the peculiar Cuſtom of that Church, That there was no Preaching in it; neither by the Biſhop, nor by any one elſe. Valeſius ſeems to wonder at it; But he ſaith, If it had not been true, Caſſiodore, who certainly knew the Cuſtoms of that Church, would never have repeated it. In the Sacramentary of Gregory, The Offertory immediately follows after the Goſpel; And Micrologus ſaith, Finito Evangelio, ſtatim eſt offerendum, ferendum, c. 10. And to the ſame purpoſe in the Ordo Romanus: But in the Ordo of the Weſtern Churches, publiſhed by (b) Caſſander with the other, There the Biſhop is to be attended on after the Goſpel in order to his Preaching; But if he will not, Then the Creed is to be ſung: And according to this Cuſtom, the (c) Gemma Animæ is to be underſtood when it ſaith, That after the Goſpel, the Biſhop preaches to the People. It is true, That in the Church of Rome, Leo did make ſome Sermons on ſolemn Occaſions; But he was the firſt that did it, ſaith (d) Queſnel, if Sozomen may be believed. It is poſſible, That upon ſome extraordinary Occaſions, the Biſhops of Rome might ſpeak to the People before his time, as Liberius is ſaid, by St. (e) Ambroſe, to have done at St. Peter's; But this ſignifies nothing to the conſtant Office of Preaching, which was not uſed in the Church of Rome by any Biſhop before Leo, nor by many after, as it was in other Churches. In the Gallican Churches, as (f) Chriſtianus Lupus obſerves, The Biſhops called their Office Prædicationis Officium; as appears by the Profeſſion both of Biſhops and Archbiſhops, among (g) Sirmondus his Formulæ publiſhed out of ancient Copies. And in the Royal Confirmation they were charged to be diligent in Preaching. The ſame Author tells us, That Charles the Great was ſo ſtrict in requiring it, That he made the Penalty of the neglect of it to be no leſs than Depoſition. Which is warranted by the Apoſtolical Canon 58. The Council in Trullo, c. 19. charges the Biſhops to preach conſtantly. But eſpecially on the Lord's-days; The want whereof was extremely lamented afterwards in the Greek Church by (h) Barlaam, and (i) Gregorius Protoſyncellus. And the neglect of it in the Armenian Churches hath brought the Epiſcopal Order into ſo great Contempt, as (k) Clemens Galanus reports, (who was a long time among them) that he ſaith, They uſe their Biſhops for little elſe but to give Orders; But the only Men in eſteem are their Vartabret, (whom he renders Magiſtri, their Preachers;) whom the People regard far beyond their Biſhops, becauſe, they ſay, they repreſent Chriſt himſelf, as he was Rabbi, or the Teacher of his Church. But to return to the Weſtern Churches. In the Church of Milan, (l) St. Auguſtine ſaith, He heard St. Ambroſe every Lord's-day; And, he ſaith, (m) He accounted it the proper Office of a Biſhop to preach; Which he performed, as in other Churches (n) after the Goſpel, before the Diſmiſſion of the Catechumeni; But by the Mozarabick Liturgy, the Sermon was after their diſmiſſion.

(4.) The Gallican Churches had peculiar Offices after the Sermon; So (o) Walafridus Strabo ſaith, That ſome of thoſe Prayers were ſtill in uſe among them. And (p) Micrologus, That the Prayer, Veni Sanctificator, &c. was taken out of the Gallican Ordo. But, to make this more clear, we are to conſider, that there were ſome parts of the Communion Service wherein all the Ancient Offices agreed; as in the Surſum Corda, and Habemus ad Dominum uſed in the Eaſtern, as well as Weſtern Churches; and there are as plain Teſtimonies of their uſe in the African and Gallican Churches as the Roman; before the Roman Offices came to be impoſed on other Churches. The Gratias agamus Domino Deo noſtro, and Verè dignum & juſtum eſt æquum & ſalutare, nos tibi ſemper & ubique gratias agere, are mention'd by St. Cyril, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Auguſtine, and other ancient Writers: This latter part in the Mozarabick Liturgy is called Inlatio. The Triſagion was generally uſed; I do not mean that which was ſaid to have come by Revelation in the time of Proclus at Conſtantinople; But that which the Greeks call Ἐπινίκιος, and is called Triſagium in the Ambroſian Miſſal, and was uſed with a more ample Paraphraſe in the Eaſtern Churches. All theſe Parts are retained in the excellent Office of our Church; not from the Church of Rome (as our Diſſenters weakly imagine) but from the conſent of all the ancient Churches in the uſe of them; Which it hath follow'd likewiſe in the putting them into a Language underſtood by the People (as (q) Caſſander fully ſhews.) And in the uſe of the Hymn, Gloria in excelſis, which, with the Addition to the Scripture Words, was uſed in the Eaſtern Churches, as appears by the (r) Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, and a Paſſage in (s) Athanaſius his Works, and ſeveral Greek MSS. of it, this was called Hymnus Angelicus from the beginning of it, and Hymnus Matutinus from the ancient time of uſing it, as appears not only from other MSS. but from the famous Alexandrian Copy of the LXX. where it is ſet down in large Letters, and called by the Name of the Morning Hymn. Its uſe in the Gallican Church is atteſted by the ancient MS. in the beginning of this Diſcourſe; And (t) Alcuinus makes St. Hilary of Poictou to have been the Inlarger of it. The Prayer for the Church Militant; For Kings and Princes; And all Ranks and Orders of Men; The Commemoration of Saints departed; The Reading the Words of Inſtitution, and uſing the Lord's-prayer; were in all the ancient Liturgies as parts of the Communion Service: And therefore are not to be look'd on as appropriated to the Canon of the Maſs in the Church of Rome.

Wherein then did the Difference conſiſt between the Roman and Gallican Churches at that time, as to this Service?

In Anſwer to this Queſtion, I ſhall go through the other parts of it, and ſhew the difference.

(1.) The Gallican Office began with a peculiar Confeſſion of Sins made by the Prieſt; which was called Apologia. A form whereof (u) Cardinal Bona hath publiſhed out of a very ancient MS. in the Queen of Sweden's Library; And which he proves to have been the old Gallican Office. It is true, that ſeveral Forms of ſuch Confeſſions, are in the (w) Sacramentary of Gregory; But all different from the Gallican Form. In the old Miſſal of Rataldus, Abbat of Corbey, publiſhed by (x) Menardus, inſtead of the Apology, we read that Form, Suſcipe Confeſſionem meam, unica Spes Salutis meæ, Domine Deus meus, &c. And then follows a particular enumeration of Sins, and a general Confeſſion of them. And a different Form is produced by (y) Menardus, out of another ancient Miſſal, which he calls the Codex Tilianus, and ſeems moſt agreeable to the old Gallican mention'd by Bona; And, There is a great variety of Forms of Confeſſion and Supplication in the old Miſſal publiſhed by Illyricus. But I obſerve, That the Form preſcribed in the Roman Miſſal is in none of them: viz. Confiteor Deo Omnipotenti, B. Mariæ ſemper Virgini, B. Michaeli Archangelo, &c. & omnibus Sanctis, &c. Ideo precor B. Mariam, &c. Omnes Sanctos. &c.---Orare pro me ad Dominum noſtrum: For all the ancient Forms of Confeſſion were only to God himſelf; And ſo they continued for 1000 Years after Chriſt; About which time Menardus ſaith, The ſeveral ancient Miſſals before mentioned do bear Date. The Common Ritualiſts attribute the preſent Form to Pontianus, or Damaſus, but without any Authority, ſaith (z) Card. Bona. The firſt mention I can find of Confeſſion to Saints, is that which he ſets down out of the Codex Chiſii; Which being in the (a) Lombard Character, he gueſſes to have been before the end of the tenth Century, and with this (b) Micrologus agrees; The Author whereof lived towards the end end of the eleventh Century. So that this part of the Roman Miſſal was neither in the Gregorian nor Gallican Offices, being of a much later Original.

(2.) The Gallican Office had peculiar Prefaces, and Collects different from the Roman. By the Prefaces are underſtood that part of the Service which immediately goes before the Conſecration, and is called in the Gallican Office, Conteſtatio, in the Gothick, Illatio, ſhewing not only the general Fitneſs for us at all times, to give thanks to God; But the particular Reaſon of it, with reſpect to the Day. Of which kind of Prefaces, the Roman Church allow'd but Nine, which were attributed to Pope Gelaſius; But (c) Card. Bona ſaith, That number is to be found only in the Miſſals, after An. Dom. 1200. For before, there were many more, as appears by Gregory's Sacramentary; But how they came to be left out afterwards in the Roman Miſſal is a Myſtery, of which none of the Ritualiſts give any tolerable account. However this is enough to ſhew their Ignorance, when they ſo confidently attributed the proper Prefaces to Gelaſius; As though Gregory would have ſlighted ſo much the Decree of his Predeceſſors, as to have appointed ſo many more, if Gelaſius had limited the number to Nine. But however it was in the Roman Church, the Gallican Church had peculiar Prefaces for all ſolemn Occaſions. Of which (d) Card. Bona hath produced three remarkable Inſtances, two out of the former ancient MS. of Nine hundred Years old, which formerly belong'd to Petavius, a Senator of Paris; And a third out of a Copy of the Palatine Library, tranſlated to the Vatican, of the ſame Age. From theſe exellent Monuments of Antiquity compared together we may in great meaſure underſtand the true Order and Method of the Communion Service of that time, both in the Gallican and Britiſh Churches, eſpecially on Saints-days; For no other Offices are preſerved, or at leaſt made known to the World. And on thoſe Occaſions the Service began with particular Collects for the Day; Then follow'd the Commemoration out of the Diptychs; Then another Collect, Poſt nomina; After which the Collect, ad Pacem; Then the particular Prefaces relating to the Saint whoſe memory was celebrated; with a larger account of his good Actions than is uſed in any of the Gregorian Prefaces, expreſſed in a devout and pathetical manner; Which ended in the Triſagion; And was continued by another Collect to the Conſecration; After which follow'd a devout Prayer for benefit by the Holy Sacrament; And after another Collect for the occaſion follow'd the Lord's-prayer, with a Concluſion for the Day: And the whole Service was concluded with a Benediction of the People, a Collect after the Euchariſt, and a ſhort Thanksgiving. This is a juſt and true Account from theſe authentick Offices of the Publick Service then uſed in the Britiſh Churches followiug the Gallican from the time of St. German, whoſe particular Office is one of thoſe preſerved by Card. Bona; And in the peculiar Preface his great Zeal is mention'd in Preaching and going up and down doing good in Gaul, Italy and Britain, for thirty years together.

(3.) As to the Canon of the Maſs, as it is called in the Church of Rome, or the Prayer of Conſecration uſed in the Church of Rome, and magnified as Apoſtolical, St. (e) Gregory affirms, as plainly as he well could, That it was firſt compoſed by a private Perſon, and was not of Apoſtolical Tradition. Who that Scholar was, it is now impoſſible to know, and not at all material, ſince it is apparent that it was received into the publick Uſe of the Church. Some ſmall additions, they ſay, were made to it by ſeveral Popes, till Gregory's time, who, according to the Ritualiſts, ſhut up this Canon. But I ſee no reaſon to believe that Conſecration of the Euchariſt, was at that time performed in other Churches by the words of this Canon. For, ſetting aſide the Eaſtern Churches, which had Forms of their own; The African Churches did not follow the Roman Form. For although (f) Optatus mentions illud legitimum in Sacramentorum myſterio; which implies, that there was a certain Form to be obſerved; yet this doth not at all prove, that it was the Roman Canon: And it evidently appears that it was not, by the Teſtimonies of (g) Marius Victorinus, and (h) Fulgentius, two African Writers, who both mention ſome Prayers uſed in the Euchariſt, which are not in the Roman Canon, and thoſe not Prefatory; but ſuch as do relate to the main parts of the Canon. It is true, the Writer about the Sacraments, under St. Ambroſe's name (for (i) Card. Bona will not allow him to be St. Ambroſe) doth produce ſeveral Expreſſions in the Form of Conſecration which agree with the Roman Canon; But then he adds a very conſiderable Paſſage, which I hardly believe, thoſe who are moſt zealous for the Roman Canon will ſay, was ever part of it, (k) Fac nobis hanc oblationem aſcriptam, rationabilem, acceptabilem, quod eſt figura corporis & ſanguinis Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti. And in the Gallican Church, the Form of Conſecration, as appears by the Office of St. German, was nothing elſe but repeating the Words of Inſtitution, after the Concluſion of the Triſagion, and Gloria in Excelſis. After which follow'd a Prayer, for God's Holy Word and Spirit to deſcend upon the Oblation they made, That it might be a ſpiritual Sacrifice well pleaſing to God; And that God, by the Blood of Chriſt, would with his own Right Hand defend thoſe his Sacraments; And then follow'd the Lord's Prayer and other Collects. This Prayer after Conſecration, Card. Bona knows not what to make of, as ſeeming wholly inconſiſtent with Tranſubſtantiation, for if that Doctrine had been then believed, and by Conſecration the Elements turn'd into the Body of Chriſt; To what purpoſe doth the Church then pray for the Word and Spirit to deſcend upon the Elements, when they are actually united already? But (l) he makes a very hard ſhift to interpret theſe Words, not of a deſcent on the Elements, but on the Hearts of the Communicants: But the Words are, Deſcendat ſuper hæc quæ tibi offerimus Verbum tuum Sanctum, Which are ſo plain and evident concerning the Elements, that nothing but mere force, can make any Man to underſtand them of the Receivers. Beſides, that Office concludes with a particular Prayer for the Benefit of thoſe that had partaken of the Body of Chriſt, wherein his Expreſſion is remarkable, Chriſte Domine, qui & tuo veſci corpore, & tuum corpus effici vis fideles, fac nobis in remiſſionem Peccatorum eſſe quod ſumpſimus, i. e. O Chriſt, our Lord, who wouldeſt have thy People eat thy Body, and become thy Body, grant that we may be that which we have taken for the Remiſſion of our Sins. And it is certain, the meaning of this Prayer was not that Chriſtians might become the Natural Body of Chriſt; And therefore it was not then believed, That the Faithful did in the Euchariſt take the Natural Body of Chriſt; But that which was the Body of Chriſt in ſuch a myſtical ſenſe as the Church is. But Tranſubſtantiation was no part of the Faith of the Church at that time, and therefore it is no wonder to meet with Expreſſions ſo diſagreeing to it in their ſolemn Devotions. And it is well obſerved by (m) Card. Bona, that the Cuſtom of Elevation of the Hoſt, in Order to Adoration, is found in none of the ancient ancient Sacramentaries, nor in the Ordo Romanus, nor in the Old Ritualiſts, ſuch as Alcuinus, Amalarius, Walafridus, Micrologus and others. The ſame had been ingenuouſly confeſſed before by (n) Menardus, in the ſame Words: And although there may be Elevation, where there is no belief of Tranſubſtantiation, yet, ſince the Cuſtom of Elevation was lately introduced into the Weſtern Churches, and in order to Adoration of the Body of Chriſt then preſent by Tranſubſtantiation; it ſeems very probable, that Doctrine was not then received by the Church, the Conſequences whereof were not certainly in uſe: For there was as much Reaſon for the Elevation and Adoration at that time as ever could be afterwards. But my Buſineſs is now only to ſhew wherein the Gallican and Britiſh Churches differ'd from the Roman, and not wherein they agreed.

(4.) The laſt difference was as to the Church Muſick, wherein the Romans were thought ſo far to excel other Weſtern Churches, That the goodneſs of their Muſick proved the great occaſion of introducing their Offices: For (o) Charles the Great ſaith, That his Father Pepin brought the Roman way of Singing into the Gallican Churches, and their Offices along with it. And although he ſaith, many Churches ſtood out then, yet by his means they were brought to it. And he cauſed ſome of the beſt Maſters of Muſick in Rome to be brought into France, and there ſettled for the Inſtruction of the (p) French Churches: By which means the old Gallican Service was ſo ſoon forgotten, That in (q) Carolus Calvus his time, he was forced to ſend as far as Toledo, to have ſome to perform the Old Offices before him; So great a Power had the Roman Muſick, and the Prince's Authority in changing the ancient Service of the Gallican Churches. But thus much may ſuffice to have cleared the ancient Service of theſe Weſtern Churches, and to have ſhew'd their difference from the Roman Offices.

From which Diſcourſe it will appear, that our Church of England hath omitted none of thoſe Offices wherein all the Ancient Churches agreed; And that where the Britiſh or Gallican and Roman differ'd, our Church hath not follow'd the Roman, but the other; And therefore our Diſſenters do unreaſonably charge us with taking our Offices from the Church of Rome.

The Particulars of that Story cleared; And the whole concluded.

BEing now to give an Account of the fatal Declenſion of the Britiſh Churches, it will be neceſſary to look back on the time when their Miſeries firſt began. For which we are to conſider, That the Romans having never made an entire Conqueſt of the whole Iſland; but contenting themſelves with the better part, and excluding the reſt by a Wall, they ſtill left a back-door open for the poor Provincial Britains to be diſturbed, as often as the Roman Garriſons neglected their Duty, or were overpowered by their Enemies. Who were now very much increaſed in thoſe remoter Parts of Britain; Which being abandon'd by the Romans, they became an eaſie Prey to the Scots and Picts; Who, from different parts, took Poſſeſſion of thoſe Coaſts, which lay neareſt to the Place from whence they came. Thus, the Scots coming from Ireland, entred upon the Southern and Weſtern Parts, as the Picts from Scandinavia had before done on the Northern. Our Learned (a) Antiquary was of Opinion, That the Picts were no other than the ancient Britains, partly ſettled in thoſe Parts, before the Roman Invaſion, and partly retiring thither out of Impatience of the Roman Yoke, who by degrees grew up into a conſiderable number of People. It is not to be queſtion'd, that there was a Stock of Old Britains in thoſe Northern Parts, as appears by the Army under Galgacus, and the Actions againſt Urbicus, Agricola, Marcellus and Severus; But their continual Wars with the Roman Legions, who were placed about the Wall, on purpoſe to take all Advantages againſt them, muſt needs exhauſt them by degrees, and leſſen them ſo much, as to leave room enough for new Recruits to come in and take up part of their Countrey. And although for their own Security, the Parts near the Wall might be well ſupplied on that ſide, yet when ſo much Blood retired to the Heart as was neceſſary to ſupport Life, a great deal muſt be called off from the extreme Parts for a freſh ſupply of it, and thoſe Parts

muſt needs be left deſtitute of natural Heat, and Strength enough to maintain themſelves. For during the War, which continued for ſeveral Ages, the very Life of the Britiſh Nation, beyond the Wall, was in perpetual danger; And not only the Duty and Service, but the many Diſeaſes and Accidents of War, could not, in ſo long a tract of time, but very much impair the Britiſh Strength, and leave the remoter Parts, if not wholly void of Inhabitants, yet not in a Condition to withſtand a foreign Invaſion. I grant that Tacitus, Dio, Herodian, Vopiſcus, &c. take no notice of any other Enemies the Romans had at that time in thoſe Parts beſides the Britains; But then, I think, the Argument may be thus turned upon Camden, What makes the latter Writers ſo expreſly and diſtinctly mention the Picts, if they were no other than the Old Britains, ſo often ſpoken of by Roman Hiſtorians? I do not underſtand, why their continuing an old Cuſtom ſhould now give them a new Name? The Britains, however rude, were no more Picts then, than they were at Cæſar's coming. What makes the Roman Writers ſo of a ſudden alter their Style, and leave off a Name ſo famous among the Romans, for the Name of Picts, which was not heard of before? The firſt mention we find of them is in (b) Eumenius his Panegyrick to Conſtantius, where he takes notice of the different State of the Britains, when Cæſar ſubdued them, from what they were in Conſtantius his time: Then, ſaith he, they were a rude, half naked People, and ſo eaſily vanquiſhed; But now the Britains were exerciſed by the Arms of the Picts and the Iriſh. Nothing can be plainer, than that Eumenius here diſtinguiſhes the Picts from the Britains, and ſuppoſes them to be Enemies to each other. Neither can we reaſonably think this a Name then taken up to diſtinguiſh the barbarous Britains from the Provincial: For that diſtinction had now been of a very long ſtanding, and if it had been applied to that purpoſe, we ſhould have met with it in Tacitus, or Dio, or Herodian, or Zoſimus, who ſpeak of the Extra-provincial Britains, under no other Name but of Britains. (c) Dio is ſo exact as to ſet down the Names of diſtinction then uſed for thoſe Britains, and he ſaith, they were of two ſorts, the Mæatæ, and the Caledonii; If the name of Picts had then comprehended them all, no doubt he would have mention'd it on that occaſion. (d) Zonaras likewiſe calls them all then by the name of Britains. But it is ſaid, That the (e) Panegyriſt himſelf calls the Caledonians, Picts, who were certainly Britains. His Words are, Non dico Caledonum, aliorúmque Pictorum, Silvas & Paludes: where H. Valeſius obſerves, it ought to be read, Non Dicaledonum aliorúmque Pictorum; For (f) Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith, the Picts were divided into the Dicaledones and the Vecturiones. It is ingeniouſly conjectured by Mr. Camden, that theſe Names were taken from the Situation of the People, the firſt from Deheu and Caledones, or the Caledonians on the Right-hand, and the other from Chwithic, which ſignifies the Left-hand in the Britiſh Language But Archbiſhop (g) Uſher obſerves, that he is miſtaken, in ſuppoſing; the Right-hand among the Britains to be the Weſt, and the Left-hand the Eaſt; for he plainly proves, that by the one is underſtood the South, and the other the North. And (h) Bede ſhews, that the Northern and Southern Picts were divided from each other by a Ridge of Mountains; which (i) John Fordon ſaith, was Mount Grampius, which parted the Scots and the Picts. For the Scots came into that part of the Picts Countrey which lay next to Ireland; from whence they came thither under under the conduct of Renda, as (k) Bede ſaith. Who, as ſome think, was the chief of the Six Sons of the King of Ulſter, who, as Giraldus Cambrenſis ſaith, with no ſmall Fleet, came into the Northern Parts of Britain, and there ſettled themſelves ; from whom that Countrey was called Scotia. Which, if it happen'd in the time of Conſtantius, as Archbiſhop (l) Uſher proves from the Anonymous Life of St. Patrick, it agrees very well with what (m) Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith, That in the latter end of his Reign, the Scots and the Picts were both joined againſt the Britains. The Scots, as (n) Gildas and (o) Bede ſay, coming from the Weſt, and the Picts from the North ; And ſo Fabius Ethelwerd ſaith, the Picts came from the North ; and the Scots from the Weſt ; who took poſſeſſion of the Southweſt parts of Caledonia beyond Glota, and Bodotria, or Dumbritton, and Edenborough Frith. And ſo, the Mons Grampius, or the Dorſum Britannicum, as ſome call it, parted the Picts and the Scots ; the Old Britains ſtill living between the Wall and the two Friths ; For Bede expreſly ſaith, That both the Scots and the Picts lived beyond them ; and he likewiſe adds, That upon the remove of the Roman Legion they took in all the Countrey as far as Severus his Wall ; where the Britains dwelt before. I confeſs, the Roman Province had different Bounds at ſeveral times, it ſometimes extending as far as Antonius his Wall, or Graham's Dike between the two Friths ; Sometimes again it was brought within the Compaſs of Hadrian and Severus his Wall, id eſt, between the Tine and the Esk ; And Bede thinks that the laſt Wall made by the Romans was where Severus his Wall ſtood. If ſo, that whole Countrey between the two Walls muſt be then abandon'd for 100 Miles ; Which (p) ſome object againſt as an improbable thing, The Wall being ſo much longer, and conſequently more indefenſible by the Britains. But, in probability, the Britains were then willing to let their Enemies have the more room to prevent being diſturbed by them ; And this was the main Security they always had, the Linea Valli relating to this Wall from Hadrian's time ; And although ſometimes in a bravery the Roman Soldiers would march to Antoninus his Wall, and drive the Britains before them, yet generally the Roman Province was bounded by Severus his Wall, and therefore Gallio Ravennas might at laſt chuſe rather to make up and fortifie this for the Britains, when the Roman-Soldiers left them to defend themſelves.

But, as to the ſeveral Inhabitants beyond the Wall, it will be neceſſary, in order to the following Hiſtory, to ſet down a more particular Account in this Place of the different Original of them, which hath been ſo perplexed by the partial Conjectures of the Scottiſh and Iriſh Antiquaries, that it is no eaſie matter to find out the plain Truth amongſt them. But I ſhall endeavour to trace the Footſteps of it by the beſt Light which ancient or modern Authors afford. And I am ſo far from any pique or partiality in this matter, that I ſhall be glad to receive any better Information from learned and ingenious Men. For it will appear by this enquiry that the Antiquities of both Nations do yet ſtand much in need of being cleared to the ſatisfaction of inquiſitive Men. But to the buſineſs.

It is certain that in the time of Tacitus; the Northern Parts of this Iſland were well inhabited, as appears by the following Account from him. The Brigantes, who extended as far as the Tine, were, as (q) he ſaith, ſubdued by Petilius Cerealis ; The Silures, by Julius Frontinus ;

nus; The Ordovices, the other People of Wales, by Julius Agricola in his firſt entry upon this Province. But in his third year he went as far as the Frith of Taus: By which Sir H. Savil ſaith, Some underſtand the Tweed: For that it cannot be underſtood of the Taus, which parts the Northern and Southern parts of Scotland, ſeems evident from Tacitus, who ſaith, That the Romans had leiſure to build Caſtles there: But this Taus is a great way beyond the two Friths; And Tacitus, in the fourth year of Agricola, makes the Roman Power to reach no farther than to Glota and Bodotria, where he thought the Romans might have conveniently fixed the Bounds of their Empire that way. But, I confeſs, Tacitus his words may bear another meaning; viz. That although the Romans had made Excurſions as far as the Taus, and ſet up ſome Forts there; Yet when Agricola went about to ſettle the Province, he reduced it within the compaſs of the two Friths; There being the moſt convenient Place for the Garriſon to be fixed; There being ſo ſmall a Neck of Land between the Arms of the two Seas, which was then very well fortified. But the boundleſs Ambition of the Romans, in the fifth year of Agricola, carried them beyond theſe Limits; And then he ſubdued Nations before that time unknown; And furniſhed with Forces that part of Britain which lieth againſt Ireland; Not out of fear of any Invaſion from thence; But rather in hopes of ſubduing that Country by their means. Which ſhews that Ireland was then well peopled; and thought by Agricola very fit for the Roman Army to conquer; Becauſe it lay ſo convenient for uniting the parts of the Empire together; And it would help much towards the total ſubduing of Britain, if there were no appearance of Liberty left within their view. And Tacitus inſinuates that Agricola had it in his Deſign, if he had been ſuffer'd to continue longer after his Victory over Galgacus: Which Domitian's incurable Jealouſie of Great Men would not permit. However, in order to it, Agricola had taken an account of the Ports, and condition of the People, whom he found not unlike the Britains; And he kept with him till Occaſion ſerved, one of the Princes of that Country, who was driven from thence by a domeſtick Sedition But in the mean time, in his ſixth year, he applied himſelf to the Conqueſt of the ſeveral Nations beyond Bodotria, among whom a general Inſurrection was apprehended, and all Paſſages by Land were ſuppoſed to be beſet; And therefore Agricola ſet out a Fleet for diſcovery of the Country; the ſight whereof ſtruck great Terror into the Britains. And then he ſaith, the Caledonians armed themſelves and ſet upon the Romans with all the Force they could make; and falling upon the ninth Legion unexpectedly, had like to have totally defeated them, if the reſt of the Army had not come in to their timely reſcue. By which good ſucceſs, the Roman Army, being much incouraged, cried out to march into Caledonia; That they might at laſt come to the utmoſt Bounds of Britain. But the Britains attributed this not to the Valour of the Romans, but to the ill Conduct of their General; And therefore reſolved to fight it out, and to that end they diſpoſed of their Wives and Children in Places of Safety, and by frequent Meetings and ſolemn Sacrifices they entred into a ſtrict Confederacy, to ſtand it out to the utmoſt againſt the Romans. And in this Caſe of common danger, all the Cities were united together, and raiſed an Army of 30000 Men, under the Command of Galgacus, who, in his brave Oration, ſo much commended by Lipſius, tells his Souldiers, they were the laſt of the Britains, there being no Nation

tion beyond them; And he calls them, the moſt noble of the Britains, who had never beheld the Slavery of others; Upon this the fatal Battel was fought at the Foot of Mons Grampius, where 10000 Britains were killed, and the reſt diſperſed; After which Agricola was recalled. This is the Subſtance of Tacitus his Relation, wherein we may obſerve; (1.) That theſe Britains were not merely ſuch as were driven thither by the ſtreſs of War, but ſuch as had long inhabited there, and had ſo little Communication with the other Britains, that they had never ſeen the Condition of Slavery which the Romans had brought them to. (2.) That they were not inconſiderable for their Numbers or Valour, who were able to oppoſe the whole Roman Army, and make their Victory ſo doubtful. (3.) That theſe had a diſtinct Name from the reſt, being in general called the Caledonian Britains: And Tacitus thinks they had a different Original from the Silures, and other Britains. Thoſe who adjoined to Gaul, he concludes came at firſt from thence, and had ſeveral Colonies follow'd them afterwards, as appears by their Names, Cuſtoms and Language; the Silures he deduced from Spain, which he proves from their Complexion and Situation; And ſo probably enough, he thinks them a Colony of the old Iberi; ſome whereof went into Ireland, and peopled ſome part of it: But, beſides theſe two, he makes a third Race of Men in Britain, whom he fetches out of Germany, and theſe were the Caledonian Britains; But (r) he takes Germany in a very large Senſe, ſo as to extend as far as the Sarmatæ; And to comprehend under it, the Northern Nations of the Cimbri, and the Gothones, and the Sueones; From whom it ſeems very probable, that the Caledonian Britains deſcended; As the Southern Britains came from the Celtæ; Whoſe Language and Religion were kept up among them. But the Caledonians came from the European Scythians, to whoſe Coaſts they lay much nearer than to thoſe of the Celtæ, and their larger Proportions, which Tacitus obſerves agree very well with this Suppoſition.

And theſe, if I miſtake not, were the Original Picts, but not called by that Name, till new Colonies came over to people the Country, after the terrible Devaſtation of it by the Continuance of the Roman Wars. For (s) Claudian makes Thule the Country of the Picts; And after all the Diſputes which have been about it, (t) Olaus Rudbeck hath made it very probable, that Scandinavia is meant by it; Which he proves, not only from the Teſtimony of Procopius, who affirms it; but from the exact Agreement of the Relation of Pytheas, Iſidorus, and others with that, and neither with Iſeland, nor any other Place. Beſides, (u) Bede ſaith, The common Tradition was, that the Picts came out of Scythia; Which is affirmed by Matt. Weſtminſter, and many others: But they do not mean the Aſian, but the European Scythia; Which comprehended under it all the moſt Northern Nations, Ab extremo Aquilone, ſaith (w) Pliny; And elſewhere he ſaith, (x) That the Getæ, the Daci and Sarmatæ, and even the Germans were called Scythians: (y) Herodotus mentions the Northern Scythians to whom there was no acceſs by thoſe who dwelt near the Palus Mœotis without the help of ſeven Languages; And when Darius fought with them, they retired Northwards towards their own Country. (z) Ptolemy places the Royal Scythians near the Hyperborean Mountains; Which could never be found in the vaſt Plains of Poland and Muſcovy; There being no Mountains there anſwering to their Deſcription as (a) Heberſteinius and

(b) Matthias à Micon confeſs; And therefore (c) Olaus Rudbeck hath undertaken to prove, not without great ſhew of Reaſon, That theſe Mountains were no other than the Ridge of Mountains in Sweden, where the ſeat of the ancient Scythians was; And that Ptolemy was extremely miſtaken in the Situation of the Northern Nations, removing them ſeveral Degrees more Eaſtward than they ought to have been, and ſo very much ſtraitning Scandinavia. Which (d) Jornandes calls the Work-houſe of Nations; and the ſame Jornandes affirms from Joſephus, That the Sueones were the true Scythians, whom (e) Xenophon takes to be the Governing People of Europe in his time; As the Perſians were in Aſia and the Carthaginians in Africa. And the old Greek (f) Geographers (as is ſaid before) knew of but two Nations in Europe beſides themſelves, viz. the Scythæ towards the North, and the Celtæ towards the Weſt. Theſe European Scythians did make frequent Expeditions by Sea, as appears by the old Gothick Hiſtories; And (g) Olaus Rudbeck obſerves from them, That it was a Cuſtom for them to go abroad by Sea, under the Conduct of one of their Princes, to ſee for Booty; And (h) Tacitus ſaith particularly of the Sueones, that they were well provided of Shipping; And therefore there can be no improbability that theſe Northern Nations ſhould people that part of Britain which lay neareſt to them. And (i) Sueno, the firſt Hiſtorian of Denmark, ſaith, That Helgi, the Son of Haldan, the Son of Skiold, the firſt Monarch there, was ſo powerful at Sea, that he was called Rex Maris, the King of the Sea. And (k) Saxo Grammaticus ſaith, That, having ſubdued the King of the Sclavi, he ſailed into divers Paſſages of the Sea. (l) Andreas Velleius gives this Reaſon why the Northern Nations were ſo ſoon and ſo much given to Expeditions by Sea, becauſe their Kings having many Children, they thought them beſt employ'd abroad, in ſeeking other Countries and getting Spoils at Sea. And upon the old boaſt of the Scythians concerning their Antiquity and Nobility might be grounded that Saying of Galgacus, That the Caledonian Britains were the moſt noble of any of them.

Among theſe Scythians (m) Pliny reckons the Agathyrſi; Who had their Name, ſaith (n) Olaus Rudbeck, from Aggathyr, one of the Gothick Names for Neptune: From Agga, ſignifying Power at Sea; and Tyr, Power at Land; Theſe Agathyrſi, ſaith he, were a ſort of People who lived near the Sea, in the Sinus Codanus, and were wont to prey upon the Spoils of the Sea. Jormundes places them in Scandia, and calls them Agantzyrios. They were remarkable in Antiquity for Painting their Bodies, as not only appears from Virgil's

Pictique Agathyrſi,

But from what (o) Solinus ſaith of them, That their Bodies were painted Colore cœruleo, juſt as the old Picts were. (p) Tacitus obſerves of the Arii, a fierce Northern People, That they had Tincta Corpora, i. e. were Picts. And the ſame (q) Virgil ſaith of the Geloni, who were next Neighbours to the Agathyrſi: So that (r) Hector Boethius his Conjecture is not at all improbable, who deduces the Picti from the Agathyrſi, i. e. from the Maritime Inhabitants of the Baltick Sea; or, as he expreſſes it, from thoſe who came firſt out of Sarmatia into the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, and from thence into Scotland.

This being to me the moſt probable Account of the Original of the Picts, I now come to that of the Scots. And, to do right to all Pretenders, I ſhall impartially ſet down the ſeveral Claims of the Scotiſh and Iriſh Antiquaries, and in paſſing make ſome Remarks upon them.

I begin with the Scotiſh Pretences, (s) Dempſter hath given a large Catalogue of the Scotiſh Antiquaries (whom he never ſaw) ſuch as Marcerius, the firſt Writer of their Hiſtory, whom he places Anno Dom. 53. From him, (t) he ſaith, Veremundus took his Materials, (whom Hector Boethius profeſſes to follow) and Cornelius Hibernicus, another of Hector's great Authors, who is ſaid by him to have lived Anno Dom. 1160. about 80 Years after Veremundus, according to Dempſter's computation. Leſly (or Robert Turner, as ſome think) mentions ſome ancient Annals, which Hector takes no notice of in particular, but Dempſter doth, as thoſe of Paſlet and Scone, and other Monaſteries. It would tend very much to the clearing of the Scotiſh Antiquities if ſome of theſe ancient Annals or Lieger Books were printed by ſome of their Learned Men, who have never been wanting in that Nation ſince Hector's time. And it hath rendred their Credit the more ſuſpicious, becauſe they have been ſo long kept up, when all the old Annals which have been found among us have either been carefully publiſhed, or our Writers have on all Occaſions appealed to their Authority, and made uſe of their own Words to juſtifie their Aſſertions. Whether this hath been done by Hector, Buchanan or Leſly, as to theſe Annals, I leave the Reader to determine.

I omit Dempſter's other Authors, who were never heard of by any beſides himſelf; But it is ſomewhat ſtrange, that even ſuch as Veremundus and Cornelius ſhould never fall into any hands (that I can find) but thoſe of Hector Boethius; And that he ſhould never ſo much as mention John Fordon's Scoti-chronicon. Pits confounds this Author with John de Fourdam, Confeſſor to our King John, and ſo places him Anno Dom. 1210. Wherein he is follow'd by the Learned (u) Ger. Voſſius. He was Abbat of Ford in Devonſhire, ſaith Leland, and he mentions no Hiſtorical Writings of his. But it is certain that John Fordon, who wrote the Scoti-chronicon, lived after this time, by the Authors he quotes (ſuch as the (w) Poly-chronicon of Ranulphus Higden, the Polycraticon of Roger of Cheſter, who both lived in the fourteenth Century.) And (x) Macculloch, who tranſcribed and inlarged it, lived, ſaith Dempſter, Anno Dom. 1482. For it appears by the Preface, Debitor ſum fateor, &c. That John Fordon (who is there called a Presbyter, and no Monk) finiſhed no more than five Books of the Scoti-chronicon; But left the Materials to make up the reſt; And that Fordon's own Work was but lately done, before Macculloch undertook to finiſh and inlarge it, who profeſſes himſelf a Diſciple of Fordon*'s*; And diſtinguiſhes his own Additions from Fordon's Copy, by puting in the Margin Scriptor & Autor. But (y) Dempſter makes Macculloch, Scoti-chronicon, and Fordon, three ſeveral Authors, which is a Sign he never ſaw them. Mr. (z) Camden takes notice how much the later Scotiſh Hiſtorians are beholding to Fordon*'s diligence*. And therefore out of him I ſhall give a ſhort Account of the Scotiſh Antiquities; And then ſhew how far Major, Hector Boethius and Buchanan differ from him: For Leſly doth very faithfully contract Hector where Buchanan was aſhamed to follow him; as will appear by what follows.

There was, ſaith (a) Fordon, "One Gaithelos, Son of Neolus, one "of the Kings of Greece, who, having diſpleaſed his Father, was ba- "niſhed his Countrey, and went into Egypt, where he was married to "Scota, the King's Daughter. But he quotes another Chronicle, "which

(b) Joh. Major confeſſeth, That the Scots were derived from the Iriſh, (b) De Geſt. Scot. l. 1. c. 9. which, he ſaith, is plain by the Language; For in his time, half the Nation ſpake Iriſh, and before that time, more. And ſo he tells the Story of their coming from Spain, of the City Braganza, of Iberus and his Mother Scota, and then repeats the Tradition of Gaithelos, as Fordon relates it; But very honeſtly ſaith, That he looks on that part of it, about coming out of Greece and Egypt as a Fiction; And very probably conjectures it was done, becauſe the Britains derived themſelves from the Trojans. Which was ſubtilly done of the Scots to claim Kindred rather with the conquering Greeks, than the ſubdued and baniſhed Trojans. All that Major aſſerts is, That the Iriſh came out of Spain, and the Scots out of Ireland: And the Story of Simon Brek he rejects as a Fable: And he makes the firſt ſettling of the Scots in Britain, to be that under Reuda; c. 11. But he mentions their Annals for Fergus, the Son of Ferchard, before Renda; and Rether and Ryddeſdale, as it is in Fordon. But he makes the Kingdoms of the Picts, Scots and Britains to be diſtinct in Cæſar's time; And that they all joined againſt him: And ſo relates Fordon's Story to the time of Fergus II. But between the two Fergus's he makes but 15 Kings, and 700 Years.

(c) Hector Boethius, before he begins the Tradition of Gaithelos, very ingeniouſly confeſſes, (c) Hiſt. Scot. l. 1. that their Nation follow'd the Cuſtom of other Nations, therein making themſelves the Offspring of the Greeks and Egyptians; And ſo he tells all the Story from Gaithelos, as Fordon has done, only here and there making Additions and Embelliſhments of his own; As when he derives the Brigantes from Brigantia in Spain; When he ſets down the Deliberation about the Form of Government upon Fergus his coming to Scotland; And the Speeches of Fergus and the King of the Picts; The Death of Coilus King of the Britains; The entring the fundamental Contract of the Scots, with the Poſterity of Fergus in Marble Tables in the way of Hieroglyphicks; The Agrarian Law, and Partition made by Seven, and the Diviſion of the Tribes; The bringing the Silures, Ordovices, Camelodunum, as well as the Brigantes, within the Compaſs of Scotland; Theſe are the proper Inventions of Hector, unleſs he had them from his Spaniard Veremundus, which no one could tell but himſelf; Thence Leland and (d) Lluyd charge him with innumerable Falſhoods. (d) Mona Deſcrip. ad fin. (e) Dempſter confeſſes, that Buchanan frequently chaſtiſes him; (e) Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 2. n. 175. But he would have it rather on the Account of Religion than Learning: But it is plain, that he owns his Miſtakes (f) Buch. Hiſt. l. 2. ad fin.

(g) Scoti-chr. l. 2. c. 12.

In the Second Book Hector inlarges more. For (g) Fordon paſſeth on from Fergus to Rether, or Bede's Reuda, having nothing to ſay; But Hector acquaints us with the Conteſt about the Regency upon Fergus his Death, and the Law then made concerning it, the attempt of Reſignation of Feritharis, to Ferlegus, the Son of Fergus, and his Impriſonment upon it; The Death of Feritharis after fifteen Years Reign; The Flight of Ferlegus into Britain, with the Choice of Main, his younger Brother, to be King; His good Government and Annual Progreſs for Juſtice through all Places of his Dominions; His appointing Circles of great Stones for Temples, and one in the middle for the Altar; And the Monthly Worſhip of the New Moon; And ſeveral Egyptian Sacrifices (which one would have thought had been more proper for Gaithelos himſelf) with the Succeſſion of his Son Dornadil, his making the Laws of Hunting, which were ſtill obſerved there; And of his Brother Nothatus, his Son Reuther being an Infant: Who came in by the Law of Regency, ſaith Hector; By the Power of the People ſaith Buchanan; but in truth by neither. For all this Succeſſion ſeems to have been the product of Hector's fruitful Invention, which Buchanan follows without Authority; as he doth in all the reſt of the Succeſſion of that Race of Kings from Reuther to Fergus II.

To make way for Bede's Account of Reuda's coming into thoſe Parts of Britain, This Reuther is forced back into Ireland; from whence he is ſaid to return with new Supplies after twelve Years; From whom the Scots were then called Dalreudini: But this return of Reuther, Hector places in the Year before Chriſt 204. And after him Reutha, his Kinſman; In whoſe time, Hector relates an Embaſſy from Ptolemy Philadelphus to him; And the Account of Scotland which he began in a large Volume for his Satisfaction, which was after finiſhed by Ptolemy the Coſmographer. This Buchanan had the Wit to leave out (and even (h) Dempſter himſelf, though he mentions him for a Writer of their Hiſtory) and ſo he doth the Voyage of the two Spaniſh Philoſophers in the time of Joſina, and their Preaching againſt the Egyptian Worſhip in Scotland; (but Leſly hath it.) And if Buchanan had believed it, he would have ſet it down, as well as Joſina's bringing Phyſick and Chirurgery into ſo much requeſt, That there was not a Noble Man that could not practiſe the latter. And yet Hector declares immediately after the Story of the Philoſophers, that hitherto he had followed Veremundus, John Campbell and Cornelius Hibernicus, the moſt approved Authors of their Hiſtory. It would have been ſome ſatisfaction to the World, if any other Perſon had ſeen theſe Authors beſides; Fordon never mentions them; And yet he uſed great diligence to ſearch their Antiquities; And, if (i) Dempſter may be believed, had the Sight of their moſt ancient MSS. Buchanan paſſes them over; Dempſter names them, on the authority of Hector: What became of theſe great Authors after Hector's time? Did he deſtroy them, as ſome ſay Polydore Virgil did ſome of ours after he had uſed them? But this were Madneſs, to quote their Authority and deſtroy the Authors; For theſe were his Vouchers; which ought moſt carefully to have been preſerved. And in truth Hector himſelf gives no very conſiſtent Account of his Authors: For in his Epiſtle to James 5. he mentions Veremundus, Archdeacon of St. Andrew's, who deduced the Scotiſh Hiſtory from the Original to Malcolm

colm III. And Turgott, Biſhop of St. Andrew's, and John Campbell, which were brought from the Iſland Iona; To whom he adds an Anonymous Author, and the imperfect Hiſtory of William Elphinſton, Biſhop of Aberdeen. But, ſaith he, if any ask ſuch a material Queſtion, How came theſe Authors to be ſeen no where elſe? He anſwers, That Edw. I. deſtroy'd all their Monuments of Antiquity; So that had not thoſe been preſerved in the Iſland Iona, with the Cheſt of Books which Fergus II. brought from the ſacking of Rome, in the time of Alaric, They had been able to give no account of their Antiquities. From whence it is evident that Hector never ſaw or heard of any ancient Authors of their Hiſtory, but ſuch as were conveyed to him from the Iſland Iona. But in his (k) Seventh Book, where he gives a more particular account of thoſe Books which were brought to him from thence, he only mentions ſome broken Fragments of Latin Authors; But whoſe they were, where Written, whence they came, he knew not; And, as to their own Hiſtories, he names indeed Veremundus and Elphinſton, and no more. The latter he ſaid before was imperfect, and lately done; So that the whole Credit of Hector's Antiquities reſts entirely upon Veremundus; For here he never takes notice of Campbell or Cornelius Hibernicus; But he ſaith, Edw. I. had deſtroy'd all their Antiquities, but ſuch as were preſerved in the Iſland Iona or Hy. And is this now a good Foundation to build a Hiſtory upon? For is it not very ſtrange, that no one Copy of Veremundus ſhould be heard of ſince that time; When there were ſeveral of Fordon, not only there, but in our Libraries, ſome with the Inlargements and ſome without? But if our King Edw. I. deſtroy'd all their ancient Hiſtories, how came Turgott's to be preſerved? He was Biſhop of St. Andrew's in the time of Malcolm III. and Queen Margaret, whoſe Lives he wrote; And whoſe Hiſtory, Hector ſaith, he had. So that not only Turgott's Hiſtory of the Church of Durham is preſerved in the Cotton Library, with his own Name written in an ancient Character (the ſame that is printed under the Name of Simeon Dunelmenſis, with ſome Alterations, as (l) Mr. Selden hath ſhew'd; But if Hoveden be ſo much to blame, as (m) Leland ſaith, for concealing what he borrow'd from Simeon Dunelmenſis, Simeon himſelf is at leaſt as much to blame for aſſuming to himſelf the proper work of Turgott.) But it ſeems Hector had ſeen what he wrote in relation to the Scotiſh Hiſtory: And Bale and Pits ſay, he wrote of the Kings of Scotland. But Dempſter ſaith, he wrote only the Annals of his own time, i. e. I ſuppoſe, the Lives of Malcolm and Margaret: If ſo, Hector mentions him to little purpoſe, with reſpect to the Scotiſh Antiquities. But however, from the forementioned Authors, Hector pretends to give an Account of the Inſtitution of the Great Council by Finannus, of the Order of the Druids, and their Chief Seat in the Iſland Mona, (which he would have to be the Iſle of Man, to the great regret of Humphrey Lluyd, who hath written a Book on purpoſe to diſprove him and Polydore Virgil about it.) Of the Tyranny and violent Death of King Durſtus; Of the choice of Euenus his Kinſman to ſucceed him, and his firſt requiring an Oath of Allegiance; Of the Diſturbances by Gillus his natural Son, and his flying into Ireland: And his Death by Cadallus; And Euenus his ſetting up Edecus, the Grandchild of Durſtus; with which he ends his Second Book.

In his Third Book he gives an Account of the Troubles from Ireland by Bredius, a Kinſman of Gillus; Of Caſſibellan's Meſſage to Ederus for for Aſſiſtance againſt Julius Cæſar: And the Speech of Androgeus before the Council: and Ederus his Anſwer, and ſending 10000 Men under the Command of Cadallanus, Son to Cadallus; Who, with the Britiſh Forces, quite overthrew Cæſar, by the help of Tenantius, Duke of the Cambri and Corinei; for which, as we may eaſily conceive, there was wonderful rejoicing in Scotland: And great Friendſhip upon it, between the Britains, the Picts and the Scots. But next Summer they hear the ſad News of Cæſar's coming again; And then the Britains refuſed the Scots aſſiſtance (and it is eaſie to imagine what muſt follow) the poor Britains were miſerably beaten; And Caſſibellan yields himſelf to Cæſar, and Cæſar marches towards Scotland; but before he enters it, he ſends a more Eloquent Letter to them than that in Fordon; And the Scots and Picts returned a reſolute Anſwer. But it ſeems Cæſar had ſo much good Nature in him as to ſend a Second Meſſage to the Scots, which was deliver'd with great Eloquence, but it did not work upon them; For, ſaith Hector, had it not been for the Law of Nations, they had torn the Meſſengers to pieces. But it happen'd luckily, that while Cæſar was making Preparations to enter Scotland, he received Letters from Labienus of the Revolt of the Gauls; upon which Cæſar returns, having ſcarce ſo much as frightned the Picts and the Scots. And here again Hector vouches the Authority of Veremundus and Campbel; But notwithſtanding, Buchanan very wiſely leaves all this out, which Leſly, believing Veremundus, or rather Hector before Cæſar, keeps in. But here Hector becomes very nice and critical, rejecting the vulgar Annals (which it ſeems were not deſtroy'd by Edw. I.) which ſay, that Cæſar went as far as the Caledonian Wood, and beſieged Camelodunum, and left there his Pretorian Houſe which he uſed to travel with, called Julis Hoff. But for his part, he would write nothing that might be found fault with, and therefore he follows Veremundus again, That this was the Temple of Victory, built by Veſpaſian, not far from Camelodunum; Only the Inſcription was defaced by Edw. I. Buchanan in the Life of King Donald ſaith, This was the Temple of the God Terminus: being near the Roman Wall. It was a round Building, made of ſquare Stones, and open only at the top 24 Cubits in height, 13 in breadth, as (n) Camden deſcribes it. (o) Nennius ſaith, It was built by Carauſius, in token of his Triumph. But this looks no more like a Triumphal Arch, than Cæſar's travelling Palace: And therefore Buchanan's opinion ſeems moſt probable, ſince Hector ſaith, That there was within it a Stone of great magnitude, which was the Repreſentation of the God Terminus, eſpecially, if the hole in the top were over the Stone, as it was in the Capitol at Rome. Then follow the wicked Life and tragical End of Eugenus III. the good Reign of Metallanus, and his Friendſhip with Auguſtus, which he goes about to prove from Strabo: But he had better kept to Veremundus. After him ſucceeded Caratacus, born at Caractonium, a City of the Silures, ſaith Hector, and that he might be ſure to confound all, he ſaith, his Siſter Voada was married to Arviragus, King of the Britains; But he divorced her, and married Geuiſſa, a Noble Roman; upon which Caratacus joined the Britains againſt the Romans, and was at laſt beaten by them, and betrayed by Cartumandua, his Mother-in-law, who, after his Father's death, was married to Venuſius, and was by Oſtorius carried in Triumph to Rome, from whence, he ſaith, he returned to Scotland, and remained to his death a Friend to the Romans; After Caratacus, Corbred his Brother was choſen King; who joined with Voada againſt the Romans; And partaking of her misfortune returned into Scotland, and there died. His Sons being under Age, Dardannus ſucceeded; Who deſigning to deſtroy the right Heirs of the Crown, was himſelf taken off: And thereby Way was made for Galdus the true Heir to ſucceed; Who was the ſame, ſaith Hector, with Tacitus his Galgacus; and he confeſſes, was beaten by Petilius Cerealis. This King, Buchanan thinks, was the firſt of their Kings who fought with the Romans. What becomes then of the Credit of Hector and Veremundus, from whom we have ſuch ample Narrations of their engaging with the Romans ſo long before? From hence it is plain that Veremundus his Authority ſignified nothing with him; And yet he follows Hector where he profeſſes to rely upon his Authority. For Buchanan evidently abridges Hector as to the Scotiſh Affairs, leaving out what he found inconſiſtent with the Roman Hiſtory.

Hector begins his Fifth Book with the ſhort Reign and doleful End of Luctacus, Galdus his Son; who was ſucceeded by Mogallus, his Siſter's Son; who continued for ſome time a brave Prince, but at laſt degenerating, was killed by his Subjects. After him Conarus his Son, who was confined for ill management, and the Government committed to Argadus; Upon his death the Kingdom fell to Ethodius, Nephew to Mogallus, who was ſtrangled in his Bed by an Iriſh Harper: And ſo was Satrael that ſucceeded him, by thoſe of his Bed-chamber. Theſe are ſad Stories, if they were true, but the comfort is, there appears yet no better Authority than that of Hector for them. For Fordon hath nothing of all this; And Buchanan and Leſly take them upon Hector's Credit. They ſerved Buchanan's purpoſe well enough, as appears by his Book De jure Regni apud Scotos; And therefore he was willing to let them ſtand in Hiſtory, being none of his Invention, and knowing what uſe was to be made of them. Donaldus, Brother to Ethodius, was choſen in his room, and here Hector falls in with Fordon about Fulgentius, one of the Royal Britiſh Race, who revolted from the Romans, which Fordon had from Geoffrey of Monmouth, who calls him Fulgenius, and ſaith, he was driven with the Britains into Albany: But after, in a Fight with Severus at York, they were both killed. But in this Hector was aſhamed to follow them, allowing Severus to die a natural death, and Fulgentius to ſurvive him. As to Donald's embracing Chriſtianity, he follows Fordon, but never quotes him; And here he never mentions Veremundus; As though ſo conſiderable a Point of Hiſtory needed no Authority but his own. He concludes this Book with a brief Account of Ethodius, Son to the former, who for his ill Government was confined by his Nobles and killed by his Guards.

In the Sixth Book he begins with a Convention of the Eſtates for the choice of a new King. And they ſet up his Son Athirco, who gave great hopes at firſt, but falling into Debauchery, his Nobles combined againſt him, and finding no way to eſcape, he killed himſelf. Nathalacus, Head of the conſpiracy ſucceeds, who was for a time Popular, afterwards Cruel, to that degree, as raiſed a general hatred of him, which ended in a Deſign to deſtroy him; Wherein they were prevented by one of his greateſt Confidents, who ſtabbed him. Then Findocus, eldeſt Son to Athirco, recover'd the Crown, who proved an excellent Prince, but was at laſt murthered by two Villains, his Brother Carantius being privy to it: The Murtherers were executed, but Carantius fled, and was afterwards a great Souldier under Probus, Carus and Diocleſian. This Carantius is the ſame whom the Roman Writers call Carauſius, as Hector afterwards confeſſes, who ſet up for himſelf in Britain; But, ſaith he, he purpoſely diſguiſed himſelf abroad. Geoffrey of Monmouth makes him a Britain, and calls him Caraſſius. (p) Fordon tells the main of the Story of Carauſius well enough; only inlarging on the Leagues he made with the Scots and Picts; And Gothorius, Nephew to Fulgentius, who ruled over the Northern Britains. But whence had Hector this Information, That he was Carantius, Son to Athirco, and Brother to Findocus? Buchanan is not aſhamed to relate the Story of Carantius as far as to his paſſing into the Roman Army, and there ſtops. But afterwards he ſpeaks of Carauſius his Actions in Britain, without any farther mention of Carantius; Which ſhews that Buchanan took, and left what he pleaſed out of Hector's Hiſtory without being obliged by any Authority he produced to carry it on as he found it there.

(p) Scotichron. l. 2. c. 44.

After the Death of Findocus, his Brother Donal ſucceeded, who was ſoon killed by Donald of the Iſles, who uſurped the Kingdom, and was at laſt killed by a Conſpiracy whereof Crathlintus, Son to Findocus was the chief; Who immediately took poſſeſſion of the Crown: After him ſucceeded Fincormachus; both theſe died peaceably. Then aroſe a mighty Conteſt about the Regency between the three Nephews of Crathlintus; At firſt Romachus prevailed, but Governing cruelly, he was taken off: Then follow'd Anguſianus, who was killed in Battel by the Picts, After him Fethelmachus, killed in his Bed by his Harper; And laſt of all Eugenius, killed in Battel by the Romans: And ſoon after, by the Inſtigation of the Picts their mortal Enemies, the Scots were univerſally baniſhed out of Britain by order of Maximus the Roman General; whither they returned not till about forty years after, under Fergus II. And in this, as to the main part of this laſt Tragedy, Fordon agrees with Hector, viz. That it was occaſion'd by the Romans joining with the Picts againſt the Scots, in the time of Eugenius, who were not only beaten by them, but driven out of Britain into Ireland, and Norway, and other Countries.

This is the Subſtance of what theſe Scotiſh Antiquaries deliver concerning their remoteſt Antiquities to the time of Fergus II.

But ſeveral Arguments are of late produced to juſtifie the Hiſtory of Scotland, as it is delivered by Hector Boethius out of Veremundus and his other Authors; which muſt be briefly conſidered, before I proceed to the Iriſh Antiquities. And it is alledg'd, that the Scotiſh Antiquities, as delivered by him (for it is concerning Hector's Authority which I diſpute) have been received with great Applauſe for many hundreds of years, by all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks of other Nations, who had any occaſion to mention their Affairs. It will go a great way with me, if it be made appear, that there was any ſuch account received among Learned Antiquaries in any part of the World before Hector's time. But I cannot find any one Antiquary, no not in Scotland, before his time, who gives the ſame Account that Hector doth. The Tradition of the Scots peopling that part of the Iſland long before Fergus II. I grant was a much elder Tradition, and is embraced by Fordon, and probably others before him. But Fordon doth not own the Succeſſion of the ſame number of Kings, and in ſuch a manner as Hector delivers them. From whence then came Hector to know ſo much more than Fordon in theſe matters? I yield that there was ſome ancient Chronica before Fordon, which he often quotes. But ſtill the Argument is the ſtronger againſt Hector. For if Fordon had all thoſe Helps, and yet knew nothing of thoſe particulars, it is a vehement Preſumption againſt Hector, that he took too much Liberty in thoſe many particulars, which Fordon paſſed over, as having nothing to ſay about them. The more Copies they have of Fordon in their Monaſteries, the more eaſily they may be convinced, how little Hector and he agree about the firſt Succeſſion between the Fergus's. And if Fordon did agree with all their Annals, as it now pleaded, Hector Boethius could not, becauſe they differ ſo much from each other; as will appear to any one that compares them. Why do we not read in Fordon the Authorities of Veremundus and Cornelius Hibernicus, who were certainly before his time, if ever? For we are told, that he was Archdeacon of St. Andrew's, An. Dom. 1076. and dedicated his Book to Malcolm Canmore; which was long enough before Fordon's time. But it is ſaid, that he is cited in a particular part of Fordon's Book; which could not be copied from Boethius. It had been a much clearer Evidence, if that Place had been produced; for then we might have conſider'd whether it was a Paſſage of Fordon, or of one of thoſe ſeveral Writers who it ſeems wrote Additions and Continuations to him; ſuch, as beſides Macculloch, Arelat and Walter Bowmaker are ſaid to have been, who continued the Hiſtories to the Reign of James II. And yet I would be glad to ſee any Teſtimony of Veremundus of that Antiquity. As to the Teſtimony of Chambers, who ſaith, he had theſe principal Authors, Veremund, a Spaniard, Turgott, Swinton, Campbel, &c. till ſome farther Proof be produced, I have reaſon to ſuppoſe, it was the ſame Caſe as to him with that of Sir R. Baker, which immediately follows; For we are told, that he likewiſe quotes this Veremund among the Authors out of whom he compiled his Hiſtory, and likewiſe Campbel and Turgott. And if we have no more ground to believe that Chambers had them, than Sir R. Baker, the matter muſt remain in as much obſcurity as before. For no one imagines that Sir R. Baker had all thoſe Authors by him which he there mentions; but he ſets down the Names of thoſe whoſe Authorities he relied upon, although he found them quoted by others. And he is not the only perſon in the World who hath cited the Authority of Books which he never ſaw; The ſame is to be ſaid of Hollinſhed. But if ſuch kind of Proofs muſt paſs for evident Demonſtrations, that the Scots had ſuch Hiſtorians as Veremundus and the others before mentioned; I wonder the ſame Learned Author ſhould ſhrink ſo much the Faith of Hiſtory as to allow that deſpicable thing, called Moral Certainty, to be a ſufficient Probation for it; For ſcarce any Hiſtory can be mention'd, but may have ſuch kind of evident Demonſtrations to prove it. Well, but Balæus, a Learned Engliſh-man, and Geſner, and other famous Strangers, quote Veremundus. But ſo do not Boſton of Bury, nor Leland, who had written of the Britiſh and other Writers before the time of Hector Boethius. And thoſe were Men who ſearched all our Libraries for the ancient Books in them, and have digeſted them with great Care; and if Veremundus with other MSS. were brought into England by Edw. I. as is now ſuggeſted, it could hardly have eſcaped the diligence of thoſe Men. But thoſe who lived after Hector Boethius publiſhed his Hiſtory, took his word for Veremundus, and entred him into their Catalogues; as Voſſius hath done many whom he never ſaw. But Eraſmus ſaith that Hector was a Perſon who could not lye. That was more than Eraſmus could know, unleſs he had been by when he wrote his Hiſtory and compared it with the Authors he pretended to follow. As to Paulus Jovius, he was a fit Second to Boethius; but I am ſure Eraſmus would not have ſaid of him, that he could not lye. For Hector's pretending to have his Books from the Iſland Iona, I have given an Account of it already, and ſhew'd how inconſiſtent his own relation thereof is. But all this while, Where is the great Applauſe of theſe Scotiſh Antiquities for many hundreds of years by all Hiſtorians, Antiquaries and Criticks of foreign Nations? When not ſo much as one is produced, who lived before Hector Boethius, and, I think, that was not many hundred years ſince.

But whatever becomes of Veremundus, we are told, That the Black-book of Scoon, containing the Scotiſh Hiſtories from the beginning, was among Preſident Spotſwood's Books, and given to Lambert, and by him to Colonel Fairfax. All this, I am afraid, is a great miſtake for a Black-book of Fordon's, which was brought out of Scotland and preſented to the late King by a Gentleman of that Name, as ſome yet living can atteſt. But no ſuch thing as the Black-book of Scoon was ever heard of here; and if any ſuch could be found, we ſhould be ſo far from ſuppreſſing any thing that tended to the Glory of the Scotiſh Nation, that ſome here would be very glad to publiſh it, with all other ancient Annals which themſelves would think fit to be printed; whether it be the Black-book of Paſley, Pluſcardin, or any others. We do not deny that they had any ancient Annals or Regiſters in their Monaſteries; but we deſire to be better acquainted with them; and it is no good Argument, they can tell us where to find them, that they are ſo careful to let us know how they came to loſe them.

But, after all this Fencing, it is poſitively ſaid, that the ſureſt foundation of all Hiſtory is the common belief and conſent of the Natives. But what if the Natives of ſeveral Countries differ from each other? It may be reaſonable to believe neither, but it is not poſſible to believe both. What if they had for a long time no certain way of conveying their Hiſtories from one Age to another? It is poſſible Oral Tradition may preſerve ſome general ſtrokes of the ancient Hiſtory of a Country; but it is hardly credible, that ſo many particulars as Boethius hath in the firſt Race of Kings could be kept ſo diſtinctly by the force of Tradition. The caſe of the old World is vaſtly different from any other People ſince the ſhortning of Mens Lives; and whatever Nation wanted Records, could never make out the Credibility of their Hiſtory to other People. We do not deny the Annals of the Jewiſh or Roman Prieſts; but we think Annals and Oral Tradition are two things; when Annals are produced, we muſt weigh and conſider them, and compare the Annals of ſeveral Nations together, that we may better judge which are to be relied upon.

And yet we are told again, that when Hiſtories are formed out of ancient Records, there is no farther need to produce them; for Papers may be loſt by accident, but the Hiſtories taken out of them are to be believed, although the Records cannot be found; as it is in reſpect of the Hiſtories of Rome and Greece, whoſe Authority remains, although the Teſtimonies on which they relied are not extant.

So that at laſt Geoffrey of Monmouth muſt be believed as to the Britiſh Antiquities, as well as Hector Boethius as to the Scotiſh. For Geoffrey doth no more pretend to invent his Hiſtory than Hector: and Hunibaldus is as good an Author as either of them; and Keting as good as Hunibaldus. For they all equally pretend to derive their Hiſtories from ancient Records and the Tradition of the Natives; and all theſe having formed their Hiſtories out of theſe ſubſtantial Grounds, we are to ſearch no farther; but to believe them all however improbable in themſelves, and contradictious to one another.

The caſe is very different as to the Learned Greek and Roman Hiſtories, from thoſe of the modern barbarous Nations; which were plainly made in imitation of them, as will appear afterwards. And as to the Greeks and Romans, there is a conſiderable difference to be made between the Hiſtories that related to the times before they had written Annals and after. Can any Man imagine that there is as great reaſon to believe the firſt Accounts of Greece as thoſe that were written after the Peloponneſian War? Or, that the firſt beginnings of the Roman Monarchy by Romulus are delivered with as much certainty as the Carthaginian War? The moſt judicious Writers among the Greeks and Romans did make allowance for the Obſcurity of ancient Times, when many things were utterly loſt, and others very imperfectly delivered: What Reproach then is it to any modern Nations to ſuppoſe their Hiſtories to have had the ſame Fate the Greeks and Romans had? Only in this reſpect they are liable to greater Diſpute, becauſe they pretend to give an exact Account of thoſe times before they had any Annals or written Records; and in this Caſe, the more exact and particular the more ſuſpicious. And we have more certain Rules of trying their ancient Hiſtories, than the Greeks and Romans had; becauſe we have the Accounts of ſeveral Nations to compare together; and undoubted Teſtimonies of other Writers to examine them by. And if they be not found faulty by ſome of theſe ways, we are contented to let them paſs.

But as to the Scotiſh Antiquities, we not only object the want of ſufficient Antiquity in their written Records, but their Inconſiſtency with approved Writers, in the moſt ancient Account they give of the firſt ſettling of the Scots ſo early in Britain. And which yet adds more to the Suſpicion, the Iriſh, from whom they deſcend, give a far more different Account of their firſt coming than themſelves do; as will appear by what follows.

For, The Iriſh Antiquaries will by no means allow the Account given by Hector Boethius; And ſay, He had not regard to Truth in the Writing of it; Particularly, as to Simon Brek's coming out of Spain, and bringing the fatal Chair with him, which they ſay are both falſe, and the main ground they inſiſt upon is, That they are contrary to the Relation of the (q) Old Iriſh Antiquaries who deſerve far more Credit.

I ſhall therefore ſet down the Account they give, and conſider the Credit they deſerve.

The beſt Account we have from (r) them is this;

(1.) That Ireland was firſt planted after the Flood, by one Ciocal, with a Fleet, wherein every Veſſel had fifty Men and fifty Women; And this, Keting ſaith, happen'd about 100 Years after the Deluge. But ſince ſuch remote Antiquities are very tender things, I ſhall not with a Beſom ſweep them all away at once, but gently take them in Pieces, and lay them open as I paſs along. Now I deſire to know what Foundation there is for our believing a thing ſo unlikely, as the Peopling of Ireland in this manner

(q) Cambrenſis everſus per Grat. Lucian. c. 8. p. 61.

(r) Proſpect of Ireland by P. W. p. 6.

manner, with ſuch a Fleet, ſo ſoon after the Flood? It was a long time after this before the Phœnicians had any Skill in Shipping; to whom the Romans attributed the Invention of it. And certainly the Expedition of the Argonautæ had not made ſuch a noiſe among the Greeks ſo long after the Flood (but twenty Years before the Deſtruction of Troy, as (s) Scaliger ſaith, which happen'd in the time of the Judges) if the Skill in Shipping had been ſo great within 100 Years after it? Yet, if that Expedition were ſuch as (t) Olaus Rudbeck deſcribes it, it was far more conſiderable than is commonly thought. For he ſaith, They not only entred the Euxine Sea, but he proves from Orpheus and Diodorus Siculus, that they ſailed up the Tanais, from whence Hornius in his Map ſaith, They went into the Mare Cronium, and ſo came round Egypt, paſſing between Britain and Ireland, and returning home by the Straits. But Rudbeck finds a Paſſage for them from the Tanais to the Volga, and ſo to the Lake of Fronoe, the Head of the Volga, and then by Rivers into the Baltick Sea, and ſo about the Scythian Promontory to Irene (Ireland) and Peuceſſa (Britain) and to Auſonia (Italy) and Trinacria (Sicily) and ſo home to Iolcos. If this were a mere Poetical Fancy, yet it was extraordinary, ſince it agrees with the exact Deſcription of the Northern Countries, ſaith Rudbeck, far more than Ptolemy doth. I will ſuppoſe this Orpheus, who wrote the Argonauticks, to be neither the Old Orpheus, nor Onomacritus, but Orpheus of Crotona, to whom Suidas attributes the Argonauticks, who lived in the time of Piſiſtratus; yet it is very much for him then to deſcribe theſe Parts of the World, as he doth; and to mention Ireland as a Country then known to the Greeks. And Feſtus Avienus, deſcribing the Voyage of Himilco the Carthaginian (ſpoken of by (u) Pliny) ſpeaks of Ireland as then eſteemed Sacred in theſe remarkable Verſes:

(t) Atlant. c. 26.
(u) L. 2. c. 67.

Aſt hinc duobus, in ſacram, ſic Inſulam
Dixere priſci ſolibus curſus rati eſt
Hæc inter Undas multum ceſpitem jacit Eámque latè Gens Hibernorum colit
Propinqua rurſus Inſula Albionum patet.

Nothing can be plainer, than that he here ſpeaks of Ireland and Britain, as then known by Himilco; For Feſtus Avienus ſaith, He took this Deſcription from the Phœnician Annals, in which this Voyage was inſerted. And it is very ſtrange to me that (w) Olaus Rudbeck ſhould here change the Hiberni into Hyperborei, eſpecially when he allows Albion to ſtand for Britain. But theſe are undoubted Teſtimonies of the ancient Peopling of Ireland: and of far greater Authority than thoſe domeſtick Annals now ſo much extolled. But muſt we follow Keting, becauſe he follows the old Annals in this Tradition of the firſt Peopling of Ireland? And why not then in the Story of Seth and three Daughters of Cain viewing Ireland? And of the three Fiſhermen of Spain being Wind-driven thither the Year before the Flood? And of Keaſar the Daughter of Bajoth, Son of Noah, coming thither with three Men and fifty Women, to ſave themſelves from the Flood? Are not all theſe fine Stories in the ſame Iriſh Annals? But Keting rejects them; And what then? Doth this make for or againſt the Authority of theſe Annals, that even Keting looks on theſe as Poetical Fictions? But he ſaith,

The beſt Iriſh Antiquaries did of Old look on theſe as fabulous. Poſſibly the two former they might; But do they indeed reject the Story of Keaſar and her Companions? (x) Giraldus Cambrenſis quotes the moſt ancient Hiſtories of Ireland for this Tradition; and they confirm it by the Names of the Place where ſhe landed, and where ſhe was buried. And (y) Gratianus Lucius confeſſes, that he had the ſight of their ancient Annals; and he ſuſpects that he made away many of them. If ſo, Keting had fewer advantages than Giraldus for the Old Iriſh Antiquities. But if theſe Old Annals be of ſo little Authority in this Story, What Credit do they deſerve in this early Plantation after the Flood? But to proceed in the Iriſh Account, It is ſaid, (x) Topogr. Hib. Diſt. 3. n. 1.

(y) Cambrenſis everſ. p. 40.

(2.) That Bartholanus and his three Sons, about three hundred Years after the Flood, landing in Ireland with a thouſand fighting Men, had many doughty Battels with the Poſterity of Ciocal; And at the end of three hundred Years they were all conſumed by a Peſtilence.

This Story, I confeſs, is in (z) Nennius, and (a) Giraldus Cambrenſis; But it is a very obvious Queſtion, if they all died, How their Memory came to be preſerved, and even the memory of that Peſtilence which deſtroy'd them all? But to this Giraldus gives a very ſubſtantial Anſwer out of the ancient Annals, viz. That only one Ruanus eſcaped, who lived to St. Patrick's days, and was baptized by him: (in a good old Age certainly, for he muſt be born within ſix hundred Years after the Flood; And it was above four hundred and thirty Years after Chriſt before St. Patrick was deſigned for Ireland.) This Ruanus, ſay the Iriſh in Giraldus, was the true Relator of the ancient Hiſtory of Ireland to St. Patrick, and who can queſtion the Teſtimony of ſuch an authentick and truly ancient Witneſs? A late (b) Iriſh Antiquary ſaith, he continued ſo long by a Pythagorean Tranſmigration; but it was much he could retain theſe things in his Memory under all his Tranſmutations.

(z) Nenn. c. 6.
(a) Diſt. 3. c. 2.
(b) Ogyg. Inſula. p. 4.

But as to this Bartholanus (who is called by Nennius, Bartholomeus, but by Geoffrey, Partholomeus, by Fordon, Partholonius) we read in the (c) Britiſh Hiſtory, That when Gurguintus returned from Dacia, he found 30 Ships near the Orcades full of Men and Women, and ſending to enquire who they were, their Commander, (c) Bartholomeus, ſaid, They were driven out of Spain to ſeek a Countrey to live in, and beg'd ſome part of Britain, for they had been a year and a half at Sea; But he ſent them into Ireland, then void of Inhabitants, which they planted, and there continued to this day. It ſeems there was a Tradition in Nennius his time, Anno Dom. 830. That Ireland was Peopled from Spain; And that one Bartholonus, or Bartholomeus, was the Leader of them; But Geoffrey would not let them go thither without leave from the Britains; But Nennius hath nothing of it, and that part concerning being a year and a half at Sea, Nennius applies to Nimech, as he calls him, but the Iriſh, Nimead; and he ſaith, after his abode in Ireland, he returned to Spain. Then, Nennius ſaith, Three Sons of a Spaniard came with thirty Veſſels, and thirty Women in each of them, who ſaw a Towr of Glaſs in the middle of the Sea, and Men upon it, who would give no Anſwer, wherefore they reſolved to aſſault it with all their Veſſels, except one, which was Shipwreck'd, having thirty Men, and as many Women, in it, all the reſt were ſunk in the Attempt of the Caſtle, and from thoſe thirty Men and thirty Women, ſaith Nennius, all Ireland was Peopled. Here we ſee how far Geoffrey differs from Nennius; and alters the old Traditions as he thought fit. But

(c) De Orig. & Geſtis Briton. l. 1. c. 20.

Nennius goes on, and ſaith, That more ſtill came from Spain, and the laſt was one whom he calls Clamhochor, and his Company. But the Interpolator of Nennius (whether Samuel Beulanus or another) there obſerves, That there is no certain Account of the Original of the Scots; So the Iriſh were then called. But yet Nennius relates, from the Iriſh Antiquaries, the Story of the Noble Scythian, who was Son-in-law to Pharaoh, and his Expulſion out of Egypt, and coming at laſt to Spain, and thence to Ireland above a thouſand Years after the Egyptians were drowned in the Red Sea; And firſt ſettled in Dalrieta, which he underſtands of that Region in Ireland; But the Scotiſh Antiquaries apply it to the Countrey which had the ſame Name in Scotland. So that here we have very different Accounts, that were given ſo long ſince as the time of Nennius; and no way found then, to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe, or the certain from the uncertain. But of that more afterwards. Now to go on to a farther Account from the Iriſh Authors, who ſay, (3.) That thirty Years after, Nemedus, another Scythian, with his four Sons, arrived in Ireland with a good Fleet, and fought with the remainder of the Giants, but by another Peſtilence were driven off, under the Conduct of three Captains, Simeon Breac, Ibaath, and Briotan, and the two former ſailing to Greece; Briotan, with his Adherents, landed in the North of Britain, now called Scotland; And by theſe, and their Poſterity remaining there, gave the Denomination of Britain to the whole Iſland. And this we are told is affirmed by the Holy Cormach, King of Munſter and Biſhop of Caſhel, in the Pſalter of Caſhel. And all the Chronologers of Ireland agree with him. This Pſalter of Caſhel is one of the moſt authentick Hiſtories among them, and ſo called becauſe done in Verſe; And (d) it is ſaid, That the more remote Antiquities in it were taken from another Book made 1200 Years ſince, collected out of all the former Chronicles of that Nation, and allowed in a ſolemn Convention of the Eſtates at Tarach, under Laogerius, in the time of St. Patrick, who was one of the Committee appointed for the ſuperviſing of it. And this Book was called the Pſalter of Tarach.

This I confeſs goes much beyond what can be ſaid for Geoffrey of Monmoth, or Hector Boethius. But yet methinks there ſeem to be ſome Reaſons, why theſe Annals ſhould not have ſuch a mighty Authority with us. For we cannot be certain that there ever were ſuch Annals, or that theſe Annals, if they were ſo exactly drawn up, are ſtill preſerved. For not only (e) Gratianus Lucius complains for the loſs of their old Annals; But (f) Jocelin, in the Life of St. Patrick, concludes with ſaying, that many of their Writings relating to him, were burnt by the fury of the Pagans while they governed in Ireland. By theſe Pagans the Danes are meant, and the Slavery under them is (g) ſaid to be worſe than Egyptian, Circaſſian, or any other mention'd in Hiſtory. And particularly it is ſaid, That the Clergy were baniſh'd into Bogs, Woods and Caves, where they were fain to lurk ſeveral Years like wild Beaſts; And that none were ſuffered to keep School, or to be taught any kind of Learning, not even in their own Houſes: And which is yet more to the purpoſe, None were ſuffer'd to have any kind of Book; But all Books the Danes could light upon, were either burnt, or taken away from them. It is poſſible their Annals might eſcape ſuch a Storm as this, but it doth not ſeem altogether probable; Eſpecially conſidering, that this firſt Slavery under the Danes continued Forty Years, in which, they ſay, all their famous

mous Monaſteries, Cells, Univerſities, Colleges were deſtroyed, not one being left in the Land. And it is withal ſaid, That although other Loſſes might be recover'd, yet their Libraries were never recover'd. Only ſome few Religious Men preſerved ſome of their Books. But we have no aſſurance that the old Annals were among them. Or if they were then, That they could eſcape the Second Daniſh Invaſion, which continued for a hundred and fifty Years. In which (h) Colganus ſaith, The Iriſh Antiquities had an irrecoverable Loſs, at leaſt, he ſaith, not yet recover'd. And yet he had Cormach's Pſalter, or the Pſalter of Caſhel, Tigernacus his Annals, or the Annals Cluanenſes, the Annals Inſulenſes, compoſed by one Magraidin, in the Iſland of All-ſaints, in the County of Longford, which he deduces to Anno Dom. 1405. The Annals of Ulſter, by one Maguir, Canon of Armach, deduced to his own time, who died Anno Dom. 1498. And the Annals of Dungall, compoſed by four modern Authors out of all their former Annals; But among all theſe, there is nothing pretending to Antiquity, but the Pſalter of Caſhel and Tigernacus; yet the Pſalter of Caſhel falls ſhort of the time of Nennius, for Cormach, King of Munſter, the ſuppoſed Author of it, lived after the beginning of the 10*th Century*, being killed by Flannbac Siona (called Flannus Siuna by (i) Gratianus Lucius) who died Anno Dom. 914. or as Sir James (k) Ware thinks, Anno Dom. 916. And for Tigernacus his Annals, the four Magiſtri, as Colganus calls them, or the Annals of Dungall are poſitive, that Tigernacus ô Braion, the Author of them, died (l) in the 11*th Century*, Anno Dom. 1088. There remains only the Pſaltuir Na-Ran, written by Aonghais Ceile de, or by Ængusius, one of the Culdees, who lived in the latter end of the 8*th Century*, as the ſame Iriſh Antiquary confeſſes, who withall ſaith, That all the Works contained therein relate only to Matters of Piety and Devotion, which therefore can ſignifie nothing to our purpoſe. So that nothing appears of the Iriſh Antiquities which can pretend to be written before the Daniſh Invaſion; And although we are told, that theſe Annals were taken out of others more ancient; yet we have barely their Word for it; for thoſe ancient Annals, whatever they were, are irrecoverably loſt; So that there can be no compariſon of one with the other. And how can they be ſo certain of the exactneſs uſed in the Parliament of Tarach to preſerve their Annals, if there be no ancient Annals to preſerve the Memory of the Proceedings at that time? It was a very extraordinary Care for the Eſtates of the whole Nation to preſerve their Annals; if we could be aſſured of it: Which doth much exceed the Library of Antiquities which (m) Suffridus Petrus ſpeaks of, ſet up, as he ſaith, by Friſo, the Founder of the Friſians, at Stavera, near the Temple of Stavo, in which not only the ancient Records were preſerved from time to time; But the Pictures of the ſeveral Princes, with the times of their Reigns, from An. 313. before Chriſt*'s coming, to* Charlemagn*'s time; The like whereof*, he ſaith, no German Nation can boaſt of; But yet methinks the Poſterity of Gaithelos exceeds that of Friſo's in the Care of Preſerving their Antiquities; For the Wiſdom of the whole Nation was concerned in it. But I never read of any who ever ſaw this Library of Antiquities at Stavera, but we muſt believe Cappidus Staverenſis and Occa Scarlenſis, as to theſe things; And that they ſaw the Records, as Hector did Veremundus, although none elſe ever did. But as to this Parliament of Tarach, which was careful to preſerve the Iriſh Antiquities; Whence have we this Information? Are the Acts of that Aſſembly preſerved? Are any Copies of thoſe Annals ſtill in being? Yes, we (n) are told, that the keeping of the Original Book was entruſted by the Eſtates to the Prelates, and thoſe Prelates, for its perpetual Preſervation, cauſed ſeveral authentick Copies of it to be fairly engroſſed, whereof ſome are extant to this day, and ſeveral more faithfully tranſcribed out of them; their Names being the Book of Ardmach, the Pſalter of Caſhel, &c. It ſeems then, theſe are the Tranſcripts of the Original Authentick Book, allowed by all the Eſtates of the Kingdom. But the Book of Ardmach is a late thing, being the ſame with the Annals of Ulſter compoſed by a Canon of Ardmach: So that the whole reſts upon the Pſalter of Caſhel, which muſt be compoſed 500 Years after the meeting of that famous Aſſembly. For St. Patrick was one of the number, and it was done in the time of Laogirius, or Leogarius, King of Ireland, who died, ſaith (o) Gratianus Lucius, Anno Dom. 458. But King Cormach lived in the 10*th Century*; And therefore an account muſt be given, how this Original Book or Authentick Copies were preſerved for that 500 Years and more, in the miſerable Condition that Nation was in, a great part of that time.

So that the Difference is not ſo great between the Authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth and theſe Annals, as is pretended. For I ſee no Reaſon why the Story of Brutus ſhould be thought more incredible than that of Ciocal, Bartholanus and Nemedus, with his Son Briotan that gave the Name to Britain; And eſpecially the Story of Gaithelos himſelf, his Marriage in Egypt to Scota, coming to Spain, and thence his Poſterity to Ireland; which ſeems to me to be made in imitation of Geoffrey's Brutus. For Brutus married Pandraſus his Daughter, the King of Greece, and then was forced to ſeek his Fortune at Sea, and paſſing by Mauritania, juſt as Gaithelos did, the one landed in Gaul, and came for Albion; And the other in Spain, and ſent his Son for Ireland. And I wonder to find (p) Brutus his Giants in Albion of ſo much larger Proportions than the Giants in Ireland, who are ſaid, not to exceed the talleſt growth of Men; For I had thought Giants had been Giants in all Parts of the World. Suppoſe ſome Learned Men have queſtion'd, Whether there were ſuch a Perſon as Brute; I ſhould think it no more Hereſie, than to call in queſtion, Whether there were ſuch Perſons as Ciocal, Bartholanus, Briotan or Gaithelos; If the ſilence of good Authors, the diſtance of Time, and want of ancient Annals complained of, makes the Hiſtory of Brutus ſo hard to be believed, I only deſire that theſe Iriſh Traditions may be examined by the ſame Rules, and then, I believe, the Iriſh Antiquities will be reduced to the ſame Form with the Britiſh; Only Geoffrey had not ſo lucky an Invention, as to have his Hiſtory confirm'd by Parliament. For, if he had but thought of it, he could have made as general an Aſſembly of the Eſtates at Lud's Town, and as ſelect a Committee of Nine, as ever was at Tarach. But all Mens Inventions do not lie the ſame way; And in this, I confeſs, Keting or his Authors have very much exceeded Geoffrey and his Britiſh MS. And upon the whole matter I cannot ſee that the Iriſh Chronologers and Hiſtorians have ſo much more probability in their Story of Briotan than the Britiſh Writers had in the Tradition of Brute. For it is certain, it was not originally the Invention of Geoffrey, only he might uſe ſome art in ſetting it off, as he thought, with greater advantage than the Britains had done before him.

But ſtill we are referr'd to the Authority of the Iriſh Monuments in the Pſalter of Caſhel written 800 years ſince by the holy Cormach, both King and

and Biſhop of Munſter. Let us then, for once, examine one part of the Hiſtory taken from thence, and then leave the Reader to judge, whether it deſerves ſo much more Credit than the Britiſh Antiquities; And that ſhall be concerning the Kingdom of the Picts, becauſe we are told, (q) This is the way to end the vexatious Queſtions about them, being taken out of the moſt authentick Records of Ireland, which are of ſuch irrefragable Authority, That ſome are perſuaded, had they been known to Camden, he would never have diſputed the matter. And ſo I think too. But this irrefragable Authority is that of the Pſalter of Caſhel; From whence we are inſtructed in theſe Particulars: (1.) That the Picts ſerved in Thracia, under one Polycornus, a King of that Country; where their General Gud took away the King's Life, to prevent an Attempt on his Daughter. And did not Brutus ſerve King Pandraſus with his Army not far off in Greece? And methinks Pandraſus is as good a Name for a King of Greece as Polycornus for the King of Thrace. But where are either of them to be met with elſewhere? (2.) That upon this the General and his Army fled the Country, roamed up and down at Sea till they came to Gaul, and there they founded the City of Pictavia. This is juſt Geoffrey. For Brutus came to Gaul too, and there fought with Groffarius, King of the Picts, and founded the City of Tours, which had its Name from Turonus, Brutus his Nephew. (3.) That upon the ſame Occaſion they were forced to leave Gaul, and to go for Ireland, (as Brutus did for Albion) where they were entertained, to fight with the Britains; Who it ſeems made very early Invaſions upon Ireland, which ſtill agrees with Geoffrey's Hiſtory. (4.) The Story of the Advice of Troſdan, the Pictiſh Magician, for the Iriſh Army to bath in the Milk of 150 White, Crumple-horned Cows, as an effectual Antidote againſt the envenom'd Arrows of the Britains, and the ſtrange Succeſs upon it, is hardly to be matched in Geoffrey. (5.) That the Picts, growing inſolent, were forced by Herimon to retire to the Northern Parts of Britain, Only with three Iriſh Women, whatever Bede ſaith of more; or, how differently ſoever he relates the whole Story of the Picts; For what is Bede's, a poor Monk's Authority, to King Cormach's? (6.) That from Cathluan, Son to Gud, there was a conſtant Succeſſion of Kings of the Picts in that Country. But not more exact than the Succeſſion of Britiſh Kings from King Brutus. And now I leave the Reader to judge whether Geoffrey be not hardly dealt with, when ſuch Authors are prefer'd ſo much before him. We now return to the farther Account which the Iriſh Antiquaries give of their own Antiquities.

(4.) We are then to underſtand, that, beſides the Race deſcended from Nemedus, there was another called Clanna Gaoidhel, or Poſterity of Gaithelos; concerning whom theſe things are affirmed. (1.) That he deſcended from Niul, a younger Son to Feanuſa Farſa, King of Scythia, who, travelling into Egypt, had a Country there given him by Pharaoh Cingeris called Capacyront (I ſuppoſe in the old Egyptian Language) who was married to Pharaoh's daughter called Scota. Copies of thoſe Annals ſtill in being? Yes, we (n) are told, that the keeping of the Original Book was entruſted by the Eſtates to the Prelates, and thoſe Prelates, for its perpetual Preſervation, cauſed ſeveral authentick Copies of it to be fairly engroſſed, whereof ſome are extant to this day, and ſeveral more faithfully tranſcribed out of them; their Names being the Book of Ardmach, the Pſalter of Caſhel, &c. It ſeems then, theſe are the Tranſcripts of the Original Authentick Book, allowed by all the Eſtates of the Kingdom. But the Book of Ardmach is a late thing, being the ſame with the Annals of Ulſter compoſed by a Canon of Ardmach: So that the whole reſts upon the Pſalter of Caſhel, which muſt be compoſed 500 Years after the meeting of that famous Aſſembly. For St. Patrick was one of the number, and it was done in the time of Laogirius, or Leogarius, King of Ireland, who died, ſaith (o) Gratianus Lucius, Anno Dom. 458. But King Cormach lived in the 10*th Century*; And therefore an account muſt be given, how this Original Book or Authentick Copies were preſerved for that 500 Years and more, in the miſerable Condition that Nation was in, a great part of that time.

So that the Difference is not ſo great between the Authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth and theſe Annals, as is pretended. For I ſee no Reaſon why the Story of Brutus ſhould be thought more incredible than that of Ciocal, Bartholanus and Nemedus, with his Son Briotan that gave the Name to Britain; And eſpecially the Story of Gaithelos himſelf, his Marriage in Egypt to Scota, coming to Spain, and thence his Poſterity to Ireland; which ſeems to me to be made in imitation of Geoffrey's Brutus. For Brutus married Pandraſus his Daughter, the King of Greece, and then was forced to ſeek his Fortune at Sea, and paſſing by Mauritania, juſt as Gaithelos did, the one landed in Gaul, and came for Albion; And the other in Spain, and ſent his Son for Ireland. And I wonder to find (p) Brutus his Giants in Albion of ſo much larger Proportions than the Giants in Ireland, who are ſaid, not to exceed the talleſt growth of Men; For I had thought Giants had been Giants in all Parts of the World. Suppoſe ſome Learned Men have queſtion'd, Whether there were ſuch a Perſon as Brute; I ſhould think it no more Hereſie, than to call in queſtion, Whether there were ſuch Perſons as Ciocal, Bartholanus, Briotan or Gaithelos; If the ſilence of good Authors, the diſtance of Time, and want of ancient Annals complained of, makes the Hiſtory of Brutus ſo hard to be believed, I only deſire that theſe Iriſh Traditions may be examined by the ſame Rules, and then, I believe, the Iriſh Antiquities will be reduced to the ſame Form with the Britiſh; Only Geoffrey had not ſo lucky an Invention, as to have his Hiſtory confirm'd by Parliament. For, if he had but thought of it, he could have made as general an Aſſembly of the Eſtates at Lud's Town, and as ſelect a Committee of Nine, as ever was at Tarach. But all Mens Inventions do not lie the ſame way; And in this, I confeſs, Keting or his Authors have very much exceeded Geoffrey and his Britiſh MS. And upon the whole matter I cannot ſee that the Iriſh Chronologers and Hiſtorians have ſo much more probability in their Story of Briotan than the Britiſh Writers had in the Tradition of Brute. For it is certain, it was not originally the Invention of Geoffrey, only he might uſe ſome art in ſetting it off, as he thought, with greater advantage than the Britains had done before him.

But ſtill we are referr'd to the Authority of the Iriſh Monuments in the Pſalter of Caſhel written 800 years ſince by the holy Cormach, both King and

and Biſhop of Munſter. Let us then, for once, examine one part of the Hiſtory taken from thence, and then leave the Reader to judge, whether it deſerves ſo much more Credit than the Britiſh Antiquities; And that ſhall be concerning the Kingdom of the Picts, becauſe we are told, (q) This is the way to end the vexatious Queſtions about them, being taken out of the moſt authentick Records of Ireland, which are of ſuch irrefragable Authority, That ſome are perſuaded, had they been known to Camden, he would never have diſputed the matter. And ſo I think too. But this irrefragable Authority is that of the Pſalter of Caſhel; From whence we are inſtructed in theſe Particulars: (1.) That the Picts ſerved in Thracia, under one Polycornus, a King of that Country; where their General Gud took away the King's Life, to prevent an Attempt on his Daughter. And did not Brutus ſerve King Pandraſus with his Army not far off in Greece? And methinks Pandraſus is as good a Name for a King of Greece as Polycornus for the King of Thrace. But where are either of them to be met with elſewhere? (2.) That upon this the General and his Army fled the Country, roamed up and down at Sea till they came to Gaul, and there they founded the City of Pictavia. This is juſt Geoffrey. For Brutus came to Gaul too, and there fought with Groffarius, King of the Picts, and founded the City of Tours, which had its Name from Turonus, Brutus his Nephew. (3.) That upon the ſame Occaſion they were forced to leave Gaul, and to go for Ireland, (as Brutus did for Albion) where they were entertained, to fight with the Britains; Who it ſeems made very early Invaſions upon Ireland, which ſtill agrees with Geoffrey's Hiſtory. (4.) The Story of the Advice of Troſdan, the Pictiſh Magician, for the Iriſh Army to bath in the Milk of 150 White, Crumple-horned Cows, as an effectual Antidote againſt the envenom'd Arrows of the Britains, and the ſtrange Succeſs upon it, is hardly to be matched in Geoffrey. (5.) That the Picts, growing inſolent, were forced by Herimon to retire to the Northern Parts of Britain, Only with three Iriſh Women, whatever Bede ſaith of more; or, how differently ſoever he relates the whole Story of the Picts; For what is Bede's, a poor Monk's Authority, to King Cormach's? (6.) That from Cathluan, Son to Gud, there was a conſtant Succeſſion of Kings of the Picts in that Country. But not more exact than the Succeſſion of Britiſh Kings from King Brutus. And now I leave the Reader to judge whether Geoffrey be not hardly dealt with, when ſuch Authors are prefer'd ſo much before him. We now return to the farther Account which the Iriſh Antiquaries give of their own Antiquities.

Sruth, and then being forced thence, they landed in Creet, where he died. And his Eldeſt Son Eibhir Scot went into Scythia; where one of his Deſcendents killed Refloir, the King of that Country, and was forced with his Company to the Caſpian Sea, and landed in an Iſland there (juſt like Geoffrey's Largecia, where Brutus landed.) But they went from thence to Caronia, another Iſland in the Pontick, and from thence to the North end of the Riphean Mountains; (a pretty kind of Compaſs!) And here, inſtead of Diana's Oracle to Brutus, an old Druyd told them, they ſhould never fix till they came to the Weſtern Iſland, and ſo they removed to Gothia, and in the eighth Generation, they went to Spain. And doth not this exceed the Story of Brute, in the great Probability of it, which their lateſt (r) Antiquary knows not what to make of? It is certain whoever invented it, deſigned to go beyond the Author of the former. But this is not all; For we are told farther from the ſame Authentick Iriſh Annals (3.) That Calamb (called Milead Eſpain or Mileſius the Spaniard) great Grandchild to Bratha, who brought them into Spain, went back into Scythia: and there ſerved as General under Refloir, King of the Scythians; From whence, upon Suſpicions, he fled into Egypt, and there married Pharaoh's Daughter called Scota; And at laſt returned to Spain, and there founded Braganza: And here the Scotiſh Antiquities fall in. But is it not a little improbable to have the ſame Scene acted twice over? Two Gaodel's, two Refloir's, two Scota's, twice paſſing to and fro after much the ſame manner? We may well ſay, as our Author doth, enough of theſe profound remote Antiquities. For I ſhall not need now to add any thing about the eight Sons of this Mileſius coming to Ireland; And how the reſt being killed, the Country was divided between Eibhir and Erimthon; and the former being killed, the latter became the firſt Monarch of Ireland, from whom deſcended 181 Monarchs of this Mileſian Race: which muſt depend on the Credit of their Annals, of which I have already ſpoken.

But, in ſhort, to give the true Account of theſe Fabulous Antiquities. We are then to conſider, That when the Northern Nations began to have ſome ſmattering of the Greek and Roman Learning, they were never ſatisfied, till by one means or other, they could deduce their Original from ſome of the Nations moſt celebrated in ancient Books; Such were the Trojans, the Greeks and the Egyptians. As to the Trojans, the Romans themſelves had ſhewed the Way to other Nations. For there are conſiderable Arguments to prove that neither Æneas, nor Aſcanius, ever came into Italy; as may be ſeen in (s) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, (t) Strabo and Feſtus, in the Word Roma. Hellanicus, in Dionyſius, ſaith, That Aſcanius (from whom Brutus is derived) never left Phrygia; But only withdrew for a time to Daſcylites, near the Lake (from him called the Aſcanian) and afterwards returned to Troy. Strabo ſaith, That Aſcanius reigned at Scepſis, near the Ruins of Troy, and that his Poſterity continued there a long time after, with a Royal Title. Feſtus ſhews, that the old Authors were not agreed where Æneas was buried; Many were of Opinion, that he lay buried in the City Berecinthia. And ſome in Dionyſius ſay, he died in Thrace, others in Arcadia. But the Romans making it ſo great a part of their Glory to be deſcended from the Trojans; Other Nations of Europe, upon the Diſſolution of the Roman Empire, would not ſeem to come behind them in this. So (u) Hunibaldus gives as formal an Account of the deſcent of the Franks from Antenor, and as good a Succeſſion of their Kings down from him; with the particular Names of Perſons, and the time of their Reigns, as either Geoffrey doth of the Britiſh Kings from Brutus; or Hector of the Scots from Fergus; or the Iriſh Annals from Gaithelos or Herimon. And that this is no late Invention appears from hence; That Aimoinus, Ado Viennenſis, Abbas Urſpergenſis, Rorico, Gaguinus, Æneas Silvius, and others, agree with Hunibaldus in the Subſtance of his Story. And (w) Vignier mentions ſeveral Diplomata of the ancient Kings of the Franks, to prove the Authentickneſs of this Tradition. And it is leſs to be wonder'd at, that the Britains ſhould pretend to be derived from the Trojans becauſe of the mixture of the Romans and them together, while Britain continued ſo long a Roman Province. From whence I ſuppoſe the firſt Occaſion was taken, which continued as a Tradition among the Britains for a long time before it was brought into ſuch a Hiſtory as we find in Geoffrey. That the Tradition it ſelf was elder than his time is certain; For even thoſe who deſpiſed Geoffrey embraced it, as appears by (x) Giraldus Cambrenſis; And in the Saxon times this Tradition was known, as is evident by the Saxon Poet, mention'd by (y) Abr. Whelock; But Nennius his MS. puts it out of diſpute, That there was then a Tradition about the Britains coming from Brute; but he could not tell what to make of this Brute; ſometimes he was Brito the Son of Yſicion, the Son of Alan, of the Poſterity of Japhet: And for this he quotes the (z) Tradition of his Anceſtors; But this being uncapable of much Improvement or Evidence, he then runs to Brutus the Roman; and ſometimes it is Brutus the Conſul; But that, not ſuiting ſo well, he then produces the Story of Æneas, and Aſcanius, and Silvius, and the Prediction of the Magician, that his Son ſhould kill his Father and Mother; ſhe died in Labour, and his Father was killed by him by chance; However he was baniſhed from Italy into Greece; and from thence again baniſhed, and ſo came into Gaul, and there built Tours, having its Name from one of his Companions; And from thence he came for Britain, which took its Name from him, and he filled it with his Progeny, which continue to this day. So that here we have the Foundation of Geoffrey's Hiſtory laid long before his time; And Nennius his Account is mention'd by (a) William of Malmesbury, under the Name of Geſta Britonum; And follow'd by Henry of Huntingdon, and Turgott, or Simeon Dunelmenſis; But when Geoffrey's Book came abroad, it was ſo improved and adorned with Particulars, not elſewhere to be found, that the generality of the Monkiſh Hiſtorians, not only follow'd, but admir'd it, and pitied thoſe that not had ſeen it, (as they ſuppoſed) as (b) Ranulphus Ceſtrenſis doth William of Malmesbury; But there were ſome Croſs grained Writers who called it an Impoſture as Gul. Newburgenſis; or a Poetical Figment, as John Whethamſted. But theſe were but few in Compariſon with thoſe who were better pleaſed with the Particulars of a Legend than the dryneſs of a true Hiſtory.

But this humour was not peculiar to the Franks and Britains; For the Saxons derived (c) themſelves from the Macedonian Army of Alexander, which had three Captains ſaith (d) Suffridus Petrus Saxo, Friſo and Bruno; from whom are deſcended the Saxons, Friſians and thoſe of Brunſwick. And (e) Abbas Stadenſis adds, That not only the Saxons, but thoſe of Pruſia, Rugia and Holſtein came from them. (f) Gobelinus Perſona relates the Particulars as exactly as Geoffrey, or Hector, or the Iriſh Annals do; how they were left on the Caſpian Mountains, and wandred up and down juſt as Brutus and Gaithelos did, till they ſettled in Pruſſia, Rugen and Saxony. The Danes, ſaith (g) Dudo S. Quintin derived themſelves from the Danai; The (h) Pruſſians from Pruſias, King of Bithynia, who brought the Greeks along with him. Only the Scots and Iriſh had the Wit to derive themſelves from the Greeks and Egyptians together.

We are now to ſit down and conſider, what is to be ſaid to all theſe glorious Pretences? Muſt they be all allowed for good and true Hiſtory? If not, what marks of diſtinction can we ſet between them? They all pretend to ſuch Founders as came afar off, wandred from place to place, conſulted Oracles, built Cities, founded Kingdoms, and drew their Succeſſion from many Ages; So that it ſeems unreaſonable to allow none but our own. And yet theſe Antiquities will hardly paſs any where, but with their own Nation; And hardly with thoſe of any Judgment in any of them. But when all this is ſaid, every one will believe as he pleaſes; But it is one thing to believe with the Will, and another with the Underſtanding.

To return now to the Iriſh Antiquities. And it only remains that we enquire, How the Iriſh Antiquaries give an Account of their Nations coming into the Northern Parts of Britain: And here is ſomething which deſerves Conſideration, viz. That they (i) charge the Scotiſh Antiquaries with placing the time of Fergus I. 819 years before he landed in Britain. For, ſay they, the Iriſh Monuments fix on An. Dom. 498. as the time wherein Fergus Mor the Son of Erch (whom the Scotiſh Writers call the Son of Ferchard) with his five Brothers invaded the North of Britain. To this purpoſe they produce the Teſtimony of Tigernacus, who in his Annals ſaith, Fergus Mor mhac Ercha cum gente Dalraida partem Britanniæ tenuit, & ibi mortuus eſt. This he writes about the beginning of Pope Symmachus, which was about ſix years after the death of St. Patrick, and very near the end of the fifth Century. Beſides another Iriſh Author who writes of the Kings of Albany who were contemporary with the Monarchs of Ireland, reckons twenty years between the Battel of Ocha, and the going of the ſix Sons of Erc into Albany: And the Annals of Vlſter place the Battel of Ocha An. Dom. 483. ſo that Fergus his coming into Scotland could not be before the beginning of the ſixth Century. (k) Gratianus Lucius ſaith, that the Battel of Ocha, wherein Oliol Molt, the Iriſh Monarch, who ſucceeded Leogarius was killed, was An. Dom. 478. Which makes but five years difference. Farther, ſay they, The Scotiſh Antiquaries make Reuda the ſixth King after Fergus. Whereas it appears by their Annals, (l) That their Monarch Conair had three Sons, called the three Cairbres, and the third (m) was Cairbre Riada; from whom that part of Britain was called Dal Riada, or Dal Reuda; But Conair was killed An. Dom. 165. and therefore this (n) Reuda muſt be 300 years before Fergus. The Old MS. cited by (o) Camden, makes Fergus to be deſcended from Conair, with which as (p) Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves the old Iriſh Genealogies agree: But he ſaith, Conair reign'd An. Dom. 215. however, long enough before the time of Fergus. According to this ſuppoſition, that part of Scotland called Dalrieta, or Dalreuda, (the bounds whereof are deſcribed by the Learned Primate) was inhabited long before the coming of Fergus; and ſo agrees with what (q) Bede ſaith, That the Scots came firſt out of Ireland under the conduct of Reuda, and either by force or Friendſhip found habitations for themſelves there, which they ſtill enjoy'd, and from their Leader to this time they were called Dal-

reudini; Daal ſignifyng a ſhare in their Language. This Reuda ſeems to be the ſame with Cairbre Riada, the third Son of Conair; And if Fergus were deſcended from the ſame Conair, it gives a probable Account of Fergus his coming afterwards into thoſe Parts; and taking the Government upon him. For (r) Keting ſaith, That Eochac Mumreamhar of the Progeny of Cairbre Redhfadac or Riada had two Sons, Earcha and Elchon; And from the former the Families of Dal Riada in Scotland are deſcended; from the latter thoſe of Dal Riada in Ulſter. Which muſt be underſtood of that part of the Ulſter Dal-riadans, which Fergus carried with him: For there were the Deſcendents from Riada in Scotland before, according to the former account. But the whole matter about the Reign of Fergus remains ſtill very obſcure. For (1.) It ſeems ſtrange that Bede takes no notice at all of him, which in all probability he would have done, as well as of Reuda, who was leſs conſiderable. (2.) (s) Jocelin in the Life of St. Patrick ſaith, That Fergus was one of the twelve Sons of the King of Dalredia, and was excluded from his ſhare by his Brethren, of whom St. Patrick propheſied, That from him Kings ſhould riſe, who ſhould not only Reign at home, but in a foreign Countrey; After which, ſaith he, Fergus in no long time came to be King in his own Countrey; And from him ſprang Eanus, who ſubdued Albany, and other Iſlands, and whoſe Poſterity ſtill reigns there; So that if Jocelin's Authority be good, Fergus himſelf never came into Scotland; But the miſtake aroſe, becauſe he was King in Dalrieda; Which the Scots underſtood of their own, and thought they had Reaſon, becauſe the Poſterity of Fergus reigned there. (3.) (t) Giraldus Cambrenſis, who had a Sight of the Iriſh Annals, never mentions Fergus, but only ſaith, That in the time of Nellus the Monarch of Ireland, ſix Sons of Mured King of Ulſter ſailed into the Northern Parts of Britain, and there planted themſelves, from whom the Scotiſh Nation is derived. This Nellus, whom the Iriſh call Niall the Great, was killed, ſaith Gratianus Lucius, Anno Dom. 403. And if the Sons of the King of Ulſter came then over to plant and ſettle in Scotland, this muſt be 100 Years before the time of Fergus; and conſequently he could be none of that Number: And yet the (u) Iriſh Annaliſts make the two Fergus's, the two Ængus's, and the two Loarns, to be the ſix Sons of Muriedhach, King of Ulſter, who came over to ſettle in Scotland. But if Giraldus his Authority be allow'd, the Scots came not to ſettle in Britain, till the beginning of the fifth Century; And the Monarchy in the Poſterity of Fergus, according to Jocelin, could not be till towards the middle of the ſixth Century. And if Edan, King of the Scots in Bede's Hiſtory, be the ſame with that Edan in Jocelin, who deſcended from Fergus, Then the Scotiſh Kingdom did not begin till the ſeventh Century, as appears by (w) Bede. But in matters of ſo much Obſcurity I determine nothing.

But it is but Juſtice to conſider on the other ſide, what the Scotiſh Antiquaries do now plead for themſelves, to prove that they inhabited Scotland long before this time.

Firſt, They ſay, (x) Bede mentions them as ancient Inhabitants of this Iſland before the coming of the Romans; and deſcribes the Wars between the Picts, Scots and Britains before that of the Romans. It is very true, that Bede, in the beginning of his Hiſtory, doth ſet down the ſeveral Nations which inhabited Britain, and he names five, Engliſh, Britains, Scots, Picts and Romans. And among theſe he reckons the Britains firſt,

But when all this is ſaid, every one will believe as he pleaſes; But it is one thing to believe with the Will, and another with the Underſtanding.

To return now to the Iriſh Antiquities. And it only remains that we enquire, How the Iriſh Antiquaries give an Account of their Nations coming into the Northern Parts of Britain: And here is ſomething which deſerves Conſideration, viz. That they (i) charge the Scotiſh Antiquaries with placing the time of Fergus I. 819 years before he landed in Britain. For, ſay they, the Iriſh Monuments fix on An. Dom. 498. as the time wherein Fergus Mor the Son of Erch (whom the Scotiſh Writers call the Son of Ferchard) with his five Brothers invaded the North of Britain. To this purpoſe they produce the Teſtimony of Tigernacus, who in his Annals ſaith, Fergus Mor mhac Ercha cum gente Dalraida partem Britanniæ tenuit, & ibi mortuus eſt. This he writes about the beginning of Pope Symmachus, which was about ſix years after the death of St. Patrick, and very near the end of the fifth Century. Beſides another Iriſh Author who writes of the Kings of Albany who were contemporary with the Monarchs of Ireland, reckons twenty years between the Battel of Ocha, and the going of the ſix Sons of Erc into Albany: And the Annals of Ulſter place the Battel of Ocha An. Dom. 483. ſo that Fergus his coming into Scotland could not be before the beginning of the ſixth Century. (k) Gratianus Lucius ſaith, that the Battel of Ocha, wherein Olliol Molt, the Iriſh Monarch, who ſucceeded Leogarius was killed, was An. Dom. 478. Which makes but five years difference. Farther, ſay they, The Scotiſh Antiquaries make Reuda the ſixth King after Fergus. Whereas it appears by their Annals, (l) That their Monarch Conair had three Sons, called the three Cairbres, and the third (m) was Cairbre Riada; from whom that part of Britain was called Dal Riada, or Dal Reuda; But Conair was killed An. Dom. 165. and therefore this (n) Reuda muſt be 300 years before Fergus. The Old MS. cited by (o) Camden, makes Fergus to be deſcended from Conair, with which as (p) Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves the old Iriſh Genealogies agree: But he ſaith, Conair reign'd An. Dom. 215. however, long enough before the time of Fergus. According to this ſuppoſition, that part of Scotland called Dalrieta, or Dalreuda, (the bounds whereof are deſcribed by the Learned Primate) was inhabited long before the coming of Fergus; and ſo agrees with what (q) Bede ſaith, That the Scots came firſt out of Ireland under the conduct of Reuda, and either by force or Friendſhip found habitations for themſelves there, which they ſtill enjoy'd, and from their Leader to this time they were called Dal-

reudini; Daal ſignifyng a ſhare in their Language. This Reuda ſeems to be the ſame with Cairbre Riada, the third Son of Conair; And if Fergus were deſcended from the ſame Conair, it gives a probable Account of Fergus his coming afterwards into thoſe Parts; and taking the Government upon him. For (r) Keting ſaith, That Eochac Mumreamhar of the Progeny of Cairbre Redhſadac or Riada had two Sons, Earcha and Elchon; And from the former the Families of Dal Riada in Scotland are deſcended; from the latter thoſe of Dal Riada in Ulſter. Which muſt be underſtood of that part of the Ulſter Dal-riadans, which Fergus carried with him: For there were the Deſcendents from Riada in Scotland before, according to the former account. But the whole matter about the Reign of Fergus remains ſtill very obſcure. For (1.) It ſeems ſtrange that Bede takes no notice at all of him, which in all probability he would have done, as well as of Reuda, who was leſs conſiderable. (2.) (s) Jocelin in the Life of St. Patrick ſaith, That Fergus was one of the twelve Sons of the King of Dalredia, and was excluded from his ſhare by his Brethren, of whom St. Patrick propheſied, That from him Kings ſhould riſe, who ſhould not only Reign at home, but in a foreign Countrey; After which, ſaith he, Fergus in no long time came to be King in his own Countrey; And from him ſprang Eanus, who ſubdued Albany, and other Iſlands, and whoſe Poſterity ſtill reigns there; So that if Jocelin's Authority be good, Fergus himſelf never came into Scotland; But the miſtake aroſe, becauſe he was King in Dalrieda; Which the Scots underſtood of their own, and thought they had Reaſon, becauſe the Poſterity of Fergus reigned there. (3.) (t) Giraldus Cambrenſis, who had a Sight of the Iriſh Annals, never mentions Fergus, but only ſaith, That in the time of Nellus the Monarch of Ireland, ſix Sons of Mured King of Ulſter ſailed into the Northern Parts of Britain, and there planted themſelves, from whom the Scotiſh Nation is derived. This Nellus, whom the Iriſh call Niall the Great, was killed, ſaith Gratianus Lucius, Anno Dom. 403. And if the Sons of the King of Ulſter came then over to plant and ſettle in Scotland, this muſt be 160 Years before the time of Fergus; and conſequently he could be none of that Number: And yet the (u) Iriſh Annaliſts make the two Fergus's, the two Ængus's, and the two Loarns, to be the ſix Sons of Muriedhach, King of Ulſter, who came over to ſettle in Scotland. But if Giraldus his Authority be allow'd, the Scots came not to ſettle in Britain, till the beginning of the fifth Century; And the Monarchy in the Poſterity of Fergus, according to Jocelin, could not be till towards the middle of the ſixth Century. And if Edan, King of the Scots in Bede's Hiſtory, be the ſame with that Edan in Jocelin, who deſcended from Fergus, Then the Scotiſh Kingdom did not begin till the ſeventh Century, as appears by (w) Bede. But in matters of ſo much Obſcurity I determine nothing.

But it is but Juſtice to conſider on the other ſide, what the Scotiſh Antiquaries do now plead for themſelves, to prove that they inhabited Scotland long before this time.

Firſt, They ſay, (x) Bede mentions them as ancient Inhabitants of this Iſland before the coming of the Romans; and deſcribes the Wars between the Picts, Scots and Britains before that of the Romans. It is very true, that Bede, in the beginning of his Hiſtory, doth ſet down the ſeveral Nations which inhabited Britain, and he names five, Engliſh, Britains, Scots, Picts and Romans. And among theſe he reckons the Britains firſt, then the Picts, after them the Scots from Ireland under Reuda; and then adds, That Ireland was the true Countrey of the Scots, who coming hither made a third Nation in Britain, beſides the Britains and Picts, and landed on the North Part of the Frith, towards Ireland, and there ſetled themſelves. But Bede ſaith nothing at all of the time when the Scots came firſt from Ireland, and it is of no force, that he reckons them here before the War with the Romans; for, ſo he doth the Engliſh as well as the Scots: His buſineſs being to give an Account of the preſent Inhabitants, and not merely of the Ancient. Hæc in præſenti 5 Gentium linguis, &c. But where doth Bede ſay, that the Scots were in Britain before the Romans coming hither? I cannot find ſo much as an Intimation that way, unleſs it be in the Title of the Chapter, Of the Situation of Britain and Ireland, and their ancient Inhabitants. And doth not Bede ſpeak of the Britains as the ancient Inhabitants of this Iſland and the Scots of Ireland? But if all mention'd muſt be ancient Inhabitants, then ſo muſt the Engliſh and Romans be, as well as the Picts and Scots.

(y) *L.*1.*c.*5. Well! But doth not (y) Bede afterwards ſay, That Severus his Wall was built againſt the unconquer'd Nations beyond it? I grant it, if he had ſaid, the Scots and Picts beyond it, the Controverſie had been ended. But doth not Dio explain Bede, who expreſly tells us, theſe Nations were the Mæatæ and the Caledonii? Why not the Picts and the Scots if then in Britain? The latter Roman Writers never forbear calling them by their own Names, when they knew them to be here; as appears by Eumenius, Claudian and Ammianus Marcellinus: but to ſay the Scots were called Mæatæ, becauſe they came from the Palus Mæotis, will hardly go down in this Age. However it is confidently affirmed, the Caledonii were the Scots. Let this one thing be well proved, and I will yield the Scots were in Britain long before Severus his time; for Tacitus mentions the Caledonians. But it is to no more purpoſe to quote modern Writers, who call the Caledonians Scots, than Lipſius his calling Galgacus a Scotiſh King: for we are not bound to follow any modern Writers in their Improprieties. There is no Queſtion the Caledonians were known to Flaccus and Martial (who certainly lived not in Auguſtus his time, unleſs that Name be very improperly given by it ſelf to Domitian or Trajan.) But do any of theſe Roman Authors ever tell us the Caledonians were Scots? If not, to what end are the Caledonians ſo much ſpoken of? As far as we can find by Tacitus, or Dio, or any others, they were the Northern Britains. And if Tacitus had known that they came out of Ireland, and were a diſtinct Nation, he was ſo diligent and judicious a Writer, he would never have omitted the ſetting it down, when he gives ſo punctual an account of the Original of the ſeveral ſorts of Britains, according to his beſt Judgment and Information; and none could have better; relating ſome things concerning Ireland, from Agricola's own Mouth, who was then the Roman General againſt the Caledonians. And he ſaith, Agricola had one of the Kings of Ireland with him. Suppoſe we then the Caledonians to have been Scots come out of Ireland; Is it poſſible, that an Iriſh King ſhould not be able to inform Agricola who theſe Caledonians were? Or, if Tacitus had known any ſuch thing, would he have ſaid, the Caledonians, by the habit of their Bodies ſeemed to be of German Extraction, when he derives the Silures from Spain? Had it not been as eaſie for him to have derived the Caledonians from Spain through Ireland, if any ſuch thing had been heard by him, as that the Caledonians were of Ireland, and came firſt out of Spain thither? But nothing can be more plain than that Tacitus took the Caledonians for Britains, and ſo doth Galgacus, in his excellent Speech, wherein he calls them, the Nobleſt of the Britains, and excites them to recover the Liberty of the Britains; and tells them, they fought the ſame Cauſe with the other Britains; and now they were to ſhew what ſort of Men Caledonia had reſerved for their common defence. Was Tacitus ſo inconſiderate a Writer to put ſuch Words into Galgacus his Mouth, if he knew or ſuſpected the Caledonians to be no Britains, but a different Nation come out of Ireland in the time that Alexander took Babylon? Had Tacitus known any thing of this, he would never have concealed it, when he values himſelf upon his Integrity, in relating what he could find about the Affairs of Britain. And therefore Tacitus his Judgment in this matter is to be much preferr'd before Scaliger's Criticiſm about the Scoto-brigantes, or the Scoticæ pruinæ in Spartian's Poet; or any ſuch uncertain Conjectures. And yet the Scoto-brigantes might be Iriſh; where both Scoti and Brigantes were, and ſo it proves nothing, as to Britain; for Claudius conquer'd Ireland as much as Scotland.

But it is more plauſibly urged, That (z) Bede ſpeaking of the Scots being a tranſmarine Nation, he explains himſelf by ſaying, that he means not that they were out of Britain, but beyond the two Friths; therefore the Scots then inhabited Britain. This was but a neceſſary Explication, for Bede, who uſed theſe Words, after he had confeſſed before, that the Scots under Reuda did ſettle in Britain. Therefore when he uſed Gildas his Words, he thought it neceſſary to reconcile them with his own; and ſo declares that he uſed tranſmarine now in another ſenſe. Juſt as if a Scotiſh Writer in Bede's time had ſpoken of the tranſmarine Saxons, uſing the Words of an Author who lived before their coming into Britain; and then ſhould explain himſelf, That he did not mean the German Saxons, but thoſe who lived in Britain, beyond the two Friths; would this prove, that the Saxons lived here before Cæſar's time? And if this be an Argument clear to a Demonſtration, ſome Mens Demonſtrations will hardly amount to the ſtrength of a probable Argument. And I am apt to fear no Mens way of reaſoning more than thoſe who talk moſt of Demonſtrations.

What if St. Jerome mentions the Scoti from Porphyry, and the Attacotti as a Britiſh Nation, what doth this prove as to the Scots inhabiting Britain ſo long agon? Could there be no Scots but in Britain, when it is confeſſed they came originally out of Ireland? Sidonius Apollinaris doth mention the Scots and Picts, in his Panegyrick to (s) Anthemius; but what then? who denies that the Scots and Picts did then fight and were beaten in Britain? But could not they be beaten here then unleſs they came into Britain by Julius Cæſar? Is this clear to a Demonſtration? But it is obſervable, that in the Verſe before he calls the Caledonians Britains even then.

Victricia Cæſar
Signa Caledonios tranſvexit ad uſque Britannos.
Fuderit & quamquam Scotum, & cum Saxone Pictum.

Where it is evident he diſtinguiſheth the Caledonian Britains from the Scots and Picts.

(z) L. 1. c. 12.

(s) Sidon. Carm. 7. v. 90.

But Claudian mentions the Scots as ſettled in Britain before his time. If it be granted, that falls very much ſhort of Alexander or Julius Cæſar's time; yet there appears no Demonſtration for it. His Words are,

(t) Claud. in 4. Conſul. Honorii, v. 33.

(t) Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Irene.

But there is a certain Place in Scotland called by that Name. I will not diſpute it, but are we ſure that Claudian knew it by that Name? Was that ſo conſiderable to be taken ſuch notice of by the Roman Writers? Was not Ireland then called Irene by him? And doth he not mention the Scots moving all Ierne?

(u) Totam cùm Scotus Iernen
Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Tethys?

(u) 1° Conſulat. Stilicon. l. 2. v. 251.

And is not this very Poetical, to ſay, He moved all a certain little Part of Scotland? From whence they might paſs beyond the Wall, without ſo much as touching the Ocean? Muſt theſe things paſs for Demonſtrations too?

I mention theſe Evidences, which the Weight of the Cauſe is laid upon, to ſhew how far theſe Antiquities are ſtill from being cleared, to the ſatisfaction of impartial Men. For I had no Luddus my Kinſman, no Buchanan my Enemy; I ſearch for nothing but Truth in ſuch Enquiries, it being as much to my ſatisfaction, that the Scots came into Britain in Alexander's time, as any time after, if it can be as well proved. But it doth not become the Ingenuity of Learned Men, when all judicious Perſons in the Nations about us have rejected their fabulous Antiquities, to adhere to them without producing better Proofs of them; and that with ſo much violence, as if the Intereſt of the Nation, and the Succeſſion of the Royal Family were concerned in them: Which hath far ſtronger Grounds to ſtand upon than the Authority of Hector Boethius, or the Race of Kings between the two Fergus's, or the certain time when the Scots came firſt into Britain.

Having thus far given an Account of the Antiquities relating to the Picts and Scots, the mortal Enemies of the Britains; I now come to purſue my main Deſign, which relates to the Antiquities of the Britiſh Churches, whoſe declining State and Condition I am now arrived at.

And the firſt Occaſion thereof was, the laying them open to the fury of their greateſt Enemies, the Picts and the Scots. It is impoſſible for us to ſet down the punctual time when the Scots and the Picts firſt join'd their Forces together to give diſturbance to the Britains, but it is clear that they did ſo towards the middle of the fourth Century. For (x) Ammianus Marcellinus, ſpeaking of the Incurſions they made in the time of Conſtantius, when Julian was Cæſar, Anno Dom. 360. he ſaith, That Julian being then at Paris, durſt not go over to the aſſiſtance of the Britains againſt the Scots and the Picts, as Conſtans had done before. Which Expedition of his happen'd Anno Dom. 343. after his Succeſs over the Franks, and he paſſed an Edict, ſtill exſtant in the (y) Theodoſian Code, when he was at Bologn, in his Paſſage, which bears date that Year; And a Coin of his is mention'd by (z) Du Cange and (a) Spanheim, wherein the Effigies of Conſtans is on one Side, and on the Reverſe, an armed Man on Shipboard, with the Image of Victory, and the Inſcription of Bononia Oceanen; being Coined on purpoſe to preſerve the Memory of this Paſſage. And upon his coming over, things were quieted here, but not long after, they began to make new Incurſions, within the Bounds of the Province, as is evident from the foregoing Paſſage of Ammianus Marcellinus, when Lupicinus was ſent over, who arrived at London, ſaith he, in the middle of Winter, to take Council how to proceed. In the time of Valentinian, the ſame Hiſtorian (b) ſaith, That there ſeem'd to be a general diſturbance through the whole Empire, by the barbarous Nations who lay near them; And, among the reſt, he mentions the Picts (whom ſome render Redſhanks) the Saxons, the Scots, and the Attacots, who were continually vexing and doing miſchief to the Britains, ſo that in a little time, the (c) Britains were reduced to a miſerable condition by a new Conſpiracy of the Barbarians, wherein Nectaridus the Comes Maritimi Tractûs, or Roman Admiral, and Fallofaudes, the General, were both killed. And then Valentinian ſent over Theodoſius, a famous Captain (Father to the firſt Emperor of that Name) with conſiderable Forces. For at that time, the Picts of both kinds, the Deucalidones and Vecturiones; the Attacotti; a fierce Nation, and the Scots, diſperſing themſelves up and down, did abundance of miſchief; But Theodoſius, leaving London, diſperſed his Forces likewiſe into ſeveral parts, who ſurprized the Enemies, and recover'd their Booty, which they reſtored to the Owners, only reſerving a ſmall ſhare for the Souldiers; And ſo in a ſhort time, he put the City out of its fears and difficulties, and entred it as it were in Triumph: And then took care to have good Officers placed here; Civilis for Adminiſtration of Juſtice; and Dulcitius for Military Affairs.

Who theſe Attacotti were, who joyn'd with the Picts and Scots, our Antiquaries are not agreed; But becauſe of their joining with the other, and yet being diſtinguiſhed from them, it ſeems moſt probable, that they were the Wild Britains; For (d) St. Hierome doth ſay, they were a Britiſh People. But what the Reaſon of the Name was, is not yet underſtood, and I doubt will not be, unleſs ſome happen to derive it from the Phœnician Language. What great miſchief had been done to the Britains, by this Combination of their Enemies, appears by the care taken by Theodoſius, after his beating them out of the Country, to reſtore the Cities and Garriſons, and to ſettle the Guards upon the Frontiers; which being done, That part of the Country which he recover'd from them, he obtained leave to have it named a New Province. And it was called Valentia, from the Emperor's Name. This was done An. Dom. 368. And the next year Theodoſius returned to the Emperor's Court. From that time we read no more of their Incurſions till Maximus, in the time of Gratian, Son to Valentinian, was ſet up by the Souldiery in Britain, to be Emperor. Then (e) Proſper, ſet out by Pithœus, ſaith, Maximus overcame the Picts and Scots, making new Incurſions. Which he thought he had done ſo effectually as to fear no diſturbance on that Side; And therefore took away from hence all the Flower both of the Roman and Britiſh Souldiery, to make good his Title againſt Gratian and Valentinian, and after, againſt Theodoſius; So that there was no poſſibility of their return, to ſecure the Frontiers from their Enemies. And this proved the fatal Blow to the Britains. For the Empire being ſo divided, and Maximus forced to keep his Army together, thoſe parts were left open to the Rage and Fury of their Mercileſs Enemies. And if the (f) Author of the Eulogium and Giraldus Cambrenſis may be believed, Gratian and Valentinian entred into a League with the Gothick Picts, and helped them with Shipping to convey them into the Northern parts of Britain, on purpoſe to withdraw Maximus his Army out of Gaul: Who coming thither in great Numbers, and finding the Country naked and without defence, ſettled themſelves in thoſe Parts. Not as though the Picts had not come hither before, but they never came over in ſo great Numbers and with ſo much Incouragement as they did now. And it ſeems not improbable, that Gratian and Valentinian ſhould at that time deal with the Gothick Nation to give a diverſion to Maximus. For (g) Zoſimus aſſigns that as one of the great Cauſes of Gratian's Ruine, that he ſeemed more fond of the barbarous Nations than of the Romans: And Maximus charged Valentinian, with making uſe of the Hunns and the Alani againſt him; Which is not denied by (h) St. Ambroſe, who was ſent by Valentinian on an Embaſſy to him. Theſe Hunni and Alani were, as is commonly ſaid, Inhabitants of Sarmatia Europæa near to the Palus Mæotis. The Alani did live upon the Tanais, ſaith (i) Hadrianus Valeſius; And the Hunni, ſaith he, were a Scythian People, between the Pontus and the Caſpian Sea, upon the Northern Parts of the Caucaſus, from whom the Abares, Turks and Hungarians are deſcended. But whoſoever obſerves (k) Ammianus Marcellinus his Deſcription of them, will find that the Hunni were the Aſiatick Tartars; and the Alani the European. The Hunni in the time of Valens paſſed over the Palus Mæotis in vaſt Numbers, and after, having killed many of the Alani, took the reſt into Confederacy with them, and having conquer'd the Goths in thoſe Parts inlarged their Power as far as the Danube: Where they lay ready to come into the Roman Empire on any Occaſion. And it is not to be wonder'd if Gratian ſhould employ Perſons into Scandinavia to draw out greater Forces from thence, thereby to make a Revulſion, as to Maximus his Deſigns in the Northern Parts of Britain. However this were, Gildas from this time dates the miſerable Condition of the Britains, as being in no Poſture to defend themſelves at Home. (l) Nennius ſaith, That Maximianus (as he calls him) carried all the Forces out of Britain, and killed Gratian the Emperor; And would not let the Britiſh Souldiers return to their Wives, Children or Poſſeſſions, but gave them another Country inſtead of it; In the Weſtern parts of Gaul, ſaith the Interpolator of Nennius. And theſe, ſaith Nennius, are the Aremorican Britains, who never after returned to their own Country. And from hence, he ſaith, Britain was ſeized upon by foreign Nations, and its own Natives were driven out; and would ſo contiue till God helped them. But the Britiſh Hiſtory, ſet forth by (m) Geoffrey, hath improved the Story in many Particulars. Firſt, It makes this Maximianus to marry the Daughter of Octavius, and ſo to come to the Kingdom of Britain; Then, it adds, That Conanus retired into Albany, and raiſed an Army, which was overthrown by Maximianus, who after five years paſſed into Gaul, and fought firſt againſt the Aremoricans, whoſe Country he gave to Conanus and his Britains; Who, reſolving not to marry any others than Britiſh Women, he ſent over Meſſengers to Dionotus, King of Cornwall, to whom Maximianus had committed the Government of Britain, to provide Wives for them; And ſent with Urſula his own Daughter Eleven thouſand of the better ſort, and of the common ſixty Thouſand. But theſe were unhappily, by Storms either ſunk or driven into thoſe Places, where Guanius, King of the Hunns, and Melga, King of the Picts, who were Confederates with Gratian, were joined with their Armies, who cruelly deſtroyed them. After which they came into Albany, where where they made havock of all Places they came near. Then Maximianus ſent Gratianus Municeps with two Legions who ſubdued the Hunns and Picts, and drove them into Ireland. Here we have many fabulous Particulars put together, but none comparable to the 71000 Virgins ſunk or deſtroyed by the Hunns. And yet Geoffrey's Relation of this Legend is magnified by (n) Baronius, and approved by (o) M. Velſerus, (p) Aub. Miræus, and (q) Ægid. Bucherius, as moſt agreeable to the Circumſtances of the time. Which is a thing to be wonder'd at; conſidering how little Foundation there is for any one Particular of Geoffrey's whole Relation, either as to Octavius, then King of Britain, or the marrying his Daughter to Maximus, or as to Conanus going firſt into Albany, and thence into Aremorica, or the ſettling of the Britiſh Souldiers there, at ſo buſie a time, when Maximus wanted all the Aſſiſtance he could get; or the ſending to Dionotus, or the ſending away ſuch a Number of Virgins at once, without any Fleet to conduct or ſecure their Paſſage. But (r) Browerus hath overthrown this Legend at once, by proving that Aremorica was not in the Britains Poſſeſſion till a good time after this; For, as he well obſerves, Maximus was kindly received in Gaul, and met with no conſiderable Oppoſition there, Gratian's own Souldiers revolting to him, and he paſſed on and ſettled himſelf at Triers, (then the Seat of this part of the Empire) as Gildas ſaith; And beſides, in the time of Aetius, the Aremorici enjoy'd their own Country (as he proves from Conſtantius his Life of St. German) about An. Dom. 434. After which time they ſtood up in their own defence, till they were reduced by Littorius, which he ſhews from Sidonius Apollinaris. And (s) Rutilius Claudius, in the beginning of the fifth Century, after Maximus his time, mentions the Aremorici, as ſtill enjoying their Country, where Exuperantius was then Governour. Saying, that after the Troubles by the Goths they had Poſtliminium Pacis; which evidently proves, they were not then kept out of Poſſeſſion.

Cujus Aremoricas Pater Exuperantius oras
Nunc Poſtliminium pacis amare docet.
Leges reſtituit libertatémque reducit,
Et Servos Famulis non ſinit eſſe ſuis.

And this was written after the Sacking of Rome by the Goths; So that there is no foundation for this Legend in the time of Maximus. Ægid. Bucherius, although he approves of Geoffrey, as to the time, and ſome other Circumſtances, yet he differs from him in others. For he goes upon theſe Grounds, that Maximus landed at the Mouth of the Rhine, as Zoſimus ſaith, That there they left the Multitude of Women and Virgins which follow'd the Army out of Britain; where the Hunns which Bauto ſent againſt Maximus fell upon them and deſtroy'd them. This is no ill-contrived Story; but very different from the Legend in Geoffrey, in all the conſiderable parts of it: And yet after all, Bucherius thinks fit to yield up his Faith to the old Legend, as it is defended by Bebius and Crombachius; and ſo it is taken off from the time of Maximus.

(t) Joh. Fordon, agrees with Geoffrey about Maximus his giving the Country of Aremorica to Conanus and his Britains, An. Dom. 386. but he is ſo far from mentioning the 71000 Virgins, That he ſuppoſes the Bri-

Britains of both ſexes to have ſettled there together. But he makes a more credible Relation of Conanus his going over to Aremorica, which is, That Maximus miſtruſted he might ſet up for himſelf in his Abſence, having the legal Title to Britain, and therefore he removed him and the Chief of the Britains, and ſettled them in thoſe Parts of Gaul. This is no improbable Story; but yet the Aremoricans enjoying their Country after this time, is an effectual Confutation of it.

After the death of Maximus, more Troubles following in the Roman Empire, the Picts and the Scots, ſaith (u) Fordon, negotiate a mutual Peace and ſtricter Alliance, in order, ſaith he, to the recovering their Country again. For Maximus had made uſe of the Picts to drive out the Scots, and then put Garriſons among the Picts to keep them under. And upon this Agreement, An. Dom. 403. in the ſixth of Arcadius and Honorius, Fergus the Son of Erk the Son of Ethadius the Brother of Eugenius, who was driven out by Maximus, came with his two Brothers (called there Loarii and Tenegus, in all probability Loarn and Ænegus, which were the Names, the Iriſh Annals give to the Brothers of Fergus, as is obſerved before) and great Supplies of Scots from the Iſlands of Ireland and Norwey, whither they were driven: And the Picts, to prevent all Suſpicion of Treachery ſurrendred up their Forts to Fergus. Who now became King of all Scotland, i. e. of that part which is beyond Drum Albain, as well as on this other, which, he ſaith, it doth not appear how he came to, whether by the Sword or by any other Right, none of his Predeceſſors having any Power there. (w) Bede ſaith, The Romans had the Right of Dominion to the remoteſt part of the Iſland: Which is not eaſie to make out, unleſs the Poſſeſſion and Conqueſt were better proved than appears by Bede's Hiſtory. For although he mentions Claudius his Conquering the Orcades; yet it is hard to prove it by any Roman Authors; And if the Poſſeſſion were after loſt for ſo long a time, it will be as hard to prove the Romans ſtill enjoy'd the Right of Dominion upon ſo ſlender a Title. But the Picts and Scots being thus united, their firſt Work, ſaith Fordon, was to drive out the Romans and Britains from their Country, and then to invade Britain, which was then left deſtitute of any defence: And ſo by their Incurſions they either killed the Common People, or made them Slaves.

c. 3.

Here Fordon tranſcribes Bede's twelfth Chapter of his firſt Book; the Foundation whereof he took out of Gildas, concerning the departure of the Britiſh Forces without returning; the Invaſion of the Scots and Picts; the Britains ſending an Addreſs to Rome for Aſſiſtance; a Roman Legion coming and driving out their Enemies; and perſuading the Britains to build a Wall for their own Security. But it is obſervable, that Bede varies from Gildas without Reaſon; for what Gildas ſpeaks of their departure with Maximus, he applies to the going of the Remainders of the Britiſh Forces under Conſtantinus and Conſtans, after Gratianus Municeps was killed in Britain, having uſurped the Empire here. But that Bede was herein miſtaken will beſt appear by digeſting the times wherein theſe things happen'd as well as we can.

(x) Zoſimus ſaith, That Honorius VII. and Theodoſius II. being Conſuls, viz. An. Dom. 407. (nineteen years after the death of Maximus, as (y) Archbiſhop Uſher obſerves, (z) Olympiodorus in Photius ſaith, the year before, Oroſius and Sozomen the year after, viz. the year when Arcadius died;) the Britiſh Souldiers in a Mutiny ſet up one Marcus to be

Emperor, as a Man of great Power in theſe Parts; But he, not anſwering their expectation, they ſoon took him off, and then ſet up Gratianus, (who was a Native of Britain, for ſo much (a) Oroſius his Words imply, when he ſaith, he was Municeps ejuſdem Inſulæ) and made him put on the Royal Purple and Crown, &c. but he not pleaſing them, after four Months they take away his Life. (b) Of him Nennius ſaith nothing; But he mentions one Severus between Maximus and Conſtantius, whom others omit; But (c) Geoffrey makes Gratianus to aſſume the Royal Authority as ſoon as he heard of the Death of Maximus; But he was ſo tyrannical, he ſaith, That the common People roſe up and killed him; and after his Death the Britains, according to him, ſent to Rome, to beg help againſt the Picts and Scots. But Zoſimus and Oroſius both ſay; That, upon the Death of Gratianus, they ſet up here Conſtantine, a mean Perſon, (for the good Omen of his Name, ſaith Oroſius) who immediately left Britain, and paſſed over into Gaul, where he gained the Army to him, and made his Son Conſtans Cæſar, and ſent him into Spain. Olympiodorus ſaith, That he ſent a Meſſage and Excuſe to Honorius, for aſſuming the Imperial Dignity, that he was forced to it by the Army; and that Honorius allow'd the Excuſe, and for a time admitted him into Partnerſhip with him. But Gerontius a Britain, one of the Generals, finding himſelf ſlighted by Conſtans made a Revolt among his Soldiers, and ſtirr'd up the barbarous Nations in Gaul againſt Conſtantine; Upon which occaſion, ſaith Zoſimus, The Britiſh Iſlands, and ſome of the Celtick Nations renounced the Roman Empire; And took up Arms to defend themſelves from the Incurſions of their Enemies: And Honorius by his Letters, gave them leave to take care of themſelves. Not long after Conſtans is killed by Gerontius, and Conſtantine, after the Siege of Arles, had his Head cut off by (d) Honorius his Order. But (e) Nennius, againſt the conſent of all the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, both Heathen and Chriſtian, ſaith, That this Conſtantine reigned 16 Years in Britain, and in the 17*th died at* York. However he falls much ſhort of (f) Geoffrey; for, he ſaith, That Conſtantine was Brother to Aldroenus, King of the Aremorican Britains, to whom Guithelin, Metropolitane of London, was ſent on an Embaſſy to accept the Government, which he put off to Conſtantine, who was choſen King at Silceſter, and had a Roman Wife of Guithelin's Education, by whom he had three Sons, Conſtans a Monk at Wincheſter, Aurelius Ambroſius, and Uther Pendragon, who were committed to Guithelin's Care. After Conſtantine's Death, who was killed by a Pict, there happen'd a great Conteſt about the Succeſſion; but by Vortigern's means Conſtans is taken from the Monaſtery, and ſet on the Throne at London; But Guithelin was now dead, and Vortigern put the Diadem on his Head, who governed all things, and ſoon got himſelf rid of him by a Guard of Picts he had placed about him, and ſo took the Government upon himſelf.

But I ſhall ſet aſide theſe Fictions or Traditions of Geoffrey and Nennius, and conſider now what Bede ſaith, He makes Gratianus Municeps to be ſet up two Years before the ſacking of Rome by Alaric, King of the Goths, which happen'd Anno Dom. 410. And he follows Oroſius, about Conſtantine and his Son Conſtans, without ever imagining their continuing to govern, and loſing their Lives in Britain: But then he applies the Paſſage in Gildas concerning the lamentable Condition of the Britains, and their help from the Romans, to the Times after the Death of Conſtantine; Whereas Gildas mentions both upon the Uſurpation of Maximus, and his withdrawing the Forces from hence; And therefore this firſt cruel Invaſion of the Picts and Scots, muſt be between the Death of Maximus, and the ſetting up of Gratianus Municeps: And then the Britains ſo earneſtly begging for Aſſiſtance, had Roman Governors and Forces ſent to their Relief. Some think that (g) Claudius Rutilius mentions Victorinus as a Roman Governor here at that time, but this is uncertain, when he there ſpeaks of the taking Tholouſe by the Goths, which was done by Ataulphus ſome time after the death of Alaric; And therefore could not be before the time of Gratian and Conſtantine; For Idatius ſaith, that this latter was killed before Ataulphus entred Narbon, which was before the taking of Tholouſe.

It is evident from many Paſſages in (h) Claudian, that Stilicho, took particular care of the Supplies of the Britains againſt the Scots and Picts: But Stilicho was killed by the Army when Baſſus and Philippus were Conſuls, Anno Dom. 408. before the firſt Siege of Rome by the Goths; And therefore the Roman Forces ſent by him were before the Uſurpation of Gratianus and Conſtantine: Stilicho being killed the ſame Year that theſe were ſet up in Britain, it is not poſſible he ſhould do it after their Death; And it ſeems not probable that any Supplies ſhould be ſent through Gaul while Conſtantine remained there, the Army through which they were to paſs in Gaul taking part with Conſtantine againſt Honorius. And withall Gildas ſaith, That the Roman Legion, having driven out the Picts and Scots, returned in Triumph to Rome: And ſo much is confeſſed by Bede. But at what time ſhould we ſuppoſe, after the Uſurpation of Conſtantine, that a Roman Legion ſhould return in ſo much Triumph? For after Conſtantine's Uſurpation the Roman Empire began to decline extremely in thoſe Parts through which they were to paſs: Gaul being upon Compoſition (i) delivered up to the Goths by Honorius, and the Franks and Burgundians making continual impreſſions there. I conclude it therefore moſt probable, that the firſt Supplies given to the Britains were not after Conſtantine's Uſurpation, but between the Death of Maximus, and the ſetting up of Gratianus Municeps.

The ſecond time the diſtreſſed Britains were forced to ſolicit the Romans for Supplies, is placed by (k) Archbiſhop Uſher, Anno Dom. 426. when Gallio Ravennas was ſent hither, as he ſuppoſes, becauſe the next Year Proſper, ſaith Gallio, was ſent againſt Bonifacius in Africa. But then he makes the firſt Supplies to have been in the latter end of Honorius; for which I can ſee no reaſon. For he grants, That after the Death of Maximus, the Scots and the Picts did waſte Britain; and that then Stilicho did ſend aſſiſtance to them. Why then ſhould the firſt waſting of the Countrey, ſpoken of by Gildas, and the Legion ſent upon it, be that in the latter end of Honorius, and not rather that in the beginning? For the latter end of Honorius his Reign was very perplexed and troubleſome. The Alani, Suevi and Vandali were in Spain; The Franks, Burgundians and Goths in Gaul; Jovinus and Sebaſtian there, after Conſtantine's death, uſurped the Empire; And although the Goths, going into Spain, did great Service againſt the other Barbarians, yet ſuch were the Straits of the Roman Empire in Gaul, That Conſtantius, who then managed the Affairs of the Empire, was forced to recall them, as both Proſper and Idatius ſay, Monaxius and Plinta being Conſuls (which was the twenty fourth of Honorius,) and to give them all that part in Gaul from the Garonne to the Ocean. The Year before Honorius his death, he was forced to ſend his Forces under Caſtinus into Spain, againſt the Vandals, as Proſper affirms; and that proved the Occaſion of new Troubles in Africa, by the difference between Caſtinus and Bonifacius, who, for his own Security, conveyed over the Vandals thither. It is not therefore very probable, that the firſt Supplies of the Britains ſhould be in the latter end of Honorius, eſpecially ſince the Learned Primate confeſſeth, that Honorius did not in his time recover the Province of Britain, and he proves it againſt Sabellicus from Procopius, Bede, the Saxon Annals and Ethelwerd. And the ſingle Teſtimony of Sigebert, That Honorius, at the ſame time, ſent aſſiſtance to the Britains, that he did to the Spaniards (when Proſper, Idatius and Caſſidore, who all mention the latter, ſay not a Word of the former) cannot weigh down the Reaſons on the other ſide.

But as to the ſecond Supplies which were ſent upon the mighty importunity of the Britains; They were in probability in the beginning of the Reign of Valentinian III. after that Aëtius had ſomewhat recover'd the Credit of the Roman Empire in Gaul: For after his Succeſs there, both againſt the Goths and Franks he had liberty enough to ſend over a Legion to the Aſſiſtance of the Britains, who were again miſerably haraſs'd by the Scots and Picts. And at this time it was that Gildas ſaith, The Romans, upon the ſad Repreſentations the Britiſh Embaſſadors made of their pitiful Condition, ſent them ſpeedy Supplies, who coming upon their Enemies on a ſudden, like a violent Torrent, drove them all before them, and made them repaſs the Seas: Which is an Argument, they did not then inhabit in Britain. But the Romans then plainly told the Britains. they were not at leiſure to bring over Legions as often as their Enemies invaded them: But they muſt train up their own People to Arms to defend themſelves and their Wives and Children againſt a ſort of Men no ways ſtronger than themſelves. And, to incourage them the more, they built a Wall of Stone from Sea to Sea, and Forts on the Shore, and exerciſed them in Arms, taking their leave of them, and telling them, they muſt expect their return no more. This is the Subſtance of Gildas his Relation, with whom Bede agrees; only inlarging the Deſcription of the Wall, which, he ſaith, was eight Foot in breadth and twelve in height, and that it ſtood where the Wall of Severus ſtood, being all made of Stone, and not of Turf as that unſerviceable Wall was, which the Britains had before without skill and direction built for themſelves.

It hath been much diſputed among our Learned Antiquaries where this laſt Wall ſtood, whether in the place where the former of Turf was raiſed by the Britains between the two Friths, or where Hadrian's Wall was firſt built, between the Tine and the Esk. Bede puts a great diſtance between theſe two Walls, and makes the former to have been between the two Friths, beginning at a Place called Peneltun, two Miles from Abercorney, and ending to the Weſt, near Alcluyd: Which, ſaith he, ſignifies a Rock in the River Cluyd. But the latter Wall was from Sea to Sea, in a direct Line, between the Cities there built for Security againſt Incurſions, and it ſtood in the Place of Severus his Wall. (l) Joh. Fordon diſtinguiſhes between the old Wall called Grimeſdike, from Grime, a Britain (whoſe Daughter Fergus married, and after his death, ruled over the Scots, during his Grand-child's Minority: and which Wall, he ſaith, this Grime overthrew, and ſo recovered the ancient Poſſeſſions due to him as deſcended from Fulgenius) and the other Wall built where Severus his ſtood: And he gives very different deſcriptions of them. The former

Wall, he ſaith, begins from the Eaſt, upon the South-ſide of the Scotiſh Shore, near a Village called Karedin, and then for twenty two Miles croſſes the Land, leaving Glaſgow on the South; and ends on the Bank of the River Clyd, near Kirk-patrick. The other, he ſaith, begins on the Eaſt in the Southern Bank of the Tyne to Gaitſheved, or Goats-head, where Severus, ſaith he, a long time before had made a Wall and a Trench over againſt New-caſtle; and ſo it is continued to the River Eſk, called Scotiſhwath, for ſixty Miles, and ends near Carliſle, on the Weſt. But (m) Buchanan contends, that Severus his Wall was where Graham's Dike, or Grimeſ-dike was, and at leaſt eighty Miles diſtant from Hadrian's Wall; which he proves from the Antiquities there found, and the ſquare Stones taken up; which do ſufficiently prove an ancient ſtone Wall to have been there, but not that of Severus: And the Roman Inſcriptions in (n) Camden mention Antoninus, and not Severus. Joh. (o) Major places Severus his Wall, as Fordon doth, between the Tine and the Eſk. But Archbiſhop (p) Uſher hath endeavoured to clear this matter, by yielding to Buchanan, that the Scotiſh Wall was made of Stone, viz. By the Romans under Gallio Ravennas, and by proving, that Bede was miſtaken as to Severus his Wall being made of Turf before, which was the Reaſon he thought it turned into Stone at this time; it being not likely, that the Romans would bring the Britains at leaſt eighty Miles back, and put them to defend a Wall ſo very much longer than the other; But I rather think Severus his Wall was now repaired, and a larger Scope allow'd for the Picts and Scots; As, beſides what hath been ſaid before, may appear by this one Argument from (q) Fordon. He ſaith, That when the Scots made a new Incurſion, they open'd Paſſages in the Wall, from whence it was called Thirle-wall, i. e. ſaith he, Murus perforatus. Now the Learned (r) Primate grants, that a Place called Thirle-wall ſtood on the Borders of Cumberland and Northumberland: And that Fordon ſaith, Thirle-wall was built by Severus on the Tyne. And therefore Bede ſeems to have been in the right as to Severus his Wall, but only miſtaken in thinking it was made of Turf before, which was built of Stone by Severus, and accounted one of the great Works of the Roman Empire, which was impoſſible to be built of Stone a-new by one Legion and the help of the Countrey; But might very well be repaired, and made defenſible againſt the Scots and Picts.

We might now think that the Britains were left by the Romans in a tolerable Condition to defend themſelves; But as ſoon as their old Enemies underſtood that their old Friends had forſaken them, they came upon them with a greater Force and Violence than ever. And the Spirits of the poor Britains were ſo broken by their former Miſeries, that they were not able to withſtand the Aſſaults of their Enemies: But they forſook their Wall and Forts, and fled as far as they could, and diſperſed themſelves, which made them an eaſie Prey to their barbarous Enemies, who now deſtroyed them in a more cruel manner than they had done before; And thoſe who eſcaped were driven from their Habitations, and hardly left in a Condition to ſubſiſt, having no Proviſion left, but what they did get by Hunting. This is the ſhort account of what Gildas more Tragically inlarges upon. And being thus reduced to the utmoſt Extremities, they reſolve once more to ſend to Aetius their laſt Groans; and to let him underſtand how unable they were to ſtand out againſt their Enemies, Seeing between them and the Sea they were either drowned or butchered. But all further Aſſiſtance was now denied them; Aëtius being then, as (s) Bede ſaith, deeply engaged in the War with Bleda and Attila, Kings of the Hunns. This Meſſage was ſent, ſaith Bede in the 23*d.* of Theodoſius, Aëtius being then third time Conſul with Symmachus. But Bleda, according to Proſper and Caſſiodore, was killed by Attila two years before Aëtius and Symmachus were Conſuls (but one year before according to Marcellinus) but the year following he makes the terrible Invaſion of Europe by Attila to be; And ſo Aëtius havingthen a Proſpect of that War, had juſt reaſon to deny Supplies to the Britains. And when Valentinian was VI. Conſul, the year before Aëtius and Symmachus, it appears by Valentinian's Letters to him, that he was then in Gaul, for then he directed the famous Conſtitution de Epiſcoporum Ordinatione to him there; wherein he interpoſes his Authority to ratifie Leo's Sentence againſt Hilary of Arles. But this is ſufficient to ſhew that the Britains Complaints were then ſent to Aëtius, and not to any Agitius or Æquitius, as ſome imagine. (t) Fordon ſaith, The Britains ſent to Agitius and Litorius; But Litorius ſome years before was beaten, and taken Priſoner by the Goths, as appears by the Faſti Conſulares both of Proſper and Caſſiodore, and (u) Paulus Diaconus out of them.

But the Miſeries of the Britains were ſtill increaſed by a Famine which then raged; which was not peculiar to Britain. (w) Bede ſaith, That there was then a Famine at Conſtantinople, and a great Plague which follow'd it, which conſumed abundance both of Men and Beaſts. Which he borrows from Marcellinus who makes both Famine and Plague to break out the very year Aëtius and Symmachus were Conſuls. Both theſe are mention'd by (x) Euagrius in the Eaſtern Parts, and therefore are not to be looked on as a peculiar Judgment on the Britains.

After this, as (y) Gildas and Bede tell us, finding their Caſe almoſt deſperate, the Britains were reſolved to ſell their Lives and Liberties as dear as they could, and by making a fierce Aſſault upon their Enemies, they began to get the better of them; Which they impute to their truſting rather to Divine Aſſiſtance than to the help of Men, which they too much relied upon before. The Britains, as appears afterward, did not want Courage, but Exerciſe in Arms; being kept under ſo long by the Romans, they durſt not ſo much as pretend to fighting, for fear of being deſtroyed; And now the Romans, when they had a mind, could not infuſe new Spirits into them; But their own Miſeries at laſt rouſed and awaken'd them to that degree, that they made their Enemies quiet for ſome time; And the Iriſh Robbers, ſaith Gildas, returned home, intending to return ſhortly: And the Picts in the fartheſt part of the Iſland lay ſtill, only ſometimes making Excurſions. This is a conſiderable paſſage in Gildas, which ſhews, that even then the Scots, whom he calls Iriſh Robbers, were not Inhabitants of any part of Britain. For he calls Ireland their home, as before he ſaid upon the Second Devaſtation (as the Margin of Jocelin's Gildas hath it) that they came in their Curroughs over the Scythian Vale, ſo he calls the Iriſh Sea; as Nennius calls the Scots, Scytæ. But if they had then inhabited in Britain, there had been no uſe of Curroughs to convey them over, and this had been their proper Home. (x) Fordon ſeems to have been aware of this Objection, and therefore ſaith, The Scots and Picts took the Iriſh in to their Aſſiſtance; But Gildas takes notice of no other Scots than thoſe that came out of Ireland, and returned back again. the Scots Aſſiſtance, and had their ſhares allow'd them in the conquer'd Lands. But he takes no notice of Gildas or Bede's ſaying, That thoſe very People who fought with the Britains returned home to Ireland; And the Picts were quiet in the utmoſt parts of the Iſland; where there is no mention of any third ſort of People called the Scots in Britain. But (z) Dempſter undertakes from this place of Gildas to prove, That the Scots and Iriſh were then diſtinguiſhed, becauſe Gildas, after he had mention'd the Scots and Picts, here names the Iriſh Robbers. It is true, that Gildas before doth mention the Scots and Picts; but in this Place he only ſpeaks of the Iriſh and the Picts, which is an Argument on the other ſide. For either the Scots had no ſhare in theſe laſt Incurſions, or they muſt be comprehended under the Name of Iriſh, having then no ſettled Habitations elſewhere but in Ireland. But there is one Paſſage in (a) Gildas which ſeems to imply that it was their Cuſtom to inhabit this Country, but Solito more being their uſed, and they being then ſuppoſed out of Britain, the word Inhabit can only imply making a longer ſtay here, as they were wont to do when they had Succeſs. For their coming is deſcribed, like that of the Bucaniers in the Weſt-Indies, and their Stay was as they liked their Entertainment.

From this time Gildas only mentions the Vices and the Fears, and another great Plague among the Britains, before he comes to that pernicious Counſel, as he calls it, for ſending for the Saxons by Vortigern.

But before I ſpeak of that, while we are upon this Head of the Britains being thus expoſed to their Enemies, it will be needful to enquire what that Legionary Aſſiſtance was which is mention'd in the Notitia Imperii, and at what time that was made; For if the Common Opinion be true, that it was made after the time of Honorius, then Britain could not have been left ſo deſtitute of Roman Aſſiſtance as Gildas and Bede ſay. For by that Notitia, here in Britain, under the Dux Britanniarum (who ſeems to have ſwallow'd up the Power of the Comes Britanniæ, whoſe bare Title is ſtill left in the Notitia) there was the Prefect of the ſixth Legion at York, of the Dalmatian Horſe at Præſidium, i. e. Warwick, probably firſt built in the time of Didius Gallus againſt the Silures, and ſo continued its Name after, as being a convenient Station to keep under the Provincial Britains; Of the Caſpian Horſe at Danum, (Doncaſter;) Of the Cataphractarii at Morbium, (Moresby in Cumberland;) and ſo of others, at Albeia (Jerby in the ſame County,) at Dictum (Diganwey in Carnarvanſhire,) at Concangii (Kendal in Weſtmoreland,) at Lavatræ (Bowes in Richmondſhire,) at Verteræ (Burgh in Weſtmoreland,) at Brovoniacum (Brongham in the ſame County,) at Maglona (Macleneth in Montgomery-ſhire,) at Magi (old Radnor,) at Longovicum (Lancheſter in the Biſhoprick of Durham,) at Derventio (Aldby in Yorkſhire;) And beſides theſe, there were many Cohorts diſpoſed per lineam Valli, along the Wall, as at Segedunum (Seton or Seghill in Northumberland,) Pons Ælii (Ponteland in the ſame County,) Condercum (Cheſter in the Street,) Vindobila (Walls-end,) Hunnum (Severſhale,) Cilurnum (Silcheſter in Muro,) Procolitia (Prudlow,) Borcovicus (Borwick,) Vindolana (Wincheſter,) Æſica (Netherby on the Esk in Cumberland,) Magna (Cheſter in the Wall,) Amboglana (Ambleſide in Weſtmoreland,) Petrianæ (old Perith in Cumberland,) Aballaba (Appleby in Weſtmoreland,) Congavata (near Caudebec in Cumberland,) Axellodunum (Hexam in Northumberland,) Gabroſentum (Gateſhead by Newcaſtle,) Tunnocelum (Tinmouth,) Glanoventa (a Place upon the Wensbeck, ſaith our Learned (b) Antiquary, (whoſe Judgment in the other I have follow'd) ſome Miles within the Wall;) Alione (upon the River Alne in Cumberland,) Brementuracum (Brampton in the ſame County,) Olenacum (Elenborough in the ſame,) Viroſidum (Warwick on the Eden.) Now if all the Military Forces lay here ſo near to the Wall, after the time of Honorius, how came the Britains to have been in ſuch diſtreſs? But we have no certainty when this Notitia was made. If it were, as Pancirol conjectures, in the latter end of Theodoſius the younger, about Anno Dom. 445. Then all theſe Roman Forces were certainly withdrawn; and any new Supplies denied by Aëtius in the 23th of Theodoſius; Therefore this Notitia muſt relate to the Roman Settlement here, before the time that Maximus carried over the Roman Legions, which never returned to that Station which they had before. And although the Title ſeems to imply that it extended beyond the times of Arcadius and Honorius; yet it cannot be underſtood of what then was, but of what had been in former times. For that the Britains had then no ſuch Forces among them is apparent by what hath been ſaid already.

I now come to that fatal Counſel of ſending for the Saxons to come to their Aſſiſtance. It appears by (c) Gildas, That the Britains could come to no Settlement among themſelves. “ For, ſaith he, They anointed Kings, not according to the Will of God, but ſuch as were “ more fierce and cruel than others, and not long after they without “ Examination took them off, and ſet up worſe than they. If any one “ was more gentle and a Lover of Truth, he was the moſt hated and “ maligned, as a Betrayer of his Countrey, they minded not what was “ pleaſing or diſpleaſing to God; or rather the latter was more pleaſing “ to them. They acted ſtill contrary to their own Intereſt, and there “ was an univerſal Degeneracy of Manners in all ſorts of Men; And “ thoſe who ſhould have given the beſt Examples, their Prieſts and “ Teachers, were as bad as others; Exceſſive Drinking, Heats and Animoſities, Contentions and Diviſions, Envy and Oppreſſion, were then “ ſo prevailing, that they ſeemed to have loſt all Judgment of Good “ and Evil; ſo that then, he ſaith, The Saying of the Pſalmiſt was “ fulfilled, He poureth Contempt upon Princes, and cauſeth them to wander
“ in the Wilderneſs, where there is no Way. And when neither Fear of “ their Enemies nor the Judgments of God in a raging Peſtilence would “ do them good, then their Iniquities, ſaith he, growing full, like the “ Amorites, they fell into Conſultation, what was beſt for them to do “ againſt their Enemies Incurſions, and they all agreed to invite the “ Saxons over to aſſiſt them. Upon which he breaks out into a ſtrange “ Admiration of that Stupidity and Infatuation which the Britains were “ then under, to call in a Nation to help them whom they dreaded “ worſe than Death.

For the Saxons had been terrible for ſome time before to the Britiſh Nation; which was the Occaſion of calling the Shore on both ſides the Saxon Shore, and ſetting up ſuch an Admiral here by the Romans, who was called Comes Litoris Saxon' per Britanniam. Which ſhews that the Saxons were then very well known for their great Piracies, and had been ſo from the time of Carauſius: For then, (d) Eutropius ſaith, he was employ'd to ſcour the Seas from the Franks and Saxons, who were very troubleſome. It appears by (e) Tacitus, that Gannaſcus, with the Chauci, did, in Claudius his time, infeſt the Gallican Shore with Piracy.

(f) Zoſimus ſaith, That the Saxons, who were the ſtouteſt of all the barbarous Nations, ſent out the Quadi, a part of their own People, into the Roman Territories. By theſe Quadi (g) Cluverius and (h) Bucherius underſtand the Cauchi. But (i) Archbiſhop Uſher ſhews, That theſe were neither the Quadi nor the Cauchi, but the Chamavi, from Eunapius, whom Zoſimus tranſcribes, and from Julian himſelf: But from hence it appears, That the Chamavi were then accounted a part of the Saxons, who, according to (k) Cluverius, there lived near the River Amiſia, a great way on this ſide the Elb or the Weſer; And Eunapius places them not far from the Rhine. However, this proves, that the Name of Saxons then comprehended Nations of other denominations. But, to make this out, we are to conſider, that Zoſimus ſaith, That in the time of Conſtantius, three German Nations brake forth as it were at once on the Roman Empire; The Franks, the Alemanni and the Saxons; and had taken and deſtroyed forty Cities on the Rhine. And St. (l) Hierome mentions the Franks, as lying between the Alemanni and the Saxons. Theſe three, as (m) Beatus Rhenanus obſerves, comprehended the ſeveral Nations of Germany; And, as the late Learned Biſhop of (n) Munſter ſaith, The Saxons was a Name belonging to different, but Neighbour Nations, which joined together upon a common Intereſt. And, not improbably, had their Name at firſt from the ſhort Swords they did commonly wear, called Sachs; as the Quirites had their Name from Quiris, a ſort of Spear; And the Scythians, from Scytten, to ſhoot with a Bow. (o) Witikindus firſt mentions this Etymology, which is followed by others; but (p) Reinerus Reneccius and (q) Gryphiander do much more incline to another derivation, viz. from Saſſen, which in the German Tongue is the ſame with Natives or Inhabitants; And which in the modern Saxon is Saten; as Groſs is Grote; and ſo Holſati are the ſame with Holt-ſaten, Men that lived in Woods. But why this, which was common to other Germans, ſhould give a particular denomination to one ſort, is not ſo eaſie to apprehend: But Tacitus, ſpeaking of ſome of the Northern Germans, ſaith, That the common Badges of them are round Shields and ſhort Swords: And the Arms of Saxony to this day, as (r) Pontanus obſerves, are two ſhort Swords a-croſs. As to thoſe who derive the Saxons from the Sacæ of Aſia, as though they were Sacaſones; although there be Perſons of great Name who embrace that Opinion (among whom our (s) Mr. Camden is one) yet I think it no more probable, than that the Germans are derived from the Plowmen of Perſia, ſome whereof, Herodotus ſaith, were called Germanii. For a bare ſimilitude of Names is no ſufficient ground to judge of the Affinity of People; nor the agreement of ſome Words, as in the German and Perſian Languages (which Mr. Camden inſiſts on) to conclude the People of the ſame Original: Unleſs there be a probable account withall given, how they came to be propagated from each other, i. e. how the Perſian Germans came into theſe Parts; And how the Sacæ left their own Countrey to People Saxony. But under this Name of Saxons, not only thoſe who originally had that Name, but all thoſe who joined with them, were comprehended. And it is obſervable, that not one of the three Names of the German Nations then in uſe was known in Tacitus his time. The Alemanni are firſt ſpoken of by (t) Spartianus, in the Life of Caracalla; and, as (u) Agathias ſaith from Aſinius Quadratus, They were an Aſſociation of many People together under that Name, as the Word imports. The Name of Franks was firſt known in the time of (w) Aurelian, and took in ſeveral of the old German Names, the Sicambri, Chatti, Tencteri, and many others; Thence (x) St. Jerome ſaith, That France was that which Hiſtorians called Germany; And ſo the Saxons was a general Name for the Northern Germans, who chiefly lived upon the Sea-ſhore, from the Amaſis to the Weſer and Elb, as far as the Eydor, unto the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, that had peculiar Appellations. For although the Teſtimony of (y) Ptolomy be commonly produced for the Saxons living on the back of the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, yet Mr. Selden's MS. in both places, leaves out the Σ, and Capnio, as (z) Ciſnerus obſerves, contends, it ought to be read Ἄξονες. But I lay no weight upon this. But it is certain, that the People in Tacitus his time were called Foſi, who lived in the Place where the Saxons are ſuppoſed to have been. (a) Cluverius makes a very unhappy Conjecture, that FOSI, in Tacitus, was corrupted, for SASONI; becauſe they lived in Holſtein, and about Sleſwick; But it is far more probable, That the Name of Saxons was then generally aſſumed by the Northern Germans when they joined their Forces together, and reſolved to make ſome Expeditions abroad, as the Franks and Alemanni had done. Which they did with ſo great Succeſs, that (b) Zoſimus ſaith, in the time of Julian they went down the Rhine, and drove out the Salii, a Nation of the Franks, out of the Iſland of the Batavi. But it ſeems very probable, That the Saxons had placed themſelves near the Sea-ſhore, from the time of Diocleſian, when Carauſius was employ'd againſt them. (c) Oroſius deſcribes them as a People living on the Sea-ſhore; and ſo do Iſidore and Paulus Diaconus after him. Ammianus (d) Marcellinus mentions them, as bordering, in Valentinian's time, on the Parts of Gaul as well as the Franks.

But about this Point our two Learned Antiquaries differ, (e) Camden ſaith, That the Saxons originally came from the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, in the time of Diocleſian; And after, paſſing the Elb, they partly went into thoſe parts of the Suevi, which are ſince called Saxony, and partly into Friſia and Batavia; From whence, he ſaith, all the Inhabitants of the German Shore, who uſed Piracy at Sea, were called Saxons; by which he underſtands the People from Jutland to Holland. For which he produces the Teſtimony of Fabius Ethelwerd, of the Royal Blood of the Saxons; Who ſaith, That the Saxons lived upon the Sea Coaſts, from the Rhine as far as Denmark. But Archbiſhop (f) Uſher will not allow, that the Saxons had ſeated themſelvos upon thoſe Coaſts then; But only that they did exerciſe their Piracies along them. He grants, that before Bede's time, the Saxons took Poſſeſſion of the Places quitted by the Franks, when they went into Gaul, and not only inhabited on the Coaſt between the Elb and the Rhine, but in the inner Parts of the Countrey; But he denies, that this was before the Saxons coming into Britain. But then Fabius Ethelwerd did not underſtand where his Countreymen lived before they came into Britain; And if the Saxons in Valentinian's time, were ſtill only in the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, how comes Ammianus Marcellinus to make them to border upon the Parts of Gaul? Are either Jutland or Holſtein, or Sleſwick, or any of thoſe Countries contiguous to Gaul? Yet his Words are, Gallicanos Tractus Franci & Saxones iiſdem confines, &c: Which, that it is not to be underſtood, that the Saxons were Neighbours to the Franks; but that the Franks and Saxons then bordered upon the Gauls, will appear from hence, The Franks were then in Taxandria, as is plain by (g) Ammianus his Words, in the time of Julian, and and in Batavia; and withall, Zoſimus ſpeaks of the Salii, who were undoubtedly Franks, being driven out of the Iſland of the Batavi by ſome of the Saxons. And this was no Incurſion of the Franks. For Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith, They did there fix their Habitations: And the Chamavi, whom he makes a part of the Saxons, had that Command of the Rhine, that Julian made Peace with them, becauſe without their leave Corn could not be brought out of Britain, as (h) Eunapius Sardianus ſaith: And ſo (i) Libanius and (k) Zoſimus ſay, that Julian took greater Care for the tranſporting Corn out of Britain, as had been accuſtomed, by building more Ships on the Rhine for that purpoſe; And (l) Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith, he built Granaries inſtead of thoſe which were burnt. Such a one the Arx Britannica, in the Mouth of the Rhine, was made from a Magazine, and thence probably, ſaith (m) Camden, had its Name, becauſe the Corn was conveyed thither out of Britain. From thence it follows, that the Saxons ſo early as Julian's time, had the Command of the Rhine. For, whether theſe were the Chauci, the Quadi, or the Chamavi; yet Zoſimus ſaith, That they were a People of the Saxons. But it may be ſaid, That this was only a ſudden Incurſion, and that they were driven out again by the Roman Forces. So indeed Zoſimus and Julian relate it, but how then come the Saxons in Valentinian's time to border ſtill upon Gaul? So that, if they were driven out by Julian, they quickly returned, and fixed their Habitations by the Sea, as the Salii, who were Franks, did in Taxandria; which was more within Land: and where, as (n) Godfrey Wendelin hath endeavoured to prove, the Salick Law was firſt made. Which Taxandria, according to him, was bounded by the Maes on the Eaſt and North; by the Tamera on the South, and by the Scheld on the Weſt; And here, upon Submiſſion, the Franks were permitted to live; And this was thence forward called Francia Minor, and he mentions a Place there ſtill called Vranrijck, the Kingdom of France (but a very ſmall one) and others called Seilberg, the Mountain of the Salii, Seelbendens, the Salian Meadows, Seleheim, the Houſe of the Salii: But the other Franks being by Stilicho's means driven out of their Poſſeſſions beyond the Rhine, they came into the Parts about Tongres near to Taxandria, and there joined in one Body; and ſet up Kings among themſelves, as he ſhews from Gregorius Turonenſis, and then they made that Body of Laws, called the Salick Laws. But to return to the Saxons.

(o) Ubbo Emmius, a learned and judicious Hiſtorian, gives this Account of the Saxons and their Neighbour Nations, who inhabited on the Northern Parts of Germany. The Friſii dwelt from the middle Stream of the Rhine, about Utrecht, to the River Amaſus, (Eems;) From thence to the Elb lived the Chauci, divided into the greater and leſſer by the Weſer; A great part of theſe, leaving their Native Soil, joined with the Sicambri on the Rhine, who, from their affecting Liberty, were called Franks; beyond the Elb were the Saxons and the Cimbri; Theſe Saxons, being preſſed by the more Northern People, or for their own Conveniency, came Southwards, and took Poſſeſſion firſt of thoſe Places where the Chauci dwelt; And by degrees prevailing, all the other People, who joined with or ſubmitted to the Saxons, were called by their Name: and among the reſt the Friſii; From whoſe Coaſts he ſuppoſes the two Brothers, Hengiſt and Horſa, to have gone into Britain; and, returning thither, carried over a far greater Number with them, not ſo much to fight, as to inhabit there. He thinks it moſt probable, probable, that Hengiſt and Horſa, by their Deſcent, were originally Saxons; But that the greateſt part of the People who went over with them were rather Friſians than Saxons. Which he proves, not only from the greater facility of Paſſage from the Coaſts of Friſeland, and the Teſtimony of their own Annals; but from the greater agreement of the Engliſh Language with theirs than with the Saxon, or any other German Dialect. And becauſe (p) Bede reckons the Friſians among thoſe from whom the Engliſh are derived; and Wilfrid, Wickbert, Willibrord, preach'd to the Friſians in their own Tongue, as he proves from Marcellinus his Life of Suidbert: And Procopius reckons the Friſians among the Inhabitants of Britain. But he ſaith farther, That the Affinity of the Languages continues ſtill ſo very great, that from thence he concludes many more to have gone out of Friſeland into Britain, than either of the Saxons, Jutes or Angles.

But to all this our Learned (q) Primate anſwers, That Hengiſt and Horſa might be true Friſians, there being a Friſia in the Southern Parts of Jutland, which Saxo Grammaticus calls the leſſer Friſia, and is parted by the Eidore from the Countrey of the Angli on the Eaſt, and of the Saxons on the South. But whatever Suffridus Petrus, or ſuch Authors contend for, as to Hengiſt and Horſa being originally Friſians, Ubbo Emmius quits that Point upon (r) Bede's Genealogy, and grants they were Saxons; being the Sons of Victgilſus, whoſe Father was Vitta, the Son of Vecta, whoſe Father was Voden, of whoſe Race the Kings of many Provinces are deſcended. It doth not ſeem at all probable, That theſe lived in the leſſer Friſia, which is hardly taken notice of by any but by (s) Saxo Grammaticus; and (t) Pontanus tells us, is not above four German Miles in length upon the Sea-ſhore; But ſuppoſe that Saxo comprehended Dithmars under it, yet we have no certainty that the Colony of Friſians was removed thither before Hengiſt and Horſa came for Britain; and Helmoldus ſeems to imply that it was brought thither by Adulphus II. Count of Holſtein, about Anno Dom. 1137. But the Queſtion is not concerning Hengiſt and Horſa, but the greater Number of the People, which might be ſtill of the greater Friſia; For which the affinity of the Language is a conſiderable Argument, which doth not depend merely upon the Credit of Marcellinus his Life of Suidbert, but upon the probability of the thing. For ſince ſeveral Engliſh went thither to Preach, and the Affinity of the Language continues ſo great ſtill, it is a good Argument to prove, either that the Friſians came over hither, or that the Friſian and Saxon Languages were then the ſame. And (u) Procopius his Teſtimony is not to be ſlighted, who places the Friſians in Britain; for although he calls it Brettia, it is certain he means Great-Britain, becauſe he places the Angles together with the Friſians in it; So that he might as well queſtion the Angles as the Friſians coming hither; if Procopius his Authority ſignifie any thing.

I know that our moſt Learned (w) Primate takes this Brettia for the Iſland of the Batavi, becauſe Joh. Leidenſis ſaith, That upon the Saxons Invaſion, ſome of the Britains fled into Holland, and there, in the Mouth of the Rhine, built that famous Caſtle called Britton, and ſubdued the People thereabout. But this ſeems to be very improbable, for any one that looks into the Deſcription of it, in (x) Scriverius his Antiquitates Batavicæ, will conclude it to have been a Roman Work; which a Perſon of his Judgment could not but diſcern; But he ſaith, it was poſ- ſeſſed then by the Britains: Which depends wholly on the Credit of this Joh. Gerbrandus of Leyden, who was a late Writer, and of no great Eſteem with him, as appears by many Paſſages in his Book: But how came the Angles to live here with the Friſians and Britains? For that the ſame Gerbrandus is cited, who ſaith, That when part of Hengiſt's Army was driven out of Britain, they built the Caſtle of Leyden. And ſo we have the Britains dwelling there, being driven out by the Saxons; and the Saxons driven out by the Britains; only to make this to be the Iſland Brettia, in Procopius, diſtinct from Great-Britain. But to proceed.

(y) Adamus Bremenſis, who lived near to Jutland, ſaith, That the Saxons, who went over into Britain, lived near the Rhine. (z) Engelhuſius, lately publiſhed out of MSS. by Maderus, and who lived in the lower Saxony, ſaith, That Hengiſt and Horſa went out of Weſtphalia, from a Place called Enghere, and inſtead of Engerſchen, called themſelves Engelſchen. (a) Suffridus Petrus ſaith, Thoſe People were called Angrivarii, and the Country Angria, which was ſubdued by Udolphus, Father to Hengiſt and Horſa, and Prince of Friſia; But their Mother's Name was Suana, Daughter to Vectgiſtus, a great Man about Hamburgh. If he ſuppoſe Hamburgh then built, he was extremely miſtaken; for it was only a Caſtle erected on the Elb, in the time of Charles the Great, for preventing the Incurſion of the Sclavi, as appears by the Teſtimonies of (b) Eginhardus, and (c) Albertus Stadenſis: After which he built a City, and founded a Church there, as Adamus Bremenſis and Helmoldus agree; Which City had its Name from a Neighbour Wood, called in the Saxon, Hamme; as (d) Lambecius ſaith, in Ditmarſe there are two Woods ſtill called Suderhamme and Norderhamme. But to return to Suffridus; When, according to Cuſtom, ſaith he, a Colony of Friſians was to be drawn out, Hengiſt and Horſa were their Captains, and ſo went for old England, or Anglen in Jutland, where they were kindly received, by means of Vectgiſtus; and from thence took the opportunity of coming into Britain. From hence he finds fault with Crantzius, for making Angria in Weſtphalia to be Old Anglen; and ſaith, That Bede only reckons the Mother's Line, and not the Father's. But his Occa Scarlenſis, on whom he chiefly relies, is much ſuch another Author as Hunibaldus, or Geoffrey, or Hector's Veremundus; and therefore I ſhall ſay no more of him. For, I perceive, ſcarce any of the Northern Nations wanted ſuch Authors, who endeavour'd to ſupply the defect of their Hiſtories by their own Inventions. So that it is neceſſary to lay open the pretended Antiquities in order to the ſetting forth the true.

The late Biſhop of (e) Munſter, a Perſon of far greater Judgment and Learning than Suffridus Petrus, calls his Originals of the Saxons, by no better a Title than of Canoræ Nugæ, Sounding Trifles, having no Foundation in good Authority. The Account he gives of the Saxons is this, That they at firſt lived beyond the Elb, where they had the ſame Situation with Tacitus his Angli, whom he makes the fartheſt of the Suevi, and therefore might well be the ſame People; That in Bede's time they were come on this ſide the Weſer, and were ſettled in Weſtphalia; and ſo they made a threefold Saxony of the Oſtphali, Angrivarii and Weſtphali, who were called Olt-ſaxons by Bede and others: Not that theſe were all originally Saxons; But they bore the ſame Name, being united in one common League; So that, as all the Germans which went into Gaul were called Franks, ſo thoſe who prevailed in Germany and went into Britain, were called Saxons.

But (f) Olaus Rudbeck, after all, hath found the Seat of the Saxons more North than Jutland, where, ſaith he, The Name of the Saxons could never yet be found; and where are no Mountains to be met with upon which Ptolemy places them on the back of the Cimbrick Cherſoneſe, but in that part of Sweden which lies between Vermelandia and Angermannia he hath found Norſaxen, and Soderſaxen, and Saxehundari, and Saxewall, and Saxen, &c. And in Smaland he hath diſcovered many Places taken from the Angles, as Angleſted Hundred, Angloridia, Anglodorpia, Engelbeck, &c.

But for our better underſtanding the Condition of that People who were called in by the Britains, it will be moſt material to conſider what is ſaid of them by thoſe who deſcended from them, and lived here not long after their coming.

(g) Bede, who was himſelf a Saxon, and lived neareſt the time of the Saxons coming hither, muſt be preſumed to have underſtood beſt who they were, and whence they came. And although at the beginning he makes the Angles and Saxons all one, ſaying, the Angles or Saxons, being invited by King Vortigern, came hither in three Keels or long Boats at firſt; yet when he adds, that Numbers came afterwards, he then diſtinguiſheth them into three diſtinct ſorts of People, viz. the Saxons, Angles and Jutes. The Saxons, he ſaith, came from that Place which was then called Saxony; The Angles, from the Country called Angulus, which remained deſart to this day, and lay between the Provinces of the Jutes and Saxons. And much to the ſame purpoſe (h) Fabius Ethelwerd; only he ſaith, that they came de Saxonia, Anglia atque Giota. Saxony, he ſaith, was then called Ealdſexe; and for Anglia, he ſaith, it lay between the Saxons and the Gioti, whoſe chief Town in the Saxon Tongue was called Sleſwic, and by the Danes, Haithaby. But, by this Account, all theſe People who came hither to aſſiſt the Britains, and after conquer'd them, and poſſeſſed their Land, muſt come out of that Cherſoneſe called Jutland, taking it in the largeſt extent, not only to the Eidore, but from the Eidore to the Elb. For if the Angli came from about Sleſwic, and lay between the Jutes and the Old Saxons; then the Jutes poſſeſſed all that part of the Cherſoneſe which is now called the Northern Jutland: and the Southern Jutland takes within it all that was poſſeſſed by the Angli, which reached no farther than between Sleſwic and Flensburgh, which in the modern Maps is ſtill called Angelen; And ſo the Country lying between the Elb and the Eidore, comprehending Hoſtein, Dithmars and Stomar, muſt be the Seat of the Old Saxons; which, by (i) Adamus Bremenſis and (k) Helmoldus, is called Nortalbingia; and, by (l) Eginhartus, Saxonia Tranſalbiana; by (m) Albertus Stadenſis, Tranſalbia; where the Saxons remained in ſo great Numbers that Charles the Great could not totally ſubdue them, till after a War of above thirty years, as the foremention'd Authors aſſure us. And (n) Eginhartus, whoſe Authority is unqueſtionable, ſaith, That Charles had no War more tedious or more fierce than that which he had with the Saxons; And in the concluſion of it, he was forced to remove 10000 Saxons on both ſides the River Elb, and to diſperſe them in ſeveral Parts of the Empire. And as to that part of Jutland which Bede ſaith was left deſolate to his time upon the remove of the Angli; (o) Adamus Bremenſis gives another Reaſon for it, ſaying, That Jutland was the moſt uncultivated part of all Germany, and the leaſt fit for humane habitation, being ſo barren and unfruitful, and ſo obnoxious to Pirates from both Seas. But ſince the Saxons, Angles and Jutes, coming into Britain, took Poſſeſſion of ſo great a part of it, as our Hiſtorians tell us, viz. The Jutes, Kent, the Iſle of Wight and part of Hampſhire; The Saxons, Suſſex, Eſſex, Middleſex, the South part of Hartfordſhire, Surrey, the other part of Hampſhire, Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Devonſhire and part of Cornwall; The Angles, Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, the Midland and Northern Counties; It deſerves to be conſidered whether, ſince there were ſo few Inhabitants then in Jutland and ſo many Saxons left behind, there be not far greater probability that theſe ſhould come from all the Maritime Coaſts from the Rhine to Jutland, than merely out of ſuch an unpeopled Country as that was. I do not deny the diſtinction of People that Bede mentions, nor their coming originally out of Jutland, or rather through Jutland: But, I think, all Circumſtances conſidered, it is more probable that the Saxons, before that time, were come nearer to the Rhine, and ſo had greater Conveniency of removing themſelves over in ſuch great Numbers into Britain, as they did upon Vortigern's Invitation, and the Diſcontents which ſoon happen'd between the Saxons and the Britains.

And it is obſervable, That thoſe who inlarge the Bounds of the Saxons do take notice of a difference in their Situation agreeable to what Bede ſaith; For (p) Reinerus Reineccius, a Learned German Antiquary, ſaith, The Saxons were divided into three ſorts, the Oſtvali, or the Eaſtern Saxons, whom the Old Saxon Poet calls Oſterlingi, whoſe Limits extended, he ſaith, as far as the Slavi, i. e. beyond the River Elb; the Weſtvali, whoſe Bounds, he ſaith, came very near the Rhine, And between theſe, he ſaith, were the Angarii, juſt as Bede puts his Angli, between the Jutes and the Saxons.

Angarii, Populus Saxonum tertius——

If this Diviſion of the Saxons be allow'd, we have here ſcope enough for all thoſe People to live in who came over into Britain, and number enough to come hither, and yet not to leave the Places deſolate whence they came. And it is not improbable that the Northern Nations thruſting one another forwards, for a greater Conveniency of living, thoſe Saxons who lived about Hoſtein might come into Weſtphalia, and ſo be neareſt to the Rhine; The Angli came into the Place where the Angrivarii are ſeated; And the moſt remote Inhabitants of the Cherſoneſe, would then be the Oſterlings or the Eaſtern Saxons. This, upon the whole matter, ſeems to me the moſt probable way of reconciling what Bede ſaith with the Circumſtances of thoſe times, and with the Friſians coming in together with the Saxons, which he elſewhere expreſly affirms, as is already ſhew'd.

As to the time of the Saxons coming into Britain, in the common printed Copies of Bede, it is ſaid to have been An. Dom. 409. and ſo it is in the late Edition by Chiffletius, out of the old MS. of S. Maximin at Triers; But that cannot be true, becauſe Martianus is ſaid to be Emperor at the ſame time. But in the Chronology, at the end of that Edition, it is ſaid to have been An. Dom. 449. to which Mr. Wheelock's MS. agrees; and Aſſerius Menevenſis in his Annals; which is follow'd by Fabius Ethelwerd, the Old Saxon Annals, William of Malmesbury,

Henry

(p) De Orig. Sax. p. 11.

Henry Huntingdon, Matth. Weſtminſter, and others. Florentius Wigornienſis, who generally follows Marianus Scotus, places it in the following year; Valentinianus and Avienus Conſuls; but, according to Marianus Scotus, in the Baſil Edition, they were Conſuls the year before Martianus was Emperor, and he makes their coming in to have been when Herculanus and Aſporatius were Conſuls, An. Dom. 453. But Archbiſhop (q) Uſher ſaith, That appears by the Faſti to have been An. Dom. 452. or the ſecond of Martianus, by Caſſiodore. Two Characters of the time are certain; viz. that it was after the third Conſulſhip of Aëtius, and the Death of Theodoſius; And therefore it is to be wondred, Mr. (r) Camden ſhould ſo confidently affirm that it was before An. Dom. 449. But there are three things he goes upon which muſt be conſider'd. Firſt, That Vortigern's Death was before St. German's return; But St. German died An. Dom. 435. And therefore the coming in of the Saxons muſt be ſome time before. As to Vortigern's Death, before St. German's return, he produces only the Teſtimony of Nennius, who, in the Affairs of Vortigern, doth Romance ſo much, That even Geoffrey of Monmouth was aſhamed to follow him. But as to the time of St. German's Death, there are very convincing Arguments to prove Camden miſtaken. (s) Honoratus, in the Life of Hilary, Biſhop of Arles, mentions St. German as preſent when Chelidonius was depoſed by Hilary in his Viſitation; which (t) Sirmondus placeth not without Reaſon, An. Dom. 444. as appears by the Epiſtle of Leo and the Reſcript of Valentinian upon Chelidonius his Appeal, which bears date, An. Dom. 445. But which is yet more conſiderable, (u) Bede ſaith, that after his ſecond return he went on an Embaſſy to Ravenna, and was there kindly received by Valentinian and Placidia, and there died; And, not long after, Valentinian was killed in the ſixth of Martianus: And therefore St. German's Death could not be ſo ſoon as Mr. Camden ſuppoſeth. Add to this, that Conſtantius, in his Life of St. German ſaith, That he ſate thirty years after St. Amator in his See, who died An. Dom. 418. But the Sammarthani ſay, An. Dom 420.

As to the Teſtimony of Proſper Tiro, who ſaith, That Britain was brought under the Power of the Saxons, the 18th of Theodoſius, it plainly contradicts Gildas; For this was before the third Conſulſhip of Aëtius, which was five years after; and in matters of the Britiſh Hiſtory, Gildas certainly deſerves the greater Credit, ſuppoſing it were the true Proſper.

His laſt Argument is from the Calculation, at the end of Nennius, on which he lays the greateſt Weight; which makes their coming in to be when Felix and Taurus were Conſuls, which agrees with An. Dom. 428. But this was near twenty years before the third Conſulſhip of Aëtius, when the Britains were not yet in deſpair of Aſſiſtance from the Romans; Before which they never ſought for the Saxons. And I confeſs the Authority of Gildas and Bede, with the Series of the Britiſh and Roman Affairs at that time ſway much more with me than ſuch an Anonymous Calculation.

It is a ſtrange miſtake of (w) Hadrianus Valeſius, to make Vortigern, King of the Angles, who were hired to aſſiſt the Britains; But the Ambiguity of the words in (x) Paulus Diaconus ſeem to have been the occaſion of it: which had been eaſily prevented by looking into Bede: And ſo had another miſtake in the ſame place, viz. That only the Angles, and not the Saxons, were invited over: For Bede ſaith expreſly, That the the Britains, with their King Vortigern, agreed to ſend for the Saxons; But it is a third miſtake, when he ſaith, That the Saxons before this time had a part of the Iſland near to the Picts; Which he proves from the Words of Conſtantius as to their joining with the Picts in one of their Battels. But the Saxons did frequently make Incurſions before, and in one of them might join with the other Enemies of the Britains, which is a very different thing from Inhabiting in any Part of the Iſland, which we have no Evidence that they did, till they were called in by the Britains.

The Saxons having received ſuch an Invitation from the Britains were unwilling to let ſlip ſo fair an Opportunity of coming into that Land, by the conſent of Prince and People whoſe Shores they had ſo long infeſted. (y) Bede ſaith, There was a particular Providence of God in it, to make them the Scourges of the Peoples wickedneſs. (z) Gildas imputes it to mere Sottiſhneſs and Infatuation. (a) Nennius intimates ſome Domeſtick Fear that was the Occaſion of Vortigern's ſending for the Saxons, as well as that of their common Enemies, i. e. he was very apprehenſive of a ſudden Riſing of the Roman Party yet left in the Iſland, and of Ambroſius. But he leaves it wholly in the dark, who this Ambroſius was, and what Cauſe Vortigern had to be afraid of him. (b) Gildas ſpeaks of Ambroſius Aurelianus, as of a modeſt Man, and as almoſt the only perſon of the Roman Nation then ſurviving, whoſe Parents were killed enjoying the Purple, and whoſe Poſterity was living in Gildas his time, but much degenerated from the Vertues of their Anceſtors. This is the only Paſſage which gives us any light into this matter which is repeated by (c) Bede, who more plainly ſaith, That his Parents had Royal Authority, and were killed. Who theſe Parents of his were we are left only to conjecture. The (d) Britiſh Hiſtory would clear the matter, if it deſerved Credit, for there we read, That Aurelius Ambroſius was one of the younger Sons of Conſtantine, King of Britain, who was forced to fly from Vortigern after the Murther of their Brother Conſtans by his Contrivance. But we know that Conſtantine and his Sons, Conſtans and Julian, were killed abroad; and it is not probable the Romans would have permitted any one of his Sons to have remained here; or, if they did, this Ambroſius muſt have been of Ripe years for Government long before this time. For Conſtantine's Life was taken away when Theodoſius was IV. Conſul, as Idatius and Marcellinus agree, An. Dom. 411. So that Ambroſius could not be very young when Vortigern took the Government, in whoſe fourth year, they ſay, The Saxons were called in. But there is another Paſſage in Gildas which helps to explain this: For he ſaith, That after they found themſelves deſerted by the Romans, they ſet up Kings of their own, and ſoon after put them down again, and made choice of worſe in their Room; This ſetting up of Kings he expreſſes by their being anointed; whether that Cuſtom were then uſed or not, it is plain, that he ſuppoſes that the Britains, in that Confuſion they were in, took upon them, without regard to their Duty, to place and diſplace them. But that he takes anointing in a metaphorical Senſe appears by what follows, That the Anointers were thoſe who deſtroy'd them. Among theſe in all probability was the Father of Ambroſius, and the rather becauſe, it is ſaid, he was of Roman Deſcent: For the Britains thought none then able to defend them that had not a Roman Spirit in him. At this time the Britains were left to their full Liberty by the Roman Empire, which, as (e) Bede reckons, had the Dominion here for 470 years; And then then there was no Line remaining to ſucceed in the Government, nor ſo much as to determine their Choice, which made them ſo eaſily to make and unmake their Kings, who loſt their Purple and their Lives together. This muſt needs breed infinite Confuſions among them; and every one who came to be King lived in perpetual fear of being ſerved as others had been before him; And the natural Conſequence of this Jealouſie of their own Subjects was, looking out for Aſſiſtance from abroad, which I doubt not was one great Reaſon of Vortigern's ſending for the Saxons, hoping to ſecure himſelf by their means againſt his own People: although it proved at laſt the Ruin both of himſelf and his People. But this Jealouſie could not but increaſe upon them, while there was a Perſon deſcended from a former King, and of Roman Parentage in being; So that Nennius ſeems to have hit upon one of the main Reaſons which ſway'd Vortigern to ſend for the Saxons.

(f) Some have gone about to defend Vortigern ſo far as to ſay, That he took the moſt prudent Courſe he could, for the benefit and ſecurity of his Subjects, by placing the Saxons upon the Picts Wall, and upon the Kentiſh Shores, which were thought fit to be ſecured by the Romans. But, againſt whom? Was it not againſt theſe very Saxons? And is it the beſt way to ſecure the Flock, to ſet the Wolves to watch them? If they had the Command of thoſe Shores, could not they let in what Numbers they pleaſed of their own People, to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the Britains? And, was this for the Peoples Security? What Succeſs had there been in that Age, in letting in the Barbarous Nations upon the ſeveral Parts of the Roman Empire? And what could be expected in ſuch a Condition as the Britains were in, otherwiſe than what did happen when a fierce, ungovernable, military People were called in to defend a Nation ſo long kept under, and wholly almoſt unacquainted with the exerciſe of Brutiſh Valour, and unexperienced in the Arts of War? Eſpecially when the Air, Situation, Fruitfulneſs and all ſorts of Conveniencies were ſo much above thoſe of the Countrey which they came from? So that Gildas ſeems to have a great deal of Reaſon, when he attributes this Act of Vortigern's, with a reſpect to the Nation, to mere Sottiſhneſs and Infatuation.

(f) Hiſt. of Gavel-kind, p. 40.

(g) Witikindus tells a formal Story of a Speech made by the Britiſh Ambaſſadors to the Saxons, wherein they magnify the Saxons Courage, and lament their own Miſeries; and in ſhort tell them, If they would come and help them, their Land and themſelves would be at their ſervice; for they knew none more worthy to Command them, ſince the Romans had left them. But neither Bede nor Ethelwerd, although both Saxons, mention the leaſt Promiſe of Submiſſion; And it is apparent by their Quarrel with the Britains afterwards, that they came as Mercenary Soldiers, upon promiſe of Pay. For (h) Gildas ſaith, The firſt Pretence of Quarreling was for greater Allowance, which he calls their Epimenia, and Bede, Annonæ: Which ſhews upon what Terms they came. And Witikindus himſelf makes no other Pretence for their Riſing againſt the Britains, but that the Countrey pleaſed them, and they found they were able to ſubdue the Inhabitants. For after Hengiſt and his Company had taſted the Sweetneſs of it, they never left Wheedling that weak and vicious King (as all deſcribe him) with fair Promiſes, and neceſſity of more Succours to ſecure himſelf and to defend his Countrey, till they had by degrees got over Strength enough to bid defiance to the Britains. At firſt they ſeem'd very zealous and hearty againſt their common Enemies, mies, and did great Service in beating the Picts and Scots; inſomuch that (i) Buchanan confeſſes, they were driven beyond Adrian's Wall; And ſome think their King Eugenius was then killed. (k) Fordon ſaith, They went into Albany, and brought away great Booty from thence; and confeſſes, that he found in a certain Hiſtory, that he was killed South of Humber, by the Britains and the Engliſh. And it is eaſie to imagine how inſolent ſuch a Barbarous People would grow upon their Succeſs, when they knew the Britains durſt not oppoſe them. (l) Bede ſaith, That they entred into a ſecret League with the Picts and the Scots after they had beaten them, and then took occaſion to quarrel with the Britains; Only they ſtill endeavour'd to keep Vortigern firm to them. To this purpoſe (m) Nennius tells the Story of Hengiſt's fair Daughter Rovena, and how Vortigern was inſnared by her, to the great diſſatisfaction of the Britains. Hector Boethius ſaith, That Vodinus, Biſhop of London, was killed by Hengiſt, for reproving Vortigern for that Marriage; But we muſt not be too ſtrict upon Hector to put him to produce his Vouchers. And the (n) Britiſh Hiſtory adds, that Hengiſt, being a ſubtile Man, inſinuated ſtill into Vortigern, That his own People did not love him, and that they would depoſe him, and ſet up Aurelius Ambroſius: And by ſuch Arts they widen'd the Diſtance between him and his People, when they deſigned nothing leſs than the deſtruction of both.

It is certain, by what Gildas and Bede have left, that theſe Heats ſoon brake out into open Flames, to the Ruine and Deſolation of the Countrey: But how the War began, and by what means it was firſt managed on the Britiſh ſide is not ſo clear. But (o) Nennius ſaith, That when Vortigern's Wickedneſs grew ſo great as to Marry his own Daughter, he was condemned in ſolemn Council of the Britiſh Nation both Clergy and Laity, and upon the Advice of his Nobles, he withdrew himſelf from Affairs to a private Caſtle. But the (p) Britiſh Hiſtory makes it worſe, viz. That the Britains forſook him, and ſet up his Son Vortimer, who behaved himſelf with great Courage and Reſolution againſt the Saxons: And then reckons up four Battels, which he fought with them; The firſt upon the Derwent, the ſecond at Epiſford, or rather Aleſford, the third upon the Sea-ſhore, when he drove them into their Ships, and ſo home; but the fourth is not mention'd; After which Geoffrey relates Vortimer's being poiſon'd by his Mother-in-law, and the reſtoring of Vortigern, and his calling for the Saxons back again. (q) Nennius ſpeaks of Vortimer's fighting with Hengiſt and Horſus, and adds, his Succeſs to have been ſo great, as to have driven them into the Iſle of Thanet, and that there he beſieged, and beat, and terrified them to that degree, That they ſent into Germany for freſh Succours; by which they were enabled to manage the War with various ſucceſs againſt the Britains. And then reckons up the three Battels, juſt as Geoffrey doth; Only the laſt, he ſaith, was upon the Sea-ſhore, juxta lapidem tituli; a little after which, he ſaith, that Vortimer died, without any mention of Poyſon; But, he ſaith, before his Death he gave command to have his Body buried on the Sea ſhore, where the Saxons fled; which was neglected, and to which Nennius imputes their Return, after which they could never be driven out. Becauſe, as he ſaith, It was the Divine Pleaſure more than their own Valour which made them ſettle here. And it is he that Orders and Rules the Nations of the Earth; And who can reſiſt his Will? It is plain by all this, that Nennius conſulted the Honour of the Britiſh Nation as much as it was poſſible, and no where uſeth that freedom which Gildas doth in ſetting forth the great Sins among them which provoked God to puniſh them in ſo ſevere a manner.

The Place where Vortimer deſired to be buried is called by Nennius, Lapis Tituli; from whence (r) Camden and Archbiſhop (s) Uſher conceive it to be Stonar in the Iſle of Thanet, near Richborrow; but Nennius ſaith only, It was upon the Shore of the French Sea; From whence Mr. (t) Somner rather concludes it to be Folkſtone in Kent, becauſe of its lofty Situation, whereas Stonar lies in a low and flat level, apt to Inundations; But then Nennius muſt have miſtaken Lapis Tituli, for Lapis Populi; and, I dare ſay, Nennius was guilty of greater Miſtakes than that. But he makes Vortigern to have fled away with the Saxon Army, and to have given them all the Aſſiſtance he could: And then, ſaith he, Vortimer began to reſtore the Britains Poſſeſſions to them, and to rebuild their Churches, and to ſhew kindneſs to the Churchmen. The next Year, he ſaith, "The Saxons fought again with the Britains at Ailesford; and after a ſharp Fight the Saxons fled, and great Multitudes of them were ſlain; Not long after Vortimer, with his Brothers Catigern and Paſcentius, and the whole Nation of the Britains made War with the Saxons, and in Battel Catigern was killed by Horſus, and Horſus by Vortimer, upon which the Saxon Army fled. The next Year, he ſaith, Hengiſt fought three Battels with Vortimer, and at laſt he was forced to go back into Germany, and four Years after, Vortimer, ſaith he, was poiſon'd, Anno Dom. 460. and buried in London, and then Vortigern recalled the Saxons.

(x) William of Malmesbury ſaith, "That the Britains and Saxons agreed for ſeven Years after their Landing, and then Vortimer, finding their Deceit, incenſed his Father and the Britains againſt them, and ſo for twenty Years there was continual War and light Skirmiſhes, and four pitched Battels. In the firſt he makes their Fortune equal, Horſa being killed on one ſide, and Catagis on the other. In the reſt, the Saxons being always ſuperior, and Vortimer dead, a Peace was made; And ſo the Britains Affairs went ill, till Ambroſius recover'd them.

(y) Henry of Huntingdon relates this Story after a different manner: He tells us, "That Vortigern, after the Marriage of Hengiſt's Daughter was ſo hated, that he withdrew to the Mountains and Woods, and that he and his Caſtle were conſumed together. After which Ambroſius Aurelianus, with Vortigern's two Sons, Vortimer and Catigern, fought the Saxons; And he makes the firſt Battel at Aileſtreu or Elſtree, the next after Vortimer's Death at Creganford or Crayford, in which, he ſaith, the Britains were quite beaten out of Kent, and from thence he begins the Saxons Kingdom of Kent; The next, he ſaith, was at Wippedsflede, which was ſo terrible on both ſides, That from thence he ſaith, That the Saxons and Britains did not diſturb each other for a great while, they remaining within Kent, and the Britains quarrelling among themſelves.

(z) Chronic. A. D. 455.

(z) Florentius Wigornienſis therein differs from the reſt, that he makes the Battel at Ægelſtherp to have been between Vortigern and Hengiſt; But, he ſaith, after the Battel at Creccanford, the Britains fled to London, and left Kent to the Saxons: Wherein he follows the Saxon Annals; as he doth in the Account of the two other Battels; that at Wippedsfleot, and that which he calls the great Victory over the Britains by Hengiſt and Æſca his Son; which he places Anno Dom. 473. when he ſaith, the Britains fled from the Saxons as from Fire.

(a) Fabius Ethelwerd agrees with the Saxon Annals and Florentius in theſe Particulars; And ſo doth Aſſerius in his MSS. Annals, as to Vortigern's fighting with Hengiſt. Wherein they very much differ from the Britiſh Traditions; But after the Tranſlation of the Britiſh Hiſtory by Geoffrey, the Monkiſh Hiſtorians generally follow that, as to the Succeſs of thoſe Battels, and as to the Treachery uſed towards Vortigern by Hengiſt, upon Saliſbury Plain, near Ambresbury; Where it is ſaid by Geoffrey, that the Saxons killed 470 of the Britiſh Nobility, under a Pretence of a Treaty of Peace; (b) Nennius ſaith but 300; and that Vortigern was then taken, and was forced to give Eſtſex, Suthſex and Middleſex for his Redemptiom.

(d) Verſtegan. p. 14

This Story paſſes for current among the Monks, and our late Collectors of Engliſh Hiſtory: And that which ſeems to add moſt weight to it is, That William of Malmesbury relates it, but he reports it much as he found it in Nennius, only inlarging on the drinking part, that went before the Maſſacre. But when I find the ſame Story in effect in (c) Witikindus, between the Saxons and the Thuringers, and the very ſame Word given NEM ET EOUR SEAXES, I am apt to think one was borrowed from the other. But I cannot but take notice of the Diſingenuity of (d) Verſtegan, who lays this to the Charge of the Thuringers, whereas Witikindus not only ſaith, the Saxons did it, but adds, That the Saxons ſtruck terror into their Neighbours by it, and ſaith, They were thought to have their Name from it, as Verſtegan himſelf thinks; Which were ridiculous, unleſs the Seaxes belong'd to the Saxons.

(e) Gild. §. 24.

(f) Bed. l. 1. c. 15.

All the certainty we have as to the matter of the Proceedings between the Britains and Saxons is, what (c) Gildas relates, which is very Tragical, viz. " That all the Cities and Churches were burnt to the " Ground, from the Eaſt to the Weſtern Ocean; The Inhabitants de" ſtroyed by the Sword or buried in the Ruines of Houſes and Altars " which were defiled with the Blood of the Slain; in which horrible
" Devaſtation, the Rulers of the Church and the Prieſts ſuffered toge" ther with the Common People. So that he applies to this Deſolati-
" on the Words of the Pſalmiſt, They have caſt Fire into thy Sanctuary,
" they have defiled it by caſting down the dwelling Place of thy Name to the " Ground. And, O God, the Heathen are come into thine Inheritance;
" thy holy Temple have they defiled, &c. And (f) Bede ſaith, A Fire " was kindled by the hands of the Heathens, which executed Ven" geance on God's People for their Sins, not unlike that of the Chalde-
" ans, which burnt Jeruſalem to the Ground: So here, ſaith he, the " wicked Conqueror prevailing, or rather the juſt Judge ſo diſpoſing,
" there ſeem'd to be one continued Flame from one Sea to another;
" All publick and private Buildings demoliſhed, the Prieſts Blood ſpilt
" upon the Altars, the Prelates and People deſtroy'd together by Fire
" and Sword, and no Man durſt to give them Burial. Many of thoſe “ that eſcaped at preſent, as (g) Gildas ſaith, had their Throats cut, and were thrown on Heaps in the Mountains, or delivered themſelves up to Slavery, to avoid being famiſhed, and thought it a Favour to be preſently diſpatched, and others hid themſelves among Mountains and Rocks and Woods to eſcape the Fury of their Enemies, where they lived in continual Fear; and others went over into Foreign Parts: Which was the Foundation of the Aremorican Colony of Britains; as will appear afterwards.

But that which prevented a total Deſtruction of the Britains now was, that it ſeems both by (h) Gildas and (i) Bede, the Saxons having burnt ſo many Cities and Towns, and driven the Remainder of the Inhabitants into inacceſſible Places, did go home for ſome time, “ And in that Interval, the diſperſed Britains gathered together, and after moſt earneſt Supplications to God, that they might not be utterly deſtroyed, they made Choice of Ambroſius Aurelianus, as their King; and, under his Conduct, God was pleaſed to give them Succeſs: And, from that time, ſaith Gildas, now one Party prevailed, and then another (whereby God made a farther Tryal of the Britains, whether they would love him or not) to the Battel on Badon Hill, wherein the Saxons ſuffer'd ſo great a Loſs; Which was forty four Years after their firſt coming hither, as appears more plainly by Bede. But Gildas adds, “ Even at this time their Cities were far from being Inhabited as formerly; And when their Enemies gave them reſpite, they deſperately quarrell'd among themſelves. So that we have here a Conjunction of ſo much Severity and Patience, ſuch Fears and Hopes, and yet ſuch Defeating of theſe Hopes, by their own Follies and Diviſions, as commonly forerun a Churches Deſtruction and a Peoples Ruine.

This is the beſt and trueſt Account of the Britiſh Affairs from the Saxons coming till the Government of Ambroſius, by which we are to judge of the probability of Nennius his Traditions.

As to the particular Conduct of the Britiſh Affairs under Ambroſius, we have little more light than what Traditions and Conjectures give us. However, it may not be amiſs to lay together what we can find about them.

(k) Nennius ſaith little more of him, than that Vortigern was afraid of him: and afterwards he confounds him with Merlin, when he tells Vortigern, after the Story of his being without a Father, That he concealed his Father's Name out of Fear, but that his Father was one of the Roman Conſuls; and ſo Vortigern gave him the Command of the Weſtern Parts of Britain.

But (l) Geoffrey gives a more ample account of him, not only that he was one of Conſtantine's Sons; But that he, underſtanding the Condition of the Britains, came over from Aremorica, with his Brother Uther Pendragon, and conſiderable Forces, and after his Revenge upon Vortigern, burning him in his Caſtle, he makes the Saxons to retire beyond Humber, through the Terror of his Name; Whither Aurelius purſued them, and overcame Hengiſt in a ſet Battel, who fled to Caer Conan or Conisburg, where they fought again, and Hengiſt was taken by Eldol, Duke of Glouceſter, and beheaded by him, according to the Advice of Eldad, then Biſhop of Glouceſter.

(m) Flores Hiſt. A.D. 487, 489.

(m) Matthew Weſtminſter tranſcribes theſe Paſſages out of Geoffrey, and puts them to ſuch years as he fanſied; but it is obſervable that he makes Aurelius Ambroſius to have fought the Battel at Wippedsfleet with Hengiſt and his Son Æſc, 16 years before this; which according to him was ſeven years after his coming into Britain: So that even Matthew Weſtminſter durſt not wholly rely on Geoffrey's Relation. But, as to the death of Hengiſt, Florentius ſaith, he died after he had reigned in Kent thirty four years, and Æſca ſucceeded him, An. Dom. 488. The Saxon Annals take no notice of Hengiſt's death, but place Æſc's Reign An. Dom. 487.

(n) Huntingd. l. 2.

(n) Henry of Huntingdon ſaith, That Hengiſt died the fortieth year after his coming into Britain, the 39th ſaith William of Malmesbury. But neither of them mentions any violent Death by the hands of his Enemies, and that after a Victory by the Britains under Aurelius Ambroſius; which are ſuch Circumſtances they could not eaſily have omitted, if they had then heard of them. But if they had heard of them, and yet left them out, it is a ſhrewd Sign, they gave no Credit to them. We are then to conſider, that Geoffrey of Monmouth, according to Leland, flouriſhed in the time of Henry I. Of King Stephen ſay Bale and Pits; but Leland obſerves, That he dedicated his Tranſlation of Merlin to Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln, the ſame that was Henry of Huntingdon's Patron: And William of Malmesbury dedicates his Hiſtory to the ſame Robert of Glouceſter, Son to Henry I. to whom Geoffrey dedicates his Tranſlation of the Britiſh Hiſtory, who died 12 of King Stephen. So that in all probability Geoffrey's Book was ſeen by both theſe Hiſtorians, and ſince they do not follow him where they have occaſion to mention the ſame matters, They plainly diſcover they preferr'd Nennius before him, whom both of them follow; but it appears by H. Huntingdon he then paſſed under the Name of Gildas.

(o) Cambr. l. 2. c. 1.

But theſe two Hiſtorians thought it beſt for them to decline taking any publick notice of Geoffrey's Hiſtory, it being ſo great a Novelty then, and probably enough in ſome eſteem with Robert of Glouceſter, whoſe Father; as (o) Giraldus Cambrenſis ſaith, had lately ſubdued the Britains in Wales; and ſuch a Hiſtory ſeemed to add to his Father's Glory. But after Robert's death, William of Newborough very frankly delivers his Opinion of it, charging the Original with Falſhood, and the Tranſlator with Inſincerity. Geoffrey, in the Concluſion of his Hiſtory, mentions William of Malmesbury and H. of Huntingdon, as then Writing the Engliſh Hiſtory; But he bids them not to meddle with the Britiſh Kings, ſince they had not the Britiſh MS. which Walter of Oxford brought out of Britany. But they do not forbear to make uſe of Nennius; and Huntingdon tranſcribes ſeveral things out of him; But they do not inlarge or alter or adorn their Hiſtory in one Point from the Britiſh MS. although in all likelyhood ſet forth before their Death.

As to what he next adds, That after his Victory over the Saxons, Aurelius Ambroſius called the Princes and great Men together at York, and gave order for repairing the Churches which the Saxons deſtroyed, there is far greater probability in it. For after the Battel at Wippedsfleet, which was ſeventeen years after the Saxons coming; H. Huntingdon ſaith, Things remained quiet for a good while between the Britains and Saxons; and in that time it is reaſonable to preſume that Ambroſius and the Nobles and People did their endavour towards the recovering the honour of their Churches, as well as of the Kingdom. And after the care he took in other places, ſaith Geoffrey, he marched to London, which had ſuffered as well as other Cities; and having called the diſperſed Citizens together, he went about the repairing of it; all his deſign being the reſtoring the Church and Kingdom. From thence he went to Wincheſter and to Salisbury. And in the paſſage thither Geoffrey launches out to purpoſe in his Hiſtory of Stonehenge, tranſlated ſaith he, by Merlin out of Ireland, to make a Monument for the Britiſh Nobles, ſlain there by Hengiſt's Treachery: Which is ſuch an Extravagancy that it is to be wondred any ſhould follow him in it, and yet Matt. (p) Weſtminſter tranſcribes the main of it; and (q) Walter Coventry ſets it down for authentick Hiſtory; But he adds two circumſtances which make it ſeem probable that Stonehenge had ſome Relation to Ambroſius, viz. That here Ambroſius was Crowned, and was not long after buried; from whom (r) Polydore Virgil makes it the Monument of Ambroſius; and John of Tinmouth in the Life of Dubricius calls it Mons Ambroſii: And the Name of Ambresbury near it doth much confirm the probability, That it had rather a reſpect to Ambroſius, than either to the Romans or the Danes. But I cannot now inſiſt on this.

(p) Flores; A. D 490.
(q) W. Coventry in Præfat.
(r) Polyd. Virg. Hiſt. l. 3.

(s) Matthew Weſtminſter confirms Geoffrey's Relation concerning the great Zeal of Ambroſius in repairing the Britiſh Churches every where, and ſetting up Divine Worſhip in them, and giving great incouragement to the Clergy to perform all Divine Offices, and particularly to pray for the Proſperity of the Church and Kingdom. But Geoffrey adds yet farther concerning him, that in a ſolemn Council of the Britains he appointed two Metropolitans for the two Vacant Sees at that time, viz. Sampſon one of eminent piety for York, and Dubricius for Caer-leon. This ſaith Matt. Weſtminſter was done An. Dom. 490. and he makes them both to live and flouriſh An. Dom. 507. But he ſaith, That Sampſon was afterwards driven over to Aremorica, and there was Archbiſhop of Dole among the Britains. For An. Dom 561. he ſaith, another Sampſon ſucceeded in that See, the former who came out of Great Britain to the Leſs. Sigebert of the old Edition, An. Dom. 566. ſpeaks of Sampſon then Archbiſhop of Dole, Kinſman to Maglorius, who came from the Britain beyond the Sea to that on this ſide. This ſecond Sampſon's Life is extant in the Bibliotheca Floriacenſis, where he is ſaid to have been born in Britain, and the Scholar of Iltutus, and conſecrated by Dubricius. But (t) Giraldus Cambrenſis ſaith, The Pall was carried over from Wales to Dole, in the time of another Sampſon, who was the 25*th from St.* David, and went over becauſe of the Plague which diſcoloured People like the Jaundice, and therefore called Flava Peſtis: Which is tranſcribed by (u) Roger Hovedon. But here are ſeveral miſtakes in this Account. For there was no ſuch thing as a Pall then known or uſed in the Weſtern Church; And if this Sampſon went over on the occaſion of that Plague, there could not be 25 between St. David and him: For in the Life of St. Teliaus, St. David's Siſter's Son, that Plague is deſcribed, and then Sampſon is ſaid to be Archbiſhop of Dole, and to have received Teliaus and his Company with great joy, having been School-fellows under Dubricius, and Sampſon being conſecrated by him. But ſtill we have two Sampſons Archbiſhops of Dole, and in the time of the great Controverſie about that Archbiſhoprick, (of which afterwards) it was a Queſtion from which the Title was derived. And Innocent III. as Giraldus relates, ſaid it was from this Sampſon Archbiſhop of York: but but the Sammarthani only mention him that came from St. Davids, when Maglorius ſucceeded among the Aremorican Britains; but we are not yet come to them.

It is obſerved by H. of (w) Huntingdon, that after the Britains had a little reſpite from their Enemies, they fell into Civil diſſenſions among themſelves, which is very agreeable to what Gildas had ſaid. Of this the (x) Britiſh Hiſtory gives no improbable account, when it relates that one of Vortigern's Sons called Paſcentius, raiſed a Rebellion in the North againſt Ambroſius among the Britains, who were overcome by him, and put to flight; but afterwards he hired a Saxon to poiſon Ambroſius at Wincheſter. This ſaith Matthew Weſtminſter happen'd An. Dom. 497. But we are not to paſs over what he affirms of him, An. Dom. 485. viz That he commanded in the Battel at Mecredsburn againſt Ælla and his Sons, in which they were ſo much worſted as to ſend home for Supplies, as he ſaith. This Ælla and his Sons Cymen, Plenting and Ciſſa came into Britain, An. Dom. 477. and landed at a place from his eldeſt Son called Cymenſhore, on the Coaſts of Suſſex. (y) Camden ſaith it hath loſt its Name; But he proves from a Charter of Cedwalla to the Church of Selſey it muſt be near Wittering. Here Ælla and his Army fought the Britains at his firſt Landing, and forced them to retire to Andredeſwald, ſay the Saxon Annals, and Matthew Weſtminſter, Florentius and Huntingdon. The Saxon Annals and Huntingdon call it Andredeſleage: by that no queſtion is meant the vaſt Wood which began in Kent, and ran through Suſſex into Hampſhire, called by the Britains Coid Andred, by the Saxons Andred, and Andreſwald; from whence as Mr. Somner obſerves, that part of Kent where the Wood ſtood is ſtill called the Weald; and (z) Lambard obſerves, that no Monuments of Antiquity are to be met with in the Weald either of Kent or Suſſex. The Saxons after this Battel continued to inhabit on the Shore, till at laſt the Britains finding them to incroach farther, reſolved to fight them at a place called Mecredsburn. And a different account is given of the Succeſs of this Battel: The Saxon Annals and Ethelwerd only mention it, boaſting of no Victory; Florentius makes it a clear Victory on the Saxon ſide: Matthew Weſtminſter ſaith Ælla quitted the field, but confeſſeth the Britains had great loſs: H. of Huntingdon ſaith, It was a drawn Battel, both Armies having ſuſtained great damage and avoiding each other. After this Ælla and Ciſſa, ſay the Saxon Annals, beſieged Andredeſceſter and killed all the Inhabitants, leaving not one Britain alive; and ſo Florentius and Matthew Weſtminſter relate it. But he (a) ſaith, That the Britains came out of the Wood, and galled the Saxons ſo much, that they were forced to divide their Army; and the Inhabitants periſhed by a Famine as well as by the Sword: And he obſerves that the Saxons utterly demoliſhed the City, and the place where it ſtood was in his time ſhewed to Travellers. Therefore the queſtion among our Antiquaries which was the Anderida of the Ancients, Newenden or Haſtings or Pemſey is quite out of doors, unleſs one of theſe be proved to be built in the place of Anderida ſince Matthew Weſtminſter's days; which were towards the end of Edw. III. Thoſe words (b) Camden applies only to H. of Huntingdon, and he ſaith it was new built in Edw. I. his time, and therefore called Newenden; but they are likewiſe Matthew Weſtminſter's who lived after that time, and therefore it cannot be Newenden if it were rebuilt in the time of Edw. I. for he ſaith, The deſolate place was ſhewed in his time; unleſs one tranſcribed the other, without any regard to the difference of their own times.

This is the ſumm of what is there more at large related; but taking it all together, it is a very blind and partial account of the proceedings between the Britains and Saxons of that time. For even Matthew Weſtminſter, An. Dom. 494. takes notice of Cerdic and Kenric his Son, Landing with new Forces at a place called from him Cerdicſhore, (near Yarmouth ſaith (d) Camden where the name Cerdicſand ſtill remains) and fought the Britains at their firſt Landing, till they were forced to withdraw and leave room for them, who after went into the Weſtern parts, and laid the foundation of the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons. To the ſame purpoſe Florentius, Ethelwerd and Huntingdon. Seven years after him came Port and his two Sons Bleda and Magla, and arrived at Portſmouth, which had its Name from him, as the ſame Authors inform us from the Saxon Annals. Now how comes Geoffrey to think of none of theſe, but only of Hengiſt's two Sons in the North? Beſides, he let ſlip one of the greateſt Battels that was fought between Cerdic and Nathanleod, and pretends to give no account at all of it. This the Saxon Annals, Florentius, Ethelwerd and Matthew Weſtminſter all place An. Dom. 508. But Huntingdon the ſixtieth year after the firſt coming of the Saxons. This Nazaleod, as he calls him, was the greateſt King of the Britains, one of great Fame and Pride, from whom the Country about Charford did take its Name. At this place the whole Forces of the Britains were gathered together, and Cerdic procured aſſiſtance from Æſc of Kent, from Ælla of Suſſex, from Port and his Sons; ſo that here was a pitched Battel of the Strength of both ſides; and Nazaleod behaved himſelf with ſo much Courage, that he drove Cerdic out of the Field, and purſued him; which his Son who commanded the other Wing perceiving, followed him cloſe and cut him off, and 5000 of his Men who fled upon the death of their King. And from this memorable Battel, the Place was called Cerdicsford, and ſince Charford, upon the Aven between Salisbury and Ringwood. But who was this mighty King of the Britains, who loſt his Life in this Battel? (e) Mr. Camden profeſſes he cannot gueſs; unleſs it were Aurelius Ambroſius, whoſe Name he obſerves the Saxon Annaliſts never mention, nor the Battels wherein they were worſted. And the Britiſh Hiſtory is even with them for that, which takes no notice of this great Fight, wherein their King was ſlain. Matthew Weſtminſter will not have him to be King, but only to be General under Uther, who was then ſick, which contradicts Ethelwerd, and Huntingdon, and Florentius, who affirm him to have been then King, and as Huntingdon ſaith Rex Maximus Britannorum; which ſeems to imply, that there were more Kings then among the Britains, as there were among the Saxons; and that one was the Chief as in the Heptarchy. Archbiſhop (f) Uſher thinks this King was the ſame whom the Britiſh Hiſtory calls Uther, and that Nathanleod was his true Name, and Uther was a Nick-name to denote his fierceneſs, as the Annotator on (g) Nennius calls Arthur Mab Uter in the Britiſh Tongue for the ſame reaſon: And ſo Arthurus in Latine from the Britiſh Arth, which ſignifies a Bear. This is an ingenious Conjecture: But we are not ſo ſure there ever was ſuch a King as Uther, as we are from Gildas, that there was ſuch a one as Ambroſius; But Gildas ſaith, That ſome of the Race of Ambroſius were living in his time; therefore he died not without Iſſue, as the Britiſh Hiſtory ſuppoſes, and this might probably be his Son, who was ſlain in this Battel.

But what then is to be ſaid to King Arthur, who was Son to Uther, and ſucceeded him, whoſe mighty Feats are ſo amply related by the Britiſh Hiſtory? I think both ſorts are to blame about him, I mean thoſe who tell incredible Tales of him, ſuch as are utterly inconſiſtent with the Circumſtances of the Brittiſh Affairs at that time; and thoſe who deny there was any ſuch Perſon, or of any conſiderable Power among the Britains. William of Malmesbury takes notice of the Britiſh Fables about him, (and if I miſtake not makes a ſevere Reflexion upon Geofrey's Hiſtory without naming it, when he ſaith, Hic eſt Arthurus de quo Britonum Nugæ hodieq; delirant) but he wiſhes a true Account had been given of him, for he was the ſupport of his Countrey for a long time, who ſharpned the broken Spirits of the Britains, and made them Warlike. But after all, he will not allow him to have been Monarch in Britain, but only the General under Ambroſius. And in all this William keeps cloſe to Nennius; for Nennius ſpeaking of the Wars between the Britiſh Kings and the Saxons, ſaith of Arthur, Ipſe Dux erat Bellorum; although he exceeds the bounds of Truth in the next Words, & in omnibus Bellis Victor extitit, he came off always Conqueror. If this had been true, the Saxons could never have kept footing in England. I will allow the Saxon Annals to be partial in not recounting their Loſſes; and on the other ſide it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Saxons ſhould be always beaten, and yet always get Ground even in Arthur's Days. For after the great Battel wherein Nathanleod was killed, (the only Britiſh King mentioned in the Saxon Annals) Cerdic's two Nephews, Stuff and Witgar, landed upon Cerdicſhore, which (h) Matt. Weſtminſter here places on the Weſtern Coaſts (and not on the Eaſtern as Camden doth, which ſeems more probable, becauſe they came with Supplies to Cerdic their Uncle) but all agree, that as they fought upon their Landing, they had the better of the Britains; Huntingdon ſaith, It was ſuch a Victory as laid open the Countrey to them; the force of the Britains being ſcattered, God having caſt them off. Where was Arthur at this time? Again, five Years after ſaith Ethelwerd, Cerdic and Cenric, came the ſecond time to Cerdicsford, and there fought the Britains; the Saxon Annals ſay nothing of the Victory, but Florentius gives it to the Saxons, and ſo doth Huntingdon, who ſaith, the Britains had a terrible Blow that Day. And as an Evidence of the Saxons Conqueſt, Ethelwerd ſaith, That Year Cerdic began the Kingdom of the Weſt Saxons; From that very day ſaith Huntingdon, Anno Dom. 519. Here Matt. Weſtminſter is ſo hard put to it, that taking in King Arthur at Anno Dom. 516. he is forced to leave out this Battel, and to tell Geoffrey's Story of King Arthur's beating the Saxons in the North about York and Lincoln, and driving them as far as the Caledonian Wood, and takes no notice of Kerdic's ſetting up a Kingdom in the Weſt: But the following Year, Anno Dom. 520. he brings Colgrin, Badulph and Cheldric to Totnes with new Forces, with which they beſieged Bath; And then

(g) Nenn. c. 63.

(h) Mat. Weſtm. A.D. 514.

Arthur with his Caliburn did incredible Execution, for he ſaith, he killed 840 with his own Hands, and ſo totally routed the Saxons; and not a Word of Kerdic or Kenric, whereas Anno Dom. 528. he remembers them again, and tells what a mighty Army they had in the Iſle of Wight, which H. Huntingdon calls Witland, and what ſlaughter they made at Witgaresburgh, which had its Name from Witgar, one of Kerdic's Nephews, to whom he gave the Iſle of Wight, and was buried at Witgar ſaith Huntingdon.

But before this there was another Battel between Kerdic and the Britains at Cerdicſleage; which Huntingdon makes the ſame with Cerdicsford, in which there was great Slaughter on both ſides, and in that time, he ſaith, many Saxons came in out of Germany into Eaſtangle and Mercia, but they were not yet formed into Kingdoms; however, innumerable Battels were fought in many Places by Perſons whoſe Names are not recorded. And now Huntingdon mentions Arthur, as a moſt valiant General on the Britiſh ſide, who commanded in twelve Battels, in all which he had the better; and ſo reckons them up in order juſt as (i) Nennius had done, whom he tranſcribes, and when he hath ſet down the Places of the twelve Battels he confeſſes they were then unknown, but he adds, that there was almoſt perpetual fighting, in which ſometimes one ſide had the better and ſometimes the other; but ſtill the Saxons poured in greater Numbers upon them: And (k) Nennius ſaith, They increaſed here without intermiſſion, and fetched new Kings out of Germany to Rule over them. And then ſets down the Foundation of the Northern Saxon Kingdom under Ida, who govern'd all beyond Humber twelve Years, which was branched into two, Deira and Bernicia. This Kingdom began, ſaith Huntingdon, in the 13*th* Year of the Reign of Kenric (who ſucceeded Kerdic) Anno Dom. 547. and Ida deſcended from Woden was the firſt King. Kenric in his 18*th* Year, ſaith the ſame Author, fought againſt the Britains, who came with a powerful Army to Salisbury, where he diſperſed them and made them fly. But this is ſuppoſed to have hapned after Arthur's Death, which is placed by Matt. Weſtminſter and others, Anno Dom. 542.

We muſt therefore look back to judge of Arthur's Prowefs. We have already ſeen ſeveral Saxon Kingdoms eſtabliſhed, that of Kent, of South-Saxons, of Weſt-Saxons and Saxons in other Parts, not yet gather'd into Kingdoms; and beſides theſe, before Kerdic had gained the Iſle of Wight, H. Huntingdon ſaith, The Kingdom of Eaſt Saxons was founded by Erkinwin, whom Slede ſucceeded, who married the Daughter of Ermenerick, King of Kent, Siſter of Ethelbert, and Mother to Sibert the firſt Chriſtian King there. Now, if Arthur were a King ſo powerful, ſo irreſiſtible as the Britiſh Hiſtory makes him, how came all theſe Kingdoms to grow up under him? Why did he not ſend the Saxons all out of Britain? Nay, how came Cerdic and Kenric to grow ſo ſtrong in the Weſtern Parts as they did? Cerdic, ſaith (l) William of Malmesbury, came hither 8 Years after the death of Hengiſt, Anno Dom. 495. He was here 24 Years before he ſet up his Kingdom, and lived in it 16 Years. This was in the midſt of Arthur's Fame and Greatneſs. If it were ſuch as Geoffrey deſcribes, would he have ſuffered ſuch a Terror to the Britains to have been ſo near him? (m) Ranulphus Higden ſaith, That Arthur was ſo tired out with fighting Cerdic, (ſo weary of overcoming) that 26 Years after his coming he yielded part of the the Weſt to him: And to the ſame purpoſe (n) Rudburn ſpeaks. What is the meaning of all this? The plain truth is, they follow'd Geoffrey as far as they could, but they found at laſt they muſt give away Kerdic's Kingdom to him; and ſo they had better make it a free Act of King Arthur.

Let us now compare with this, the Account the Britiſh Hiſtory gives of him; which is this in ſhort.

(o) “After the death of Uther Pendragon, the Britiſh Nobility met at Silceſter, where they deſired Dubricius to conſecrate Arthur: For the Saxons had conquer'd from Humber to Cathnes. (It ſeems all clear on this ſide Humber.) And ſo he was no ſooner Crown'd but away he marches for York, (leaving the Saxons here in quiet poſſeſſion) where Childeric came with 600 Ships to aſſiſt the two Brothers Colgrin and Baldulph (whoſe Names the Saxon Annals conceal.) Upon this dreadful Conjunction Arthur repairs to London, and calls a Parliament: And they ſend over to Hoel King of Little-Britain, his Nephew, and who brings 15000 to his aſſiſtance at Southampton, (notwithſtanding Port and his Sons were ſo near) then away he marches for Lincoln, and there kills 6000 Saxons, and purſued the reſt into Scotland, and there diſmiſſed them home upon promiſe of Tribute; but they perfidiouſly returned to Totnes, and ſo marched to beſiege Bath: Where after he had done the execution Matt. Weſtminſter related, the Saxons get upon the Hill, which Arthur by the help of his Caliburn recover'd, killed the two Brothers, and made Childeric fly, whom Cador purſued to the Iſle of Thanet, (although the Son of Hengiſt had all Kent as his Kingdom.) After this he drives Gillomarus and his Iriſh home; and determined to root out the Scots and Picts, but upon great Submiſſion he ſpared them. This being done he returns to York, where he rebuilds the Churches, and ſettles Pyramus Archbiſhop in the place of Samſon, and reſtores the Britiſh Nobility. Next Summer he goes for Ireland, and having ſubdued that, he ſails for Iſeland, (not then inhabited ſaith (p) Arngrimus Jonas a Learned Native there) but upon notice of his coming, the Kings of Seland and the Orcades yielded themſelves. Then he returns home and ſettles the Nation in a firm Peace for 12 Years. (although the Saxons were every where about them.) After which time, his Name was dreaded abroad, and away he ſails for Norway, and there conquer'd Riculfus and the whole Countrey: from thence to Gaul, where he chopt in pieces the Head of Flollos the Governor in ſingle Combat, and diſpoſed the ſeveral Provinces to his Servants, and returning home reſolved to keep a ſolemn Court at Caer-leon, (this was well thought upon, for we read of no Saxons thereabouts) where beſides ſeveral Kings the three Metropolitans met, of London, York and Caerleon, beſides all his Nobility. But to paſs over the great Solemnities there, the Emperor Lucius (not to be found elſewhere) ſends to demand Tribute on the account of Julius Cæſar's Conqueſt, upon which he makes great Preparations to conquer Rome; and leaves Britain to Mordred his Nephew, who rebelled againſt him, and forced him to return home, when, after he had conquered Lucius, he was marching for Rome; and here Mordred had aſſociated Saxons, Scots and Picts, all againſt Arthur; but upon his coming the other fled to Wincheſter, from thence to Cornwall, where near the River Camblan he waited for Arthur's coming, “ ing, the iſſue of the Battel Mordred was killed, and Arthur mortally wounded, who was carried into the Iſland of Avalon, and there died and was buried.

This is the Britiſh Legend of King Arthur, which hath raiſed the laughter of ſome, and the indignation of others. William of Newburgh was the firſt who openly and in plain terms charged it with falſity and inconſiſtency; but againſt ſome parts of it he makes trifling objections; as about the three Archbiſhops, denying that the Britains had any Archbiſhops, becauſe the firſt Pall was given to Auguſtine the Monk. But this was a piece of Monkiſh ignorance in him, for there were Metropolitans before, and without Palls from Rome; and Archbiſhops or Metropolitans did aſſume the uſe of Palls to themſelves, without asking the Pope's leave; and when he ſaith Archbiſhops came ſo late into the Weſtern Churches, it is true the uſe of the word did, but the juriſdiction over Provinces was long before, as I have already ſhew'd.

Upon the reviving of Learning ſome were ſo offended at this ridiculous Legend, that they queſtioned whether ever there were ſuch a Perſon as Arthur, againſt whom Leland undertook the defence of King Arthur. But ſome of his Authors will not be allow'd to bear witneſs in this cauſe, being partial followers of Geoffrey; ſuch as Alfred of Beverly, Gray the Author of Scalæ-Chronicon, Joh. Burgenſis, Joh. Roſs, &c. Others do not ſpeak home to the point, ſuch are the Teſtimonies of Nennius, Malmesbury, Huntingdon, which make him only General of the Britiſh Forces: others are too modern, as Trithemius, Volaterranus, Philippus Bergomas, Nauclerus, Hector Boethius, Pontius Virunnius, &c. Others overthrow the main part of it, as to Arthur*'s Sovereign Dominion in* Britain, as the (q) Chronica Divionenſis, which ſaith, That after ſeveral Combats Cerdic had the poſſeſſion of the Weſt Saxon Kingdom by Arthur's Conſent: and as parts of this Kingdom he reckons Seven whole Provinces from Surry to Cornwall. But the Britiſh Hiſtory takes no notice of Cerdic, but ſuppoſes all under Arthur's command, and his Nephew Mordred's in his abſence. If Cerdic had the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom, then how comes no notice of him in the Battel at Camblan? how came the fight within his Territories? Again, the Author of the Life of Gildas cited by him, ſaith, That one Meluas had ſtollen his Wife Guenhere, and defiled her, and that Arthur a long time beſieged him in the Marſhes near Glaſſenbury. Is this agreeable to the mighty power of King Arthur, to have his Queen detained by force ſo long by ſuch an inconſiderable Perſon as Meluas? Eſpecially if it were as Caradoc of Lancarvan there ſaith, She was reſtored at laſt, more by the intreaty of Gildas than out of reſpect to Arthur*'s Authority.* As to Arthur's Seal which he lays ſo much weight upon, it certainly belonged to the Diploma he gave to the Univerſity of Cambridge, in his time, mentioned by Leland; and the Church of Weſtminſter, if they have it ſtill, ought to reſtore it. But after all Leland hath ſufficiently proved, That there was ſuch a Perſon as King Arthur from the Cair-Arture in Wales, two Mountains ſo called; And Arthur's Gate in Mongomery; and the abundant Teſtimony he brings about his Coffin in Lead found in Glaſſenbury, either in Henry the Second's time, or at leaſt in the beginning of Richard the Firſt, with an Inſcription ſet down often by him, and more exactly by (r) Camden. Where the Letters appear very rude, and the Inſcription very plain, and therefore more likely to be true.

ARTURIUS IN INSULA AVALONIA.

Where are all the Noble Titles given him in the Britiſh Hiſtory and contained in the Inſcription about his Seal?

PATRICIUS ARTURIUS BRITANNIÆ, GALLIÆ, GERMANIÆ, DACIÆ, IMPERATOR.

So much greater a Man was Arthur living, when he uſed his Seal, than dead, when ſo mean an Inſcription was put upon the lower part of his Leaden Coffin! How ſoon were all his great Titles forgotten!

(s) Hiſt. Brit. Defenſ. p. p. 109. But ſince Leland, Sir John (s) Price hath undertaken to vindicate the Story of King Arthur: and the firſt Argument he uſes is from the Inſcription on his Coffin, and the Antiquity of the Letters; but the modeſty of the Inſcription is a better Argument to me, for if the Monks deſigned a Cheat in Henry II. his time, and laid this Coffin there on purpoſe to deceive, they might counterfeit ſuch Letters, but they could never have held from ſpeaking more glorious things of ſo great a Heroe. p. 117. Then he produces the Teſtimonies of Nennius, Malmesbury and Huntingdon, and proves that theſe two could not take out of Geoffrey; that they did not I grant, but the other is not proved. The Verſes of Thaliaſin (who he ſaith lived in the time of Maglocunus mentioned p. 120. by Gildas) do prove That Arthur commanded in the Battel at Badon Hill, which I ſee no reaſon to queſtion; but Polydore Virgil will have Aurelius Ambroſius to do it, which I ſee no reaſon to believe. p. 121. Beſides, he quotes old Britiſh Chronicles, which reckon from Vortigern to the Battel on Badon Hill, wherein Arthur beat the Saxons, 128 years; from that Battel to the Battel at Camblan wherein Arthur was killed, 22 years. And he finds the Name of Arthur in many ancient p. 125. Britiſh Poems; and in the old Regiſter of Landaff: But that only proves, there was one Arthur, whoſe Son's Name was Noe; but what is more p. 128. material, he finds ſome paſſages agreeing with Geoffrey in the old Chronicles of St. Davids and Caer-Mardin, as to his fighting againſt Lucius Hiberus in Burgundy, and the Battel at Camblan; but it doth not appear, that theſe Chronicles were before Geoffrey's time. As to King p. 129. Arthur's Crown and Seal, they may go together. But as to Gildas his ſilence, from whence ſome would prove that there was no ſuch Perſon, he anſwers from Giraldus, that Arthur having killed his Brother p. 141. Hoel, he purpoſely left him out, which is no clear anſwer; For if Gildas did this in revenge, he would rather have mentioned his Cruelty, as we ſee he ſpares not the Kings of his own time. But his better Anſwer is, That Gildas deſign'd no Hiſtory, but a ſerious exhortation to the Britains to repent of their Sins, and therefore paſſes over other things, only by the by mentioning Ambroſius Aurelianus, and addreſſes himſelf to his main buſineſs; which is reaſon enough why he never names King Arthur.

(t) Scotic. l. 4. c. 25. Joh. (t) Fordon follows Geoffrey, as far as he thinks conſiſtent with the honour of his Country. This appears in the Story of King Arthur; for he ſaith, he was ſet up by a Faction againſt the lawful Heirs, who were Mordred and Walwan, the Sons of Uther's Daughter by Loth, then a great Man in Scotland; but deſcended from Fulgentius; but he after excuſes it, on the account of neceſſity; which Dubricius alledged, they being then under age ſo much, as not to be able to go into the Field. But he juſtifies Mordred's Rebellion afterwards againſt Arthur on this ground, that he had the right Title to the Crown. (u) Hector Boethius ſaith, That Lothius put in his claim, according to the ancient Law of the Britains, and that he ought to have the Regency during the Minority of his Sons; But the Britains would by no means hear of Strangers coming to their Crown; and ſo Arthur took poſſeſſion of it; who firſt conquer'd the Saxons 10 Miles from London, then took London (which it ſeems the Saxons had before) and ſo went towards Humber; and then he goes on with the Britiſh Hiſtory, only interſperſing ſome News of his own. Particularly he tells what a profane Chriſtmas Arthur kept with his Nobles at York for thirteen days together; And that ſuch Jollity and Feaſting then had its original from him. (w) Buchanan is ſo pleaſed with this notable obſervation, that he ſets it down for good Hiſtory; ſaying upon it, that the old Saturnalia were renewed, only the Days increaſed, and Saturn*'s Name changed to* Cæſar*'s, for,* ſaith he, we call that Feaſt Julia. But why ſhould the Name of Saturn be changed into Cæſar's, Was he worſhipped for a God among the Britiſh Chriſtians, as Saturn was among the Old Pagans? But the Name Julia imports it: by no means. For Buchanan doth not prove that this Name was ever uſed for that Feſtival among the Britains; And the Saxons who brought in both the Feaſt and the Name give another reaſon for it. For (x) Bede ſaith, That December was called Giuli from the converſion of the Sun and the increaſe of the days. And Giul, as (y) Loccenius obſerves, ſignified a Wheel, or any thing that turns round, in the Gothick Language. At which time among the Northern Nations, the Feaſt of the New-year was obſerved with more than ordinary jollity; thence as (z) Olaus Wormius and (a) Scheffer obſerve they reckon'd their Age by ſo many Iòla's, and Snorro Sturleſon deſcribes this New-years Feaſt, juſt as Buchanan ſets out the Britiſh Saturnalia, by feaſting and ſending Preſents or New-years Gifts to one another: Thence ſome think the Name of this Feaſt was taken from Iòla, which in the Gothick Language ſignifies to make merry. But (b) Olaus Rudbeck thinks the former more proper, not only from Bede's Authority, but becauſe in the old Runick Faſti a Wheel was uſed to denote that Feſtival: And as he obſerves, this Feſtival continued twelve days from their firſt of Juul. The true reaſon whereof was, as Olaus Rudbeck at large proves, from the Joy they had at the hopes of the return of the Sun; at which time they made Solemn Sacrifices to the Sun. But after Chriſtianity prevailed, all their Idolatrous Sacrifices were laid aſide, and this time of Feaſting was joined with the Religious Solemnities of that Seaſon, which in other parts of the World were obſerved by Chriſtians. Which is certainly a very different thing from the Roman Saturnalia, although Buchanan thought fit to parallel them.

But to proceed with the Story of King Arthur, as it is in Buchanan, who takes his Materials from Hector, and puts them into a finer dreſs. Arthur, he ſaith, made a League with the Scots and Picts, and Lothus brought his Sons to him: And then a reſolution was taken to drive out the Saxons, and to reſtore Chriſtianity; Then follow'd the Battel againſt Colgrin; of which before: And the reſt of Arthur's Battels: But upon the whole, he concludes that Geoffrey*'s Relations have no colour of Truth*; and yet he makes uſe of no other, but where he follows Hector's ctor's own inventions. The remainder of his Story is, “That things being quieted here, Arthur goes over into Leſſer Britain, and leaves the Government to his Nephew Mordred; But while he was abroad, ſome had prevailed with him to declare Conſtantine the Son of Cador his Succeſſor being born in Britain; which being done, Mordred ſet up for himſelf, and in a Battel about Humber, ſaith he, Mordred was killed, and Arthur mortally wounded. Thus Buchanan having picked what he thought fit of Hector, concludes with a bitter Invective againſt the fabulous Relations about Arthur; But he gives him an extraordinary Character, ſaying, he was certainly a great Man, of mighty Courage and wonderful kindneſs to his Country, preſerving them from Slavery, and keeping up or reſtoring the true Religion.

And that is the Subject I am now to conſider, viz. The State of Religion here in King Arthur's days. It was under great Perſecution almoſt where-ever the Saxons came, who were cruel both to the Bodies and Souls of the poor Britains: Moſt of the Southern and Weſtern parts were under their Tyranny, and (c) Brian Twyne quotes a paſſage out of Matthew Weſtminſter, which is not ſo full in the printed Copies, concerning the Perſecution of the Britiſh Chriſtians in the Eaſtern parts of the Land. For, ſaith he, An. Dom. 527. The Pagans came out of Germany, and took poſſeſſion of the Country of the Eaſt-Angles, & omni crudelitatis genere Chriſtianos affecerunt, They tormented the Chriſtians with all ſorts of Cruelty. Although this be wanting in other Copies, yet it may be reaſonably preſumed, The Saxons uſing the Britiſh Chriſtians in ſuch a manner in the moſt places where they prevailed. It is true that (d) Malmesbury ſaith, many of the Britains ſubmitted to Cerdic, and it is probable they were the better uſed for doing ſo. Thomas (e) Rudburn ſaith, That Cerdic allow'd Liberty of profeſſing the Chriſtian Religion to the Corniſh upon a certain Tribute. I rather think that Cerdic never went ſo far, but left that part to the Britains, who ſtill continued there: For in Gildas his time Conſtantine is ſaid to be King of the Danmonii: and (f) Camden obſerves out of Marianus Scotus, that An. Dom. 820. the Britains and Saxons had a terrible Fight at Camelford in Cornwall, which Leland thinks to have been Camblan, where King Arthur fought with Mordred, and near which is a Stone, ſaith Mr. (g) Carew, which bears Arthur's Name; but now called Atry. To prove what I have ſaid, that the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom did not extend to Cornwall, we may obſerve that, (h) William of Malmesbury ſaith, That Ceaulin, Grandchild to Cerdic, was the firſt who took Glouceſter, Ciceſter and Bath from the Britains, and drove them thence into the Rockey and Woody places: And in the time of Athelſtan, above 400 years after the coming of the Saxons; the Corniſh Britains did inhabit in Exceter, and were driven thence by him beyond the River Tamar, and confined by that, as the other Britains were by the Wye. This ſhews that the Britains in Cornwall, and thereabouts, were free from the Yoke of the Weſt-Saxon Kingdom. As to the Northern Britains, they came to ſome agreement after a while with Occa and Ebuſa, whom Hengiſt ſent thither; and that they had their own Government, and the Chriſtian Religion among them appears by the Hiſtory of Ceadwalla, a Prince of theſe Britains in (i) Bede. But theſe were but ſmall remnants in the Northern and Weſtern Parts. As to the Eaſtern, we have had the Teſtimony of Matthew Weſtminſter already. And although the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles did not begin till after-afterwards, about Anno Dom. 575. yet in the 9th Year of Cerdic, about Anno Dom. 517. Huntingdon obſerves, That many Angles or Saxons were come out of Germany, and took Poſſeſſion of the Countrey of the Eaſt-Angles and Mercia, and wherever they prevailed, the poor Britiſh Chriſtians ſuffered to the higheſt extremity. Which is enough to conſidering Men to overthrow the Credit of the ſuppoſed Diploma of King Arthur to the Univerſity of Cambridge, which bears date Anno Dom. 531. But Brian Twyne hath brought no fewer than 15 Arguments againſt it, which are far more than needed. For I cannot think that Dr. Cajus in earneſt believed it, for he goes not about to prove the Diploma, but King Arthur; And I cannot think it any Honour or Service to ſo famous and ancient an Univerſity, to produce any ſuch ſuſpected Diplomata or Monkiſh Legends to prove its Antiquity. It is not certain in whoſe Poſſeſſion London was at that time, from whence the Charter is dated: For the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons was then ſet up by Erkinwin, and London commonly was under that, and that Kingdom as (k) Malmesbury obſerves, had the ſame Limits which the Dioceſe of London now hath, viz. Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hartfordſhire: (l) Matt. Weſtminſter agrees, that Middleſex was under the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons, but he will not yield that Theonus Biſhop of London, did retire with his Clergy into Wales till Anno Dom. 586. and then he confeſſes, that he and Thadioc, Biſhop of York, when they ſaw all their Churches demoliſhed, or turned into Idol Temples, did for their Security retire thither.

And there was the freeſt Exerciſe of their Religion kept up, even in the Reign of King Arthur; There flouriſhed the Schools of Literature ſet up by Dubricius and Iltutus, and there were the Perſons of greateſt Reputation for Learning and Sanctity in the Britiſh Churches, ſuch as Dubricius, Iltutus, Paulinus, Gundleus, Cadocus, Sampſon, Paternus, Daniel, and St. David above the reſt, whoſe Reputation continues to this Day, and was preſerved in the Saxon Churches of Britain, as appears by the Breviary of Salisbury, where nine Leſſons are appointed upon his Day; And (m) Matthew obſerves that this was by a Provincial Conſtitution in the Province of Canterbury; But the nine Leſſons were taken out of the firſt Chapter of the Legend of his Life, a little being added at the end concerning his Death. It is the juſt complaint of (n) Bollandus, that there is nothing extant concerning him, which was written near his own time; and what is extant hath many fabulous mixtures, ſo that it is hard to find out the Truth. The oldeſt MS. of his Life, he ſaith, is that of Utrecht, which he hath publiſhed; the next he accounts is that in Colganus, which he would have thought to be the Life written by Ricemarchus, quoted by Archbiſhop (o) Uſher; whom he ſuppoſes to have lived before Giraldus Cambrenſis, who tranſcribed much out of him. But Colganus withall intimates, That the Life was taken out of an old Book, wherein Auguſtin Macraidin, the Author of the Annals of Ulſter had written many things, and probably might write that too; and to confirm this Bollandus obſerves, only a little difference in Style between this and the Utrecht MS. But if we add to theſe, Giraldus his Life, with that of John of Tinmouth, or Capgrave, we ſhall after all find, the Life of St. David, not much clearer than that of his Nephew Arthur, for he is ſuppoſed to have been Uncle to him by the Mothers ſide, whoſe Name is ſaid to be Nonnita in Capgrave; Nonna in the Utrecht MS. Nemata in Colganus, Melari in the Life of St. Kenna; ſo Colganus and

Bollandus ſay; But in Capgrave I find Melari ſaid to be the Mother to the Father of St. David, i. e. to Xantus King of the Provincia Ceretica, i. e. Cardiganſhire (ſo called from Ceretus Father to Xanctus ſay ſome; from Caraticus, who ruled here, as (p) Camden ſeems inclinable to believe) That Melari was one of the 12 Daughters of Braghanus King of Brecknock from whom, (q) Giraldus ſaith, The County took its Name; And he ſaid from the Britiſh Hiſtories that he had 24 Daughters; but Capgrave ſaith, he had 12 Sons and 12 Daughters. D. Powell in his Notes on Giraldus ſaith, this Brachanus his Father was Haulaphus, King of Ireland, and his Mother a Britain, viz. Marcella, Daughter to Theodoric Son of Tethwaltus King of Garthmathrin, afterwards called Brecknock; Another Daughter of Brachanus, he ſaith, was Wife to Congenus Son to Cadel, King of Powiſland, and Mother of Brochmiel, who killed Etheldred King of Northumberland, and routed his Army about Anno Dom. 603. By this we ſee what a Number of Petty Princes there was about that time among the Britains; but whether St. David were Uncle by the Mother to King Arthur or not, we have not light enough to diſcover. I ſhall paſs over all the Legendary Parts of his Life; and conſider only what relates to the Church Hiſtory of thoſe Times. His Domeſtick Education is ſaid to have been under Pauleus or Paulinus a Diſciple of St. German; with whom he continued ten Years; in the Iſle of Wight, ſaith Giraldus, but it ſeems more probable to have been Whiteland in Caermardenſhire; the School of Iltutus being not far off in Glamorganſhire at Lantwitt, i. e. Fanum Iltuti; and in his Life it is ſaid, that he came to the King of Glamorgan; and after, that Sampſon, Paulinus, Gildas and David were his Scholars. But Bollandus ſhews, that there muſt be a miſtake as to David; and that inſtead of him it ſhould be read Daniel, who was a Diſciple of Iltutus, and conſecrated firſt Biſhop of Bangor by Dubricius. After this it is ſaid, that David and Eliud, or Teliaus, and Paternus went to Jeruſalem, and David was there conſecrated Biſhop by the Patriarch. And it is not to be wondred, that in ſuch a diſtracted time at home, they ſhould go to Jeruſalem, when (r) St. Jerome in his time mentions the Britains going thither; eſpecially ſuch as were more inclined to Devotion; which humour ſpread ſo much, that Gregory Nyſſen wrote againſt it, as a thing very much tending to Superſtition if not ariſing from it. But it was moſt excuſable in ſuch a troubleſome time at home. Not long after his return, the famous Synod at Brevy was held at a place called Lhandewy-brevy, the Church of St. David at Brevy. Here the Utrecht MS. ſaith; was a Synod aſſembled of all the Biſhops of Britain, upon the account of the Pelagian Controverſie then revived. Giraldus ſaith, It was a general Convention of Clergy and Laity. But the former MS. ſaith, there were preſent 118 Biſhops, beſides Abbats and others. One would think it hard to find ſo many Biſhops in Britain at that time: And Bollandus ſtartles at it; but Colganus undertakes to defend it; having premiſed that Giraldus and Capgrave leave it out; But he ſaith, there were more Biſhops at that time than afterwards; and more Biſhops than Biſhopricks, Dioceſes not being then ſo limitted as afterwards; And every Monaſtery almoſt having a Biſhop its Superior; by which means he juſtifies St. Patrick's conſecrating, as Jocelin ſaith, 350 Biſhops with his own Hands. But after all this, Giraldus did much better to omit ſuch a number in ſuch a time, unleſs there were better Teſtimony concerning it. However there was a conſiderable number there preſent, yet St. David was abſent abſent; and firſt Paulinus was ſent to him, but he prevailed not, then Daniel and Dubricius went, upon whoſe intreaty he came, and by his Authority and Eloquence put an effectual ſtop to Pelagianiſm: And before the end of the Synod it is ſaid, That by general Conſent he was Choſen Archbiſhop of Caerleon, Dubricius deſiring to retire on the account of his Age.

But here we meet with a conſiderable difficulty concerning the Succeſſion to Dubricius, viz. That Teliaus is ſaid to ſucceed Dubricius at Landaff, and to have Power over all the Churches of the Weſtern Parts of Britain; How can this be conſiſtent with St. David's ſucceeding Dubricius in the See of Caerleon, which had the Metropolitan Power over thoſe Churches?

(s) Biſhop Godwin out of Bale, and as he ſuppoſeth, out of Leland ſaith, That St. Dubricius was firſt Biſhop of Landaff being there conſecrated by Germanus and Lupus, and that afterwards he was removed by a Synod to Caerleon, and Teliaus placed in Landaff. But this by no means clears the difficulty; for although Bale doth there exactly follow Leland, yet Leland himſelf doth not ſeem to have conſulted the Book of Landaff; Where it is ſaid, That when Dubricius was made Archbiſhop, he had the See of Landaff conferr'd upon him, by the Gift of Mouricus then King, and the three Eſtates, i. e. the Nobles, Clergy and People, and all the Land between the Taff and Elie: And (t) Leland himſelf out of another Author ſaith, That when Dubricius was made Archbiſhop, Landaff was made his Cathedral Church. After Dubricius his time Teliaus is ſaid to be Archbiſhop ſeveral times in the Book of Landaff; and after him Oudoceus is called Summus Epiſcopus; and the Biſhop of Landaff in his Petition to Calixtus 2. Anno Dom. 1109. ſaith, That it appears by the hand writing of St. Teliaus, That the Church of Landaſſ was Superior in dignity to all other Churches in Wales. That which ſeems to me the moſt probable account of this matter is, That when Landaff was given to Dubricius then Archbiſhop, he fixed his See there, and ſo Landaff was the Seat of the Archbiſhop of Caerleon. But afterwards when St. David removed the Archiepiſcopal See to Menevia, a remote, barren and inconvenient Place, as Giraldus himſelf confeſſeth; The Biſhops of Landaff aſſumed the Archiepiſcopal Power, which had been in that See, and would not ſubmit to the Biſhops of St. Davids. This is apparent from that paſſage of Oudoceus (who ſucceeded Teliaus) in the Book of Landaff, that he would not receive Conſecration from the Biſhop of St. Davids, as his Metropolitan, but had it from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. This is a very improbable thing at that time, conſidering the hatred the Britains did bear to the Saxons, and their Biſhops to Auguſtine the Monk: It is far more likely that they received it from the Archbiſhop of Dole in Britany; or from the Archbiſhop of London then reſident in thoſe Parts; who probably kept up their Succeſſion for ſome time, as long as there were any hopes of returning to their own See, as is before obſerved.

(t) Collect. Vol. 2. p. 42.

After this Giraldus ſpeaks of another great Council held by St. David, which he calls Victoria; in which he ſaith all the Clergy of Wales were preſent; And the Decrees of the former Council were confirmed, and new Canons made for the Government of the Britiſh Churches; But this ſecond Synod is not mentioned in the old Utrecht MS. nor in Capgrave, but it is in Colganus, and by the Expreſſions it appears to have been taken out of Giraldus, who confeſſeth, That no Copies of thoſe Canons were to be ſeen in his time, that Coaſt being ſo often viſited by Pirats, (who no doubt came to ſteal MSS. and eſpecially Church-Canons.) I will not deny that the Britiſh Churches at that time, and in thoſe Parts might be ſaid to be in a flouriſhing Condition, in compariſon with other Parts of Britain, and there might be more Chriſtians there, becauſe they had been driven out from other Places; and their Brethrens Afflictions might encreaſe their Devotion; But Gildas takes no more notice of St. David than he doth of King Arthur. The Battel at Badon-hill, according to Archbiſhop Uſher, was the Year after the Synod at Brevy, and from that time the Britiſh Churches had ſome quiet from their Enemies: But then (u) Gildas ſaith, The Britains quarrelled among themſelves; but yet ſo as that ſome kind of Order and Government was then kept up among them, by the Remembrance of their late Calamities. And at this time he ſpeaks the beſt of the Britains, that he doth in his whole Book; for he ſaith, That Kings, and Publick and Private Perſons, Biſhops and other Churchmen (for Sacerdotes in that Age often ſignified Biſhops, and Gildas calls it, Sacerdotalem Epiſcopatus Sedem) did all keep to the Duty of their Places. But then he adds, when the Senſe of theſe Calamities was worn out, and a new Generation aroſe, they fell into ſuch a degeneracy as to caſt off all the Reins of Truth and Juſtice, that no remainder of it appear'd in any ſort of Men, except a few, a very few, whoſe number was ſo ſmall in compariſon with the reſt, that the Church could hardly diſcern its genuine Children when they lay in her Boſome.

(u) Gild. §. 26.

But before I come to this laſt and ſaddeſt part of the Hiſtory of the Britiſh Churches it will be neceſſary now to give ſome Account of thoſe Britains, who being wearied out here went for Refuge to that Countrey in France, which from them is called Bretagn.

It ſeems hard to determine when the firſt Colony of Britains was ſettled in the Parts of Aremorica. For in the declining times of the Roman Empire, there was ſo frequent occaſion of the Britiſh Soldiers removing into the Continent, and ſo little encouragement to return hither, that it is not improbable, that after the Troubles of Maximus and Conſtantine a Colony of Britains might ſettle themſelves upon the Sea Coaſts near to Britain, where they might be ready to receive or to go over to their Countreymen, as the condition of Affairs ſhould happen. This I am very much induced to believe, not from the Authority of Nennius, or Geoffrey, or William of Malmesbury, or Radulphus Niger, &c. but from theſe Arguments;

Firſt from Sidonius Apollinaris; and there are two Paſſages in him which tend to the clearing this matter; The firſt is concerning Arvandus accuſed at Rome of Treaſon, in the time of Anthemius, for perſuading the King of the Goths to make War upon the Greek Emperor, i. e. Anthemius, who came out of Greece, and upon the Britains on the Loir, as (w) Sidonius Apollinaris expreſly affirms, who lived at that time, and pitied his Caſe. This hapned about Anno Dom. 467. before Anthemius was the ſecond time Conſul. From whence it appears, not only that there were Britains then ſettled on the Loir, but that their Strength and Forces were conſiderable, which cannot be ſuppoſed to conſiſt of ſuch miſerable People as fled from hence for fear of the Saxons: And it is obſervable, that about this time Ambroſius had Succeſs againſt the Saxons, and by Vortimer's means, or his, the Britains were in great likelihood of driving them out of Britain; ſo that there is no probability that the Warlike Britains ſhould at that time leave their Native Countrey. A ſecond paſſage is concerning Riothamus, a King of the Britains in the time of (x) Sidonius Apollinaris, and to whom he wrote, who went with 12000 Britains to aſſiſt the Romans againſt Euricus King of the Goths, but were intercepted by him, as (y) Jornandes relates the Story, and Sigebert places it Anno Dom. 470. Now what clearer Evidence can be deſired than this, to prove that a conſiderable Number of Britains were there ſettled, and in a condition not only to defend themſelves, but to aſſiſt the Romans; which cannot be imagined of ſuch as merely fled thither after the Saxons coming into Britain. Beſides we find in Sirmondus his Gallican Councils, Manſuetus, a Biſhop of the Britains ſubſcribing to the firſt Council at Tours, which was held Anno Dom. 461. By which we ſee the Britains had ſo full a Settlement then, as not only to have Habitations, but a King and Biſhops of their own; which was the great incouragement for other Britains to go over, when they found themſelves ſo hard preſſed by the Saxons at home. For a People frighted from hence, would hardly have ventured into a foreign Countrey, unleſs they had been ſecure before hand of a kind Reception there. If they muſt have fought for a dwelling there, had they not far better have done it in their own Countrey? From whence I conclude, that there was a large Colony of Britains in Aremorica before thoſe Numbers went over upon the Saxon Cruelties; of which (z) Eginhardus and other foreign Hiſtorians ſpeak. Archbiſhop Uſher ſeems to think this Riothamus himſelf to have been the firſt Leader of them; But it is hard to think a Perſon of his Valour and Experience would leave his Countrey in that diſtreſſed Condition it was brought into by the Saxons.

But (a) Florentius, the Author of the Life of Judocus Son to a King of Bretagn ſaith, That his Name was Rioval, a Prince here in Britain, who gathered a good Army and Fleet together, and with that ſubdued the People who lived on the Aremorican Coaſts, being then left deſtitute and unable to defend themſelves. For that was the effect of the Roman Government, which was kept up by the force of the Roman Legions in all Parts of it, and ſo when theſe were broken, the Nations were ſo unaccuſtomed to War, that they lay open to all Invaders. So that the Aggreſſors did generally ſucceed in their attempts where the Roman Legions were withdrawn; and next to the Wiſe Providence of God which ordereth all things, there was no one Cauſe which contributed ſo much to the miſeries of thoſe times, and the ſtrange Revolutions which hapned in them, as the Natives being not trained up to Martial Diſcipline, but depending wholly on the Roman Legions for their Defence and Security; thence, whatever People had the Courage to invade, did uſually take Poſſeſſion of the Countrey where the Roman Legions were at a diſtance, or otherwiſe engaged againſt each other. Thus in France, the Goths, the Burgundians, the Franks, and the Britains took poſſeſſion of the ſeveral Parts they attempted; and the Goths and Vandals in Spain: So Goths and Lombards in Italy it ſelf. So that it is not to be wondred, if the Saxons prevailed here at laſt; but with as much difficulty, and after as many Battels, as were fought by any People of that time without foreign Aſſiſtance. But to return to the Aremorican Britains, whether they came over under Rioval in the beginning of the Diſtractions here, when the People were ſo Rebellious againſt their Princes, as Gildas relates, or whether they went over to aſſiſt Con- ſtantine and his Son, and ſo remained there, I ſhall not determine. But that the Britains were well ſettled there before Sampſon Archbiſhop of York and his Company paſſed the Seas, appears by what (b) Matt. Paris ſaith, That they went to their fellow Citizens and Countrey Men, hoping to live more quietly there. And after the death of the Biſhop of Dole, he was by the conſent of the Britains put into his Place, and from thenceforwards exerciſed his Archiepiſcopal Power there; the Kings of that Province, not ſuffering his Succeſſors there to pay any Obedience to the Archbiſhop of Tours. Which begot a Suit which held 300 Years in the Court of Rome, and was this Year manfully decided by Innocent III. as Matt. Paris there relates: Who ſtates the Caſe very unskilfully, laying the weight of it upon the Archbiſhop's bringing over his Pall from York, which the Pope had given him there. Suppoſe this were true (although the Popes gave no Palls then, nor a great while after) yet this were no reaſon to conteſt it in the Court of Rome ſo long together. But the difficulty of the Caſe lay upon another Point, viz. according to the Old Canon of the Church, If a Province were divided into two, each Province was to have a Metropolitan; Now this Reaſon held much ſtronger when new Kingdoms were erected out of the Roman Provinces: For what Reaſon was there why the Biſhop of Dole in the Kingdom of Bretagn ſhould yield Subjection to the Biſhop of Tours in a diſtinct Kingdom? And there was the fairer Colour for this when one actually an Archbiſhop before came to be ſettled there; and from hence they inſiſted on a Preſcription of a very long time, wherein no Subjection had been made to the Biſhop of Tours, as appears by the account given of this Cauſe by (c) Innocent III. in his Epiſtles lately publiſhed by Baluzius. On the other ſide it was pleaded, that all Britany was under the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Tours, but that the Britains conſpiring againſt the King of France, and ſetting up a Kingdom of their own, they made uſe of Sampſon, Archbiſhop of York, coming to eſtabliſh a Metropolitan Power within that Kingdom; and upon Complaint made to Rome, the Popes had put it upon this iſſue, whether any of their Predeceſſors had granted the Pall to the Biſhop of Dole, which not being proved, the Pope, as it was eaſie to imagine, gave Sentence againſt the Biſhop of Dole. But it is certain, that they went upon a falſe Suggeſtion, viz. That the Kingdom of Bretagn was ſet up in Rebellion to the Kingdom of France. For Childeric had not extended his Dominions in France as far as the Loir: and before his time, the Britains were in quiet Poſſeſſion of thoſe Parts of Aremorica; and the beſt (d) French Hiſtorians now grant that the Britains came thither in the time of Merovée, who obtained but little in Gaul, as (e) Hadrianus Valeſius confeſſeth. And the (f) Author of the Life of Gildas obſerves, That the Power of the Kings of France was very inconſiderable in the time of Childeric, Son of Merovée, at what time Gildas went over into Aremorica, as his School-fellows under Iltutus, Sampſon and Paulus had done before him; whereof one ſucceeded the other Sampſon at Dole, and the other was made Biſhop of the Oxiſmii, the moſt Northern People of Bretagn; which Dioceſe is ſince divided into Three, Treguier, S. Pol de Leon, and S. Brieu.

Here Gildas at the requeſt of his Brethren who came out of Britain, ſaith the Author of his Life, wrote his Epiſtle, wherein he ſo ſharply reproves the ſeveral Vices of the five Kings of Britain, whom he calls by the Names of Conſtantine, Aurelius, Vortiporius, Cuneglaſus and Maglocunus; and ſpeaks to them all as then living. The (g) Britiſh Hiſtory makes them to ſucceed each other; Conſtantine, according to that, was killed in his third year by Aurelius Conanus. He died in his ſecond year, and Vortiporius ſucceeding him Reigned four years. After him he places Malgo, and leaves Cuneglaſus wholly out. But that they Reigned at the ſame time in ſeveral parts of Britain is evident from Gildas, becauſe he ſaith, He knew that Conſtantine was then living; Now Conſtantine Reigning the firſt of theſe, how could he ſpeak to the four Kings that ſucceeded him, if he were ſtill living? For there is no colour, for imagining that Gildas ſtill added his Reproof as one died and another ſucceeded; for any one may diſcern it was written in one continued Style, and he writes to them all as then living without the leaſt intimation that they ſucceded each other: Beſides, he calls Conſtantine the Iſſue of the impure Danmonian Lioneſs; and at this time the Britains in the remote Weſtern parts were ſeparated from the other by the Weſt Saxon Kingdom; and therefore there is far leſs Probability that all the Britains at that time ſhould be under one Monarch. And where they had greateſt freedom of living together, they were divided into ſeveral Principalities. For he, whom Gildas calls Maglocunus, is by the Britiſh Writers called Maelgun Guineth, and Maelgunus mentioned by John of Tinmouth, in the Life of St. Paternus, and by Thalieſſin in Sir John Price, from whom it appears that he was King of North-Wales. And as Gildas calls Vortiporius the Tyrant of the Demetæ, by whom the Inhabitants of South-Wales are underſtood: Aurelius Conanus, Archbiſhop (h) Uſher thinks was King of Powiſland; which was ſometime a third Kingdom. And for Cuneglaſus, it ſeems probable, he had the Command of the Northern Britains; for it is plain from Bede they had a diſtinct Principality there. All theſe Gildas doth very ſeverely reprove for their ſeveral vices; and then taxes the Judges and Clergy to the Concluſion of his Epiſtle, to the end they might repent of their Sins, and acquit the juſt and wiſe Providence of God in the judgments he brought upon them, which were very terrible, and ended in the deſolation of the Country and the ruine of the Britiſh Churches, excepting only thoſe Remnants which were confined to the Corners of the Land. For our (i) Hiſtorians ſay, That the Saxons left not the Face of Chriſtianity where-ever they did prevail.

This is a very ſad Subject, which ought not to be paſſed over without that Reflection which St. (k) Paul made on the Church of the Jews and Gentiles.

Behold the goodneſs and ſeverity of God; on them which fell ſeverity, but towards thee goodneſs; if thou continue in his goodneſs, otherwiſe thou alſo ſhalt be cut off.

It remains only, that we conſider the Liberty or Independency of the Britiſh Churches; of which we can have no greater Proof than from the Carriage of the Britiſh Biſhops towards Auguſtine the Monk, when he came with full power from the Pope to require Subjection from them. And this material point relating to the Britiſh Churches I ſhall endeavour to clear from all the Objections which have been made againſt it. In order thereto, we are to underſtand, That (l) Auguſtine the Monk by virtue of the Pope's Authority, did challenge a Superiority over the Biſhops of the Britiſh Churches, which appears not only by Gregory's Anſwer to his Interragations, but by the Scheme of the Eccleſiaſtical Government, here, which Gregory ſent to him, after he had a fair pro-ſpect of the Converſion of the Saxons, which was at the ſame time that he ſent Melitius, Juſtus, Paulinus and Rufinianus, with the Archiepiſcopal Pall to him. There he declares that there were to be two Archbiſhops Sees, one at London (which out of honour to Ethelbert or Auguſtine was fixed at Canterbury, or rather by Ethelbert's own Authority) and the other at York, which had been a Metropolitan See in the Britiſh times, and both theſe Archbiſhops were to have twelve Suffragan Biſhops under them. The Biſhop of London was to be conſecrated by his own Synod, and to receive the Pall from the Pope; But Auguſtine was to appoint the firſt Biſhop of York, who was to yield Subjection to him for his time, but afterwards the Sees were to be Independent on each other. But by all this, it ſhould ſeem, that he had Authority given him only over thoſe Biſhops who were conſecrated by him, and the Archbiſhop of York; what then becomes of thoſe Biſhops in Britain who were Conſecrated by neither, and ſuch they knew there were? Concerning theſe Gregory gives a plain Anſwer, That they were all to be ſubject to the Authority of Auguſtine; and to govern themſelves in Life and Doctrine and Church-Offices according to his Direction. Auguſtine being furniſhed with ſuch full Powers, as he thought, deſires a Meeting with the Britiſh Biſhops, at a place called Auguſtinſac, as (m) Bede ſaith, in the Confines of the Wiccii and the Weſt-Saxons. Where this place was is very uncertain, and not at all material; Camden could find nothing like it, and the Conjectures of others ſince have no great probability, either as to Auſtric, or Hauſtake, or Oſſuntree, but at this place, the Britiſh Biſhops gave Auguſtine a Meeting; where the firſt thing propoſed by him was, That they would embrace the Unity of the Catholick Church, and then join with them in Preaching to the Gentiles, for, ſaith he, they did many things repugnant to the Unity of the Church; Which was in plain terms to charge them with Schiſm; and the Terms of Communion offer'd, did imply Submiſſion to the Church of Rome, and by conſequence to his Authority over them. But the utmoſt that could be obtained from them, was only that they would take farther advice, and give another Meeting, with a greater Number. And then were preſent Seven Biſhops of the Britains, and many Learned Men, chiefly of the Monaſtery of Banchor, where Dinoth was then Abbat; And the Reſult of this Meeting was, That they utterly refuſed Submiſſion to the Church of Rome, or to Auguſtine as Archbiſhop over them. And for the Account of this, we are beholding to Bede, whoſe Authority is liable to no exception in this matter.

(m) L. 2. c. 9.

But againſt this plain Matter of Fact, there have been three Objections made which muſt be removed.

(1.) That Auguſtine did not require Subjection from the Britiſh Biſhops, but only treated with them, about other matters in difference between them.

(2.) That their refuſing Subjection to the Biſhop of Rome depends upon the Credit of a Spurious Britiſh MS. lately invented and brought into light, as the Anſwer of Dinoth.

(3.) That if they did refuſe Subjection to the Pope, it was Schiſmatical Obſtinacy in them, and contrary to the former Senſe of the Britiſh Church.

To all theſe I ſhall give a clear and full Anſwer.

(1.) As to the matter of their Conference, it cannot be denied that other things were ſtarted; as about the Paſchal Controverſie and ſome Rites of Baptiſm, &c. but this was the main point; which Auguſtine did not in plain Terms inſiſt upon, becauſe it would look too invidiouſly to require Subjection to himſelf, but he cunningly inſinuates it under the Name of Eccleſiaſtical Unity. For I dare appeal to any Man's common Senſe, whether upon the Principles of the Church of Rome, the Britiſh Biſhops complying in other things and rejecting the Pope's Authority would have been thought ſufficient? If ſo, then Submiſſion to the Pope is no neceſſary term of Communion; and Men may be in a very ſafe Condition without it. But if it were neceſſary, then Auguſtine muſt imply it within the terms of Catholick Peace and Eccleſiaſtical Unity. It is therefore ridiculous in (n) Alford and (o) Creſſy, and ſuch Writers to ſay, That Auguſtine did not inſiſt upon it: For it is to charge him with Ignorance or Stupidity, that he ſhould leave out ſo neceſſary an Article of Communion: And yet Gregory had ſo great an opinion of him, as to make him the Director of the Britiſh Churches. And therefore it cannot be ſuppoſed that he ſhould offer terms of Communion without requiring Submiſſion to the Pope's Authority; if thoſe were in a ſtate of Schiſm who denied it.

But it is ſaid, That in the Concluſion of the ſecond Meeting, Auguſtine did not inſiſt upon, nor ſo much as mention any ſubjection to him from the Britiſh Churches, but only required Compliance in three Points, viz. the time of the Paſchal Solemnity agreeable with the Church of Rome; following the Roman Cuſtoms in Baptiſm; and joining with them in Preaching to the Saxons; and upon theſe they broke up the Meeting.

To which I Anſwer,

That theſe things were required by Auguſtine, not as Conditions of Brotherly Communion, but as the Marks of Subjection to his Authority; which appears from Bede's own Words, Si in tribus his mihi obtemperare vultis, &c. Which Creſſy very unfaithfully renders, If they would conform in three points only: Whereas the meaning is, If they would own his Authority in thoſe three things; and therefore the Britiſh Biſhops anſwered very appoſitely, when they ſaid, we will neither do the things nor ſubmit to you as Archbiſhop over us. Why ſhould they deny Subjection if it had not been required of them? Which ſhews they very well underſtood his meaning, and gave anſwer in ſhort, to the main point. And upon this Account I ſuppoſe it was, that the Anchoret's advice was followed about obſerving Whether he roſe up to the Britiſh Biſhops at their entrance; Not that they were ſo offended for want of a Complement, as Mr. Creſſy ſuggeſts, but this was look'd on by them, as a Mark of that Superiority which he challenged over them; And therefore they had reaſon to take ſo great notice of it, and to infer harder uſage from him, when they ſhould be under his Authority. They could not be ignorant what Authority the Pope had given Auguſtine, and that made them more Obſervant of his whole Behaviour, and finding it ſo agreeing to the Character of an Archbiſhop over the Britiſh Churches, They give him that Reſolute Anſwer, That they would not own any Authority he had as Archbiſhop over them. Which is a ſufficient proof, that this was really the main point conteſted between them.

(2.) As to the Britiſh MS. which contains Dinoth's Anſwer more at large; I Anſwer;

1. (p)

(n) Annals Eccleſ. A. D. 604. n. 11.

(o) Church. Hiſt. l. 13. ch. 19. n. 6.

1. (p) Leland obſerves, That the Britiſh Writers give a more ample account of this Matter than is extant in Bede; who is very ſparing in what concerns the Britiſh Affairs. But from them he ſaith, That Dinoth did at large diſpute with great Learning and Gravity againſt receiving the Authority of the Pope, or of Auguſtine; and defended the Power of the Archbiſhop of St. Davids; and affirmed it not to be for the Britiſh Intereſt to own either the Roman Pride or the Saxon Tyranny. And he finds fault with Gregory, for not admoniſhing the Saxons of their groſs Uſurpations, againſt their Solemn Oaths; And adds, that it was their duty, if they would be good Chriſtians, to reſtore their unjuſt and Tyrannical Power to thoſe from whom they had taken it. For Dinoth, out of his great Learning could not but know, that the Pope under a pretence of bringing in the true Faith could not confirm them in their unjuſt Uſurpation. For if that ſhould be admitted no Princes could be ſafe in their Dominions. And no doubt the Britiſh Biſhops looked upon this attempt of Auguſtine upon them to be the adding one Uſurpation to another: Which made them ſo adverſe to any Communication with the Miſſionaries which otherwiſe had been inexcuſable.

(2.) The certainty of the Britiſh Churches rejecting the Pope's Authority, and Auguſtine's juriſdiction doth not depend upon the Credit of this Britiſh MS. for this is ſufficiently clear from Bede's own Words, wherein they declare, they would not own Auguſtine as Archbiſhop over them. But if they had owned the Pope's Authority, they ought to have ſubmitted to him, who acted by virtue of his Commiſſion: And it was not poſſible for them at ſuch a diſtance from Rome, to expreſs their diſowning his Authority more effectually than by rejecting him, whom he had ſent to be Archbiſhop over them. And Nich. Trivet in his MS. Hiſtory cited by Sir H. (q) Spelman, ſaith expreſly, that Auguſtine did demand Subjection from the Britains to him, as the Pope's Legate, but they refuſed it. So that if this MS. had never been heard of, the Matter of Fact had been nevertheleſs fully atteſted.

(3.) The Objections againſt this MS. are not ſufficient to deſtroy the Authority of it. Sir H. Spelman who ſets it down at large in Welſh, Engliſh and Latin, tells from whom he had it, and exactly tranſcribed it, and that it appeared to him to have been an Old MS. taken out of an Older, but without Date or Author, and believes it to be ſtill in the Cotton Library. Here is all the appearance of Ingenuity and faithfulneſs that can be expected; and he was a Perſon of too great Judgment and Sagacity to be eaſily impoſed upon by a modern Invention, or a new found Schedule, as Mr. Creſſy Phraſes it. The ſubſtance of it is, That the Abbat of Banchor, in the Name of the Britiſh Churches declares, That they owe the Subjection of Brotherly Kindneſs, and Charity to the Church of God, and to the Pope of Rome, and to all Chriſtians: but other obedience than that, they did not know to be due to him whom they called Pope; And for their parts they were under the Juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Caerleon upon Usk, who was under God their ſpiritual Overſeer and Director. But ſay the Objectors, There was then no Biſhop of Caerleon upon Usk, and had not been ſince the time the Metropolitan Juriſdiction was by St. David tranſferr'd to Menevia. I grant that from the time of Dubricius the See was tranſferr'd firſt to Landaff, and then to St. Davids, but this latter Tranſlation was not agreed to by all the Britiſh Biſhops; And it appears by the foregoing Diſcourſe, That the Biſhops of Landaff did at that time when Oudoceus lived, challenge the Metropolitical Power of Caerleon to themſelves, and therefore would not be conſecrated by the Biſhop of St. Davids. And Caerleon having been the ancient Metropolitical See, it was no abſurdity at all to mention that in a Diſpute which depended upon ancient Right. For the Authority over the Britiſh Churches was not upon the account of St. David's or Landaff, but the Metropolitan Right which belonged to the See of Caerleon. As if in the Britiſh times the Metropolitan See had been removed from London to Canterbury, what incongruity had it been in a Diſpute of Superiority to have alledged, that the Britiſh Churches of theſe Parts were under the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of London, although at that time the See were removed to another Place? And if this be all to make it appear to be a Forgery, as Mr. Creſſy pretends, for all that I can ſee, it may be a very ancient and genuine MS.

But Alford goes deeper, for he diſproves it, becauſe it contradicts the Senſe of the Britiſh Churches before, which profeſſed Subjection to the Roman See.

This is indeed to the purpoſe if it be well proved, which in the laſt place comes to be conſidered.

(3.) To this purpoſe he alledges, (1.) The Confirmation of St. David*'s Synod by the Pope's Authority.* But from whence hath he this? From no other Teſtimony than that of Giraldus Cambrenſis cited by Biſhop Uſher, who in the ſame place confeſſes, That there was no Monument of thoſe Synods at all remaining, nor of the Pope's Confirmation of them; and the other MSS. and Legends of St. David's Life ſay not a Word of this. How then came Giraldus to affirm it? We are to remember that Giraldus had a Cauſe depending in the Court of Rome, about the Biſhoprick of St. David's, and he knew well enough what Doctrine was pleaſing there, and therefore the Teſtimony of ſuch a one, having no concurrent Evidence to ſupport it, is of very little force in this matter. (2.) He mentions the Reſpect Kentigern ſhew'd to the Church of Rome, going ſeven times thither, and having at laſt his uncanonical Ordination purged, or confirmed by the Pope; as the Author of his Legend relates. But this ſeems to me a ſenſeleſs and ridiculous Legend: For as (r) Bollandus obſerves, if Kentigern went ſeven times to Rome, how came he to put off the Error of his Conſecration to the laſt? If it were good before, why not then? If naught before, then all the Acts performed by him by virtue of his firſt Conſeration were invalid. But there is no more Error ſuppoſed in the Conſecration of Kentigern by one Biſhop, than there was in that of Seruanus by Palladius, which as (s) Joh. Major ſaith, was good in caſe of neceſſity. But the Writers of the Legends, living long after the times of the Perſons, framed their Stories according to the Cuſtoms of their own times; and becauſe ſuch a Conſecration was not then held good, therefore the Author of his Legend takes care to have that defect ſupplied at Rome, and to make amends, he ſaith, That Kentigern at his death recommended to his Diſciples the Decrees of the Fathers, and the Cuſtoms of the Roman Church. But what is this to the neceſſity of Subjection to the Roman See from the general Senſe of the Britiſh Churches? What if Kentigern having been often at Rome, were pleaſed more with the Cuſtoms of that Church, than of the Britains? Doth it hence follow, that thoſe Britains who maintained Cuſtoms contrary to the Romans, did think it neceſſary to conform to the Church of Rome, when the plain Evidence of Fact is to the contrary; and which hath far more Authority than ſuch Legends, gends as theſe? (3.) Ninianus is (t) ſaid to have learnt the Chriſtian Doctrine at Rome, who converted the Southern Picts, and founded the Church ad Candidam Caſam; being the firſt built of Stone. But what follows from hence? Becauſe Ninianus was made a Chriſtian at Rome, therefore the Britiſh Churches always own'd the Pope's Supremacy. They are indeed to ſeek for Arguments who make uſe of ſuch as theſe. (4. He offers to prove the conſtant Submiſſion of the Britiſh Churches to the Roman See from Gildas himſelf, and he makes uſe of two Arguments.

(1.) From his calling the Britiſh Churches, Sedem Petri, the See of St. Peter. I confeſs Gildas hath theſe Words, but quite in another Senſe; For in the beginning of his Invective againſt the Clergy, among other things he charges them, that they did Sedem Petri Apoſtoli immundis pedibus uſurpare. Doth he mean that they defiled St. Peter's Chair at Rome? No certainly, but he takes St. Peter's Chair for that which all the Clergy poſſeſſed, and implies no more than their Eccleſiaſtical Function; and ſo he oppoſes it to (u) the Chair of Judas, into which, he ſaith, ſuch wicked Men fell. But if they will carry St. Peter's Chair to Rome, they muſt carry the Chair of Judas thither too.

(2.) (w) Alford inſiſts on this Paſſage in Gildas, That they were more ambitious of Degrees in the Church than of the Kingdom of Heaven; And after a bitter Invective againſt their Symoniacal Contracts, he adds, that where they were oppoſed they ran beyond Sea to compaſs their ends. Now ſaith Alford, whither ſhould this be but to Rome? For as Leland obſerves in the Caſe of Giraldus Cambrenſis, ſunt enim omnia Venalia Romæ: all things are bought and ſold there; and therefore whither ſhould ſuch notorious Symoniacal Perſons go, but to Rome? This is a very ſurpriſing Argument, and is more wiſely paſt over by Mr. Creſſy than inſiſted on by Alford, as being a horrible Reflection on the Court of Rome in thoſe Days. But to ſay Truth, there is not one Word of Rome in Gildas; but if they will apply it to Rome, how can we help it.

To conclude this Diſcourſe, (x) Alford is much diſpleaſed with (y) Sir H. Spelman, for parallelling the Caſe of the Britiſh Biſhops, and Auguſtine, with that of the Cyprian Biſhops againſt the Patriarch of Antioch: But for what Reaſon? Why, ſaith he, The Council of Epheſus did not permit the Cyprian Biſhops to decline the Judgment of their Patriarch, but declared the Biſhop of Antioch not to be their Patriarch. Very well! And is not this the very caſe here? The Biſhop of Rome challenged a Patriarchal Power over the Britiſh Churches, and appoints an Archbiſhop over them, but they deny that he had ſuch Authority over them, they being governed by their own Metropolitan, as the Cyprian Biſhops were; and therefore by the Decree of the Council of Epheſus, they were bound to preſerve their own Rights, and conſequently to oppoſe that foreign Juriſdiction, which Auguſtine endeavoured to ſet up over them.

Two DISCOURSES Concerning the DOCTRINE of CHRIST's SATISFACION: or, the true Reaſon of his Sufferings: Wherein the Socinian and Antinomian Controverſies are truely Stated and Explained. With an ANSWER to Mr. LOBB's Appeal, and to ſeveral Letters from the Diſſenting Parties in London.

PART I.

The PREFACE.

T*HE Deſign of the following Diſcourſe, is to vindicate the Doctrine of* Chriſt's Satisfaction from the Socinian Objections. Which, that I might do more effectually, I ſet my ſelf to conſider the Force and Strength of all that Crellius had produced in his elaborate Anſwer to Grotius. For I have always endeavoured to underſtand the right ſtate of a Queſtion, before I undertook it; and when I had done that, I have taken as much Care, as I could, to repreſent it truly to others. Which made me not a little ſurpriſed, when I found our modern Socinians in their late Pamphlets to charge Me as well as others, with not reading their Books upon this Queſtion, and wholly miſtaking the State of the Queſtion between the Church and them. Whereas, if I had not read their Books I might peradventure have entertained a more favourable Opinion of them, than I now have. But it was upon a diligent Conſideration of the utmoſt I could find was ſaid by their beſt Writers, that I ſo long ſince ſatisfied my ſelf, that if the Books of the New Teſtament are to be our Rule of Faith, they were extreamly miſtaken. Indeed, our Unitarians (as they call themſelves) ſeem to go another way to work; which is, by undermining the Authority of theſe Books, and ſo to introduce Deiſm among us; (of which I hope to give an Account in another Diſcourſe.) But my preſent buſineſs is to lay open the true ſtate of this Controverſie between us. In their Anſwer to my Sermon (which is here Reprinted) they ſay, That the Unitarians never denied, as I fanſie, that Jeſus Chriſt made himſelf a voluntary Sacrifice for Expiation of the Sins of Mankind. If this be true, I confeſs, I have miſtaken them; but if the contrary prove very true from their own Writings, what do theſe Men deſerve, for denying that which they know to be true? For it is hardly poſſible to ſuppoſe ſuch bold undertakers, as they are, ſhould be ignorant that Socinus abſolutely denied, That Chriſt made himſelf a voluntary Sacrifice for Expiation of the Sins of Mankind. For in his Anſwer to Volanus, he ſaith, That he and moſt others are greatly miſtaken when they ſay, that Chriſt offered up himſelf to God, when his Blood was ſhed upon the Croſs: And he poſitively affirms, That the Sacrifice which Chriſt offered was not upon the Croſs, but in Heaven. Theſe Paſſages gave great offence to one Niemojevius, a Friend of his, who in his firſt Epiſtle to him, calls it, A horrid Para-Conſiderations on the Explications of the Trinity in the Archbiſhop's Sermons, &c. p. 31.

Anſw. to Serm. p. 12.

Socin. Epiſt. p. 196. Ed. Racov.

Paradox, and directly contrary to Scripture, and wonders what he meant to write ſo confidently againſt the plain Teſtimonies of Scripture.
Socinus in anſwer to him, ſaith, It is no more than himſelf had p. 204. aſſerted ſome Years before, in his Book De Servatore; and others of their Party before him. And he lays down, as his Concluſion, which he deſires his Friend to bring his Arguments againſt, viz. That the Expiatory Sacrifice of Chriſt for our Sins was not performed on the Croſs, but in Heaven. Niemojevius brings expreſs places of Scripture againſt
p. 224. this Opinion; and ſaith, He could by no means excuſe ſuch plain Oppoſition
p. 226. to the words of Scripture. Socinus in his Reply, perſiſts in ſaying, That there was no Expiatory Sacrifice for Sin in the Death of
p. 254. Chriſt; and that it ought to be conſidered as an Intervening Condition
p. 265. in order to the Expiation in Heaven, and not otherwiſe; but he will by no means allow any Proof of any Sacrifice of the Expiation on the Croſs. And ſo the diſpute ended. With what face can they now ſay, That the Unitarians never denied this, when Socinus not only doth it, but defends it, to the laſt, and ſaith, That others had done it before him:
Which ſhews, that it was no ſingular Opinion of his own, but that which had been received among the Unitarians before him.

But they ſay, The Unitarians ever acknowledged that the Lord Chriſt was an Expiatory Sacrifice for our Sins, as may be ſeen in the Racovian Catechiſm. This is indeed a wonderful Proof, they ever acknowledged it, as may be ſeen in the Racovian Catechiſm: Were there no Unitarians before the Racovian Catechiſm? And was that always the ſame? Suppoſe the Unitarians before, were of another Opinion; ſuppoſe the Racovian Catechiſm it ſelf hath been altered in this matter: how can any man of Senſe be ſatisfied with ſuch kind of Arguments as theſe? One would think, they wrote only for ſuch as would take their Words; they joyn ſo much Confidence with ſo very little appearance of Reaſon. All that know any thing of theſe Matters, know very well, that the Racovian Catechiſm was firſt framed by Smalcius, a ſtrict Follower and Defender of Socinus, from whoſe Opinions he did not vary at all as to this matter, as will appear from all the old Editions Catech. Racov. c. 8. q. 4. of it. In which the Queſtion is put, What is the Reaſon of the Sufferings of Chriſt? The Anſwer is two fold; 1. To be an Example of Patience. 2. To confirm the Truth of God's Promiſes. And after theſe are explained, another Queſtion is asked, Is there no other Cauſe of the Q. 12. Death of Chriſt? The Anſwer is very ſhort, Nulla prorſus, None at all.
And in the Concluſion of that Chapter a Queſtion is put about Sacrifices, Q. 38. and the Anſwer is, That the Death of Chriſt was no Sacrifice, but only a Preparation to it, and a kind of Introduction to it, for the Sacrifice was offered in Heaven and not before. Have we not now great Evidence to believe from the Racovian Catechiſm, that Jeſus Chriſt made himſelf a voluntary Sacrifice for Expiation of the Sins of Mankind?
But beſides the Racovian Catechiſm, they refer me to Schlictingius and Ruarus. For what, I pray? For what the Unitarians always held? That is impoſſible, when there is ſuch evident Proof to the contrary. I ſuppoſe their meaning is, That the Racovian Catechiſm, being reviewed by them ſpeaks otherwiſe. And is this a good Proof, that they were always of that mind, becauſe from hence it is evident they have changed it? And ſo it Catech. Racov. Staurop. An. Dom. 1680. will appear to any one that will compare the latter Editions with the former.
In the laſt Edition I have ſeen, as it is review'd by Schlictingius, Ruarus, and others, there is a Preface, wherein they confeſs it is changed in ſeveral things from what it was, when it was firſt publiſhed by Moſcorovius, vius, *A.D.*1609, aad yet the Unitarians were ſtill of the ſame mind, although ſome more ſoftning Expreſſions were for meer ſhame thought fit to be inſerted. In this Correct Edition, the Queſtion is put, Why was it neceſſary for Chriſt to ſuffer as he did? And the Anſwer is two-fold; 1. That Chriſt ſuffered for our Sins by God's appointment, and underwent a cruel Death as a Sacrifice of Expiation. Who could imagine this to be the Racovian Catechiſm ſtill? 2. Becauſe thoſe who are to be ſaved by him are ſubject to the like Suffering. This is ſomewhat a dark Reaſon; but the former is that which we are to conſider.

p. 141.

Chriſt, ſay they, ſuffer'd for the ſins of Mankind, and was a Sacrifice of Expiation by his Death. What can we deſire more? ſhall we always maintain diſputes about Words, when we agree in Senſe? No, that is not the Caſe, but we may ſeem to agree in Words and differ in Senſe. That therefore muſt be more ſtrictly examined. But becauſe they ſometimes ſeem to be diſpleaſed that we take their Opinion from foreign Writers, (ſince they here ſet up for themſelves and are ſo able to expreſs their own Senſe) and becauſe they refer me to their own late Prints in the Engliſh Tongue, therefore I ſhall apply my ſelf to them, to find out what their true Senſe in this matter is. And they ſeem freely to tell us what they deny and what they affirm.

Conſiderations on the Explications of the Trinity by Dr. W. &c. p. 32.
Anſwer to my Serm. p. 12.

1. They deny that this Sacrifice was by way of true and proper Satisfaction or full and adequate Payment to the Juſtice of God.

2. They affirm, that this Sacrifice was only an Oblation, or Application to the Mercy of God.

In another place they complain, that very few of their Adverſaries have really underſtood what they affirm or deny concerning the Cauſes or Effects of our Saviour's Death. And they ſay, the Queſtion is only this, Whether the Lord Chriſt offer'd himſelf as ſuch a Sacrifice, Oblation or Price as might be made to the Juſtice of God, by way of Equivalent for what we ſhould have ſuffer'd; or was an Oblation or Satisfaction as all former Sacrifices under the Law were, to the Mercy of God by way of Humble Suit and Deprecation? So that they will no longer diſpute with us, about the Death of Chriſt being an Expiatory Sacrifice for the Sins of Mankind; and ſo this Point ſeems wholly gained. But we muſt have a care of being deceived by them. For the Scripture was too clear and full to be born down by the Authority or Evaſions of Socinus; and therefore they found it neceſſary to comply in Terms, as long as they could keep to their own Notions under them. But what is the true meaning of an Expiatory Sacrifice to the Mercy of God? If it be no more but as a Condition intervening, Socinus would not allow that to make an Expiatory Sacrifice, and therein he was in the Right.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 58.

The main Point then between us ſeems to be whether the Death of Chriſt had Reſpect to the Juſtice or to the Mercy of God? And here we muſt conſider what they underſtand by the Juſtice of God.

Anſwer to Milb. p. 53.

1. They ſay, that Almighty God as King and Proprietor of all Perſons and Things, can forgive any Offence or all Offences, even without Repentance or Amendment, nor is it contrary to his Juſtice ſo to do.

2. That it is not the Juſtice of God, by which he is prompted to puniſh ſinners, but his Holineſs and Wiſdom, and that juſtice hath no other ſhare or intereſt in Puniſhment, but only to ſee that Puniſhment be not miſplaced, and that it do not exceed the Offence.

3. That God could not (juſtly or wiſely) ſubſtitute an innocent p. 54. and well deſerving Perſon to undergo Puniſhment, properly ſo called in the Place of the unrighteous and worthleſs, becauſe it is of the Nature of Juſtice not to miſplace Puniſhments.

4. That Chriſt could not offer himſelf freely for us to undergo the Puniſhment due to us, nor could God accept of it, or allow it: becauſe it is of the very Eſſence of Juſtice not to miſplace Puniſhment p. 55. and not to exceed the Deſert of the Offence, which they ſay are the two things that conſtitute the Nature of Punitive Juſtice.

Trinitarian Scheme of Relig. p. 18. In another place, they ſay, That Chriſt made himſelf an Oblation, an Expiatory Sacrifice on the Altar of the Croſs for our Sins. But his Sufferings were not (as Trinitarians teach) deſigned as a Puniſhment laid on him in our ſtead, becauſe Puniſhment is the evil of Suffering inflicted for the evil of Doing; but Chriſt having done no ſin; what he underwent was only labour and ſuffering and no Puniſhment. And again they ſay, the Oblation was not made to the Juſtice, but to the Mercy p. 19. of God. But the Sufferings of Chriſt being graciouſly accepted by God, as an Interceſſion on our behalf, God was ſatisfied with them, Anſwer to the Archbiſhop, p. 32. and this, they ſay, is the proper Notion of Satisfaction. The ſame they repeat in other places. And if no more were to be regarded but meer words, this Controverſie were at an end; for they own Chriſt's Death to be an Expiatory Sacrifice for the Sins of Mankind, and that he made by his Sufferings Satisfaction to God.

But I ſhall now make it appear, that whatever they pretend, they do really own no ſuch thing as the Death of Chriſt being an Expiatory Sacrifice for the Sins of Mankind. However, we have this Advantage by theſe Conceſſions, that the Scriptures are yielded to be on our ſide, and that they are forced to ſpeak as we do, whatſoever their meaning be. But that they do not own any proper Expiatory Sacrifice in the Death of Chriſt, will beſt appear by an Account of the Riſe and Progreſs of this Controverſie, and of the true State of it.

The firſt Riſe of it was from the Multitudes of Places of Scripture, which Attribute all the proper Effects of an Expiatory Sacrifice to the Death of Chriſt. And that by thoſe who beſt underſtood for what End it was that Chriſt ſuffer'd, and had no Intention to deceive or to amuſe Mankind, I Matt. 10. 28. mean our Saviour and his Apoſtles. Our Bleſſed Saviour himſelf ſaith, That Mark 10. 45. the Son of Man came to give his Life a Ranſom for many. A Ranſom as to what? Surely not as to the Mercy of God. But Chriſt's Death was a Ranſom as it was an Expiatory Sacrifice; and if the one reſpects the Mercy of God, the other muſt do ſo too. They may ſay, the Ranſom is from the Puniſhment of Sins, but this Ranſom might be made as to the Mercy of God, which delivers from it. But a Ranſom is ſomething which is paid or laid down as a Price of Redemption; and was very well Levit. 17. 11. underſtood in that Senſe among the Jews; who all knew that by their Law, the Blood of the Sacrifices was appointed to be a Ranſom for their Souls. For it is the Blood that maketh an Atonement for the Soul. Heb. 9 22. To which the Apoſtle refers, when he ſaith, That without ſhedding of Blood there is no Remiſſion. So that hereby the Jews underſtood theſe things, (1.) That there was a Puniſhment due to their Sins, from which they could expect no Deliverance but by the Blood of Sacrifices as a Ranſom or Price of Redemption for them. (2.) That as the Puniſhment became due by the Law, and the execution of it was by the Juſtice of God, ſo the Ranſom or Price of Redemption muſt be by way of Satisfaction to the Law, in ſuch a manner as it had appointed. (3.) That they had no other Notion of an Expiatory Sacrifice, but the Offering the Blood of the Sacrifice for an Atonement in order to the Averting the juſt Diſpleaſure of God againſt them for their Sins; and this was that, which they underſtood by Expiation or Remiſſion of Sins. (4.) That the Expiation did not depend upon the Sacrifice, as an intervening Condition as to the Party, who thereby performed an Act of Obedience, but upon the Nature of the Sacrifice which was offer'd to God. For, whatever had been required, the Obedience had been the ſame; but here the great Force is laid on the Blood being offer'd for Expiation. (5.) That however the Mercy of God was ſeen both in the Appointing and Accepting the Ranſom; yet the Expiatory Sacrifice was never underſtood by them to Reſpect the Mercy of God, but his Juſt Diſpleaſure againſt their Sins. What ſtrange Language would it have been thought among the Jews to offer an Expiatory Sacrifice to the Mercy of God? But Men that bring in New Doctrines, muſt make a New Senſe of Words and Phraſes; or elſe they can never reconcile them to each other. And it is a mighty Advantage to our Cauſe, that we underſtand the Expreſſions of the New Teſtament with Reſpect to theſe Matters, no otherwiſe than the Jews underſtood them, among whom they were ſpoken; and who had their own Law to interpret them by. Our preſent Unitarians do not deny that the Sacrifices under the Law had an immediate Reſpect to God; but they ſay, it was not by way of Satisfaction to the Juſtice of God, but by way of Application to the Mercy of God, by way of humble Suit and Deprecation.

But if there were ſuch a Sanction of the Law, whereby an Obligation to Puniſhment did follow the Offences forbidden by it; If the Juſtice of God were concerned to ſee the Puniſhment executed, if the Law were not ſatisfied; If the Sacrifice of Atonement or Expiation were deſigned for ſatisfaction of the Law; and God did accept it for that end, then it follows, that theſe Sacrifices were intended not merely as Rites of Interceſſion and Deprecation to the Mercy of God; but by way of Satisfaction to his Juſtice: For was it not Juſtice in God to puniſh Offenders againſt his Law? Was it not Juſtice in God to require a Satisfaction to his Law when it was broken? Was it not Juſtice in God, when he had declared that he would accept a Sacrifice of Atonement, to require that inſtead of the Puniſhment of the Offenders, and to puniſh thoſe who wilfully neglected or deſpiſed it? How then, can they pretend that theſe Sacrifices had no Reſpect to the Juſtice of God? We never read in Scripture any Expreſſions, as to the Methods of Supplication like this, That the Blood of the Sacrifices was to expiate for their Sins: and that it was given for an Atonement for the Soul. Is it ever ſaid, that Prayer and Supplication was to make a Sacrifice of Atonement, and that it was appointed for that End? Prayer is a Natural and Neceſſary Duty and a Condition in order to Pardon, but the Life and Force of that lies in a Man's own Breaſt, in the inward and fervent Deſires of the Soul: but a Sacrifice of Atonement was a thing of another Nature, the Blood was to be ſhed and then offer'd up to God, as a Sacrifice of Atonement, which God himſelf had appointed for that End; and without which no Remiſſion of Sins was to be expected. But was not this from the Mercy of God to appoint ſuch a Sacrifice of Atonement? No doubt of it, and ſo it was that he would accept it for ſuch an End. But that is by no means the preſent Queſtion; for it is, Whether the Sacrifice, which God appointed for an Atonement, was only a Rite of Supplication to the Mercy of God? In one Senſe a Sacrifice of Atonement is a way of Deprecation: but then it re-relates to the Wrath and Diſpleaſure of God; for it is that which God hath appointed as the Means of Averting his Wrath, and Preventing the Execution of his Juſtice. But the main Queſtion is, Whether the Sacrifice of Atonement as to God's juſt Wrath and Diſpleaſure, be not a Real Satisfaction to his Juſtice? For if he be juſtly diſpleaſed, and might juſtly puniſh, but doth accept a Sacrifice of Expiation in ſtead of it, although there be a Concurrence of Mercy, yet there is a Real Atonement to his Juſtice: unleſs they will ſay, the Juſtice of God is not concerned in preſerving the Honour of his Laws. But of this more afterwards. If an Expiatory Sacrifice under the Law were nothing elſe but a Solemn Rite of Supplication to the Mercy of God it would take away the Typical Nature of thoſe Sacrifices, and eſpecially thoſe on the Day of Expiation. For what doth a Rite of Supplication and Interceſſion repreſent as a Figure of ſomething to come? Levit. 6. 10, 11. 14,15,19. Why were the Goat and the Bullock for the Sin-Offering to be preſented alive before the Lord; then their Blood to be ſhed, and to be ſprinkled before the Mercy-ſeat and upon the Altar? Why was the Scape-Goat to have the Sins of the People confeſſed over him and put upon v. 21. his head? Why was the Fleſh of the Bullock and Goat that was Sacri- 27. ficed burnt without the Camp? Do theſe look like Applications to the Mercy of God, by way of humble Suit and Deprecation? But the A- Heb. 9. 9, poſtle to the Hebrews tells us, theſe things were a Figure repreſenting Chriſt 11, 13, 14 offering himſelf up to God by his own Blood, who having obtain'd eternal Redemption for us enter'd into the Holy Place (in Heaven) whoſe Blood was far more effectual for the Purging away of Sin, than the Blood of Bulls and Goats could be; and to anſwer to the burning of the 13. 12. Fleſh of the Sacrifices without the Camp, that he might Sanctify the People with his own Blood, he ſuffer'd without the Gate. Was all this nothing but an Oblation to the Mercy of God by way of Prayer and Interceſſion? Why all this Ceremony about an Oblation of Prayer, which depends on the hearty Devotion of him that makes it? Why did not the High-Prieſt enter without Blood into the Holy of Holies, if it were nothing but a Rite of Supplication? Why was the Blood ſprinkled upon the Altar for Atonement, after he came out from the Mercy Seat? Why was the Fleſh burnt without the Camp? Was that for Interceſſion too? But ſaith the Correct Racovian Catechiſm, all this doth not prove that the whole Expiatory Sacrifice of Chriſt was performed on the Croſs, but only that it was begun there and perfected in Heaven. This doth evidently prove, that the Blood of Chriſt was ſhed for the Expiation of Sins, and that as the High-Prieſt went into the Holy of Holies with the Blood of the Sacrifice of Atonement there to make Interceſſion; ſo Chriſt as our High-Prieſt Heb. 7.25. with his Blood ſhed enter'd into Heaven, where he ever lives to make Interceſſion for us. But ſay they, the Sacrifices under the Law did not make any proper Satisfaction for Sin, therefore neither did Chriſt's Sacrifice. So that at laſt they confeſs that Chriſt's death was no proper Expiatory Sacrifice; for whatſoever is ſo, muſt make Satisfaction to the Law and Juſtice of God. But ſay they, the Sacrifices were not offer'd for Payment but for Remiſſion. I ſay, they were a Payment in order to Remiſſion. I mean ſuch a Payment as the Law appointed and God accepted, and that is true and proper Satisfaction. But we muſt diſtinguiſh a Legal Payment and Satisfaction, from Pecuniary Payment to a Creditor. And all the Confuſion theſe Men have run into, hath been from want of diſtinguiſhing theſe; of which I have treated at large in the following Diſcourſe.

Thus far it appears that they have by no means allow'd the Death and Sufferings of Chriſt to have been an Expiatory Sacrifice in the Senſe of the Jews, as it was a Ranſom or Price of Redemption.

But there is ſomething farther to be conſider'd in an Expiatory Sacrifice, and that is a Subſtitution in Place of the Offenders. For that the Jews and others underſtood by a Sacrifice of Expiation, when the Puniſhment of one was laid upon another, in order to his deliverance. Not that the very ſame was to be undergone, as appears by the Sacrifice of Atonement on the Day of Expiation; which was not that which the People of Iſrael were to have ſuffer'd without it, but it was what God Appointed and Accepted inſtead of their Puniſhment: and therefore the Scape-Goat is ſaid to bear upon him all the Iniquities of the People, which was ſuppoſed to be Levit. 16.
ſo much charged with them, that he that let him go was to Purify himſelf 22.
before he could come into the Camp. So in the Sin-offering for the 26. 4. 15.
Congregation, the Elders were to lay their hands upon the head of the Bullock before the Lord: and in other Sacrifices the Rule among the Jews was, that none but the Owner was to lay on his Hands; to ſhew 1. 4.
on whoſe Account he was offer'd up as a Sacrifice of Atonement. For here the Right of Dominion was ſufficient for Subſtitution; but in a Rational Agent, Conſent is neceſſary to make it Juſt.

Having thus ſeen, what the true Nature of an Expiatory Sacrifice was, we muſt now conſider, how far this can agree with the Suffering of Chriſt for the Sins of Mankind. And we have already found our Saviour himſelf declaring, that he gave his Life a Ranſom for many. But that is not all;
for when he inſtituted his laſt Supper for a Commemoration of his Suffering, he ſaid, For this is my Blood of the New Teſtament, which is Matt. 26.
ſhed for many for the Remiſſion of Sins. His Diſciples, to whom he 28.
ſpake theſe Words, muſt underſtand them as the Jews commonly did; when the Blood of a Sacrifice was offer'd for an Atonement in order to the Remiſſion of Sins. And one great end of his Preaching was to declare that he came into the World with that deſign; that it was the Will of God he ſhould ſuffer, and that he came to do his Will. And therefore ſpeaking Heb. 10. 9, 10.

lay it down of my ſelf. I have power to lay it down and I have power 17, 18.
to take it again. This Commandment have I received of my Father.
So that here we have God's Appointment of ſuch a Sacrifice of Atonement for Mankind; Chriſt's free and voluntary Conſent for the undertaking it, and a Tranſlation of the Puniſhment of our Sins upon him; which St. Paul calls God's making him to be ſin for us who knew no Sin; which ſhews 2 Cor. 5. that the Sufferiugs of Chriſt were on the Account of our Sins, being laid upon 21.
him by his own Conſent as our Sin-offering; or a Sacrifice of Expiation for our Sin. And in another place ſaith, that he hath re- Gal. 3. 10. deemed us from the Curſe of the Law, being made a Curſe for us. How could he be made a Curſe for us in order to the Redeming us from the Curſe of the Law; if his Sufferings were only a mere voluntary Condition in order to his Exaltation, without bearing the Burden of our Sins? But St. Paul adds, that we have Redemption through his Eph. 1. 7.
Blood, the Forgiveneſs of Sins. That, God hath ſet him forth as a Coloſſ. 1. 14.
Propitiation through Faith in his Blood, to declare his Righteouſneſs Rom. 3. for the Remiſſion of Sins. That, when we were enemies, we were re- 25.
conciled to God by the Death of his Son. That he hath given him- 5. 10. Eph. 5. 2.
ſelf for us, an Offering and Sacrifice to God. That, he appeared Heb. 9. 26. to put away Sin by the Sacrifice of himſelf; and that he was once 28.

1 Tim. 2. 6. offer'd to bear the Sins of many. That, he gave himſelf a Ranſom for all.

Neither was it St. Paul only who ſpeaks after this manner; but St.
1 Pet. 2. 24. Peter ſaith, that his own ſelf bare our Sins in his own Body on the Tree.
3. 18. That Chriſt alſo hath once ſuffered for Sins, the Juſt for the Unjuſt.
1 John 1. 7. And St. John, That the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt his Son cleanſeth us from
2. 2. all Sin, and that God ſent his Son to be the Propitiation for our Sins.
4. 10. So that Chriſt and his Apoſtles agree in the ſame manner of expreſſion; and great weight is laid upon Chriſt's being a Propitiation for us, and our Hopes of Remiſſion of Sins and the Favour of God depend upon it. What now is to be ſaid to all theſe places of Scripture? Were they deſigned only to humour and impoſe upon the Credulity of Mankind by telling them of ſuch an Expiatory Sacrifice in the Death of Chriſt, which never was nor could be, being Repugnant to the Juſtice of God? For Chriſt, ſay they, being Innocent could not ſuffer the Puniſhment of our Sins, and God being Juſt could not accept of it, although he freely offer'd himſelf as a Sacrifice for our Sins. Doth this agree with the Force and Deſign of all theſe Expreſſions? Had not Chriſt the Power and Will to offer up himſelf as a Sacrifice of Propitiation to God? And where lies the Injuſtice of accepting ſuch a Sacrifice which he freely offer'd? But it could not be, ſay they, by way of Puniſhment for our Sins. What then is the meaning of all thoſe places, wherein he is ſaid to bear our Sins and to ſuffer in our ſtead, the juſt for the unjuſt? What is this but to contradict the Tenour and Scope of the New Teſtament with reſpect to the Death of Chriſt; and to turn their Senſe quite another way from what they were thought to ſignifie at that time? Which is no reaſonable way of interpreting Scripture.

Do they deny that Chriſt ſuffered, what we ſay he did? No; that they dare not do. But they ſay, What he underwent was only Labour and Suffering; but not the Puniſhment of our Iniquities. Then, I ſay, it could be no Expiatory Sacrifice, which implies a Subſtitution, and the contrary appears by the many places of Scripture already mentioned, wherein our Sins and the Sufferings of Chriſt are joined together.

Thus we ſee the true Riſe of this Controverſie was from the many places of Scripture, which ſeem very plain and clear in this matter; and therefore I ſhall now give an account of the Progreſs of it.

F. Socinus ſeeing the bent of the Scripture ſo much againſt him, ſets himſelf to the finding out ways to avoid the force of them.

Socin. de Serv. l. 2. c. 1. in fin. 1, To thoſe which ſpeak of Chriſt's being a Ranſom or Price of Redemption for us, he anſwers, That theſe Expreſſions are to be underſtood only Metaphorically, and Chriſt's Death being an Intervening Condition in order to our Deliverance; it is therefore called a Price of Redemption. And to the ſame purpoſe, the Correct Racovian Catechiſm; only there it is added, That God did accept of the Death of Chriſt as a moſt Acceptable Sacrifice. But not by way of Satisfaction or Payment of our Debts, becauſe he as a Sacrifice was given by God himſelf; but that he might give us the greater Aſſurance of Pardon and Eternal Life.

So that here we have the true State of this Matter before us; viz. Whether the Death of Chriſt, when it is ſaid to be a Ranſom or Price of Redemption for us, is only to be looked on as a hard Condition on his ſide Intervening, or as a proper Sacrifice of Atonement, which God had appointed, for the Expiation of Sins? The Queſtion is not, Whether God appointed or accepted him, for that we have allowed in all Sacrifices of Atonement, by the Law of Moſes; but whether his Sufferings were not required in order to the Satisfaction of Divine Juſtice for the Sins of Mankind; not by way of ſtrict Payment, as in caſe of Debts; but by a Legal Satisfaction to the Juſtice of God as it is concerned in the Honour of his Laws.

Our Unitarians grant, That Chriſt was a Ranſom and Price of Redemption for us; but they deny, That he was an Adequate Price, or a Sacrifice to the Juſtice of God. But ſtill they run upon the Notion of Debts and Payments, as though there were no other Notion of Juſtice and Satisfaction but between Creditors and Debtors; or as if their Notions of theſe things were rather taken from the Shops than the Schools. And the monſtrous Contradiction they conclude the charge of our Doctrine with, is, That God freely Pardons the whole Debt of Sin, and yet hath been infinitely over-paid for both in the Death and other Sufferings of the Lord Chriſt. Anſw. to Milb. p. 58.

But in the following Diſcourſe, I have endeavoured to lay open this Miſtake, by ſhewing, That Debts and Puniſhments are of a different Nature; and therefore the Satisfaction in one Caſe is not to be meaſured by the other. But I ſhall not here anticipate the Reader, as to what follows; but I ſhall take notice of what they ſay, which ſeems to relate to this Matter. Ch. I.

Almighty God, ſay they, as King and Proprietor of all Perſons and things, can forgive any Offence or all Offences even without Repentance or Amendment, nor is it contrary to his Juſtice ſo to do.

This is a very ſtrange Aſſertion. For then there is no Obligation on God's part in point of Juſtice to puniſh the moſt Impenitent and Incorrigible Offenders. But there is a great deal of difference, between making the Exerciſe of Punitive or Vindictive Juſtice neceſſary upon every Offence, and ſaying that the Juſtice of God doth not require that any Offences ſhould be puniſhed.

The former makes Juſtice in God to proceed by a natural Neceſſity, which would leave no place for Mercy, nor any Satisfaction by a Mediator, for that muſt ſuppoſe Liberty and Relaxation, as to the Executive Part of Juſtice. And if God muſt puniſh Sinners as they deſerve, there can be no ſtop to the Execution of Juſtice ſhort of Annihilation; for our very Beings are the Gift of God which we have deſerved to be deprived of. But on the other ſide, to ſay, that the Juſtice of God doth not require the Puniſhment of any Offences without Repentance or Amendment, is to overthrow any ſuch thing as Punitive Juſtice in God; by which I do not mean, the actual Execution of it, and the due Meaſures which belong to it, but the Will to puniſh Obſtinate and Impenitent Sinners. And that reſults from his Hatred and Abhorrency of Evil, and his juſt Government of the World. For how can any Men, who believe that God is really diſpleaſed with the Wickedneſs of Men, and that he is a Juſt and Righteous Governor, ever think that it is not Repugnant to his Juſtice to forgive all Offences without Repentance or Amendment? How can his Hatred of Sin and the Juſtice of his Government be reconciled with the Impunity of the moſt Obſtinate Offenders? Is there no ſuch thing as Juſtice to himſelf and to his Laws; which lies in a juſt Vindication of his Honour and of his Laws from Contempt? And who can be guilty of greater Contempt of him, than thoſe who perſiſt in their Wickedneſs, without Repentance or Amendment? And after all, Is it not contrary to his Juſtice to forgive ſuch as theſe, becauſe he is abſolute Lord and Proprietor of all Perſons and Things? This might ſignifie ſomething, if we could imagine God to be nothing but Almighty Power without Juſtice; but if his Juſtice be as Eſſential an Attribute as his Omnipotency, we muſt not ſo much as ſuppoſe the Exerciſe of one without the other.

Anſw. to Milb. p. 53. But they do not deny, That it is inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom and Holineſs of God to let the Incorrigible and Impenitent eſcape unpuniſhed, or to forgive Sin without Repentance or Amendment. But if the Wiſdom and Holineſs of God will not permit the Impunity of Impenitent Sinners, is it not juſt in God to puniſh them? Not barely as to the Degree and Deſert of Puniſhment; but as to the Will of Puniſhing them according to their Merits? Whence doth their Puniſhment come? Is it not from the Will of God? Is that Will juſt or not? If the Will to puniſh be juſt, whence comes it to be ſo? From the Wiſdom and Holineſs of God? Then Punitive Juſtice, when it is agreeable to God's Wiſdom and Holineſs, is a proper Divine Attribute as well as they. And they muſt have ſtrange Notions of Punitive Juſtice, who would ſeparate it from them.

But Juſtice, they ſay, hath no other ſhare or intereſt in the Puniſhment, but only to ſee that Puniſhment be not miſplac'd, and that it do not exceed the Offence. We are far from denying theſe things to belong to the Meaſures in the Exerciſe of Punitive Juſtice: But whence comes Punitive Juſtice to belong to God? Is it not becauſe it is juſt in him to puniſh Offenders according thoſe Meaſures? And whence comes this, but from that Univerſal Juſtice in God, which is always joyned with his Wiſdom and Holineſs: and implies an Univerſal Rectitude in all he doth? And from thence it comes that all the Meaſures of Juſtice are obſerved by him in the Puniſhment of the greateſt Offenders.

Now this Univerſal Juſtice in God is that, whereby he not only puniſhes Obſtinate and Impenitent Sinners, but he takes care of preſerving the Honour of his Laws. And therefore, although Almighty God out of his great Mercy were willing that Penitent Sinners ſhould be forgiven; yet it was moſt agreeable thereto, that it ſhould be done in ſuch a manner as to diſcourage Mankind from the practice of Sin, by the ſame way by which he offers Forgiveneſs; and for this end, it pleaſed God in his Infinite Wiſdom and Goodneſs to ſend his Son to become a Sacrifice of Propitiation for the Sins of Mankind; which being freely undertaken by him, there was no breach in the Meaſures of Punitive Juſtice with reſpect to him; and ſo by his Death he offered up himſelf as a full, perfect and ſufficient Sacrifice, Oblation and Satisfaction for the Sins of Mankind. And this is that Doctrine of the Satisfaction of Chriſt which we own and defend.

But theſe bold Aſſertions, That God as abſolute Lord may forgive all Offences without Repentance, and it is not contrary to his Juſtice ſo to do; that, it is not the Juſtice of God which prompts him to puniſh Sinners, ariſe from too mean and narrow a Conception of Divine Juſtice; as though it lay only in the manner of the Execution of it. But that there is an Eſſential Attribute of Juſtice belonging to the Divine Nature, appears from hence, that there are ſome things which are ſo diſagreeable to the Divine Nature, that he cannot do them; he cannot break his Promiſes, nor deceive Mankind to their Deſtruction; he cannot deny himſelf, nor pervert that Order, or due Reſpects of things to each other, which he hath eſtabliſhed in the World. He cannot make it the Duty of Mankind to diſhonour their Maker, or to violate the Rules of Good and Evil, ſo as to make Evil Good and Good Evil; he cannot make Murder and Adultery to be Vertues, nor Impiety and Wickedneſs not to deſerve Puniſhment. But whence comes all this? Is it that God wants Almighty Power to do what he pleaſes? No doubt, he is ſupreme Lord over all, and hath all things under his Will. But there is an Eſſential Juſtice in God, which is a ſupreme Rule of Righteouſneſs, according to which he doth always exerciſe his Power and Will. And ſo Moſes ſaith of him, All his ways are perfect, a God of Truth, and without Deut. 32. 4.

Iniquity, juſt and right is he; and the Pſalmiſt, The Lord is righteous Pſal. 145.
in all his ways and holy in all his works. He not only is ſo, but he can 17.
be no otherwiſe, for this Univerſal Righteouſneſs is as great a Perfection and Attribute of God, as his Wiſdom, or Power. It is not one Name which ſtands for all; but it is a real and diſtinct Attribute of it ſelf: It is as a Rule and Meaſure to the Exerciſe of the reſt. And he particularly ſhews it in all the Acts of Punitive Juſtice: So Nehemiah; Howbeit thou art juſt Neh. 9.33.
in all that is brought upon us, for thou haſt done right, but we have done wickedly. And Daniel; Righteouſneſs belongeth unto thee, but Dan. 9. 7, unto us confuſion of Face: For the Lord our God is righteous in all 14.
his Works which he doth, for we obey'd not his Voice. And Zephaniah;
The juſt Lord is in the midſt thereof, he will not do Iniquity. Zeph. 3.5.
From whence it appears that the Exerciſe of Punitive Juſtice is according to the Eſſential Juſtice or Righteouſneſs of the Divine Nature. And ſo Abraham pleaded with God, Shall not the Judge of all the Earth do Gen. 18. right? i. e. Will he not puniſh according to the Righteouſneſs of his Nature? 25.
And ſo Abimelech argues from the natural Notion he had of God's righteous Nature, Lord, wilt thou ſlay alſo a righteous Nation? 20. 4.

But here the main Difficulty which deſerves to be cleared is this, How far Punitive Juſtice is founded on that Univerſal Juſtice which is an Eſſential Attribute of God. For the want of underſtanding this, hath been the great occaſion of ſo much Confuſion in the Diſcourſes about this matter. And for the clearing of it, theſe things muſt be conſidered;

1. That there is a difference between that Juſtice in God, whereby he hates Sin, and that whereby he puniſhes the Sinner. The hatred of Sin doth neceſſarily follow the Perfection of his Nature. Therefore God is ſaid, To hate the Wicked; and Evil to be an Abomination to him; to love Pſal. 11.5. Prov.6.16.
Righteouſneſs and to hate Wickedneſs. But if the Puniſhment of the Offender Pſal. 45.7.
were as neceſſarily conſequent as his Hatred of Sin, all Mankind muſt Zech. 8.
ſuffer as they offend, and there would be no place for Mercy in God, nor for 17.
Repentance in Men. But Sin in it ſelf is perfectly hateful to God, there being nothing like God in it; but Man was God's Creature and made after his Image and likeneſs; and however God be diſpleaſed with Mankind on the account of Sin, yet the Workmanſhip of God ſtill remains; and we continually ſee that God doth not exerciſe his Punitive Juſtice according to the Meaſures of their Iniquities. And they who plead moſt for the neceſſity of Punitive Juſtice, are themſelves a Demonſtration to the contrary; for they cannot deny, that they are not puniſhed as their Iniquities have deſerved. And if Punitive Juſtice be neceſſary in it ſelf it muſt reach the Perſons that have deſerved to be puniſhed, if there be no Relaxation of the Severity of it.

2. That it is very agreeable to the Divine Juſtice, to exerciſe the Severity of Punitive Juſtice on obſtinate and incorrigible Offenders. And this is that whereon the Juſtice of the Puniſhments of Sinners in another World is founded; becauſe God hath been ſo merciful to them here, and uſed ſo many ways to reclaim them, and it is the Not exerciſing his Punitive Juſtice upon them in this World, which makes it ſo much more reaſonable in another. For thereby they have ſhewed their Contempt of God and his Laws, of his offers of Mercy and their willful obſtinacy in offending him. And the reaſonableneſs of the Puniſhment of ſuch Offenders is not denyed by any of our more Learned Adverſaries, as I have ſhewed in the following Diſcourſe from Socinus and Crellius, and might do from ſeveral others. But I need not mention any more, ſince in the late Correct Edition of the Racovian Catechiſm there is this Note, That they have always aſſerted, that the Wicked ſhall be raiſed up at the great Day to undergo the Puniſhment of their Sins, and to be caſt into the Fire prepared for the Devil and his Angels. And for this, beſides their Publick Confeſſions, they quote Crellius, Schlictingius, Volkelius, Wolzogenius, &c. And Schlictingius ſaith, The Doctrine of future Puniſhments was neceſſary to be preached, as being part of the Chriſtian Faith; and that God's Veracity is concerned in the Execution of his Threatnings. Which is a part of Natural Juſtice. And thoſe Learned Men, who have been thought moſt favourable to the Socinian Opinions have declared themſelves very frankly as to the Juſtice of the Puniſhment of Impenitent Sinners.

Schlictin. in Joh. 5. 29.

Curcellæus, whom they often mention with reſpect, ſaith, the Juſtice of God requires, that he ſhould inflict the Puniſhments he hath threatned on Contumacious Sinners. And Limborch (whom they ſometimes appeal to) ſaith, That the Juſtice of God doth not permit the Impunity of Refractary and Impenitent Contemners of his Grace. Becauſe, ſaith he, God by his declared Will hath tied himſelf up from the Exerciſe of his Abſolute Power; and his Laws would be trampled upon, and his Majeſty ſlighted; nor would God's hatred of Sin ever be fully diſcovered. And therefore the Day of Wrath is calld by St. Paul, The Revelation of the Righteous Judgment of God. Epiſcopius ſaith, That although in ſuch Puniſhments, which depend only on the Will of the Lawmaker, he doth not think, that God in Juſtice is obliged to make good his Threatnings; as he is to perform his Promiſes; (but that in ſuch Caſes God is not bound in Juſtice to execute all that the Law threatens; but when he thinks fit to puniſh, then his Juſtice requires him not to puniſh beyond the Commination) yet in the Caſe of obſtinate and incurable Offenders, he doth not deny, that the Juſtice of God requires the Rigour of the Law to be executed upon them. And he adds, That the Day of Judgment will fully manifeſt the Juſtice of God in the Threatnings he hath made to Impenitent Sinners. Even Vorſtius, who was ſuppoſed to be too much inclined to the Socinian Doctrine, owns it to be a part of God's Juſtice to puniſh wicked and impenitent Perſons; that his Patience and Goodneſs may not be always contemned with Impunity. And afterwards, That although God doth no Injury to the Offender, if he doth not execute his Threatnings; yet out of regard to the Juſtice of his Word, he doth not recede from what he hath declared: But all Threatnings under the Goſpel are Conditional; and none are damned by it, but ſuch as continue in Impenitency and Unbelief. And in his Explication he ſaith, That where God hath abſolutely declared his Will to puniſh in ſuch a manner, he cannot forgive without Injuſtice.

But our Unitarians ſpeak without any Reſerve, That it is not the Juſtice of God which prompts him to puniſh Sinners, and ſo it is not contrary to his Juſtice to forgive all Offences without Repentance or Amendment. And thus the Juſtice of God is not concerned in the Puniſhments of the great Day, although the Apoſtle calls it, The Revelation of the Righteous Judgment of God.

And by this the World may ſee how very far our Modern Unitarians are from handling this Subject more Carefully, Judiciouſly and Exactly than others; However one of their own Party hath lately affirmed it; with as much Confidence and as little Ground as they have done other things.

Vindic. of S. R. H. p. 128.

3. That it is very agreeable to Divine Juſtice to accept of a Satisfaction on behalf of the Sins of Mankind, who do not perſiſt in their evil ways, ſo that their Sins ſhall be forgiven upon their Repentance and Amendment. For ſince the Exerciſe of Punitive Juſtice is not neceſſary on the Perſons of the Offenders, and ſince God in this Life abates ſo much of his juſt Severity againſt them; he thereby ſhews, that he doth not proceed with Mankind here according to the Rigour of his Juſtice; but yet, ſince God hath given to them very juſt and righteous Laws, ſince thoſe Laws have been broken and his authority contemned, it is very juſt for God to require a Sacrifice of Atonement for the Sins of the World, that Mankind may ſee that God was juſtly diſpleaſed at them, and that none take Incouragement to go on to commit them; but yet, that upon their hearty Repentance and ſincere Obedience, they may be aſſured of the Remiſſion of Sins and the Promiſe of Eternal Life. All the Difficulty now remaining is about Chriſt's Suffering in our ſtead, of which the Scripture ſpeaks ſo fully in the places already mention'd. But we muſt conſider what is Anſwered to them.

II. To thoſe places of Scripture which ſpeak of Chriſt Suffering the Puniſhment of our Sins; all that Socinius ſaith, comes to theſe two things.

1. That Chriſt ſuffer'd on the occaſion of our Sins, and with a Deſign to take away our Sins.

2. That by his Sufferings he came to have a Power to Forgive Sins; and that this is the proper Expiation of Sin. But by no means that he ſuffer'd in our ſtead; for he hath theſe Words; Ut nihil aliud ſit Chriſtum pro nobis mortuum eſſe, quam vice ſeu loco noſtro mortem ſubiiſſe, id adeo à veritate abhorret ut nihil magis. Which in plain Engliſh is, that nothing is more falſe than that Chriſt ſuffer'd in our ſtead.

Socin. de Servat. Part. 2. c. 4, &c. C. 7.

The old Editions of the Racovian Catechiſm follow Socinus, and there the Anſwer to the Places which ſpeak of Chriſt's Dying for us, is, that they do not ſignifie in our ſtead; but for our good. Which they are very careful to diſtinguiſh, becauſe they think that the latter implies no more than a Condition in order to the Expiation in Heaven; but the other makes him a true Propitiatory Sacrifice for our Sins. But if Chriſt did not ſuffer in our ſtead; how can they poſſibly Reconcile his undergoing this Condition with their own Meaſures of Divine Juſtice? All they pretend to ſay, is, that it was labour and Suffering but not Puniſhment. Which is to ſpeak againſt the Common Senſe of Mankind; and is a ridiculous piece of Stoiciſm. They ſay, it was a meer Act of Dominion as to Chriſt and not of Juſtice. But if there be ſuch an Eſſential Attribute as Juſtice in God, then the Exerciſe of Dominion muſt be regulated by it; eſpecially where there was nothing but perfect Innocency. The Caſe is very different as to the ſinful Race of Mankind, who having the Guilt of Sin upon them, God may juſtly exerciſe his Dominion over them as he ſees cauſe; but he always doth it juſtly, although the particular Reaſons may not be within our reach. But here is no Guilt of Sin conſidered, either of his own, or others; according to their Principles; and yet they make him to undergo as great Sufferings, as we do, who aſſert that he ſuffer'd for our ſakes in our ſtead; which alone gives a Reaſonable Account of it.

But in the late Correct Edition of the Racovian Catechiſm they ſay, the Senſe of Chriſt's Sufferings for our Sins is two-fold, but both come to one at laſt, 1. That Chriſt ſuffered as a Sacrifice in our ſtead; tanquam victima pro nobis Succedanea. How can Socinus and the Racovian Catechiſm agree? 2. That he ſuffer'd for our good. But they deny any Commutation which they ſay, was not in the Expiatory Sacrifices among the Jews. What doth a Subſtitution differ from a Commutation in this Caſe?

But how do ſuffering in our ſtead and for our good come all to one at laſt? Either it muſt be, that Chriſt did truly ſuffer in our ſtead, when he underwent the Puniſhment of our Sins in order to our Redemption and Expiation; and that is a very good and true Senſe; which we readily embrace, and are very well content that they ſhould come all to one: Or if the meaning be only, that Chriſt may be ſaid to ſuffer in our ſtead, becauſe we have Benefit by the Conſequences of his Death; then his dying is only conſider'd as a bare Condition and not as a Sacrifice in our ſtead. As to make it plain by an Inſtance; we all agree that Joſeph's Suffering in Egypt was deſign'd by the Wiſe Providence of God for the good of his Brethren, which they received after his Advancement, to which his Suffering was an Antecedent Condition. But can any Man ſay, that he ſuffer'd in ſtead of his Brethren? But now if Joſeph's Brethren had been ſold for Slaves in Egypt, and Joſeph had gone down thither and offer'd himſelf a Priſoner for their Deliverance; this had been truly Suffering in their ſtead, as well as for their Advantage. And ſuppoſe the King of Egypt had agreed with Joſeph, that if he would become Priſoner for his Brethren, he would advance him, and he ſhould himſelf deliver them by his own Power; this doth not at all hinder his Suffering in their ſtead. But if it had no Relation to their Deliverance by his being made Captive himſelf; but was only a ſtep to his Advancement; then it cannot be ſaid to be in their ſtead, although it might turn to their Advantage. And ſo much for the Senſe of the Racovian Catechiſm.

But our Unitarians fly higher, for they ſay,

1. That God could not juſtly or wiſely ſubſtitute an Innocent Perſon to undergo Puniſhment in place of the Guilty.
2. That Chriſt could not freely offer himſelf as a Sacrifice in our ſtead, nor could God accept of it, or allow it.

So that here we have the true State of this Controverſie between us, viz. whether Chriſt were a Real Expiatory Sacrifice for the Sins of Mankind. For, if he could not be Subſtituted in our ſtead, nor God accept of his offering up himſelf for us; all the other expreſſions are meer Words given out on purpoſe to Amuſe and Deceive us.

And this is that which I have undertaken to make out in the following Diſcourſe, viz.

Chap. II. 1. That the Scripture doth as plainly ſet forth that Chriſt ſuffer'd the Puniſhment of our Sins and in our ſtead, as it could do; and that no Expreſſions could be thought of to that purpoſe, but might be anſwered in the ſame way that they do theſe. And therefore it is in vain to contend with ſuch Men, who are reſolved that Words and Phraſes ſhall ſignifie no otherwiſe, than they would have them. And yet at laſt they cannot deny but a kind of Subſtitution is implied as a Victima Succedanea; but how? That he ſuffer'd for our good and by the occaſion of our Sins, but not the Puniſhment of them. Thus far then we have gained, that the Words of Scripture are for us; but ſay they, Whatever the Words are, they cannot mean any real Puniſhment, becauſe he was an Innocent Perſon. Therefore I have ſhewed;

Chap. III. 2. That there is no Repugnancy in Reaſon, nor to the Juſtice of God for an Innocent Perſon to ſuffer by his own Conſent and for ſo great an End, what the Scripture attributes to our Saviour. And I have fully anſwered the Arguments brought by our Adverſaries to prove that God could not juſtly or wiſely ſubſtitute an Innocent Perſon to ſuffer for the Guilty.

Ch. IV. v. 4. 3. That Chriſt did offer himſelf, as an Expiatory Sacrifice to God in our ſtead; and that God did accept and allow of it. Which is the Deſign of the three laſt Chapters. And till an Anſwer be given to what I have there diſcourſed at large, I ſhall refer the Reader to what is already ſaid; and ſhall ſuppoſe thoſe Anſwers to be ſufficient, till I ſee ſome better Reaſons for their Opinion in this matter, than I have yet met with, although I have been no ſtranger to their late Writings, as, God willing, they may ſee on another Occaſion.

CONCERNING

CHAP. I.

I. Of the Socinian way of interpreting Scripture; and of the uncertainty it leaves us in as to the main Articles of Faith, manifeſted by an Expoſition of Gen. 1. ſuitable to that way. II. The State of the Controverſie in general concerning the Sufferings of Chriſt for us. He did not ſuffer the ſame we ſhould have done. III. The grand Miſtake in making Puniſhments of the nature of Debts. IV. The difference between them at large diſcovered, from the different reaſon and ends of them. V. The Right of Puniſhment in God proved againſt Crellius, not to ariſe from mere dominion. VI. The end of Puniſhment not bare Compenſation, as it is in Debts; what Puniſhment due to an injured Perſon by the right of Nature; proper Puniſhment a reſult of Laws. VII. SIR,

ALthough the Letter I received from your hands contained in it ſo many miſtakes of my Meaning and Deſign, that it ſeemed to be the greateſt Civility to the Writer of it, to give no Anſwer at all to it; becauſe that could not be done, withour the diſcovery of far more Weakneſſes in him, than he pretends to find in my Diſcourſe: Yet the Weight and Importance of the Matter may require a farther account from me, concerning the true reaſon of the Sufferings of Chriſt. Wherein my Deſign was ſo far from repreſenting Old Errors to the beſt Advantage, or to wreck my Wits to defend them, as that Perſon ſeems to ſuggeſt; that I aimed at nothing more than to give a true Account of what upon a ſerious enquiry, I judged to be the moſt natural and genuine Meaning of the Chriſtian Doctrine contained in the Writings of the New Teſtament.

Of the Socinian way of interpreting Scripture.

I. For finding therein ſuch multitudes of Expreſſions, which to an unprejudiced Mind attribute all the the mighty effects of the Love of God to us, to the Obedience and Sufferings of Chriſt, I began to conſider what reaſon there was why the plain and eaſie ſenſe of thoſe places muſt be forſaken, and a remote and metaphorical meaning put upon them. Which I thought my ſelf the more obliged to do, becauſe I could not conceive if it had been the deſign of the Scripture, to have delivered the received Doctrine of the Chriſtian Church, concerning the reaſon of the Sufferings of Chriſt, that it could have been more clearly and fully expreſſed than it is already. So that ſuppoſing that to have been the true meaning of the ſeveral places of Scripture which we contend for; yet the ſame arts and ſubtilties might have been uſed to pervert it, which are imployed to perſwade Men that is not the true meaning of them. And what is equally ſerviceable to Truth and Falſhood, can of it ſelf, have no power on the Minds of Men to convince them it muſt be one, and not the other. Nay, if every unuſual and improper acception of words in the Scripture, ſhall be thought ſufficient to take away the natural and genuine Senſe, where the Matter is capable of it, I know ſcarce any Article of Faith can be long ſecure; and by theſe arts Men may declare that they believe the Scriptures, and yet believe nothing of the Chriſtian Faith. For if the improper, though unuſual acception of thoſe Expreſſions of Chriſt's dying for us, of Redemption, Propitiation, Reconciliation by his Blood, of his bearing our Iniquities, and being made Sin and a Curſe for us, ſhall be enough to invalidate all the Arguments taken from them to prove that which the proper Senſe of them both doth imply, why may not the improper uſe of the terms of Creation and Reſurrection, as well take away the natural Senſe of them in the great Articles of the Creation of the World, and Reſurrection after death? For if it be enough to prove that Chriſt's dying for us, doth not imply dying in our ſtead; becauſe ſometimes dying for others imports no more than dying for ſome advantage to come to them; if Redemption being ſometimes uſed for mere deliverance, ſhall make our Redemption by Chriſt, wholly Metaphorical; if the terms of Propitiation, Reconciliation, &c. ſhall looſe their force, becauſe they are ſometimes uſed where all things cannot be ſuppoſed parallel with the Senſe we contend for: Why ſhall I be bound to believe that the World was ever created in a proper Senſe, ſince thoſe Perſons againſt whom I argue, ſo earneſtly contend that in thoſe Places in which it ſeems as proper as any, it is to be underſtood only in a Metaphorical? If when the World and all things are ſaid to be made by Chriſt, we are not to underſtand the Production but the Reformation of the World and all things in it, although the natural Senſe of the Words be quite otherwiſe; what Argument can make it neceſſary for me not to underſtand the Creation of the World in a metaphorical Senſe, when Moſes delivers to us the Hiſtory of it? Why may not I underſtand in the beginning, Gen. 1. for the beginning of the Moſaical Diſpenſation, as well as Socinus doth in the beginning, John 1. for the beginning of the Evangelical? And that from the very ſame Argument uſed by him, ziz. That in the beginning is to be underſtood of the main Subject concerning which the Author intends to write, and that I am as ſure it was in Moſes concerning the Law given by him, as it was in St. John, concerning the Goſpel delivered by Chriſt. Why may not the Creation of the Heavens and the Earth, be no more than the erection of the Jewiſh Polity? ſince it is acknowledged, ged, that by New Heavens and New Earth, wherein dwelleth Righteouſneſs, no more is underſtood than a new State of things under the Goſpel? Why may not the confuſed Chaos import no more than the ſtate of Ignorance and Darkneſs, under which the World was before the Law of Moſes? Since it is confeſſed that it ſignifies in the New Teſtament ſuch a ſtate of the World before the Goſpel appeared? And conſequently, why may not the Light which made the firſt Day be the firſt tendencies to the Doctrine of Moſes, which being at firſt divided and ſcattered, was united afterwards in one great Body of Laws, which was called the Sun, becauſe it was the great Director of the Jewiſh Nation, and therefore ſaid to rule the day; as the leſs conſiderable Laws of other Nations are called the Moon, becauſe they were to govern thoſe who were yet under the night of Ignorance? Why may not the Firmament being in the midſt of the Waters, imply the erection of the Jewiſh State in the midſt of a great deal of trouble, ſince it is confeſſed, that Waters are often taken in Scripture in a Metaphorical Senſe for troubles and afflictions? And the Earth appearing out of the Waters, be no more but the ſettlement of that State after its troubles; and particularly with great Elegancy after their Paſſage through the Red Sea? And the Production of Herbs and living Creatures, be the great encreaſe of the People of all ſorts, as well thoſe of a meaner Rank (and therefore called Herbs) as thoſe of a higher, that were to live upon the other, and ſometimes trample upon them, and therefore by way of excellency called the Living Creatures? And when theſe were multiplied and brought into order, (which being done by ſteps and degrees, is ſaid to be finiſhed in ſeveral days) then the State and the Church flouriſhed and enjoyed a great deal of pleaſure, which was the production of Man and Woman, and their being placed in Paradiſe: (for a perfect Man, notes a high degree of Perfection, and a Woman is taken for the Church in the Revelations) but when they followed the Cuſtoms of other Nations which were as a fobidden Tree to them, then they loſt all their happineſs and pleaſure, and were expell'd out of their own Country, and lived in great ſlavery and miſery, which was the Curſe pronounced againſt them, for violating the Rules of Policy eſtabliſhed among them. Thus you ſee how ſmall a meaſure of Wit, by the advantage of thoſe ways of interpreting Scripture, which the ſubtileſt of our Adverſaries make uſe of, will ſerve to pervert the cleareſt Expreſſions of Scripture to quite another Senſe than was ever intended by the Writer of them. And I aſſure you, if that Rule of interpreting Scripture be once allowed; that if Words are ever uſed in a Metaphorical Senſe, there can be no neceſſity of underſtanding them any where in a proper; there is ſcarce any thing which you look on as the moſt neceſſary to be believed in Scripture, but it may be made appear not to be ſo upon thoſe terms. For by reaſon of the paucity, and therefore the ambiguity of the Original Words of the Hebrew Language, the ſtrange Idioms of it, the different Senſes of the ſame Word in ſeveral Conjugations, the want of ſeveral modes of Expreſſion which are uſed in other Languages, and above all the lofty and metaphorical way of ſpeaking uſed in all Eaſtern Countries, and the imitation of the Hebrew Idioms in the Greek Tranſlation of the Old Teſtament, and Original of the New, you can hardly affix a Senſe upon any Words uſed therein, but a Man who will be at the pains to ſearch all poſſible Significations and uſes of thoſe Words, will put you hard to it, to make good that which you took to be the proper meaning of them. Wherefore although I will not deny to our Adverſaries the praiſe of Subtility and Diligence; I cannot give them that (which is much more praiſe-worthy) of Diſcretion and ſound Judgment. For while they uſe their utmoſt Induſtry to ſearch all the moſt remote and metaphorical Senſes of Words, with a deſign to take off the genuine and proper Meaning of them, they do not attend to the ill Conſequence that may be made of this to the overthrowing thoſe things, the belief of which themſelves make neceſſary to Salvation. For by this way the whole Goſpel may be made an Allegory, and the Reſurrection of Chriſt be thought as metaphorical as the Redemption by his Death, and the force of all the Precepts of the Goſpel avoided by ſome unuſual ſignification of the Words wherein they are delivered. So that nothing can be more unreaſonable than ſuch a method of proceeding, unleſs it be firſt ſufficiently proved that the Matter is not capable of the proper Senſe, and therefore of neceſſity the improper only is to be alowed. And this is that which Socinus ſeems after all his pains to pervert the meaning of the Places in controverſie, to rely on moſt; viz. That the Doctrine of ſatisfaction doth imply an impoſſibility in the thing it ſelf, and therefore muſt needs be falſe; nay, he ſaith, the infallibility of the Revealer had not been enough in this Caſe, ſuppoſing that Chriſt had ſaid it, and riſen from the dead, to declare his own Veracity; unleſs he had delivered it by its proper Cauſes and Effects, and ſo ſhewed the poſſibility of the thing it ſelf. And the reaſon, he ſaith, why they believe their Doctrine true, is not barely becauſe God hath ſaid it, but they believe certainly that God hath ſaid it, becauſe they know it to be true; by knowing the contrary Doctrine to be impoſſible. The Controverſie then, concerning the meaning of the Places in diſpute is to be reſolved from the nature and reaſonableneſs of the matter contained in them? For if Socinus his reaſon be anſwerable to his confidence, if the account we give of the Sufferings of Chriſt, be repugnant not only to the Juſtice, Goodneſs and Grace of God, but to the nature of the thing; if it appear impoſſible that Mankind ſhould be redeemed in a proper Senſe, or that God ſhould be propitiated by the Death of his Son as a Sacrifice for Sin; if it enervate all the Precepts of Obedience, and tend rather to juſtifie Sins than thoſe who do repent of them; I ſhall then agree, that no induſtry can be too great in ſearching Authors, comparing Places, examining Verſions, to find out ſuch a Senſe as may be agreeable to the nature of things, the Attributes of God, and the deſign of Chriſtian Religion. But if on the contrary, the Scripture doth plainly aſſert thoſe things, from whence our Doctrine follows, and without which no reaſonable account can be given either of the Expreſſions uſed therein, or of the Sufferings of Chriſt; if Chriſt's Death did immediately reſpect God as a Sacrifice, and was paid as a Price for our Redemption; if ſuch a deſign of his death be ſo far from being repugnant to the nature of God, that it highly manifeſts his Wiſdom, Juſtice and Mercy; if it aſſert nothing but what is ſo far from being impoſſible, that it is very reconcileable to the common Principles of Reaſon, as well as the Free-Grace of God in the pardon of Sin; if, being truly underſtood, it is ſo far from enervating, that it advances highly all the purpoſes of Chriſtian Religion. then it can be no leſs than a betraying one of the grand Truths of the Chriſtian Doctrine, not to believe ours to be the true Senſe of the Places in Controverſy. And this is that which I now take upon me to maintain.

Socin. de Servat. Part. 2. Cap. 4.

II. For

The ſtate of the Controverſie in general.

II. For our clearer proceeding herein, nothing will be more neceſſary, than to underſtand the true State of the Controverſie; which hath been rendred more obſcure by the miſtakes of ſome, who have managed it with greater Zeal than Judgment; who have aſſerted more than they needed to have done, and made our Adverſaries aſſert much leſs than they do: And by this means have ſhot over their Adverſaries Heads, and laid their own more open to Aſſaults. It is eaſie to obſerve, that moſt of Socinus his Arguments are levelled againſt an Opinion, which few who have conſidered theſe things do maintain, and none need to think themſelves obliged to do it; which is, That Chriſt paid a proper and rigid Satisfaction for the Sins of Men, conſidered under the notion of Debts, and that he paid the very ſame, which we ought to have done; which in the Senſe of the Law, is never called Satisfaction, but ſtrict Payment. Againſt this Socinus diſputes from the impoſſibility of Chriſt's paying the very ſame that we were to have paid; becauſe our penalty was eternal Death, and that as the conſequent of inherent guilt, which Chriſt neither did nor could undergo. Neither is it enough to ſay, That Chriſt had undergone eternal Death, unleſs he had been able to free himſelf from it; for the admiſſion of one to pay for another, who could diſcharge the Debt in much leſs time than the Offenders could, was not the ſame which the Law required. For that takes no notice of any other than the Perſons who had ſinned; and if a Mediator could have paid the ſame, the Original Law muſt have been disjunctive; viz. That either the Offender muſt ſuffer, or another for him; but then the Goſpel had not been the bringing in of a better Covenant, but a performance of the old. But if there be a relaxation or diſpenſation of the firſt Law; then it neceſſarily follows, that what Chriſt paid, was not the very ſame which the firſt Law required: For what need of that, when the very ſame was paid that was in the Obligation? But if it be ſaid, That the dignity of the Perſon makes up, what wanted in the kind or degree of puniſhment; this is a plain Confeſſion that it is not the ſame, but ſomething equivalent, which anſwers the ends of the Sanction, as much as the ſame would have done, which is the thing we contend for. Beſides, if the very ſame had been paid in the ſtrict Senſe, there would have followed a Deliverance ipſo facto; for the Releaſe immediately follows the Payment of the ſame; and it had been injuſtice to have required any thing further, in order to the diſcharge of the Offender, when ſtrict and full Payment had been made of what was in the Obligation. But we ſee that Faith and Repentance, and the Conſequences of thoſe two, are made Conditions on our Parts, in order to the enjoying the benefit of what Chriſt hath procured; So that the Releaſe is not immediate upon the Payment, but depends on a new Contract, made in conſideration of what Chriſt hath done and ſuffered for us. If it be ſaid, That by Chriſt's Payment, we become his, and he requires theſe Conditions of us; beſides the contrariety of it to the Scriptures, which make the Conditions to be required by him to whom the Payment was made; we are to conſider, that theſe very Perſons aſſert, that Chriſt paid all for us, and in our name and ſtead; ſo that the Payment by Chriſt was by a Subſtitution in our room; and if he paid the ſame which the Law required, the benefit muſt immediately accrue to thoſe, in whoſe Name the Debt was paid. For what was done in the Name of another, is all one to the Creditor, as if it had been done by the Debtor himſelf. But above all things, it is impoſſible to reconcile the freeneſs of Remiſſion, miſſion, with the full payment of the very ſame which was in the obligation. Neither will it ſerve to ſay, That though it was not free to Chriſt, yet it was to us. For the ſatisfaction and remiſſion muſt reſpect the ſame perſon; for Chriſt did not pay for himſelf, but for us, neither could the remiſſion be to him. Chriſt therefore is not conſider'd in his own name, but as acting in our ſtead; ſo that what was free to him, muſt be to us; what was exactly paid by him, it is all one as if it had been done by us: ſo that it is impoſſible the ſame debt ſhould by fully paid and freely forgiven. Much leſs will it avoid the difficulty in this caſe to ſay, That it was a refuſable payment: For it being ſuppoſed to be the very ſame, it was not in juſtice refuſable; and however not in equity, if it anſwer the intention of the Law, as much as the ſuffering of the offenders had done; and the more it doth that, the leſs refuſable it is. And although God himſelf found out the way, that doth not make the pardon free, but the deſignation of the perſon who was to pay the debt. Thus when our Adverſaries diſpute againſt this opinion, no wonder if they do it ſucceſsfully; but this whole opinion is built upon a miſtake, that ſatisfaction muſt be the payment of the very ſame; which while they contend for, they give our Adverſaries too great an advantage, and make them think they triumph over the Faith of the Church, when they do it only over the miſtake of ſome particular perſons. But the foundation of this miſtake, lies in the conſideration of puniſhment, under the notion of debts, and that ſatisfaction therefore muſt be by ſtrict payment in rigour of Law; but how great that miſtake is, will appear in the ſubſequent diſcourſe. But it cannot but be wondred at, that the very ſame perſons who conſider ſins, as debts which muſt be ſtrictly ſatisfied for, do withal contend for the abſolute neceſſity of this ſatisfaction: whereas Socinus his Arguments would hold good, if ſins were only conſidered as debts, and God as the mere Creditor of puniſhment; he might as freely part with his own right without ſatisfaction, as any Creditor may forgive what ſumm he pleaſes to a perſon indebted to him; and no reaſon can be brought to the contrary, from that notion of ſins, why he may not do it. But if they be conſidered with a reſpect to God's Government of the world, and the honour of his Laws, then ſome further acccount may be given, why it may not be conſiſtent with that, to paſs by the ſins of men, without ſatisfaction made to them.

Of the difference of debts and puniſhments.

III. And becauſe the miſtake in this matter, hath been the foundation of moſt of the ſubſequent miſtakes on both ſides, and the diſcovery of the cauſe of errors, doth far more to the cure of them, than any Arguments brought againſt them; and withal, the true underſtanding of the whole Doctrine of ſatisfaction depends upon it, I ſhall endeavour to make clear the notion under which our ſins are conſidered; for upon that depends the nature of the ſatisfaction which is to be made for them. For while our Adverſaries ſuppoſe, that ſins are to be looked on under the notion of debts in this debate, they aſſert it to be wholly free for God to remit them, without any ſatisfaction. They make the right of puniſhment merely to depend on God's abſolute Dominion; and that all ſatisfaction muſt be conſidered under the notion of compenſation, for the Injuries done to him, to whom it is to be made. But if we can clearly ſhew a conſiderable difference between the notion of debts and puniſhments, if the right puniſhment doth not depend upon mere Dominion, and that ſatisfaction by way of puniſhment, is not primarily intended for compenſation, but for other ends, we ſhall make not only the ſtate of the Controverſie much clearer, but offer ſomething conſiderable towards the reſolution of it. The way I ſhall take for the proof the difference between debts and puniſhments, ſhall be uſing the other for the Arguments for it. For beſides, that thoſe things are juſt in matter of debts, which are not ſo in the caſe of puniſhments; as, that it is lawful for a man to forgive all the debts which are owing him by all perſons, though they never ſo contumaciouſly refuſe payment, but our Adverſaries will not ſay ſo in the caſe of Sins; for although they aſſert, That the juſtice of God doth never require puniſhment in caſe of repentance, yet withall they aſſert, That in caſe of impenitency, it is not only agreeable, but due to the nature and decrees; and therefore to the rectitude and equity of God not to give pardon. But if this be true, then there is an apparent difference between the notion of debts and puniſhments; for the Impenitency doth but add to the greatneſs of the debt: And will they ſay, it is only in Gods Power to remit ſmall debts, but he muſt puniſh the greateſt? what becomes then of God's abſolute liberty to part with his own right? will not this ſhew more of his kindneſs to pardon the greater, rather than leſſer offenders? But if there be ſomething in the nature of the thing, which makes it not only juſt, but neceſſary for impenitent ſinners to be puniſhed, as Crellius after Socinus frequently acknowledges, then it is plain, that ſins are not to be conſidered merely as debts, for that obſtinacy and impenitency is only puniſhed as a greater degree of ſin, and therefore as a greater debt. And withal, thoſe things are lawful in the remiſſion of debts, which are unjuſt in the matter of puniſhments; as it is lawful for a Creditor, when two perſons are conſidered in equal circumſtances, to remit one, and not the other; nay to remit the greater debt, without any ſatisfaction, and to exact the leſſer to the greateſt extremity; but it is unjuſt in matter of Puniſhments, where the reaſon and circumſtances are the ſame, for a perſon who hath committed a crime of very dangerous conſequence, to eſcape unpuniſhed, and another who hath been guilty of far leſs to be ſeverely executed. Beſides theſe conſiderations, I ſay, I ſhall now prove the difference of debts and puniſhments, from thoſe two things whereby things are beſt differenced from each other; viz. The different Reaſon, and the different end of them.

The reaſon of humane puniſhment is the publick intereſt.

IV. (1.) The different Reaſon of debts and puniſhments: The reaſon of debts is dominion and property, and the obligation of them, depends upon voluntary contracts between parties; but the reaſon of puniſhments is Juſtice and Government, and depends not upon mere contracts, but the relation the perſon ſtands in to that Authority to which he is accountable for his actions. For if the obligation to puniſhment, did depend upon mere contract, then none could juſtly be puniſhed, but ſuch who have conſented to it by an antecedent contract: If it be ſaid, That a contract is implied, by their being in ſociety with others; that is as much as I deſire to make the difference appear, for in caſe of debts, the obligation depends upon the voluntary contract of the perſon; but in caſe of puniſhments, the very relation to Government, and living under Laws doth imply it. And the right of puniſhment depends upon the obligation of Laws, where the reaſon of them holds, without any expreſs contract, or ſuperiority of one over another; as in the caſe of violation of the Laws of Nations, that gives right to another Nation to puniſh the infringers of it. Otherwiſe Wars could never be lawful between two Nations, and none could be warrantable, but thoſe of a Prince againſt his rebellious ſubjects, who have broken the Laws themſelves conſented expreſly to. Beſides, in caſe of debts every man is bound to pay, whether he be call'd upon or no; but in caſe of puniſhments, no man is bound to betray or accuſe himſelf. For the obligation to payment in caſe of debt ariſeth from the injury ſuſtained by that particular perſon, if another detains what is his own from him; but the obligation to puniſhment, ariſes from the injury, the Publick ſuſtains by the impunity of crimes, of which the Magiſtrates are to take Care; who by the diſpenſing of puniſhments, do ſhew that to be true which Grotius aſſerts, that if there be any Creditor to be aſſigned in puniſhment, it is the publick good: Which appears by this, that all puniſhments are proportioned, according to the influence the offences have upon the publick intereſt; for the reaſon of puniſhment is not becauſe a Law is broken, but becauſe the breach of a Law tends to diſſolve the community, by infringing the Authority of the Laws, and the honour of thoſe who are to take care of them. For if we conſider it, the meaſure of puniſhments is in a well ordered State, taking from the influence which crimes have upon the peace and intereſt of the community. No man queſtions, but that Malice, Pride and Avarice, are things really as bad as many faults, that are ſeverely puniſhed by humane Laws, but the reaſon theſe are not puniſhed is, becauſe they do not ſo much injury to the publick intereſt, as Theft and Robbery do. Beſides, in thoſe things wherein the Laws of a Nation are concerned, the utmoſt rigour is not uſed in the preventing of crimes, or the execution of them when committed, if ſuch an execution may endanger the publick more than the impunity of the offenders may do. And there are ſome things which are thought fit to be forbidden, where the utmoſt means are not uſed to prevent them; as Merchants are forbidden to ſteal cuſtoms, but they are not put under an Oath not to do it. And when penalties have been deſerved, the execution of them hath been deferred, till it may be moſt for the advantage of the publick: as Joab's puniſhment till Solomon's Reign, though he deſerved it as much in David's. So that the rule commonly talked of, Fiat juſtitia & pereat mundus, is a piece of Pedantry, rather than true Wiſdom; for whatever penalty inflicted brings a far greater detriment to the publick, than the forbearance of it, is no piece of Juſtice to the State, but the contrary; the greateſt Law, being the ſafety and preſervation of the whole Body. By which it appears, that in humane Laws, the reaſon of puniſhment is not, that ſuch an action is done, but becauſe the impunity in doing it, may have a bad influence on the publick intereſt; but in debts, the right of Reſtitution depends upon the injury received by a particular perſon, who looks at no more than the reparation of his loſs by it.

The right of Divine puniſhment not mere Dominion. Crell. Reſponſ. ad Grot. cap. 2. ſect. 1. &c.

V. We are now to conſider, how far theſe things will hold in Divine Laws, and what right of puniſhment doth reſult from them. For Crellius, the ſubtilleſt of our Adverſaries, knowing of how great conſequence the reſolution of this is, in the whole Controverſie of Satiſfaction, faction, vehemently contends, That the right of puniſhment doth reſult from God's abſolute Dominion, and therefore he is to be conſidered as the offended party, and not as Governour in the right of inflicting puniſhment; for which his firſt Argument is, That our obedience is due to God's p. 144. Law, on the account of his Dominion; but when that is not performed, the penalty ſucceeds in its room, and therefore that doth belong to God on the ſame account: His other arguments are, from the compenſation of injuries due to the offended party, and from God's anger againſt ſin, in which he is to be conſider'd as the offended party: Theſe two latter will be anſwered under the next head; the firſt I am to examine here. He therefore tells us, that the right of puniſhment belongs to God's Dominion, becauſe the reaſon of his Government of mankind is; becauſe he is the Lord of them. But, for our better underſtanding this, we are to conſider, although the original right of Government doth reſult from God's Dominion; for theefore our obedience is due, becauſe of his Sovereignty over us; yet when God takes upon him the notion of a Governour, he enters into a new relation with his Creatures, diſtinct from the firſt as mere Lord. For he is equally Lord of all to whom he gives a being, but he doth not require obedience upon equal terms, nor governs them by the ſame Laws: Dominion is properly ſhewed in the exerciſe of power; but when God gives Laws according to which he will reward and puniſh, he ſo far reſtrains the exerciſe of his Dominion to a ſubſerviency to the ends of Government. If we ſhould ſuppoſe, that God governs the world merely by his Dominion, we muſt take away all rewards and puniſhments; for then the actions of men, would be the mere effects of irreſiſtible power, and ſo not capable of rewards and puniſhments; for there could be neither of theſe, where mens actions are capable of the differences of good and evil, and that they cannot be, if they be the acts of God's Dominion, and not of their own. But if God doth not exerciſe his full Dominion over rational Creatures, it is apparent that he doth govern them under another notion than as mere Lord, and the reaſon of puniſhment is not to be taken from an abſolute right which God doth not make uſe of, but from the ends and deſigns of Government, which are his own Honour, the Authority of his Laws, and the good of thoſe whom he doth govern. And Crellius is greatly miſtaken, when he makes puniſhment to ſucceed in the place of the right of obedience; for it is only the deſert of puniſhment, which follows upon the violation of that right; and as we aſſert, that the right of obedience is derived from God's Sovereignty, ſo we deny not, but the deſert of puniſhment is from the violation of it; but withal we ſay, that the obligation to puniſhment depends upon the Laws, and God's right to inflict puniſhment (Laws being ſuppoſed) is immediately from that Government which he hath over mankind: For otherwiſe, if the whole right of puniſhment did ſtill depend upon God's Dominion, and the firſt right of Sovereignty, then all ſins muſt have equal puniſhments, becauſe they are all equal violations of the fundamental right of obedience; then it were at liberty for God to puniſh a greater Sin, with a leſs puniſhment; and a leſſer Sin, with a greater: And laſtly, this would make the puniſhment of Sin, a mere Arbitrary thing in God; for there would be no reaſon of puniſhment, but what depended upon God's mere will; whereas the reaſon of puniſhment in Scripture is drawn from repugnancy of ſin to the divine purity and holineſs, and not merely from God's power or will to puniſh;

niſh; but if that were all the reaſon of it, there would be no repugnancy in the nature of the thing for the moſt vitious perſon to be rewarded, and the moſt pious to be made everlaſtingly miſerable. But who ever yet durſt ſay or think ſo? From whence it appears that the relation between ſin and puniſhment is no reſult of God's arbitrary will; but it is founded in the nature of the things; ſo that as it is juſt for God to puniſh offenders, ſo it would be unjuſt to puniſh the moſt innocent perſon without any reſpect to ſin. But if the right of puniſhment depends merely on God's Dominion, I cannot underſtand why God may not puniſh when and whom, and in what manner he pleaſeth; without any impeachment of his Juſtice, and therefore it is to be wonder'd at, that the ſame perſons who aſſert the right of puniſhment to be merely in God's Dominion, ſhould yet cry out of the injuſtice of one perſon being puniſhed for anothers faults; for why may not God exerciſe his Dominion in this caſe? yes, ſay they, he may his dominion, but he cannot puniſh, becauſe puniſhment ſuppoſes guilt, and cannot be juſt without it; how far that reaches, will be examined afterwards; at preſent, we take notice of the contradiction to themſelves which our Adverſaries are guilty of, that they may ſerve their own Hypotheſis, for when we diſpute with them, againſt abſolute remiſſion without ſatisfaction, then they contend that the right of puniſhment is a mere act of Dominion, and God may part with his right, if he pleaſe; but when they diſpute with us againſt the tranſlation of puniſhment from one to another, then they no longer ſay that the right of puniſhment is an act of Dominion, but that it is a neceſſary conſequent of inherent guilt, and cannot be removed from one to another. And then they utterly deny that puniſhment is of the nature of debts, for one man's money, they ſay, may become anothers, but one man's puniſhment cannot become anothers: Thus they give and take, deny and grant, as it ſerves for their preſent purpoſes.

Soc. de Servat. l. 3. c. 3. Prælect. c. 18.

2. The end of puniſhments not bare compenſation as it is in debts.

VI. (2.) The different ends of debts and puniſhments, make it appear that there is a difference in the nature of them; for the intention of the obligation to payment in caſe of debt, is the compenſation of the damage which the Creditor ſuſtains; but the intention of puniſhment, is not bare compenſation, but it is deſigned for greater and further ends. For which we are to conſider the different nature of puniſhments, as they are inflicted by way of reparation of ſome injury done to private perſons, and as they do reſpect the publick good. I grant, that private perſons in caſe of injuries, ſeek for compenſation of the damage they ſuſtain, and ſo far they bear the nature of debts; but if we conſider them as inflicted by thoſe who have a care of the publick, though they are to ſee that no private perſon ſuffers injury by another; yet the reaſon of that is not merely that he might enjoy his own, but becauſe the doing injuries to others tends to the ſubverſion of the ends of Government. Therefore, I can by no means admit that Poſition of Crellius, that a Magiſtrate only puniſhes as he aſſumes the perſon of the particular men who have received injuries from others; for he aims at other ends than merely the compenſation of thoſe injured perſons. Their great end is according to the old Roman Formula, nè quid Reſp. detrimenti capiat: the reaſon of exacting penalties upon private men is ſtill with a regard to the publick ſafety. Suppoſing men in a ſtate of nature no puniſhment is due to the injured perſon, but reſtitution of damage, and compenſation of the loſs that accrues to him by the injury ſuſtained; and whatever goes beyond this, is the effect of Government, which conſtitutes penalties for preſervation of the Society which is under Laws. But herein Crellius is our adverſary, but with no advantage at all to his Cauſe; for he offers to prove againſt Grotius, That ſomething more is due by an injury beyond bare compenſation for what the other is ſuppoſed to loſe by the right of nature; for ſaith he, in every injury there is not only the real damage which the perſon ſuſtains, but there is a contempt of the perſon implyed in it for which as well as the former, he ought to have compenſation. To which I anſwer, 1. That this doth not prove what he deſigns, viz. that puniſhment doth belong to the injured perſon in a ſtate of Nature beyond bare reſtitution, but that it is neceſſary, that men ſhould not continue in ſuch a ſtate, that ſo they may be vindicated from that contempt, and others compelled to reſtitution. Both which, as they are puniſhments, are not in the power of the offended party as ſuch, but ſhew that it is very reaſonable there ſhould be Laws and Governours, that private perſons may be preſerved in their juſt rights, and offenders puniſhed for the vindication not only of their honour, but of the Laws too. And Laws being eſtabliſhed, the injured perſon hath right to no more, than the compenſation of his loſs; for that being forced upon the offending party, is a ſufficient vindication of his honour. 2. If the contempt of a private perſon makes a compenſation neceſſary, how much more will this hold in a publick Magiſtrate; whoſe contempt by diſobedience is of far worſe conſequence than that of a private perſon. And by this argument Crellius overthrows his main Hypotheſis, viz. that God may pardon ſin without ſatisfaction; for if it be not only neceſſary, that the loſs be compenſated but the diſhonour too; then ſo much greater as the diſhonour is, ſo much higher as the perſon is, ſo much more beneficial to the world as his Laws are, ſo much more neceſſary is it that in order to pardon there muſt be a ſatisfaction made to him, for the affronts he hath received from men. And if the greatneſs of the injury Crell. c. Grot. cap. 2. p. 174. be to be meaſured as Crellius aſſerts, from the worth and value of the thing, from the dignity and honour of the perſon, from the diſplicency of the fact to him, which he makes the meaſure of puniſhment; this makes it ſtill far more reaſonable, that God ſhould have ſatisfaction for the ſins of men, than that men ſhould have for the injuries done them by one another; eſpecially conſidering what the ſame Author doth aſſert afterwards, Sect. 29. p. 198. that it is ſometime repugnant to juſtice, for one to part with his own right in caſe of injuries, and that either from the nature and circumſtances of the things themſelves or a decree or determination to the contrary: for the firſt he inſtanceth in caſe of notorious defamation; in which he ſaith, it is a diſhoneſt and unlawful thing for a man, not to make uſe of his own right for his vindication: and for the other, in caſe of great obſtinacy and malice. By both which, it is moſt apparent, that Crellius puts a mighty difference between the nature of debts, and puniſhments, ſince in all caſes he allows it lawful for a perſon free, to remit his debts; but in ſome caſes he makes it utterly unlawful for a perſon not to make uſe of his right for puniſhment. And withal if a private perſon may not part with his own right in ſuch caſes, how unreaſonable is it not to aſſert the ſame of the great Governour of the World? and that there may be a neceſſity for him upon ſuppoſition of the contempt of himſelf and his Laws, to vindicate himſelf and his honour to the world, by ſome remarkable teſtimony of his ſeverity againſt ſin.

Crell. cap. 2. ſect. 2. ſect. 28.

VII. But Crellius yet urgeth another end of puniſhment, which though the moſt unreaſonable of all others, yet ſufficiently proves from himſelf the difference of debts and puniſhments, which is, the delight which the injured perſon takes in ſeeing the offender puniſhed. This he ſo much inſiſts upon, as though he made it the moſt natural end of puniſhment; for ſaith he, among the Puniſhments which a Prince or any other free Perſon can inflict, revenge is in the firſt place, and the more there is of that in any thing, the more properly it is called a puuiſhment; and he tells us what he means by this ultio; viz. ſolatium ex alieno dolore, the contentment taken in anothers pain. But ſaith he, no man muſt object, that this is a thing evil in it ſelf; for although it be forbidden us under the New Teſtament, yet in it ſelf it is not unlawful for one that hath ſuffered pain from another to ſeek for the eaſe of his own pain, by the miſeries of him that injured him: and for this purpoſe, ſaith he, we have the Paſſion of Anger in us, which being a deſire of returning injuries, is then ſatisfied when it apprehends it done. But how abſurd and unreaſonable this Doctrine is, will be eaſily diſcovered, for this would make the primary intendment of puniſhment to be the evil of him that ſuffers it. Where the right of puniſhment is derived from an injury received, and therefore that which gives that right, is ſome damage ſuſtained, the reparation of which is the firſt thing deſigned by the offended party: Though it take not up the whole nature of puniſhment. And on this account no man can juſtly propoſe any end to himſelf in anothers evil, but what comes under the notion of reſtitution. For the evil of another is only intended in puniſhment as it reſpects the good of him for whoſe ſake that evil is undergone. When that good may be obtained without anothers evil, the deſire of it is unjuſt and unreaſonable: and therefore all that contentment that any one takes in the evil another undergoes, as it is evil to him, is a thing repugnant to humane nature, and which all perſons condemn in others when they allow themſelves in it. It will be hard for Crellius to make any difference between this end of puniſhment which he aſſigns, and the greateſt cruelty; for what can that be worſe than taking delight in making others miſerable, and ſeeing them ſo when he hath made them. If it be replyed, that cruelty is without any cauſe; but here a juſt cauſe is ſuppoſed: I anſwer, a juſt cauſe is only ſuppoſed for the puniſhment, but there can be no juſt cauſe for any to delight in the miſeries of others, and to comfort themſelves by inflicting or beholding them. For the evil of another is never intended, but when it is the only means left for compenſation; and he muſt be guilty of great inhumanity, who deſires anothers evil any further than that tends to his own good, i. e. the reparation of the damage ſuſtained; which if it may be had without anothers evil, then that comes not by the right of nature within the reaſon of puniſhment; and conſequently where it doth not ſerve for that end, the comfort that men take in it is no part of juſtice, but cruelty. For there can be no reaſon at all aſſigned for it; for that lenimentum doloris which Crellius inſiſts on is merely imaginary, and no other than the Dog hath in gnawing the ſtone that is thrown at him; and for all that I know, that propenſion in nature to the retribution of evil for evil any further than it tends to our ſecurity, and the preſervation for the future, is one of the moſt unreaſonable Paſſions in humane Nature.

p. 191.

Of the nature of anger and revenge in men, and whether puniſhments are deſigned to ſatisfie them.

VIII. And if we examine the nature of Anger, either conſidered Naturally or Morally, the intention of it is, not the returning evil to another, for the evil received, but the ſecurity and preſervation of our ſelves; which we ſhould not have ſo great a care of, unleſs we had a quick ſenſe of injuries, and our blood were apt to be heated at the apprehenſion of them. But when this paſſion vents it ſelf, in doing others injury to alleviate its own grief, it is a violent and unreaſonable perturbation; but being governed by reaſon, it aims at no more, than the great end of our beings; viz. Self-Preſervation. But when that cannot be obtained without anothers evil, ſo far the intendment of it is lawful, but no further. And I cannot therefore think thoſe Philoſophers, who have defined Anger to be ὄρεξις ἀντιλυπήσεως, by whoſe Authority Crellius defends himſelf, when he makes anger to be a deſire of revenge, did throughly conſider what was juſt and reaſonable in it, but barely what was natural, and would be the effect of that paſſion, if not governed by reaſon. For otherwiſe Jul. Scaliger's definition is much more true and juſtifiable, that it is appetitus depulſionis; viz. that whereby we are ſtirred up to drive away from us, any thing that is injurious to us. But becauſe Crellius alledgeth a ſaying of Seneca, that would make vindicta of the nature of puniſhment, duabus de cauſis punire princeps ſolet, ſi aut ſe vindicet aut alium: We ſhall oppoſe to this the ſenſe of the ſame Author in this matter, which may ſufficiently clear the other paſſage: For, ſaith he, Inhumanum verbum eſt, & quidem pro juſto receptum, ultio, & à contumelia non differt niſi ordine: qui dolorem regerit, tantum excuſatius peccat. And no man ſpeaks with greater vehemency againſt the delight in others puniſhments than he doth; for he always aſſerts, the only reaſon of puniſhment, to be ſome advantage which is to come by it, and not meerly to ſatisfie anger, or to allay their own griefs, by ſeeing anothers: For, ſaith he, the puniſhment is inflicted, Non quia delectetur ullius pœna (procul eſt enim à ſapiente tam inhumana feritas) ſed ut documentum omnium ſint: So that it is only the uſefulneſs of puniſhment according to him, which makes it become any wiſe man; and ſo far from a ſatisfaction of his grief by anothers puniſhment, that he makes that a piece of inhumanity, not incident to any who pretend to wiſdom. Nay, he denies, that a juſt puniſhment doth flow from Anger; for he that inflicts that, doth it non ipſius pœnæ avidus, ſed quia oportet, not as deſiring the puniſhment, but becauſe there are great reaſons for it: And elſewhere, Exſequar quia oportet, non quia dolet: he is far enough then from approving, that imaginary compenſation of one mans grief by anothers. And he ſhews at large that the weakeſt natures, and the leaſt guided by reaſon, are the moſt ſubject to this anger and revenge. And although other things be pretended, the general cauſe of it is, a great infirmity of humane nature; and thence it is, that children and old men, and ſick perſons, are the moſt ſubject to it; and the better any are, the more they are freed from it:

rant to lie in this, The one delights in puniſhing, the other never does it but in caſe of neceſſity, when the publick good requires it. And this throughout his diſcourſe, he makes the meaſure of puniſhment. Who then could imagine, that he ſhould ſpeak ſo contradictory to himſelf, as to allow puniſhment for meer revenge, or the eaſing ones own griefs, by the pains of another? In the places cited by Crellius (if taken in his ſenſe) he ſpeaks what commonly is, not what ought to be in the world; for he diſputes againſt it in that very place, therefore that cannot be the meaning which he contends for. The common deſign of puniſhments by a Prince, ſaith he, is either to vindicate himſelf or others. I ſo render his words, becauſe vindicare, when it is joyned with the perſon injured, as here, vindicare ſe aut alium, doth properly relate to the end of puniſhment, which is aſſerting the right of the injured perſon; but when it is joyned with the perſons who have done the injury, or the crimes whereby they did it, then it properly ſignifies to puniſh. Thus Salluſt uſeth, Vindicatum in eos; and Cicero, In milites noſtros vehementer vindicatum, and for the fact very frequently in him, maleficia vindicare: But when it relates to the injured perſon, as here it doth, it cannot ſignifie meerly to puniſh; for then ſe vindicare would be to puniſh ones ſelf, but to aſſert his own right in caſe of injury, though it be with the puniſhment of another: For Vindicatio, as Cicero defines it, eſt per quam vis & injuria & omnino quod obfuturum eſt defendendo aut ulciſcendo propulſatur. So that the ſecurity of our ſelves in caſe of force or injury, is that which is called Vindication; which ſometimes may be done by defence, and other times by puniſhment. And that Seneca doth mean no more here, is apparent by what follows; for in caſe of private injuries, he ſaith, pœnam ſi tutò poterit donet, he would have the Prince forgive the puniſhment, if it may be done with ſafety; ſo that he would not have any one puniſhed, to ſatisfie anothers deſire of revenge, but to preſerve his own ſafety: And afterwards he ſaith, It is much beneath a Princes condition, to need that ſatisfaction which ariſes from anothers ſufferings: But for the puniſhments of others, he ſaith, The Law hath eſtabliſhed three ends, the amendment of the perſons, or making others better by their puniſhments, or the publick ſecurity, by taking away ſuch evil members out of the body: So that in publick puniſhments, he never ſo much as ſuppoſes, that contentment which revenge fanſies in others puniſhments, but makes them wholly deſigned for the publick advantage. For the Laws in puniſhment do not look backward but forward; for as * Plato ſaith, No wiſe man ever puniſhed, meerly becauſe men had offended, but leſt they ſhould: For paſt things cannot be recalled, but future are therefore forbidden, that they may be prevented. So to the ſame purpoſe is the ſaying of Lactantius, produced by Grotius, Surgimus ad vindictam, non quia læſi ſumus, ſed ut diſciplina ſervetur, mores corrigantur, licentia comprimatur: hæc eſt Ira juſta. To which Crellius anſwers, That this ſignifies nothing, unleſs it can be proved, that no man may juſtly puniſh another, meerly becauſe he is wronged. If he means of the right to puniſh, we deny not that to be, becauſe the perſon is wronged; but if he underſtands it of the deſign and end of puniſhment, then we deny, that it is an allowable end of puniſhments, any further than it can come under the notion of reſtitution, of which we have ſpoken already. When a Maſter (which is the inſtance he produceth) puniſheth his ſervants becauſe they have diſobeyed him: The reaſon of that puniſhment, is not the bare diſobedience, but the injury jury which comes to him by it; the reparation of which he ſeeks by puniſhment, either as to his authority, ſecurity or profit. But he adds, That where puniſhment is deſigned, for preſervation of diſcipline, and amendment of manners, and keeping perſons in order, (which are the ends mentioned by Lactantius) it is where the intereſt of the perſons lies, in the preſervation of theſe, and is therefore offended at the neglect of them. To which I anſwer, That the intereſt of ſuch a one, is not barely the intereſt of an offended party, as ſuch, but the intereſt of a Governour; and no body denies, but ſuch a one may be an offended party: but the queſtion is, Whether the deſign of puniſhment be meerly to ſatisfie him as the offended party, or to anſwer the ends of Government? For Crellius hath already told us, what it is to ſatisfie one as an offended party, that is, to eaſe himſelf by the puniſhment of others; but what ever is deſigned for the great ends of Government, is not to be conſidered under that notion, although the Governour may be juſtly offended at the neglect of them. And there is this conſiderable difference between the puniſhment made to an offended party, as ſuch, and that which is for the ends of Government; that the former is a ſatisfaction to Anger, and the latter to Laws and the publick intereſt. For Crellius diſputes much for the right of Anger in exacting puniſhments; the ſatisfaction of which, in caſe of real injury, he never makes unlawful, but in caſe that it be prohibited us by one, whoſe power is above our own: Nay he makes it otherwiſe the primary end of puniſhment. So that anger is the main thing upon theſe terms to be reſpected in puniſhment: But where it is deſigned for the ends before-mentioned, there is no neceſſity of any ſuch paſſion as anger to be ſatisfied, the ends of puniſhment may be attained wholly without it: And publick puniſhment, according to Seneca non ira ſed ratio eſt, is no effect of anger, but reaſon; for, ſaith he, nihil minus quam iraſci punientem decet: nothing leſs becomes one that puniſheth, than anger doth; for all puniſhments being conſidered as Medicines, no man ought to give Phyſick in anger, or to let himſelf blood in a fury: A Magiſtrate, ſaith he, when he goes to puniſh, ought to appear only vultu legis quæ non iraſcitur, ſed conſtituit, with the countenance of the Law, which appoints puniſhments without paſſion: The reaſon of which is, becauſe the Law aims not primarily at the evil of the man that ſuffers puniſhment, but at the good which comes to the publick by ſuch ſufferings. For the firſt deſign of the Law was to prevent any evil being done, and puniſhment coming in by way of Sanction to the force of the Law, muſt have the ſame primary end which the Law it ſelf had; which is not to ſatisfie barely the offended party for the breach, any further than that ſatisfaction tends to the ſecurity of the Law, and preventing the violation of it for the future. The ſubſtance of what I have ſaid upon this ſubject, may be thus briefly comprized, That antecedently to Laws, the offended party hath right to no more than bare reparation of the damage ſuſtained by the injury; that the proper notion of puniſhment is conſequent to Laws, and the inflicting of it is an act of Government, which is not deſigned for meer ſatisfaction of the anger of injured perſon, but for the publick good, which lies in preſerving the authority of the Laws, the preventing all injuries by the ſecurity of mens juſt rights, and the vindication of the dignity and honour of him, who is to take care of the publick good. For theſe Crellius himſelf acknowledgeth, to be the juſt ends of puniſhments, only he would have the ſatiſfaction a man takes in ano-anothers evil, to come in the firſt place; wherein how much he is miſtaken, I hope we have already manifeſted. Becauſe the proper nature of puniſhment depending upon Laws, the Laws do not primarily deſign the benefit of private perſons (ſuppoſing that were ſo) but the advantage of that community which they are made for.

The Intereſt of the Magiſtrate in puniſhment diſtinct from that of private perſons.

IX. And in thoſe caſes wherein the Magiſtrate doth right to particular perſons in the puniſhment of thoſe who have injured them, he doth it not as taking their perſon upon him, for he aims at other things than they do; they look at a bare compenſation for the injury received; but the Magiſtrate at the ill conſequence the impunity of injuries may be of to the publick: they, it may be at the ſatisfaction of their diſpleaſure; but he at the ſatisfaction of their Laws; they at their own private damage; he at the violation of the publick peace. And from hence among thoſe Nations who valued all crimes at a certain rate, in matters of injury between man and man, the injured perſon was not only to receive compenſation for his wrong; but a conſiderable fine was to be paid to the Exchequer for the violation of the publick peace. Thus Tacitus obſerves among the old Germans, Grotius of the old Gothick Laws, and from them (as moſt of our modern Laws and Cuſtoms are derived) Lindenbrogius of the Salick, Alemannick, Lombardick, Spelman of the Saxon, who tells us in caſe of murder there are three payments, one to the Kindred, which was called Megbote; the ſecond to the Lord, called Manbote, the third to the King, called Freda, from the German Frid, which ſignifies Peace, it being the conſideration paid to the King for the breach of the publick Peace. And this, ſaith he, in all actions, was anciently paid to the King, becauſe the peace was ſuppoſed to be broken, not by meer force, but by any injuries; and if the action was unjuſt, the Plaintiff paid it; if juſt, the defendant. And the meaſure of it, ſaith Bignonius, was the tenth part of the value of the thing as eſtimated by Law which by the Cuſtoms of the ancient Romans was depoſited at the commencing of a ſuit by both, and only taken up again by him who overcame; and was by them called Sacramentum, as Varro tells us. And the ſame cuſtom was obſerved among the Greeks too, as appears by Julius Pollux, who tells us it was called παρακαταβολὴ among them, and in publick actions was the fifth part, in private the tenth. But that which was paid to the publick in caſe of murder, was among the Greeks called ποινὴ, the ſame with pœna, for Heſychius tells us that is ἀντέκτισις ἢ ὑπὲρ φόνου διδομένη, and to the ſame purpoſe the Scholiaſt on Homer on thoſe words, Iliad. 1. εἵνεκα ποινῆς Ἀνδρὸς ἀποφθιμένου, by which the Original of the name pœna, comes from a payment made to the publick, according to that known rule, intereſt reip. delicta puniri, that perſons may ſee how much the publick ſafety is concerned, that crimes be puniſhed. From which and many other things which might be inſiſted on, Crellius his Hypotheſis will be made appear to be falſe, viz. that when the Magiſtrate doth judge in the affairs of particular men, he doth it only as aſſuming the perſon of thoſe men; whereas it appears from the reaſon of the thing, and the Cuſtom of Nations, that the intereſt of the Magiſtrate is conſidered as diſtinct from that of private perſons, when he doth moſt appear in vindication of injuries. But all this is managed with a reſpect to the grand Hypotheſis, viz. that the right of puniſhing doth belong only to the offended party as ſuch, that the puniſhment is of the nature of debts, and the ſatisfaction by com-penſation to the anger of him who is offended. The falſity of which this diſcourſe was deſigned to diſcover.

Having thus conſidered the nature of puniſhments among men, we come more cloſely to our matter, by examining how far this will hold in the puniſhments which God inflicts on the account of ſin. For which two things muſt be enquired into, 1. In what ſenſe we attribute anger to God. 2. What are the great ends of thoſe puniſhments God inflicts on men on the account of ſin.

Of the nature of Anger in God; the ſatisfaction to be made to it.

X. For the firſt, though our Adverſaries are very unwilling to allow the term of punitive juſtice, yet they contend for a punitive anger in God, and that in the worſt ſenſe as it is appetitus vindictæ: For after Crellius hath contended that this is the proper notion of anger in general; neither ought any one to ſay, he adds, that anger as other paſſions is attributed improperly to God; for ſetting aſide the imperfections, which thoſe paſſions are ſubject to in us, all the reſt is to be attributed to him, taking away then that perturbation, and pain, and grief we find in our ſelves in anger, to which the abhorrency of ſin anſwers in God, all the reſt doth agree to him. I would he had a little more plainly told us what he means by all the reſt, but we are to gueſs at his meaning by what went before, where he allows of Cicero, and Ariſtotle's definition of Anger, whereof the one is, that it is libido, or (as Crellius would rather have it,) cupiditas puniendi, the other ὄρεξις μετὰ λύπης τιμωρίας, &c. and himſelf calls it pœnæ appetitio, and in another place, that it may be as properly defined cupiditas vindictæ, as cupiditas pœnæ or affectus vindicandi, as well as puniendi: In all which places, he doth aſſert ſuch an anger in God as ſuppoſes ſuch a motion, or deſire, or inclination to puniſh ſin when it is committed, as there is in us when an injury is done us, only the perturbation and pain excluded. But he hath not thought fit to explain how ſuch new motions or inclinations in the divine nature every time ſin is committed, are conſiſtent with the immutability and perfection of it; nor what ſuch a kind of deſire to puniſh in God imports, whether a meer inclination without the effect, or an inclination with the effect following: If without the effect, then either becauſe the ſin was not great enough, or God's honour was not concerned to do it, and in this caſe the ſame reaſons which make the effect not to follow, make the deſire of it inconſiſtent with the divine wiſdom and perfection: Or elſe becauſe the effect is hindred by the repentance of the perſon, or ſome other way which may make it not neceſſary to do it; then upon the ſame reaſon the effect is ſuſpended, the inclination to do it ſhould be ſo too; for that muſt be ſuppoſed to be governed by an eternal reaſon and counſel as well as his actions; unleſs ſome natural paſſions in God be ſuppoſed antecedent to his own wiſdom and counſel, which is derogatory to the infinite perfection of God, ſince thoſe are judged imperfections in our ſelves: If it be taken only with the effect following it, then God can never be ſaid to be angry but when he doth puniſh, whereas his wrath is ſaid to be kindled in Scripture, where the effect hath not followed; which if it implies any more than the high provocation of God to puniſh (as I ſuppoſe it doth not) then this inclination to puniſh is to be conceived diſtinct from the effect following it. But that conception of anger in God ſeems moſt agreeable to the divine nature, as well as to the Scriptures, which makes it either the puniſhment it ſelf, as Crellius elſewhere acknowledges it is often taken ſo; or God's declaration of his will to puniſh, which is called the revelation of the wrath of God againſt all unrighteouſneſs of men, God thereby diſcovering the juſt diſpleaſure he hath againſt ſin; or the great provocation of God to puniſh, by the ſins of men; as when his wrath is ſaid, to be kindled, &c. By this ſenſe we may eaſily reconcile all that the Scripture ſaith concerning the wrath of God; we make it agreeable to infinite perfection, we make no ſuch alterations in God, as the appeaſing of his anger muſt imply, if that imply any kind of commotion in him. And thus the grand difficulty of Crellius appears to be none at all, againſt all thoſe paſſages of Scripture which ſpeak of appeaſing God, of atonement, and reconciliation, viz. that if they prove ſatisfaction, they muſt prove that God be actually angry with mankind before the ſufferings of his Son, he muſt be preſently appeaſed upon his undergoing them. For no more need to be ſaid, than that God being juſtly provoked to puniſh the ſins of mankind, was pleaſed to accept of the ſufferings of his Son, as a ſufficient ſacrifice of Atonement for the ſins of the world, on conſiderationof which he was pleaſed to offer thoſe terms of pardon, which upon mens performance of the conditions required on their part, ſhall be ſufficient to diſcharge them from that obligation to puniſhment which they were under by their ſins. And what abſurdity, or incongruity there is in this to any principle of reaſon I cannot imagine. But our Adverſaries firſt make opinions for us, and then ſhew they are unreaſonable. They firſt ſuppoſe that anger in God is to be conſidered as a paſſion, and that paſſion a deſire of revenge for ſatisfaction of it; and then tell us, that if we do not prove, that this deſire of revenge can be ſatisfied by the ſufferings of Chriſt, then we can never prove the doctrine of ſatisfaction to be true; whereas we do not mean by God's anger any ſuch paſſion, but the juſt declaration of God's will to puniſh upon our provocation of him by our ſins; we do not make the deſign of ſatisfaction to be, that God may pleaſe himſelf in the revenging the ſins of the guilty upon the moſt innocent perſon; becauſe we make the deſign of puniſhment, not to be the ſatisfaction of anger as a deſire of revenge, but to be the vindication of the honour and rights of the injured perſon, by ſuch a way as himſelf ſhall judge moſt ſatisfactory to the ends of his Government.

Of the ends of divine puniſhments. Crell. c. 2. ſect. 29. p. 129. p. 195.

XI. (2.) Which is the next thing we are to clear: For which end we ſhall make uſe of the Conceſſion of Crellius, That God hath prefixed ſome ends to himſelf in the Government of mankind; which being ſuppoſed, it is neceſſary, that impenitent ſinners ſhould be puniſhed. What theſe ends of God are, he before tells us, when he enquires into the ends of divine puniſhments, which he makes to be, ſecurity for the future, by mens avoiding ſins, and a kind εὐδοκία, or pleaſure which God takes in the deſtruction of his implacable enemies, and the aſſerting and vindicating his own right by puniſhing, and ſhewing men thereby, with what care and fear they ought to ſerve him; and ſo attains the ends of puniſhment propoſed by Lactantius, and manifeſtation of the Divine Honour and Majeſty, which hath been violated by the ſins of men. All theſe we accept of, with this caution, That the delight which God takes in the puniſhing his implacable enemies, be not underſtood of any pleaſure in their miſery, as ſuch, by way of meer revenge; but as it tends to the vindication of his Right, and Honour, and Majeſty; which is an end ſuitable to the Divine Nature: but the other cannot in it ſelf have the notion of an end doth ſuppoſe ſomething deſirable for it ſelf, which ſurely the miſeries of others cannot have to us, much leſs to the Divine Nature. And that place which Crellius inſiſts on to prove the contrary, Deut. 28. 63. The Lord will rejoyce over you, to deſtroy you; imports no more, than the ſatisfaction God takes in the execution of his Juſtice, when it makes moſt for his honour, as certainly it doth in the puniſhment of his greateſt enemies. And this is to be underſtood in a ſenſe agreeable to thoſe other places, where God is ſaid not to delight in the death of ſinners; which doth not (as Crellius would have it meerly expreſs God's benignity and mercy, but ſuch an agreeableneſs of the exerciſe of thoſe attributes to God's nature, that he neither doth nor can delight in the miſeries of his creatures in themſelves, but as they are ſubſervient to the ends of his Government, and yet ſuch is his kindneſs in that reſpect too, that he uſeth all means agreeable thereto, to make them avoid being miſerable, to advance his own glory. And I cannot but wonder that Grotius, who had aſſerted the contrary in his Book of Satisfaction, ſhould in his Books De Jure belli ac pacis, aſſert, That when God puniſheth wicked men, he doth it for no other end but that he might puniſh them: For which he makes uſe of no other arguments, than thoſe which Crellius had objected againſt him; viz. The delight God takes in puniſhing, and the judgments of the life to come, when no amendment can be expected; the former hath been already anſwered, the latter is objected by Crellius againſt him, when he makes the ends of puniſhment, merely to reſpect the community, which cannot be aſſerted of the puniſhments of another life, which muſt chiefly reſpect the vindication of God's Glory, in the puniſhment of unreclaimable ſinners. And this we do not deny to be a juſt puniſhment, ſince our Adverſaries themſelves, as well as we, make it neceſſary. But we are not to underſtand, that the end of Divine puniſhments doth ſo reſpect the community, as though God himſelf were to be excluded out of it; for we are ſo to underſtand it, as made up of God as the Governour, and mankind as the perſons governed, whatever then tends to the vindication of the rights of God's Honour and Sovereignty, tends to the good of the whole, becauſe the manifeſtation of that end is ſo great an end of the whole.

The ends of Divine puniſhments different in this and the future ſtate.

XII. But withal, though we aſſert in the life to come, the ends of puniſhment not to be the reclaiming of ſinners, who had never undergone them, unleſs they had been unreclaimable; yet a vaſt difference muſt be made between the ends of puniſhments in that, and in this preſent ſtate. For the other is the Reſerve, when nothing elſe will do, and therefore was not primarily intended; but the proper ends of puniſhment, as a part of Government, are to be taken from the deſign of them in this life. And here we aſſert, that God's end in puniſhing, is the advancing his Honour, not by the meer miſeries of his creatures, but that men by beholding his ſeverity againſt ſin, ſhould break off the practice of it, that they may eſcape the puniſhments of the future ſtate. So that the ends of puniſhment here, are quite of another kind, from thoſe of another life; for thoſe are inflicted, becauſe perſons have been unreclaimable by either the mercies or puniſhments of this life; but theſe are intended, that men ſhould ſo far take notice of this ſeverity of God, as to avoid the ſins which will expoſe them to the wrath to come. And from hence it follows, That whatſoever ſufferings do anſwer all theſe ends of Divine Puniſhments, and are inflicted on the account of ſin, have the proper notion of puniſhments in them, and God may accept of the undergoing them as a full ſatis- faction to his Law, if they be ſuch as tend to break men off from ſin, and aſſert God's right, and vindicate his Honour to the world; which are the ends aſſigned by Crellius, and will be of great conſequence to us in the following Diſcourſe.

The particular ſtate of the controverſie concerning the ſufferings of Chriſt for us.

I. THESE things being thus far cleared concerning the nature and ends of puniſhments, and how far they are of the nature of debts, and conſequently what kind of ſatisfaction is due for them, the reſolution of the grand Queſtion concerning the ſufferings of Chriſt will appear much more eaſie; but that we may proceed with all poſſible clearneſs in a debate of this conſequence, we muſt yet a little more narrowly examine the difference between our Adverſaries and us in this matter; for their conceſſions are in terms ſometimes ſo far, as though the difference were meerly about words without any conſiderable difference in the thing it ſelf. If we charge them with denying ſatisfaction, Crellius anſwers in the name of them, that we do it unjuſtly; for they do acknowledge a ſatisfaction worthy of God, and agreeable to the Scriptures. If we charge them with denying that our ſalvation is obtained by the death of Chriſt, they aſſert the contrary, as appears by the ſame Author. Nay, Ruarus attributes merit to the death of Chriſt too. They acknowledge, that Chriſt died for us, nay, that there was a commutation between Chriſt and us, both of one perſon for another, and of a price for a perſon; and that the death of Chriſt may be ſaid to move God to redeem us; they acknowledge reconciliation, and expiation of ſins to be by the death of Chriſt. Nay, they aſſert, that Chriſt's death was by reaſon of our ſins, and that God deſigned by that to ſhew his ſeverity againſt ſin. And what could we deſire more, if they meant the ſame thing by theſe words, which we do? They aſſert a ſatisfaction, but it is ſuch a one as is meerly fulfilling the deſire of another: in which ſenſe all that obey God may be ſaid to ſatisfie him. They attribute our ſalvation to the death of Chriſt, but only as a condition intervening, upon the performance of which the Covenant was confirmed, and himſelf into Glory, that he might free men from the puniſhment of their ſins. They attribute merit to Chriſt's death but in the ſame ſenſe that we may merit too, when we do what is pleaſing to God. They acknowledge, that Chriſt died for us, but not in our ſtead, but for our advantage; that there was a commutation; but not ſuch a one, as that the Son of God did lay down his blood as a proper price in order to our redemption as the purchaſe of it; when they ſpeak of a moving cauſe, they tell us, they mean no more than the performance of any condition may be ſaid to move, or as our prayers and repentance do. The reconciliation they ſpeak of, doth not all reſpect God but us; they aſſert an expiation of ſins conſequent upon the death of Chriſt, but not depending upon it any otherwiſe, than as a condition neceſſary for his admiſſion to the office of a High-Prieſt in Heaven, there to expiate our ſins by his power, and not by his blood; but they utterly deny, that the death of Chriſt is to be conſidered as a proper expiatory ſacrifice for ſin; or that it hath any further influence upon it, than as it is conſidered as a means of the confirmation of the truth of his Doctrine, and particularly the promiſe of remiſſion of ſins, on which, and not on the death of Chriſt they ſay our remiſſion depends; but ſo far as the death of Chriſt may be an argument to us to believe his Doctrine, and that faith may incline us to obedience, and that obedience being the condition in order to pardon, at ſo many removes they make the death of Chriſt to have influence on the remiſſion of our ſins. They aſſert, that God took occaſion by the ſins of men to exerciſe an act of dominion upon Chriſt in his ſufferings, and that the ſufferings of Chriſt were intended for the taking away the ſins of men; but they utterly deny, that the ſufferings of Chriſt were to be conſidered as a puniſhment for ſin; or that Chriſt did ſuffer in our place and ſtead; nay, they contend with great vehemency, that it is wholly conſiſtent with the juſtice of God to make one mans ſins the meritorious cauſe of anothers puniſhment; eſpecially one wholly innocent, and ſo that the guilty ſhall be freed on the account of his ſufferings. Thus I have endeavoured to give the true ſtate of the controverſie with all clearneſs and brevity. And the ſubſtance of it will be reduced to theſe two debates.

1. Whether the ſufferings of Chriſt in general are to be conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin, or as a meer act of dominion?

2. Whether the death of Chriſt in particular were a proper expiatory ſacrifice for ſin, or only an antecedent condition to his exerciſe of the Office of Prieſthood in Heaven?

Whether the ſufferings of Chriſt are to be conſidered a puniſhment of ſin.

II. (1.) Whether the ſufferings of Chriſt in general are to be conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin, or as a meer act of dominion? for that it muſt be one or the other of theſe two, cannot be denied by our Adverſaries; for the inflicting thoſe ſufferings upon Chriſt, muſt either proceed from an antecedent meritorious cauſe, or not. If they do, they are then puniſhments; if not, they are meer exerciſes of power and dominion; whatever ends they are intended for, and whatever recompence be made for them. So Crellius aſſerts, that God as abſolute Lord of all, had a right of abſolute dominion upon the life and body of Chriſt, and therefore might juſtly deliver him up to death, and give his body to the Croſs; and although Chriſt by the ordinary force of the Law of Moſes, had a right to eſcape ſo painful and accurſed a death, yet God by the right of dominion had the power of diſpoſal of him, becauſe he intended to compenſate his torments with a reward infinitely greater than they were: But becauſe, he ſaith, for great ends the conſent of Chriſt was neceſſary, therefore God did not uſe his utmoſt dominion in delivering him up by force as he might have done, but he dealt with him by way of command, and rewards propoſed for obedience, and in this ſenſe he did act as a righteous Governour, and indulgent Father, who encouraged his Son to undergo hard, but great things. In which we ſee that he makes the ſufferings of Chriſt an act of meer dominion in God without any antecedent cauſe as the reaſon of them; only he qualifies this act of dominion with the propoſal of a reward for it. But we muſt yet further enquire into their meaning, for though here Crellius attributes the ſufferings of Chriſt meerly to God's dominion, without any reſpect to ſin, yet elſewhere he will allow a reſpect that was had to ſin antecedently to the ſufferings of Chriſt, and that the ſins of men were the impulſive cauſe of them. And although Socinus in one place utterly denies any lawful antecedent cauſe of the death of Chriſt, beſides the will of God and Chriſt, yet Crellius in his Vindication ſaith, by lawful cauſe he meant meritorious, or ſuch upon ſuppoſition of which he ought to die; for elſewhere he makes Chriſt to die for the cauſe, or by the occaſion of our ſins; which is the ſame that Crellius means by an impulſive, or procatartick cauſe. Which he thus explains, we are now to ſuppoſe a decree of God not only to give ſalvation to Mankind, but to give us a firm hope of it in this preſent ſtate, now our ſins by deſerving eternal puniſhment, do hinder the effect of that decree upon us, and therefore they were an impulſive cauſe of the death of Chriſt, by which it was effected, that this decree ſhould obtain notwithſtanding our ſins. But we are not to underſtand as though this were done by and expiation of the guilt of ſin by the death of Chriſt; but this effect is hindred by three things, by taking away their ſins, by aſſuring men that their former ſins, and preſent infirmities upon their ſincere obedience ſhall not be imputed to them, and that the effect of that decree ſhall obtain, all which, ſaith he, is effected morte Chriſti interveniente, the death of Chriſt intervening, but not as the procuring cauſe. So that after all theſe words he means no more by making our ſins an impulſive cauſe of the death of Chriſt, but that the death of Chriſt was an argument to confirm to us the truth of his Doctrine, which doctrine of his doth give us aſſurance of theſe things: and that our ſins when they are ſaid to be the impulſive cauſe, are not to be conſidered with a reſpect to their guilt, but to that diſtruſt of God which our ſins do raiſe in us; which diſtruſt is in truth according to this ſenſe of Crellius the impulſive cauſe, and not the ſins which were the cauſe or occaſion of it. For that was it which the doctrine was deſigned to remove, and our ſins only as the cauſes of that. But if it be ſaid, that he ſpeaks not only of the diſtruſt, but of the puniſhment of ſin as an impediment which muſt be removed too, and therefore may be called an impulſive cauſe, we are to conſider that the removal of this is not attributed to the death of Chriſt,

but to the leaving of our ſins by the belief of his Doctrine; therefore the puniſhment of our ſins cannot, unleſs in a very remote ſenſe, be ſaid to be an impulſive cauſe of that, which for all that we can obſerve by Crellius, might as well have been done without it; if any other way could be thought ſufficient to confirm his Doctrine, and Chriſt, without dying, might have had power to ſave all them that obey him. But we underſtand not an impulſive cauſe in ſo remote a ſenſe, as though our ſins were a meer occaſion of Chriſts dying, becauſe the death of Chriſt was one argument among many others to believe his Doctrine, the belief of which would make men leave their ſins; but we contend for a nearer and moſt proper ſenſe, viz. that the death of Chriſt was primarily intended for the expiation of our ſins, with a reſpect to God and not to us, and therefore our ſins as an impulſive cauſe are to be conſidered as they are ſo diſpleaſing to God, that it was neceſſary for the Vindication of God's Honour, and the deterring the world from ſin, that no leſs a Sacrifice of Atonement ſhould be offered, than the blood of the Son of God. So that we underſtand an impulſive cauſe here in the ſenſe, that the ſins of the people were, under the Law, the cauſe of the offering up thoſe Sacrifices, which were appointed for the expiation of them. And as in thoſe Sacrifices there were two things to be conſidered, viz. the mactation, and the oblation of them, the former as a puniſhment by a ſubſtitution of them in place of the perſons who had offended; the latter as the proper Sacrifice of Atonement, although the mactation it ſelf, conſidered with the deſign of it, was a Sacrificial act too; So we conſider the ſufferings of Chriſt with a two-fold reſpect, either as to our ſins, as the impulſive cauſe of them, ſo they are to be conſidered as a puniſhment, or as to God, with a deſign to expiate the guilt of them, ſo they are a Sacrifice of Atonement. The firſt conſideration is that we are now upon, and upon which the preſent debate depends, for if the ſufferings of Chriſt be to be taken under the notion of puniſhment, then our Adverſaries grant, that our ſins muſt be an impulſive cauſe of them in another ſenſe than they underſtand it. For the clearing of this, I ſhall prove theſe two things.

1. That no other ſenſe ought to be admitted of the places of Scripture which ſpeak of the ſufferings of Chriſt with a reſpect to ſin, but this.

2. That this Account of the ſufferings of Chriſt, is is no ways repugnant to the Juſtice of God.

The ſufferings of Chriſt proved to be a puniſhment from Scripture.

III. That no other ſenſe ought to be admitted of the places of Scripture, which ſpeak of the ſufferings of Chriſt with a reſpect to our ſins, but that they are to be conſidered as a puniſhment for them. Such are thoſe which ſpeak of Chriſt bearing our ſins, of our iniquities being laid upon him, of his making himſelf an offering for ſin, and being made ſin and a curſe for us, and of his dying for our ſins. All which I ſhall ſo far conſider, as to vindicate them from all the exceptions which Socinus and Crellius have offered againſt them.

1. Thoſe which ſpeak of Chriſt's bearing our ſins. As to which we ſhall conſider, Firſt, The importance of the phraſe in general of bearing ſin, and then the circumſtances of the particular places in diſpute. For the importance of the phraſe, Socinus acknowledges, that it generally ſignifies bearing the puniſhment of ſin in Scripture: but that ſometimes it ſignifies taking away. The ſame is confeſſed by Crellius, but he ſaith, ſaith, it doth not always ſignifie bearing proper puniſhment, but it is enough (ſays he) that one bears ſomething burdenſome on the occaſion of others ſins: and ſo Chriſt by undergoing his ſufferings by occaſion of ſins, may be ſaid to bear our ſins. And for this ſenſe he quotes Numb. 14. 33. And your Children ſhall wander in the Wilderneſs forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcaſſes be waſted in the Wilderneſs. Whereby, ſaith he, it is not meant that God would puniſh the Children of the Iſraelites but that by the occaſion of their parents ſins, they ſhould undergo that trouble, in wandring in the Wilderneſs, and being deprived of the poſſeſſion of the promiſed Land. But could Crellius think that any thing elſe could have been imagined, (ſetting aſide a total deſtruction) a greater inſtance of God's ſeverity, than that was to the Children of Iſrael all their circumſtances being conſidered? Is it not ſaid, that God did ſwear in his wrath they ſhould not enter into his reſt? Surely then the debarring them ſo long of that reſt, was an inſtance of God's wrath, and ſo according to his own principles muſt have ſomething of Vindicta in it, and therefore be a proper puniſhment. The truth is, our Adverſaries allow themſelves in ſpeaking things moſt repugnant to Humane Nature in this matter of puniſhments, that they may juſtifie their own Hypotheſis. For a whole Nation to be for forty years debarred from the greateſt bleſſings were ever promiſed them; and inſtead of enjoying them, to endure the miſeries and hardſhips of forty years travels in a barren wilderneſs, muſt not be thought a puniſhment, and only becauſe occaſioned by their Parents ſins. But whatever is inflicted on the account of ſin, and with a deſign to ſhew God's ſeverity againſt it, and thereby to deter others from the practice of it, hath the proper notion of puniſhment in it; and all theſe things did concurr in this inſtance, beſides the general ſenſe of mankind in the matter of their puniſhment, which was ſuch, that ſuppoſing them preſerved in their liberty, could not have been imagined greater. And therefore Vatablus, whom Socinus and Crellius highly commend, thus renders thoſe words, dabunt pœnas pro fornicationibus veſtris quibus defeciſtis à Deo veſtro: They ſhall ſuffer the puniſhment of your fornications. And that bearing the ſins of Parents doth imply properly bearing the puniſhment of them, methinks they ſhould not ſo earneſtly deny, who contend that to be the meaning of the words in Ezekiel, The Son ſhall not bear the iniquity of the Father; viz. that he ſhall not bear the puniſhment of his Fathers ſins. Where in bearing iniquity with a reſpect to their Parents ſins, by their own confeſſion, muſt be taken for the proper puniſhment; for otherwiſe they do not deny, but Children, notwithſtanding that ſentence, may undergo much affliction on the occaſion of their Parents ſins.

IV. But Socinus further objects, that bearing ſins doth not imply the puniſhment of them, becauſe the Scape-Goat under the Law, is ſaid to bear upon him the iniquities of the people, and yet could not be ſaid to be puniſhed for them. To which Grotius anſwers, that Socinus takes it for granted without reaſon, that the Scape-Goat could not be ſaid to be puniſhed for the ſins of the people; for puniſhment in general, may fall upon beaſts for the ſins of men, Gen. 9. 5. Exod. 21. 28. Lev. 20. 15. Gen. 8. 21. and Socinus hath no cauſe to ſay, that the Scape-Goat was not ſlain; for the Jewiſh Interpreters do all agree that he was, and however the ſending him into the Wilderneſs was intended as a puniſhment, and moſt probably by an unnatural death. To which Crellius replies, That in the gene- general, he denies not but puniſhment may fall upon beaſts as well as men; but (that he might ſhew himſelf true to his principle, that one cannot be puniſhed for anothers faults,) he falls into a very pleaſant diſcourſe, That the Beaſts are not ſaid to be puniſhed for mens ſins, but for their own, and therefore when it is ſaid, before the flood, that all fleſh had corrupted his way; Gen. 6.12. he will by no means have it underſtood only of men, but that the ſins of the beaſts at that time, were greater than ordinary, as well as mens. But he hath not told us what they were, whether by eating ſome forbidden herbs; or entring into conſpiracies againſt mankind their lawful Sovereigns, or unlawful mixtures; and therefore we have yet reaſon to believe, that when God ſaith, the ground was curſed for man's ſake, Gen. 8.21. that the beaſts were puniſhed for mans ſin. And if all fleſh, muſt comprehend beaſts in this place, why ſhall not all fleſh ſeeing the glory of the Lord, Iſa. 40. 5. take in the beaſts there too? For Vatablus parallels this place with the other. But if, ſaith Crellius, any ſhall contend that ſome beaſts at leaſt were innocent, then, he ſaith, that thoſe though they were deſtroyed by the flood, yet did not ſuffer puniſhment, but only a calamity by occaſion of the ſins of men. I wonder he did not rather ſay, that the innocent beaſts were taken into the Ark, for the propagation of a better kind afterwards. But by this ſolemn diſtinction of Calamities and Puniſhments, there is nothing ſo miſerable, that either men or beaſts can undergo, but when it ſerves their turn, it ſhall be only a calamity and no puniſhment, though it be ſaid to be on purpoſe to ſhew God's ſeverity againſt the ſins of the world. And this excellent notion of the beaſts being puniſhed for their own ſins, is improved by him to the vindication of the Scape-Goat from being puniſhed, becauſe then, ſaith he, the moſt wicked and corrupt Goat ſhould have been made choice of. As though all the deſign of that great day of expiation had been only to call the Children of Iſrael together with great ſolemnity, to let them ſee, how a poor Goat muſt be puniſhed for breaking the Laws which we do not know were ever made for them. I had thought our Adverſaries had maintained that the Sacrifices (on the day of expiation at leaſt) had repreſented and typified the Sacrifice which was to be offered up by Chriſt; and ſo Socinus and Crellius elſewhere contend: He needed not therefore have troubled himſelf concerning the ſins of the Goat, when it is expreſly ſaid, That the ſins of the people were put on the head of the Goat; Lev. 16, 21. Whatever then the puniſhment were, it was on the account of the ſins of the people, and not his own. But Crellius urgeth againſt Grotius, that if the Scape-Goat had been puniſhed for the expiation of the ſins of the people, that ſhould have been particularly expreſſed in Scripture, whereas nothing is ſaid there at all of it, and that the throwing down the Scape-Goat from the top of the rock, was no part of the Primitive Inſtitution, but one of the ſuperſtitions taken up by the Jews in after-times, becauſe of the Ominouſneſs of the return of it; and although we ſhould ſuppoſe (which is not probable) that it ſhould die by famine in the Wilderneſs, yet this was not the death for expiation, which was to be by the ſhedding of blood. To this therefore I anſwer, 1. I do not inſiſt on the cuſtoms of the later Jews to prove from thence any puniſhment deſigned by the primitive inſtitution. For I ſhall eaſily yield, that many ſuperſtitions obtained among them afterwards about the Scape-Goat; as the ſtories of the red liſt turning white upon the head of it, the booths and the cauſey made on purpoſe, and ſeveral other things mentioned in the Rabbinical Writers do manifeſt. But yet it Cod. Joma tit. 6.

ſeems very probable from the Text it ſelf, that the Scape-Goat was not carried into the Wilderneſs at large, but to a ſteep mountain there. For although we have commonly render'd Azazel by the Scape-Goat, yet according to the beſt of the Jewiſh writers, as P. Fagius tells us, עזאזל doth not come from עז a Goat, and אזל abiit; but is the name of a Mountain very ſteep and rocky near Mount Sinai, and therefore probably called by the latter Jews, צור, the name of a Rock: And to this purpoſe, it is obſervable that where we render it, and let him go for a Scape-
Lev. 16. 12. Goat into the Wilderneſs, in the Hebrew it is, לשלח אתו לעזאזל תפיברה to ſend him to Azazel in the Wilderneſs: As the joyning the prepoſition ל doth import, and the Arabick Verſion whereever Azazel is mentioned, renders it by Mount Azaz: and the Chaldee and Syriack to Azazel; ſo that from hence, a carrying the Scape-Goat to a certain place may be inferred; but I ſee no foundation in the Text for the throwing it down from the rock when it was there; and therefore I cannot think, but that if the puniſhment intended did lie in that, it would have been expreſly mentioned in the ſolemnities of that day, which had ſo great an influence on the expiation of the ſins of the people. 2. I anſwer, that the Scape-Goat was to denote rather the effect of the expiation, than the manner of obtaining it. For the proper ex-

V. 22. a fit man into the Wilderneſs; and ſo the Goat ſhall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited, and he ſhall let go the Goat in the Wilderneſs. So that the former Goat noted the way of expiation by the ſhedding of blood, and the latter the effect of it, viz. that the ſins of the people were declared to be expiated by the ſending the Goat charged with their ſins into a deſart place; and that their ſins would not appear in the preſence of God againſt them, any more than they expected, that the Goat which was ſent into the Wilderneſs ſhould return among them. Which was the reaſon that afterwards they took ſo much care that it ſhould not, by cauſing it to be thrown off from a ſteep rock; which was no ſooner done, but notice was given of it very ſuddenly by the ſounding of horns all over the Land. But the force of Socinus his argument from the Scape-Goat's bearing the ſins of the people, that therefore that phraſe doth not always imply the bearing Crell. c. 1. ſect. 56. of puniſhment, is taken off by Crellius himſelf, who tells us, that the Scape-Goat is not ſaid to bear the ſins of the people in the Wilderneſs; but only that it carried the ſins of the people into the Wilderneſs, which is a phraſe of another importance from that we are now diſcourſing of. As will now further appear from the places where it is ſpoken of concerning our Saviour, which we now come particularly to examine.

He grants that ἀναφέρειν doth ſignifie to carry up, but withall (he ſaith) it ſignifies to take away; becauſe that which is taken up, is taken away from the place where it was. Beſides, he obſerves, that ἀναφέρειν doth anſwer to the Hebrew העלה, he hath made to aſcend, which is frequently rendred by it in the LXX. and ſometime by ἀνάγειν; but that Hebrew word doth often ſignifie to take away, where it is rendred in the Greek by one of thoſe two words, 2 Sam. 21. 13. Joſh. 24. 32. Pſal. 102. 25. Ezra 1. 11. To which I anſwer, 1. That the ſignification of ἀναφέρειν in this place, muſt not be taken from every ſenſe the word is ever uſed for, but in that which the words out of which theſe are taken do imply; and in Iſa. 53. 11. it doth not anſwer העלה but to סבל, a word which by the confeſſion of all is never properly uſed for taking away, but for bearing of a burden, and is uſed with a reſpect to the puniſhment of ſin, Lament. 5. 7. Our fathers have ſinned, and are not, and we have born their iniquities, where the ſame word is uſed; ſo that the ſignification of the word ἀναφέρειν here, muſt depend upon that in Iſaiah, of which more afterward. 2. Granting that ἀναφέρειν doth anſwer ſometimes to the Hebrew העלה, yet it makes nothing to Crellius his purpoſe, unleſs he can prove that ἀναφέρειν doth ever ſignifie the taking away a thing by the deſtruction of it; for where it anſwers to that word, it is either for the offering up of a Sacrifice, in which ſenſe ἀναφέρειν is very frequently uſed, as is confeſſed by Crellius; and in that ſenſe it is no prejudice at all to our cauſe; for then it muſt be granted, that Chriſt upon the Croſs is to be conſidered as a ſacrifice for the ſins of men; and ſo our ſins were laid upon him as they were ſuppoſed to be on the Sacrifices under the Law, in order to the expiation of them, by the ſhedding their blood; and if our Adverſaries would acknowledge this, the difference would not be ſo great between us; or elſe it is uſed for the removal of a thing from one place to another, the thing it ſelf ſtill remaining in being, as 2 Sam. 21. 13. And he made Saul's bones to aſcend, ἀνήνεγκαν ἐκεῖθεν τὰ ὀστᾶ, he took them away, ſaith Crellius; true, but it is ſuch a taking away, as is a bare removal, the thing ſtill remaining; the ſame is to be ſaid of Joſeph's bones, Joſh. 24. 32. which are all the places where ἀναφέρειν is uſed; and although ἀνάγειν may be ſometimes taken in another ſenſe, as Pſal. 102. 25. yet nothing can be more unreaſonable than ſuch a way of arguing as this is; ἀναφέρειν, ſaith Crellius, ſignifies taking away; we demand his proof of it; is it that the word ſignifies ſo much of it ſelf? No; that he grants it doth not. Is it that it is frequently uſed in the Greek Verſion to render a word that properly doth ſignifie ſo? No; nor that neither. But how is it then? Crellius tells us, that it ſometimes anſwers to a word that ſignifies to make to aſcend: well, but doth that word ſignifie taking away? No; not conſtantly, for it is frequently uſed for a ſacrifice: But doth it at any time ſignifie ſo? Yes; it ſignifies the removal of a thing from one place to another. Is that the ſenſe then he contends for here? No; but how then? why ἀναφέρειν is uſed to render the ſame word that ἀνάγειν doth, and ἀνάγειν, though it ſignifies too a bare removal, as Ezra 1. 11. yet Pſal. 102. 25. it is uſed for cutting off, μὴ ἀναγάγῃς με, the Hebr. is, make me not to aſcend in the midſt of my days. But doth it here ſignifie utter deſtruction? I ſuppoſe not; but grant it, what is this to ἀναφέρειν, when the LXX uſeth not that word here, which for all that we know was purpoſely altered; ſo that at laſt ἀναφέρειν is far enough from any ſuch ſignification as Crellius would fix upon it, unleſs he will aſſert, that Chriſt taking away our ſins, was only a removal of them from Earth to Heaven. But here Grotius comes in to the relief of Crellius againſt himſelf; for in his Notes upon this place, though he had before ſaid, that the word was never uſed in the New Teſtament in that ſenſe, yet he there ſaith, ἀνήνεγκεν is abſtulit, for which he referrs us to Heb. 9. 28. where he proceeds altogether as ſubtilly as Crellius had done before him, for he tells us ἀναφέρειν is put for φέρειν, נשא, Numb. 14. 33. Deut. 14. 24. Iſa. 53. 12. but φέρειν, i. e. נשא is put for ἀφαιρεῖν, Lev. 10. 17. Numb. 14. 18. A moſt excellent way of interpreting Scripture? conſidering the various ſignifications of the Hebrew words, and above all of that נשא which is here mentioned. For according to this way of arguing, ἀφαιρεῖν ſhall ſignifie the ſame with λαμβάνειν, ὑπέχειν, and βαστάζειν, for נשא ſignifies all theſe, and is rendred by them in the Greek Verſion, ſo that by the ſame way that Grotius proves that ἀναφέρειν ſignifies ἀφαιρεῖν, we can prove that ἀφαιρεῖν doth not ſignifie to take away, but to bear puniſhment; nay, נשא ſignifies the bearing puniſhment in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, Ezek. 16. 52, 54. and bearing ſin in that ſenſe, Ezek. 16. 58. Thou haſt born thy lewdneſs, and thy abominations, נשאתים. So that when נשא is more frequently uſed in this than in the other ſenſe, why ſhall its ſignifying ἀφαιρεῖν at any time make ἀναφέρειν be taken in the ſame ſenſe with that? Nay, I do not remember in any place where נשא is joyned with ſin, but it ſignifies the puniſhment of it, ſo ἁμαρτίαν λαμβάνειν, Lev. 19. 8. to bear his iniquity, Lev. 20. 17. ἁμαρτίαν κομιοῦνται, bearing their iniquity, in one verſe, is explained by being cut off from among their people, in the next. And in the places cited by Grotius, that Numb. 14. 33. hath been already ſhewed to ſignifie bearing the puniſhment of ſin, and that Deut. 14. 24. is plainly underſtood of a Sacrifice, the other, Iſa. 53. 12. will be afterwards made appear by other places in the ſame Chapter to ſignifie nothing to this purpoſe. So that for all we can yet ſee, ἀναφέρειν muſt be taken either for bearing our ſins as a ſacrifice did under the Law, or the puniſhment of them; in either ſenſe it ſerves our purpoſe, but is far enough from our Adverſaries meaning.

Crell. his ſenſe examined.

VI. But ſuppoſing we ſhould grant them, that ἀναφέρειν may ſignifie to take away, let us ſee what excellent ſenſe they make of theſe words of St. Peter. Do they then ſay, that Chriſt did take away our ſins upon the Croſs? No; they have a great care of that, for that would make the expiation of ſins to have been performed there; which they utterly deny, and ſay, that Chriſt only took the Croſs in his way to his Aſcenſion to Heaven, that there he might expiate ſins. But doth not St. Peter ſay, that what was done by him here, was in his body on the tree: and they will not ſay, he carried that with him to Heaven too. Well, but what then was the taking away of ſin which belonged to Chriſt upon the Croſs? is it only to perſwade men to live vertuouſly, and leave off their ſins? This Socinus would have, and Crellius is

Soc. de ſerv. l. 2. cap 6. Crell. cap. 1. Sect. 39.

“ contented that it ſhould be underſtood barely of taking away ſins,
“ and not of the puniſhment of them, but only by way of acceſſion “ and conſequence: but if it be taken (which he inclines more to) for “ the puniſhment, then (he ſaith) it is to be underſtood not of the “ vertue and efficacy of the death of Chriſt, but of the effect: and yet
“ a little after he ſaith, thoſe words of Chriſt bearing our ſins, are to “ be underſtood of the force and efficacy of Chriſts death to do it, not “ including the effect of it in us; not as though Chriſt did deliver us

" from ſins by his death, but that he did that by dying, upon which " the taking away of ſin would follow, or which had a great power for " the doing it. So uncertain are our Adverſaries, in affixing any ſenſe upon theſe words, which may attribute any effect at all, to the death of Chriſt upon the Croſs. For if they be underſtood of taking away ſins, then they are only to be meant of the power that was in the death of Chriſt, to perſwade men to leave their ſins; which we muſt have a care of underſtanding ſo, as to attribute any effect to the death of Chriſt in order to it; but only that the death of Chriſt was an argument for us to believe what he ſaid, and the believing what he ſaid would incline us to obey him, and if we obey him, we ſhall leave off our ſins whether Chriſt had died or no: ſuppoſing his miracles had the ſame effect on us, which thoſe of Moſes had upon the Jews, which were ſufficient to perſwade them to believe and obey without his death. But if this be all that was meant by Chriſt's bearing our ſins in his body on the tree; why might not St. Peter himſelf be ſaid to bear them upon his Croſs too? for his death was an excellent example of patience, and a great argument to perſwade men he ſpake truth, and that doctrine which he preached, was repentance and remiſſion of ſins: So that by this ſenſe there is nothing peculiar attributed to the death of Chriſt. But taking the other ſenſe for the taking away the puniſhment of ſins, we muſt ſee how this belongs to the death of Chriſt: Do they then attribute our delivery from the puniſhment of ſin, to the death of Chriſt on the Croſs? yes, juſt as we may attribute Cæſar's ſubduing Rome, to his paſſing over Rubicon, becauſe he took that in his way to the doing of it: ſo they make the death of Chriſt only as a paſſage, in order to expiation of ſins, by taking away the puniſhment of them. For that ſhall not be actually perfected, they ſay, till his full deliverance of all thoſe that obey him, from hell and the grave, which will not be till his ſecond coming. So that if we only take the body of Chriſt for his ſecond coming, and the Croſs of Chriſt, or the tree, for his Throne of Glory, then they will acknowledge, that Chriſt may very well be ſaid to take away ſins in his own body on the tree: but if you take it in any ſenſe that doth imply any peculiar efficacy to the death of Chriſt, for all the plainneſs of St. Peter's words, they by no means will admit of it.

Iſa. 53 11. vindicated. Crell. c. 1. ſect. 35.

VII. But becauſe Crellius urgeth Grotius with the ſenſe of that place, Iſa. 53. 11. out of which he contends theſe words are taken, and Crellius conceives he can prove there, that bearing is the ſame with taking away ſin: We now come to conſider, what force he can find from thence, for the juſtifying of his aſſertion, That the bearing of ſins, when attributed to Chriſt, doth not imply the puniſhment of them, but the taking them away. The words are, for he ſhall bear their iniquities. As to which Grotius obſerves, That the word עון which ſignifies iniquity, is ſometimes taken for the puniſhment of ſin, 2 King 7. 9. and the verb כבל is to bear, and whenever it is joyned with ſin or iniquity, in all languages, and eſpecially the Hebrew, it ſignifies to ſuffer puniſhment; for although נשא may ſometimes ſignifie to take away, כבל never does: ſo that this phraſe can receive no other interpretation. Notwithſtanding all which Crellius attempts to prove, That סבל here, muſt be taken in a ſenſe contrary to the natural and perpetual uſe of the word; for which his firſt argument is very infirm, viz. becauſe it is mentioned after the death of Chriſt, and is therefore to be conſidered as the reward of the other. Whereas it appears: 1. By the Prophets diſcourſe, that he doth not

not inſiſt on an exact methodical order, but dilates and amplifies things as he ſees occaſion: for Verſe 9. he ſaith, He made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; and Verſe 10. he ſaid, Yet it pleaſed the Lord to bruiſe him, he hath put him to grief: Will Crellius therefore ſay, that this muſt be conſequent to his death and burial? 2. The particle ו may be here taken cauſally, as we render it, very agreeably to the ſenſe; and ſo it gives an account of the foregoing clauſe, By his knowledge, ſhall my righteous ſervant juſtifie many, for he ſhall bear their iniquities. And that this is no unuſual acception of that particle, might be eaſily cleared from many places of Scripture if it were neceſſary; and from this very Prophet, as Iſa. 39. 1. where וישמע is the ſame with כי שמע 2 Kings 20. 12. and Iſa. 64. 5. Thou art wroth, for we have ſinned, ונחטא, what where the ſame particle is made the caſual of what went before. But we need not inſiſt upon this to anſwer Crellius, Crell. c. 9. ſect. 7. p. 463. who elſewhere makes uſe of it himſelf, and ſays, They muſt be very ignorant of the Hebrew Tongue, who do not know that the conjunction copulative is often taken caſually; Soc. Præl. c. 14. ſect. 6 and ſo much is confeſſed by Socinus alſo, where he explains that particle in one ſenſe in the beginning, and caſually in the middle of the verſe: 2 Sam. 24. 1. and the Lord's anger was kindled againſt Iſrael, ויסת, for he moved, &c. but if this will not do, he attempts to prove, That סבל in this very Chapter, hath the ſignification of taking away, v. 4. For he hath born our griefs, and carried our ſorrows, which is applied by St. Matth. 8. 17. to bodily diſeaſes, which our Saviour did not bear, but took away, as it is ſaid in the foregoing Verſe; he healed all that were ſick, on which thoſe words come in, That it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by Iſaias, &c. To which I anſwer: 1. It is granted by our Adverſaries, that St. Matthew in thoſe words, doth not give the full ſenſe of the Prophet, but only applies that by way of accommodation, to bodily diſeaſes, which was chiefly intended for the ſins of men. And in a way of accommodation it is not unuſual to ſtrain words beyond their genuine and natural ſignification, or what was intended primarily by the perſon who ſpake them. Would it be reaſonable for any to ſay that לקח ſignifies to give, becauſe that place, Pſal. 68. 18. where the word by all is acknowledged to ſignifie to receive, is rendred to give, Eph. 4. 8. ſo that admitting another ſenſe of the word here, as applied to the cure of bodily diſeaſes, it doth not from thence follow, that this ſhould be the meaning of the word in the primary ſenſe intended by the Prophet. 2. The word as uſed by St. Matthew, is very capable of the primary and natural ſenſe; for St. Matthew retains words of the ſame ſignification, with that which we contend for, ἀνέλαβε and ἐβάστασε, neither of which doth ſignifie taking away, by cauſing a thing not to be. So that all that is implied hereby, is the pains and trouble which our Saviour took in healing of the ſick. For to that end, as Grotius well obſerves upon that place, the Circumſtances are mentioned, Mat. 8.16. That it was at even, and multitudes were brought to him, in St. Matthew; that after Sun ſet all that were diſeaſed were brought, and all the City was gathered together at the door, in St. Mark; Mar. 1. 32, 33. Luke 4. 42. That he departed not till it was day, in St. Luke; that he might the better underſtand how our Saviour did bear our griefs, becauſe the pains he took in healing them were ſo great. And here I cannot but obſerve, that Grotius in his Notes on that place, continued ſtill in the ſame mind he was in, when he writ againſt Socinus, for he ſaith, "Thoſe words may either refer to the diſeaſes of the body, and ſo they note the pains

“ he took in the cure of them; or to our ſins, and ſo they were fulfilled when Chriſt by ſuffering upon the Croſs, did obtain remiſſion “ of ſins for us, as St. Peter ſaith, 1 Pet. 2. 24. But upon what reaſon the Annotations on that place come to be ſo different from his ſenſe expreſſed here, long after Crellius his anſwer, I do not underſtand. But we are ſure he declared his mind, as to the main of that Controverſie, to be the ſame, that it was when he writ his Book which Crellius anſwered; as appears by two Letters of his to Voſſius, not long ſince publiſhed; and he utterly diſowns the charge of Socinianiſm, as a calumny in his diſcuſſion, the laſt Book he ever writ. Epiſt. Eccl. p. 747, 748. Diſcuſſ. p. 16, 17.

VIII. But we are no further obliged to vindicate Grotius, than he did the truth; which we are ſure he did in the vindication of the 53 of Iſaiah, from Socinus his interpretations, notwithſtanding what Crellius hath objected againſt him. Iſa. 53. 5, 6, 7. vindicated. We therefore proceed to other Verſes in the ſame Chapter inſiſted on by Grotius, to prove; that Chriſt did bear the puniſhments of our ſins, v. 6, 7. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all: It is required, and he was afflicted, as Grotius renders thoſe words. Socinus makes a twofold ſenſe of the former clauſe; the firſt is, That God by or with Chriſt did meet with our iniquities; the latter, That God did make our iniquities to meet with Chriſt. De Servat. l. 2. c. 5. The words ſaith Grotius, will not bear the former interpretation; for the verb הִפְגִּיעַ being in Hiphil, muſt import a double action, and ſo it muſt not be, That God by him did meet with our ſins, but that God did make our ſins to meet upon him. To which Crellius replies, That words in Hiphil are ſometimes uſed intranſitively; Crell. c. 1. ſect. 52. but can he produce any inſtance in Scripture, where this word joyned with ב and את is ſo taken? for in the laſt verſe of the Chapter, the conſtruction is different: And what an uncertain way of interpreting Scripture will this be, if every Anomalous ſignification, and rare uſe of a word, ſhall be made uſe of to take away ſuch a ſenſe as is moſt agreeable to the deſign of the place. For that ſenſe we contend for, is not only forced upon the moſt natural importance of theſe words, but upon the agreeableneſs of them with ſo many other expreſſions of this Chapter, that Chriſt did bear our iniquities, and was wounded for our tranſgreſſions, and that his ſoul was made an offering for ſin: To which it is very ſuitable, that as the iniquities of the people were (as it were) laid upon the head of the Sacrifice; ſo it ſhould be ſaid of Chriſt, who was to offer up himſelf for the ſins of the world. And the Jews themſelves by this phraſe do underſtand the puniſhment either for the ſins of the people, which Joſias underwent, or which the people themſelves ſuffered, by thoſe who interpret this prophecy of them. To which purpoſe, Aben Ezra obſerves, that iniquity is here put for the puniſhment of it, as 1 Sam. 28. 10. and Lam. 4. 6. But Socinus miſtruſting the incongruity of this Interpretation, flies to another; viz. That God did make our iniquities to meet with Chriſt: And this we are willing to admit of, if by that they mean, That Chriſt underwent the puniſhment of them; as that phraſe muſt naturally imports, for what otherwiſe can our iniquities meeting with him ſignifie? For the word פגע taken properly (as Socinus acknowledgeth it ought to be, when he rejects Pagnin's Interpretation of making Chriſt to interceed for our iniquities) ſignifies, either to meet with one by chance, or out of kindneſs, or elſe for an encounter, with an intention to deſtroy that which it meets with. So Judg. 8. 21. Riſe thou ופגע בנו, ἀπάντησον ἡμῖν, LXX. irrue in nos, fall upon us; i. e.

run upon us with thy ſword, and kill us. Judg. 15. 12. Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me your ſelves; where the ſame word is uſed, and they explain the meaning of it in the next words, v. 13. We will not kill thee, Amos 5. 19. as if a man did flee from a Lyon, and a Bear met him, ופגעו, i. e. with a deſign to kill him. Now I ſuppoſe they will not ſay that our ſins met with Chriſt by Chance, ſince it is ſaid, that God laid on him, &c. not out of kindneſs; it muſt be therefore out of enmity, and with a deſign to deſtroy him; and ſo our ſins cannot be underſtood as Socinus and Crellius would have them, as the meer occaſions of Chriſt's death: but as the proper impulſive cauſe of it. Whether the following word נגש be taken with a reſpect to ſin, and ſo it properly ſignifies, it is required, or with a reſpect to the perſon, and ſo it may ſignifie he was oppreſſed, is not a matter of that conſequence, which we ought to contend about; if it be proved that Chriſt's oppreſſion had only a reſpect to ſin, as the puniſhment of it. Which will yet further appear from another expreſſion in the ſame Chapter, v. 5. The chaſtiſement of our peace was upon him, and by his ſtripes we are healed. In which Grotius ſaith "the word מוסר doth not "ſignifie any kind of affliction, but ſuch as hath the nature of puniſh-"ment, either for example or inſtruction; but ſince the latter cannot "be intended in Chriſt, the former muſt. Crellius thinks to eſcape from this, by acknowledging, that the ſufferings of Chriſt have ſome reſpect to ſin; but if it be ſuch a reſpect to ſin, which makes what Chriſt underwent a puniſhment (which is only proper in this caſe) it is as much as we contend for. This therefore he is loth to abide by; and ſaith that chaſtiſement imports no more than bare affliction without any reſpect to ſin, which he thinks to prove from St. Paul's words, 2 Cor. 6. 9. We are chaſtiſed, but not given over to death; but how far this is from proving his purpoſe will eaſily appear, 1. Becauſe thoſe by whom they were ſaid to be chaſtned, did not think they did it without any reſpect to a fault; but they ſuppoſed them to be juſtly puniſhed; and this is that we plead for, that the chaſtiſement conſidered with a reſpect to him that inflicts it, doth ſuppoſe ſome fault as reaſon of the inflicting it. 2. This is far from the preſent purpoſe, for the chaſtiſement there mentioned is oppoſed to death, as chaſtned, but not killed; whereas Grotius expreſly ſpeaks of ſuch chaſtiſements as include death, that theſe cannot be ſuppoſed to be meerly deſigned for inſtruction, and therefore muſt be conceived under the notion of puniſhment. The other place, Pſal. 73. 14. is yet more remote from the buſineſs; for though the Pſalmiſt accounts himſelf innocent in reſpect of the great enormities of others; yet he could not account himſelf ſo innocent with a reſpect to God, as not to deſerve chaſtiſement from him.

Crell. c. 1. ſect. 57.

Whether Chriſt's death be a proper παράδειγμα, and whether that doth imply that it was a puniſhment of ſin.

IX. But Crellius offers further to prove that Chriſt's death muſt be conſidered as a bare affliction, and not as a παράδειγμα, or exemplary puniſhment, becauſe "in ſuch a puniſhment the guilty themſelves are "to be puniſhed, and the benefit comes to thoſe who were not guilty, "but in Chriſt's ſufferings it was quite contrary, for the innocent was "puniſhed, and the guilty have the benefit of it: and yet (he ſaith) "if we ſhould grant that Chriſt's ſufferings were a παράδειγμα, that "will not prove that his death was a proper puniſhment. To which I anſwer, That whatever anſwers to the ends of an exemplary puniſhment, may properly be called ſo: but ſuppoſing that Chriſt ſuffered the puniſhment of our ſins, thoſe ſufferings will anſwer to all the ends of an exemplary puniſhment. For the ends of ſuch a puniſhment aſſigned by Crellius himſelf, are, "That others obſerving ſuch a puniſhment, "may abſtain from thoſe ſins which have brought it upon the perſon "who ſuffers. Now the queſtion is, whether ſuppoſing Chriſt did ſuffer on the account of our ſins, theſe ſufferings of his may deter us from the practice of ſin or no? And therefore in oppoſition to Crellius, I ſhall prove theſe two things: 1. That ſuppoſing Chriſt ſuffered for our ſins, there was a ſufficient argument to deter us from the practice of ſin. 2. Suppoſing that his ſufferings had no reſpect to our ſins, they could not have that force to deter men from the practice of it: for he after aſſerts, That Chriſt's ſufferings might be a παράδειγμα to us, though they were no puniſhment of ſin. 1. That the death of Chriſt conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin, is a proper παράδειγμα, or hath a great force to deter men from the practice of ſin: and that becauſe the ſame reaſon of puniſhment is ſuppoſed in Chriſt and in our ſelves, and becauſe the example is much more conſiderable, than if we had ſuffered our ſelves. 1. The ſame reaſon of puniſhment is ſuppoſed. For why are men deterred from ſin, by ſeeing others puniſhed; but becauſe they look upon the ſin as the reaſon of the puniſhment; and therefore where the ſame reaſon holds, the ſame ends may be as properly obtained. If we ſaid that Chriſt ſuffered death meerly as an innocent perſon out of God's dominion over his life; what imaginable force could this have to deter men from ſin, which is aſſerted to have no relation to it as the cauſe of it? But when we ſay, that God laid our iniquities upon him, that he ſuffered not upon his own account but ours, that the ſins we commit againſt God were the cauſe of all thoſe bitter Agonies which the Son of God underwent, what argument can be more proper to deter men from ſin than this is? For hereby they ſee the great abhorrency of ſin which is in God, that he will not pardon the ſins of men without a compenſation made to his Honour, and a demonſtration to the world of his hatred of it. Hereby they ſee what a value God hath for his Laws, which he will not relax as to the puniſhment of offenders, without ſo valuable a conſideration as the blood of his own Son. Hereby they ſee, that the puniſhment of ſin is no meer arbitrary thing depending barely upon the will of God; but that there is ſuch a connexion between ſin and puniſhment as to the ends of Government, that unleſs the Honour and Majeſty of God, as to his Laws and Government may be preſerved, the violation of his Laws muſt expect a juſt recompence of reward. Hereby they ſee what thoſe are to expect who neglect or deſpiſe theſe ſufferings of the Son of God for them; for nothing can then remain, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which ſhall devour the Adverſaries. So that, here all the weighty arguments concur which may be moſt apt to prevail upon men to deter them from their ſins. For if God did thus by the green tree, what will he do by the dry? If he who was ſo innocent in himſelf, ſo perfectly holy, ſuffered ſo much on the account of our ſins; what then may thoſe expect to ſuffer, who have no innocency at all to plead, and add wilfulneſs and impenitency to their ſins? But if it be replied by Crellius, that it is otherwiſe among men: I anſwer, that we do not pretend in all things to parallel the ſufferings of Chriſt for us, with any ſufferings of men for one another. But yet we add, that even among men the puniſhments inflicted on thoſe who were themſelves innocent as to the cauſe of them, may be as exemplary as any other.

ther. And the greater appearance of ſeverity there is in them, the greater terror they ſtrike into all offenders. As Children's loſing their eſtates and honours, or being baniſhed for their Parents treaſons in which they had no part themſelves. Which is a proper puniſhment on them of their Father's faults, whether they be guilty or no? and if this may be juſt in men, why not in God? If any ſay, that the Parents are only puniſhed in the Children, he ſpeaks that which is contradictory to the common ſenſe of mankind; for puniſhment doth ſuppoſe ſenſe or feeling of it; and in this caſe the Parents are ſaid to be puniſhed, who are ſuppoſed to be dead and paſt feeling of it; and the Children who undergo the ſmart of it muſt not be ſaid to be puniſhed; though all things are ſo like it, that no perſon can imagine himſelf in that condition, but would think himſelf puniſhed, and ſeverely too. If it be ſaid, that theſe are calamities indeed, but they are no proper puniſhments, it may eaſily be ſhewed that diſtinction will not hold here. Becauſe theſe puniſhments were within the deſign of the Law, and were intended for all the ends of puniſhments, and therefore muſt have the nature of them. For therefore the Children are involved in the Father's puniſhment on purpoſe to deter others from the like Actions. There are ſome things indeed that Children may fall into by occaſion of their Father's guilt, which may be only calamities to them, becauſe they are neceſſary conſequents in the nature of the thing, and not purpoſely deſign'd as a puniſhment to them. Thus, being deprived of the comfort and aſſiſtance of their Parents, when the Law hath taken them off by the hand of juſtice: this was deſigned by the Law as a puniſhment to the Parents, and as to the Children it is only a neceſſary conſequent of their puniſhment. For otherwiſe the Parents would have been puniſhed for the Childrens faults, and not the Children only involved in that which unavoidably follows upon the Parents puniſhment. So that Crellius is very much miſtaken either in the preſent caſe of our Saviour's puniſhment, or in the general reaſon of exemplary puniſhments, as among men. But the caſe of our Saviour is more exemplary, when we conſider the excellency of his perſon, though appearing in our nature, when no meaner ſufferings would ſatisfie, than of ſo tranſcendent a nature as he underwent, though he were the Eternal Son of God, this muſt make puniſhment much more exemplary, than if he were conſidered only as our Adverſaries do, as a mere man. So that the dignity of his perſon under all his ſufferings may juſtly add a greater conſideration to deter us from the practice of ſin, which was ſo ſeverely puniſhed in him, when he was pleaſed to be a Sacrifice for our ſins. From whence we ſee that the ends of a παράδειγμα are very agreeable with the ſufferings of Chriſt conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin.

God's hatred of ſin could not be ſeen in the ſufferings of Chriſt, if they were no puniſhment of ſin.
Crell. c. 1. p. 69.

X. We now conſider whether as Crellius aſſerts, ſuppoſing Chriſt's death were no puniſhment, it could have theſe effects upon mens minds or no? Yes, he ſaith, it might, becauſe by his ſufferings we might ſee how ſeverely God would puniſh wicked and obſtinate perſons. Which being a ſtrange riddle at the firſt hearing it, viz. that by the ſufferings of an innocent perſon without any reſpect to ſin as the cauſe of them: we ſhould diſcern God's ſeverity againſt thoſe who are obſtinate in ſin; we ought the more diligently to attend to what is ſaid for the clearing of it. " Firſt, ſaith he, If God ſpared not his own moſt inno" cent and holy and only Son, than whom nothing was more dear to “ him in Heaven or Earth, but expoſed him to ſo cruel and ignomi-“ nious a death; how great and ſevere ſufferings may we think God “ will inflict on wicked men, who are at open defiance with him? I confeſs my ſelf not ſubtle enough to apprehend the force of this argument, viz. If God dealt ſo ſeverely with him who had no ſin either of his own or others to anſwer for; therefore he will deal much more ſeverely with thoſe that have. For God's ſeverity conſidered without any reſpect to ſin, gives rather encouragement to ſinners, than any argument to deter them from it. For the natural conſequence of it is, that God doth act arbitrarily, without any regard to the good or evil of mens actions; and therefore it is to no purpoſe to be ſollicitous about them. For upon the ſame account that the moſt innocent perſon ſuffers moſt ſeverely from him, for all that we know, the more we ſtrive to be innocent, the more ſeverely we may be dealt with, and let men ſin, they can be but dealt ſeverely with; all the difference then is, one ſhall be called puniſhments, and the other calamities, but the ſeverity may be the ſame in both. And who would leave off his ſins meerly to change the name of puniſhments into that of Calamities? And from hence it will follow, that the differences of good and evil, and the reſpects of them to puniſhment and reward, are but airy and empty things; but that God really in the diſpenſiation of things to men, hath no regard to what men are or do, but acts therein according to his own Dominion, whereby he may diſpoſe of men how or which way he pleaſes. If a Prince had many of his Subjects in open rebellion againſt him, and he ſhould at that time make his moſt obedient and beloved Son to be publickly expoſed to all manner of indignities, and be diſhonoured and put to death by the hands of thoſe rebels; could any one imagine that this was deſigned as an exemplary puniſhment to all Rebels, to let them ſee the danger of Rebellion? No, but would it not rather make them think him a cruel Prince, one that would puniſh innocency as much as Rebellion; and that it was rather better to ſtand at defiance, and become deſperate, for it was more dangerous to be beloved than hated by him, to be his Son than his declared Enemy? ſo that inſiſting on the death of Chriſt as it is conſidered as a παράδειγμα, (for of that we ſpeak now) there is no compariſon between our Adverſaries hypotheſis and ours; but, ſaith Crellius, the conſequence is not good on our ſide, if Chriſt ſuffered the puniſhment of our ſins, therefore they ſhall ſuffer much more, who continue in ſin, for Chriſt ſuffered for the ſins of the whole world; but they ſuffer only for their own, and what they have deſerved themſelves. To which I anſwer, that the argument is of very good force upon our hypotheſis, though it would not be upon theirs. For if we ſuppoſe him to be a meer man that ſuffered, then there could be no argument drawn from his ſufferings to ours, but according to the exact proportion of ſins and puniſhments: but ſuppoſing that he had a divine as well as humane nature, there may not be ſo great a proportion of the ſins of the world to the ſufferings of Chriſt, as of the ſins of a particular perſon to his own ſufferings; and therefore the argument from one to the other doth ſtill hold. For the meaſure of puniſhments muſt be taken with a proportion to the dignity of the perſon who ſuffers them. And Crellius himſelf confeſſeth elſewhere, that the dignity of the perſon is to be conſidered in exemplary puniſhment, and that a leſſer puniſhment of one that is very great, may do much more to deter men from ſin, than a greater puniſhment of one much leſs. But he
" him

yet further urgeth, that the ſeverity of God againſt ſinners may be diſcovered in the ſufferings of Chriſt, becauſe God's hatred againſt ſin is diſcovered therein. But if we ask how God's hatred againſt ſin is ſeen in the ſuffering of one perfectly innocent and free from ſin, and not rather his hatred of innocency, if no reſpect to ſin were had therein: he anſwers, That God's hatred againſt ſin was manifeſted, in that he would not ſpare his only Son to draw men off from ſin. For anſwer to which, we are to conſider the ſufferings of Chriſt as an innocent perſon, deſigned as an exemplary cauſe to draw men off from ſin; and let any one tell me, what hatred of ſin can poſſibly be diſcovered, in propoſing the ſufferings of a moſt innocent perſon to them without any conſideration of ſin as the cauſe of thoſe ſufferings? If it be ſaid, That the Doctrine of Chriſt was deſigned to draw men off from ſin; and that God ſuffered his Son to die to confirm this Doctrine, and thereby ſhewed his hatred to ſin. I anſwer, 1. This is carrying the diſpute off from the preſent buſineſs, for we are not now arguing about the deſign of Chriſt's Doctrine, nor the death of Chriſt as a means to confirm that, but as a παράδειγμα, and what power that hath without reſpect to our ſins as the cauſe of them, to draw us from ſin, by diſcovering God's hatred to it. 2. The Doctrine of Chriſt according to their hypotheſis, diſcovers much leſs of God's hatred to ſin than ours doth. For if God may pardon ſin without any compenſation made to his Laws or Honour, if Repentance be in its own nature a ſufficient ſatisfaction for all the ſins paſt of our Lives; if there be no ſuch Juſtice in God which requires puniſhment of ſin committed; if the puniſhment of ſin depend barely upon God's will; and the moſt innocent perſon may ſuffer as much from God without reſpect to ſin as the cauſe of ſuffering, as the moſt guilty; let any rational man judge whether this Doctrine diſcovers as much God's abhorrency of ſin, as aſſerting the neceſſity of vindicating God's Honour to the World, upon the breach of his Laws, if not by the ſuffering of the offenders themſelves, yet of the Son of God as a ſacrifice for the expiation of ſin, by undergoing the puniſhment of our iniquities, ſo as upon conſideration of his ſufferings, he is pleaſed to accept of Repentance and ſincere Obedience, as the conditions upon which he will grant remiſſion of Sins, and eternal life. So that if the diſcovery of God's hatred to ſin be the means to reclaim men from it, we aſſert upon the former reaſons, that much more is done upon our Doctrine concerning the ſufferings of Chriſt, than can be upon theirs. So much ſhall ſuffice to manifeſt in what ſenſe Chriſt's death may be a παράδειγμα, and that this doth imply, that his ſufferings are to be conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin.

Grotius his arguments from Chriſt's being made ſin and a curſe for us defended againſt Crellius.

XI. The next Series of places which makes Chriſt's ſufferings to be a puniſhment for ſin, are thoſe which aſſert Chriſt to be made ſin and a curſe for us, which we now deſign to make clear, ought to be underſtood in no other ſenſe, for as Grotius ſaith, “As the Jews ſometimes uſe ſin, for the puniſhment of ſin; as appears, beſides other places, by Zach. 14. 19. Gen. 4. 13. ſo they call him that ſuffers the puniſhment of ſin; by the name of ſin as the Latins uſe the word Piaculum, both for the fault, and for him that ſuffers for it. Thence under the Law, an expiatory Sacrifice for ſin, was called ſin, Lev. 4. 3. 29.— 5, 6. Pſal. 40. 7. Which way of ſpeaking Eſaias followed, ſpeaking of Chriſt, Iſa. 53. 10. תישם אשם נפשו he made his ſoul ſin, i. e. liable to the puniſhment of it. To the ſame purpoſe St. Paul, 2 Cor. “5. 21.

“ 5. 21. He made him to be ſin for us, who knew no ſin, that we “ might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him. To which Crellius “ replies, That there is no neceſſity, that by the name of ſin, “ when applied to ſufferings, any more ſhould be implied, than that “ thoſe ſufferings were occaſioned by ſin, no more is there when it is “ applied to the perſon; nay, much leſs, for he ſaith, No more is “ required to this, but that he ſhould be handled as ſinners uſe to be,
“ and undergo the matter of puniſhment, without any reſpect to ſin, “ either as the cauſe or occaſion of it. So he ſaith, The name Sinner
“ is uſed, 1 King. 1. 21. and in St. Paul, the name of ſin in the firſt “ clauſe is to be underſtood, as of righteouſneſs in the latter; and as “ we are ſaid to be righteouſneſs in him, when God deals with us as “ with righteous perſons, ſo Chriſt was ſaid to be ſin for us, when “ he was dealt with as a ſinner. And the Sacrifices for ſin under the “ Law were ſo called, not with a reſpect to the puniſhment of ſin, but “ becauſe they were offered upon the account of ſin, and were uſed “ for taking away the guilt of it, or becauſe men were bound to “ offer them, ſo that they ſinned if they neglected it. So that all that “ is meant by Eſaias and St. Paul is, That Chriſt was made an expiatory “ Sacrifice, or that he expoſed himſelf for thoſe afflictions which “ ſinners only by right undergo. But let Crellius or any others of them tell me, if the Scripture had intended to expreſs, that the ſufferings of Chriſt were a puniſhment of our ſins, how was it poſſible to do it more emphatically than it is done by theſe Expreſſions (the cuſtom of the Hebrew Language being conſidered) not only by ſaying, that Chriſt did bear our ſins, but, that himſelf was made ſin for us? thoſe phraſes being ſo commonly uſed for the puniſhment of ſin. Let them produce any one inſtance in Scripture, where thoſe expreſſions are applied to any without the conſideration of ſin: that place, 1 King 1. 21. is very far from it, for in all probability, the deſign of Bathſheba in making Solomon King was already diſcovered, which was the reaſon that Adonijah his elder Brother declaring himſelf King, invited not him with the reſt of the King's Sons: All that ſhe had for Solomon's Succeſſion, was a ſecret promiſe and oath of David; and therefore ſhe urgeth him now to declare the Succeſſion, v. 20. Otherwiſe, ſhe ſaith, when David ſhould die, I and my ſon Solomon ſhall be accounted offenders; i. e. ſaith Crellius, we ſhall be handled as offenders, we ſhall be deſtroyed: But ſurely not without the ſuppoſition of a fault; by them which ſhould inflict that puniſhment upon them: The plain meaning is, they ſhould be accuſed of Treaſon, and then puniſhed accordingly. But we are to conſider, that ſtill with a reſpect to them, who were the inflicters, a fault or ſin is ſuppoſed as the reaſon of their puniſhment, either of their own or others. But of our Saviour it is not ſaid, That he ſhould be counted as an offender by the Jews; for although that doth not take away his innocency, yet it ſuppoſeth an accuſation of ſomething, which in it ſelf deſerves puniſhment. But in Eſai. 53. 10. it is ſaid, He made his ſoul ſin; and 2 Cor. 5. 21. That God made him ſin for us, which muſt therefore imply, not being dealt with by men only as a ſinner, but that with a reſpect to him who inflicted the puniſhment, there was a conſideration of ſin as the reaſon of it. We do not deny but God's ſuffering him to be dealt with as a ſinner by men, is implied in it, for that was the method of his puniſhment deſigned; but we ſay further, that the reaſon of that permiſſion in God, doth ſuppoſe ſome antecedent tecedent cauſe of it: For God would never have ſuffered his only Son, to be ſo dealt with by the hands of cruel men, unleſs he had made himſelf an offering for ſin; being willing to undergo thoſe ſufferings, that he might be an expiatory Sacrifice for the ſins of the world. And although Socinus will not yield, That by being made ſin for us ſhould be underſtood Chriſt's being an expiatory Sacrifice for ſin; yet Crellius is contented it ſhould be ſo taken in both places: Which if he will grant, ſo as by vertue of that Sacrifice, the guilt of ſin is expiated, we ſhall not contend with him about the reaſons, why thoſe Sacrifices were called ſins, although the moſt proper and genuine muſt needs be that, which is aſſigned by the Law, that the ſins of the people were ſuppoſed to be laid upon them, and therefore they were intended for the expiation of them: But it is very unreaſonable to ſay, That expiatory Sacrifices were called ſins, becauſe it would have been a ſin to neglect them: For on the ſame account, all the other Sacrifices muſt have been called ſo too; for it was a ſin to neglect any where God required them, and ſo there had been no difference between Sacrifices for ſin and others. To that reaſon of Crellius, from our being made righteous, becauſe dealt with as ſuch, to Chriſt's being made ſin only, becauſe dealt with as a ſinner, we need no more than what this parallel will afford us; For as Crellius would never ſay, that any are dealt with as righteous perſons, who are not antecedently ſuppoſed to be ſo by his own Argument, Chriſt being dealt with as a ſinner, muſt ſuppoſe guilt antecedent to it; and ſince the Apoſtle declares it was not his own, in thoſe words, Who knew no ſin, it follows that it muſt be the conſideration of ours, which muſt make him be dealt with as a ſinner by him, who made him to be ſin for us. But to ſuppoſe that Chriſt ſhould be ſaid to be made ſin, without any reſpect to ſin, is as much as if the Latins ſhould call any one Scelus, and mean thereby a very honeſt man; or a Piaculum, without any ſuppoſition of his own or others guilt. But we are to conſider, that the ſufferings of Chriſt, ſeeming at firſt ſo inconſiſtent with that relation to God as his only Son, which the Apoſtles aſſert concerning him, they were obliged to vindicate his innocency, as to men, and yet withal to ſhew, that with a reſpect to God, there was ſufficient reaſon for his permiſſion of his undergoing theſe ſufferings. That he knew no ſin, was enough to clear his innocency as to men; but then the queſtion will be asked, If he were ſo innocent, why did God ſuffer all thoſe things to come upon him? Did not Abraham plead of old with God, That he would not ſlay the righteous with the wicked, becauſe it was repugnant to the righteouſneſs of his nature to do ſo; That be far from thee to do after this manner, to ſlay the righteous with the wicked, and that the righteous ſhould be as the wicked, that be far from thee; ſhall not the Judge of all the Earth do right? How then comes God to ſuffer the moſt perfect innocency to be dealt with ſo, as the greateſt ſins could not have deſerved worſe from men? Was not his righteouſneſs the ſame ſtill? And Abraham did not think the diſtinction of calamities and puniſhments, enough to vindicate God's proceedings, if the righteous ſhould have been dealt withal as the wicked. And if that would hold for ſuch a meaſure of righteouſneſs as might be ſuppoſed in ſuch who were not guilty of the great Abominations of thoſe places, that it ſhould be enough, not only to deliver themſelves, but the wicked too; how comes it that the moſt perfect obedience of the Son of God, is not ſufficient to excuſe him from the greateſt ſufferings of Malefactors?

Soc. l. 1. c. 8.

But if his ſufferings had been meerly from men, God had been accountable only for the bare permiſſion; but it is ſaid, that he fore-ordained and determined theſe things to be, that Chriſt himſelf complained, that God had forſaken him; and here, that he made him ſin for us: and can we imagine all this to be without any reſpect to the guilt of ſin, as the cauſe of it? Why ſhould ſuch an expreſſion be uſed of being made ſin? Might not many others have ſerved ſufficiently to declare the indignities and ſufferings he underwent, without ſuch a phraſe as ſeems to reflect upon Chriſt's innocency? If there had been no more in theſe expreſſions than our Adverſaries imagine, the Apoſtles were ſo careful of Chriſt's Honour, they would have avoided ſuch ill ſounding expreſſions as theſe were; and not have affected Hebraiſms, and uncouth forms of ſpeech, to the diſparagement of their Religion. But this is all which our Adverſaries have to ſay, where words are uſed by them out of their proper ſenſe, That the Prophets and Apoſtles affected tricks of wit, playing with words, uſing them ſometimes in one ſenſe, and preſently quite in another. So Crellius ſaith of Iſaiah, That he affects little elegancies of words and verbal Alluſions, which makes him uſe words ſometimes out of their proper and natural ſenſe; thence he tells us, The ſufferings of Chriſt are called chaſtiſements, though they have nothing of the nature of chaſtiſements in them: And from this liberty of interpreting, they make words (without any other reaſon, than that they ſerve for their purpoſe) be taken in ſeveral ſenſes in the ſame verſe: For Socinus in one verſe of St. John's Goſpel, makes the World to be taken in three ſeveral ſenſes: He was in the World, there it is taken, ſaith he, for the men of the World in general: The world was made by him, there it muſt be underſtood only of the reformation of things by the Goſpel: and, the world knew him not, there it muſt be taken in neither of the former ſenſes, but for the wicked of the world: What may not one make of the Scripture, by ſuch a way of interpreting it? But by this we have the leſs reaſon to wonder, that Socinus ſhould put ſuch an Interpretation upon Gal. 3. 13. Chriſt hath redeemed us from the curſe of the Law, being made a curſe for us; for it is written, Curſed is every one that hangeth on a tree: In which he doth acknowledge by the curſe, in the firſt clauſe, to be meant, the puniſhment of ſin, but not in the ſecond: And the reaſon he gives for it is, amavit enim Paulus in execrationis verbo argutus eſſe. St. Paul affected playing with the word curſe, underſtanding it firſt in a proper, and then a Metaphorical ſenſe. But it is plain that the deſign of St. Paul and Socinus are very different in theſe words: Socinus thinks he ſpeaks only Metaphorically, when he ſaith, that Chriſt was made a curſe for us; i.e. by a bare Alluſion of the name, without a correſpondency in the thing it ſelf; and ſo that the death of Chriſt might be called a curſe, but was not ſo: But St. Paul ſpeaks of this not by way of Extenuation, but to ſet forth the greatneſs and weight of the puniſhment he underwent for us. He therefore tells us, what it was which Chriſt did redeem us from, The curſe of the Law; and how he did it, by being not only made a curſe but a curſe for us; i.e. not by being hateful to God, or undergoing the very ſame curſe, which we ſhould have done; which are the two things objected by Crellius againſt our ſenſe; but that the death of Chriſt was to be conſidered, not as a bare ſeparation of ſoul and body, but as properly pœnal, being ſuch a kind of death, which none but Maleſactors by the Law were to ſuffer; by the undergoing of which puniſhment in our ſtead, ſtead, he redeemed us from that curſe which we were liable to by the violation of the Law of God. And there can be no reaſon to appropriate this only to the Jews, unleſs the death of Chriſt did extend only to the deliverance of them from the puniſhment of their ſins; or becauſe the curſe of the Law did make that death pœnal, and therefore the intention of the puniſhment, could reach no further than the Law did; but the Apoſtle in the very next words ſpeaks of the farther extenſion of the great bleſſing promiſed to Abraham, That it ſhould come upon the Gentiles alſo; and withal thoſe whom the Apoſtle ſpeaks to, were not Jews, but ſuch as thought they ought to joyn the Law and Goſpel together: that St. Paul doth not mean as Crellius would have it, that Chriſt by his death did confirm the New Covenant, and ſo take away the obligation of the Law; (for to what end was the curſe mentioned for that? What did the accurſedneſs of his death add to the confirmation of the truth of his Doctrine? And when was ever the curſe taken for the continuance of the Law of Moſes?) but that Chriſt by the efficacy of his death as a puniſhment for ſin hath redeemed all that believe and obey him from the curſe deſerved by their ſins, whether inforced by the Law of Moſes, or the Law written in their hearts, which tells the conſciences of ſinners, that ſuch who violate the Laws of God are worthy of death, and therefore under the curſe of the Law.

Crell. Annot. in loc.

The particles διά, περί, ὑπὲρ being joyned to ſins, and relating to ſufferings, do imply thoſe ſufferings to be the puniſhment of ſin.

XII. We come now to the force of the particles which being joyned with our ſins as referring to the death of Chriſt, do imply that his death is to be conſidered as a puniſhment of ſin. Not that we inſiſt on the force of thoſe Particles διὰ, περὶ and ὑπὲρ, as though of themſelves they did imply this (for we know they are of various ſignifications according to the nature of the matter they are joyned with) but that theſe being joyned with ſins and ſuffering together, do ſignifie that thoſe ſufferings are the puniſhment of thoſe ſins. Thus it is ſaid of Chriſt, that he died, διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν, for our ſins, ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, that he ſuffered once περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, that he gave himſelf περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, that he offered a Sacrifice περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν. To which Crellius replies, "That if the force of theſe Particles not being joy-
" ned with ſufferings may be taken for the final and not for the impul-
" ſive cauſe, they may retain the ſame ſenſe when joyned with ſuffer-
" ings, if thoſe ſufferings may be deſigned in order to an end; but " if it ſhould be granted, that thoſe phraſes being joyned with ſuffer-
" ings, do always imply a meritorious cauſe, yet it doth not follow,
" it ſhould be here ſo underſtood becauſe the matter will not bear it.
To this a ſhort anſwer will at preſent ſerve: for, It is not poſſible a meritorious cauſe can be expreſſed more emphatically than by theſe words being joyned to ſufferings: ſo that we have as clear a Teſtimony from theſe expreſſions as words can give; and by the ſame arts by which theſe may be avoided any other might; ſo that it had not been poſſible for our Doctrine to have been expreſſed in ſuch a manner, but ſuch kind of anſwers might have been given as our Adverſaries now give. If it had been ſaid in the plaineſt terms, that Chriſt's death was a puniſhment for our ſins, they would as eaſily have avoided the force of them as they do of theſe; "they would have told us
" the Apoſtles delighted in an Antanaclaſis, and had expreſſed things " different from the natural uſe of the words by them; and though " puniſhment were ſometimes uſed properly, yet here it muſt be uſed
" only

“ only metaphorically becauſe the matter would bear no other ſenſe. And therefore I commend the ingenuity of Socinus after all the pains he had taken to enervate the force of thoſe places which are brought againſt his Doctrine; he tells us plainly, “ That if our Doctrine were not only once, but frequently mentioned in Scripture? yet he would not therefore believe the thing to be ſo as we ſuppoſe, For, ſaith he, ſeeing the thing it ſelf cannot be, I take the leaſt inconvenient interpretation of the words; and draw forth ſuch a ſenſe from them, as is moſt conſiſtent with it ſelf and the tenor of the Scripture. Socin. de ſervat. l. 3. c. 6. But for all his talking of the tenor of the Scripture; by the ſame reaſon he interprets one place upon theſe terms, he will do many, and ſo the tenor of the Scripture ſhall be never againſt him: And by this we find, that the main ſtrength of our Adverſaries is not pretended to lie in the Scriptures; all the care they have of them is only to reconcile them if poſſible with their Hypotheſis; for they do not deny but that the natural force of the words doth imply what we contend for; but becauſe they ſay the Doctrine we aſſert is inconſiſtent with reaſon, therefore all their deſign is to find out any other poſſible meaning which they therefore aſſert to be true, becauſe more agreeable to the common reaſon of mankind. This therefore is enough for our preſent purpoſe, that if it had been the deſign of Scripture to have expreſſed our ſenſe, it could not have done it in plainer expreſſions than it hath done, that no expreſſions could have been uſed, but the ſame arts of our Adverſaries might have been uſed to take off their force, which they have uſed to thoſe we now urge againſt them, and that ſetting aſide the poſſibility of the thing, the Scripture doth very fairly deliver the Doctrine we contend for; or, ſuppoſing in point of reaſon there may be arguments enough to make it appear poſſible, there are Scriptures enough to make it appear true.

I. The words of Scripture being at laſt acknowledged by our Adverſaries to make for us, the only pretence remaining is, that our Doctrine is repugnant to reaſon. The debate managed upon point of reaſon. The grand difficulty enquired into, and manifeſted by our Adverſaries Confeſſions, not to lie in the greatneſs of Chriſt's ſufferings, or that our ſins were the impulſive cauſe of them, or that it is impoſſible that one ſhould be puniſhed for anothers faults: or in all caſes unjuſt. II. The caſes wherein Crellius *allows it, inſtanced. The matter debated in point of reaſon.

I. HAving gained ſo conſiderable conceſſions from our Adverſaries concerning the places of Scripture, we come now to debate the matter in point of reaſon. And if there appear to be nothing repugnant in the nature of the thing, or to the juſtice of God, then all their loud clamours will come to nothing; for on that they fix, when they talk the moſt of our Doctrine being contrary to reaſon. This therefore we now come more cloſely to examine, in order to which we muſt carefully enquire what it is they lay the charge of injuſtice in God upon, according to our belief of Chriſt's ſufferings being a puniſhment for our ſins.

1. It is not, That the offenders themſelves do not undergo the full puniſhment of their ſins. For they aſſert, that there is no neceſſity at all that the offenders ſhould be puniſhed from any punitive juſtice in God: for they eagerly contend that God may freely pardon the ſins of men: If ſo, then it can be no injuſtice in God not to puniſh the offenders according to the full deſert of their ſins.

2. It is not, That God upon the ſufferings of Chriſt doth pardon the ſins of men: For they yield that God may do this without any charge of injuſtice, and with the greateſt demonſtration of his kindneſs. For they acknowledge, that the ſufferings of Chriſt are not to be conſidered as a bare antecedent condition to pardon, but that they were a moving cauſe as far as the obedience of Chriſt in ſuffering was very acceptable to God.

3. It is not, in the greatneſs or matter of the ſufferings of Chriſt. For they aſſert the ſame which we do. And therefore I cannot but wonder to meet ſometimes with thoſe ſtrange outcrys of our making God cruel in the puniſhing of his Son for us: For what do we aſſert that Chriſt ſuffered, which they do not aſſert too? Nay, doth it not look much more like cruelty in God to lay thoſe ſufferings upon him without any conſideration of ſin? as upon their Hypotheſis he doth; than to do it ſuppoſing he bears the puniſhment of our iniquities, which is the thing we plead for. They aſſert all thoſe ſufferings to be lawful on the account of God's dominion, which according to them muſt ceaſe to be ſo on the ſuppoſition of a meritorious cauſe. But however from this it appears, that it was not unjuſt that Chriſt ſhould ſuffer thoſe things which he did for us: the queſtion then is, whether it were unjuſt that he ſhould ſuffer the ſame things, which he might lawfully do on the account of dominion with a reſpect to our ſins as the cauſe of them.

Certum eſt Chriſtum innocentiſſimum à Deo graviſſimis cruciatibus, ipſaque morte fuiſſe affectum; cum non in materiâ pœnæ abſolute & per ſe conſideratâ, adeoque etiam in eâ afflictione à quâ pœnæ forma abeſt, injuria reſidere à nobis dicatur. Crel. c. 4. Sect. 3. Potuit autem id Deus facere, atque adeo fecit, jure dominii, quod in Chriſti vitam ac corpus habebat; accedente præſertim ipſius Chriſti conſenſu. Id. Ib. Sect. 4.

4. As to this, they acknowledge, that it is not, that the ſufferings of Chriſt were occaſioned by our ſins, or that our ſins were the bare impulſive cauſe of thoſe ſufferings. For they both confeſs in general, that one mans ſins may be the occaſion of anothers puniſhment, ſo far that he might have eſcaped puniſhment, if the others ſins had not been the impulſive cauſe of it. And therefore Crellius in the general ſtate of this queſtion, would not have it, whether it be unjuſt to puniſh one for anothers ſins; for that he acknowledges it is not, but whether, for any cauſe whatſoever it be juſt to puniſh an innocent perſon? And likewiſe in particular of Chriſt, they confeſs, that our ſins were the impulſive cauſe, and the occaſion of his ſufferings.

Quod ſi ex theſi ſpeciale facere velis generalem, ea hæc erit, injuſtum eſſe punire innocentem, quacunque tandem de cauſâ id fiat; non vero ſimpliciter, punire quempiam ob aliena delicta; id enim concedi poteſt non ſemper eſſe injuſtum. Crel. c. 4. Sect. 3.

5. It is not, that there is ſo neceſſary a relation between guilt and puniſhment, that it cannot be called a puniſhment which is inflicted on an innocent perſon. For Crellius, after a long diſcourſe of the difference of afflictions and puniſhments, doth acknowledge, “That it is not of the nature of puniſhment, that the perſon who is to be puniſhed, ſhould really deſerve the puniſhment; and afterwards when Grotius urgeth, though it be eſſential to puniſhment, that it be inflicted for ſin, yet it is not, that it be inflicted upon him who hath himſelf ſinned, which he ſhews by the ſimilitude of rewards, which though neceſſary to be given in conſideration of ſervice, may yet be given to others beſides the perſon himſelf upon his account. All this Crellius acknowledgeth; who ſaith, “They do not make it neceſſary to the nature, but to the juſtice of puniſhment, that it be inflicted upon none but the perſon who hath offended. So by his own Confeſſion, it is not againſt the nature of puniſhment, that no one man ſuffer for anothers faults. From whence it follows, that all Socinus his arguments ſignifie nothing, which are drawn from the impoſſibility of the thing, that one man ſhould be puniſhed for anothers faults; for Crellius grants the thing to be poſſible, but denies it to be juſt; yet not abſolutely neither, but with ſome reſtrictions and limitations. For,

Pœna quidem ſimpliciter in innocentem cadit, juſta non cadit, Crell. c. 4. Sect. 28.

II. 6. It is not, but that there may be ſufficient cauſes aſſigned in ſome particular caſes; wherein it may be juſt for God to puniſh ſome for the ſins of others. For Crellius himſelf hath aſſigned divers. “When there is ſuch a near conjunction between them, that one may be ſaid to be puniſhed in the puniſhment of another: as Parents in their Children and Poſterity, Kings in their Subjects, or the body of a State in its Members, either in the moſt, or the moſt principal, though the feweſt: but we are to conſider how far he doth extend this way of puniſhment of ſome in others. 1. At the greateſt diſtance of time, if they have been of the ſame Nation; for he extends it to the utmoſt degree of God's patience towards a people; “For, ſaith he, God doth not preſently puniſh as ſoon as they have ſinned; but ſpares for a great while, and forbears, in expectation of their Repentance, in the mean while a great many guilty perſons die, and ſeem to have eſcaped puniſhment. But at laſt the time of God's patience being paſt, he puniſheth their Poſterity by exacting the full puniſhment of their ſins upon them, and by this means puniſheth their Anceſtors too, and puniſheth their ſins in their puniſhment; for, ſaith he, all that people are reckoned for one man of ſeveral Ages, and that puniſhment which is taken of the laſt, may be for the ſins of the firſt, for the conjunction and ſucceſſion of them: of which we have an example, ſaith he, in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. By which we ſee a very remote Conjunction, and a mere ſimilitude in comparing ſucceſſion of Ages in people with thoſe in a man, may (when occaſion ſerves) be made uſe of to juſtifie God's puniſhing one Generation of men for the ſins of others that have been long before. 2. When ſins are more ſecret or leſs remarkable

In what caſes Crellius grants ſome may be lawfully puniſhed for the ſins of others.

Quia Deus hunc puniendo illum quoque alterum ob cujus peccati eum dicitur punire, ſimul punire poſſit, ob arctiorem quæ inter illos intercedat conjunctionem. Crell. ib. Sect. 5. Crell. p. 247.

able which God might not puniſh, unleſs an occaſion were given from others ſins impelling him to it; but becauſe God would puniſh one very near them, he therefore puniſheth them, that in their puniſhment he might puniſh the other. Or in caſe ſins ſpread through a Family or a people, or they are committed by divers perſons at ſundry times, which God doth not ſeverely puniſh, but ſometimes then, when the Head of a People or Family hath done ſomething which remarkably deſerves puniſhment, whom he will puniſh in thoſe he is related to, and therefore generally puniſheth the whole Family or People. 3. That which may be a meer exerciſe of dominion as to ſome, may be a proper puniſhment to others; as in the caſe of Infants, being taken away for their Parents ſins; For God, as to the Children, he ſaith, uſeth only an act of dominion, but the puniſhment only redounds to the Parents, who loſe them; and though this be done for the very end of puniſhment, yet he denies, that it hath the nature of Puniſhment in any but the Parents. 4. That puniſhment may be intended for thoſe who can have no ſenſe at all of it; as Crellius aſſerts in the caſe of Saul's Sons, 2 Sam. 21. 8, 14. that the puniſhment was mainly intended for Saul, who was already dead. From theſe conceſſions of Crellius in this caſe, we may take notice, 1. That a remote conjunction may be ſufficient for a tranſlation of penalty, viz. from one Generation to another. 2. That ſins may be truly ſaid to be puniſhed in others, when the offenders themſelves may eſcape puniſhment; thus the ſins of Parents in their Children, and Princes in their Subjects. 3. That an act of dominion in ſome may be deſigned as a proper puniſhment to others. 4. That the nature of puniſhment is not to be meaſured by the ſenſe of it. Now upon theſe conceſſions, though our Adverſaries will not grant, that Chriſt was properly puniſhed for our ſins, yet they cannot deny but that we may very properly be ſaid to be puniſhed for our ſins in Chriſt, and if they will yield us this, the other may be a ſtrife about words. For ſurely there may be eaſily imagined as great a conjunction between Chriſt and us, as between the ſeveral Generations of the Jews, and that laſt which was puniſhed in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: And though we eſcape that puniſhment which Chriſt did undergo, yet we might have our ſins puniſhed in him, as well as Princes theirs in their Subjects, when they eſcape themſelves; or rather as Subjects in an innocent Prince, who may ſuffer for the faults of his people; if it be ſaid, that theſe are acts of meer dominion as to ſuch a one, that nothing hinders but granting it, yet our ſins may be ſaid to be puniſhed in him; as well as Parents ſins are puniſhed properly in meer acts of dominion upon their Children; if it be ſaid, that can be no puniſhment where there is no ſenſe at all of it, that is fully taken off by Crellius; for ſurely we have as great a ſenſe of the ſufferings of Chriſt, as the firſt Generation of the Jews had of the ſufferings of the laſt, before the fatal deſtruction of the City, or as Saul had of the puniſhment of his Sons after his death. So that from Crellius his own conceſſions, we have proved, that our ſins may very properly be ſaid to be puniſhed in Chriſt, although he will not ſay, that Chriſt could be properly puniſhed for our ſins; nay he and the reſt of our Adverſaries not only deny it, but earneſtly contend, that it is very unjuſt to ſuppoſe it, and repugnant to the rectitude of God's nature to do it.

Crell. ib. ſect. 11. ſect. 19.

Crellius his arguments propounded.

III. And ſo we come to conſider the mighty arguments that are inſiſted on for the proof of this, which may be reduced to theſe three; viz. 1. That there can be no puniſhment but what is deſerved, but no man can deſerve that another ſhould be puniſhed. 2. That puniſhment flows from Revenge, but there can be no Revenge where there hath been no fault. 3. That the puniſhment of one, cannot any ways be made the puniſhment of another; and in caſe it be ſuppoſed poſſible, then thoſe in whoſe ſtead the other is puniſhed, muſt be actually delivered upon the payment of that Debt which was owing to God.

1. That one man cannot deſerve anothers puniſhment, and therefore one cannot be puniſhed for another; for there is no juſt puniſhment, but what is deſerved. This being the main Argument inſiſted on by Crellius, muſt be more carefully conſidered; but before an anſwer be made to it, it is neceſſary that a clear account be given in what ſenſe it is he underſtands it, which will be beſt done, by laying down his principles, as to the juſtice of puniſhment, in a more diſtinct method than himſelf hath done; which are theſe following: 1. That no perſon can be juſtly puniſhed, either for his own or anothers faults, but he that hath deſerved to be puniſhed by ſome ſin of his own: For he ſtill aſſerts, “That the juſtice of puniſhment ariſeth from a mans own fault, though the actual puniſhment may be from anothers: But he that is puniſhed without reſpect to his own guilt, is puniſhed undeſervedly; and he that is puniſhed undeſervedly, is puniſhed unjuſtly. 2. That perſonal guilt being ſuppoſed one man's ſin may be the impulſive cauſe of another's puniſhment, but they cannot be the meritorious. The difference between them he thus explains, “The cauſe is that which makes a thing to be; the impulſive, that which moves one to do a thing, without any conſideration of right that one hath to do it: Merit, is that which makes a man worthy of a thing, either good or bad, and ſo gives a right to it; if it be good, to himſelf; if bad, to him at whoſe hands he hath deſerved it. Now he tells us, that it is impoſſible, “That one mans ſins ſhould make any other deſerve puniſhment, but the perſon who committed them; but they may impel one to puniſh another, and that juſtly, if the perſon hath otherwiſe deſerved to be puniſhed, unjuſtly, if he hath not. The reaſon he gives of it is, “That the vitioſity of the act, which is the proper cauſe of puniſhment, cannot go beyond the perſon of the offender; and therefore can oblige none to puniſhment, but him that hath committed the fault. And therefore he aſſerts, “That no man can be juſtly puniſhed beyond the deſert of his own ſins, but there may ſometimes be a double impulſive cauſe of that puniſhment; viz. His own and other mens, whereof one made that they might be juſtly puniſhed, the other that they ſhould be actually: But the latter, he ſaith, always ſuppoſeth the former, as the foundation of juſt puniſhment; ſo that no part of puniſhment could be executed upon him, wherein his own ſins were not ſuppoſed as the meritorious cauſe of it. Theſe are his two main principles which we muſt now throughly examine, the main force of his Book lying in them. But if we can prove that it hath been generally received by the conſent of mankind, that a perſon may be puniſhed beyond the deſert of his own actions; if God hath juſtly puniſhed ſome for the ſins of others, and there be no injuſtice in one mans ſuffering by his own conſent for another, then theſe principles of Crellius will be found not ſo firm as he imagines them.

own actions. For which purpoſe Grotius objected againſt Socinus (who appealed to the conſent of Nations, abaut one being puniſhed for anothers fault) “That the Heathens did agree, that Children might be puniſhed for their Parents faults, and People for their Princes, and that corporal puniſhment might be born by one for another, did appear by the Perſians puniſhing the whole family for the fault of one. The Macedonians the near kindred in the caſe of Treaſon; ſome Cities of Greece, deſtroying the Children of Tyrants together with them; in all which, the mere conjunction was ſuppoſed a ſufficient reaſon without conſent; but in caſe of conſent, he ſaith, They all agreed in the Juſtice of ſome being puniſhed for the faults of others. Thence the right of killing hoſtages among the moſt civilized nations; and of ſureties being puniſhed in capital matters, if the guilty appear not, who were thence called ἀντίψυχοι, who were bound to anſwer body for body. In which caſes, the puniſhment did extend beyond the deſert of the perſon who ſuffered it; for no other reaſon is aſſigned of theſe ſufferings, beſides the conjunction of the perſon, or his conſent; but no antecedent guilt is ſuppoſed as neceſſary, to make the puniſhment juſt. We are now to conſider what Crellius doth anſwer to this: 1. As to their acknowledgments of God's puniſhing Children for their Parents faults, he gives the ſame anſwer which he doth to the examples recorded in Scripture to that purpoſe, That either they were puniſhed for the ſins of others, but their own ſins deſerved the puniſhment; or that the Parents were puniſhed in the Children, but the Children were not properly puniſhed. 2. As to puniſhments among men, he anſwers two things; 1. That ſuch perſons were truly “puniſhed, but not juſtly: For he acknowledges, That in ſuch a caſe it is a proper puniſhment, and that it is enough in order to that, that any fault be charged upon a perſon, whether his own or anothers, whether true or falſe, on the account of which he is ſuppoſed worthy to be puniſhed: And that ſuch a conjunction is ſufficient for cruel, angry, or imprudent men: for where-ever there is a place, ſaith he, for anger, there is likewiſe for puniſhment. So that he confeſſeth, there may be a true puniſhment, and that which anſwers all the reaſon and ends of puniſhment aſſigned by him where there is no deſert at all of it in the perſon who undergoes it. But then he adds, that this is an unjuſt puniſhment, to which I reply, That then the reaſon of puniſhment aſſigned by Crellius before is inſufficient; for if this anſwers all the ends of puniſhments aſſigned by him, and yet be unjuſt, then it neceſſarily follows, that thoſe ends of puniſhment are conſiſtent with the greateſt injuſtice. For he before made puniſhment to have a natural reſpect to anger, and makes the ordinary end of puniſhment to be a ſatisfaction of the deſire of Revenge in men, yet now grants, that theſe may be in an unjuſt puniſhment. Neither can it be ſaid, that he conſidered puniſhment only naturally, and not morally; for he tells us, that this is the nature of divine puniſhments, which are therefore juſt, becauſe deſigned for theſe ends; but in caſe there be no ſuppoſal of a fault at all, then he denies that it is a puniſhment, but only an Affliction, and an exerciſe of dominion. So that according to him, where-ever there is a proper puniſhment, it muſt be juſt, when-ever God doth puniſh men: And the only difference between God and man ſuppoſable in this caſe is, that we have aſſurance God will never uſe his dominion unjuſtly; but that men do ſo when they make one to ſuffer for anothers nothers fault, notwithſtanding a conſent and conjunction between the man that committed the fault, and the perſon that ſuffers for him. But this is begging the thing in queſtion, for we are debating, whether it be an unlawful exerciſe of power or no? For we have this preſumption, that it is not unlawful, becauſe it may anſwer all the ends of puniſhments, and what way can we better judge, whether a puniſhment be juſt or no, than by that?

Objections anſwered.

V. But we are to conſider, that we do not here take the perſon we ſpeak of, abſtractly as an innocent perſon, for then there is no queſtion, but anger and puniſhment is of one as ſuch unjuſt; but of an innocent perſon as ſuppoſed under an obligation by his own conſent to ſuffer for another. And in this caſe we aſſert, ſince according to Crellius the natural and proper ends of puniſhments may be obtained, and the conſent of the perſon takes away the wrong done to him in the matter of his ſufferings, ſo far as he hath power over himſelf, that ſuch a puniſhment is not unjuſt. For if it be, it muſt ſuppoſe ſome injury to be done; but in this caſe let them aſſign where the injury lies; it cannot be to the publick, if the ends of puniſhments may be obtained by ſuch a ſuffering of one for another by a valid conſent of the ſuffering party, it cannot be to the perſon in whoſe room the other ſuffers, for what injury is that to eſcape puniſhment by anothers ſuffering; it cannot be to the ſuffering perſon, ſuppoſing that to be true, which the Heathens ſtill ſuppoſed, viz. that every man had a power over his own life. If it be ſaid ſtill, that the injuſtice lies in this; that ſuch a one ſuffers undeſervedly, and therefore unjuſtly. I anſwer; if be meant by undeſervedly without ſufficient cauſe or reaſon of puniſhment, then we deny that ſuch a one doth ſuffer undeſervedly. Immerito in the Greek Gloſſes is rendred by Ἀλόγως, and Merito by εἰκότως and εὐλόγως, and in Cicero, jure & merito, are moſt commonly joyned together. So that where there is a right to puniſh, and ſufficient reaſon for it, ſuch a one doth not ſuffer immerito, i. e. undeſervedly. If it be ſaid, that ſuch a one is not dignus pœna, that implies no more than the other, for dignus, or as the Ancients writ it dicnus, comes from the Greek δίκη jus, as Voſſius tells us, ut dignus ſit cui tribui aliquid æquum eſt: So that where there is an equity in the thing, there is a dignity in the perſon, or he may be ſaid to be worthy to undergo it. But doth not this lay open the greateſt innocency to as great a deſert of ſufferings, as the higheſt guilt? By no means. For we make a liableneſs to puniſhment, the natural conſequent of guilt: And he that hath committed a fault, cannot but deſerve to be puniſhed, ſo that no ſufferings of others can take away the natural conſequence of a bad action, which is a deſert of puniſhment: So that as we ſay, a wicked action cannot but deſerve to be puniſhed, i. e. there is an agreeableneſs, in reaſon and nature, that he who hath done ill, ſhould ſuffer ill; ſo we ſay likewiſe there is neceſſity in nature and reaſon, that he that hath thus deſerved it, muſt unavoidably ſuffer it. And on the other ſide, we ſay, no man by his innocency can deſerve to be puniſhed, i. e. no man's innocency makes him by virtue of that obnoxious to puniſhment; but yet we add, that notwithſtanding his innocency, the Circumſtances may be ſuch that he may be juſtly puniſhed, and in that ſenſe deſervedly. So that the Queſtion is ſtrangely miſtaken, when it is thus put, Whether an innocent perſon conſidered as ſuch, may be juſtly puniſhed; for no one aſſerts that, or is bound to do it; but the true queſtion is, whether a perſon notwithſtanding his innocency may not by ſome act of his own will will oblige himſelf to undergo that puniſhment which otherwiſe he did not deſerve? Which puniſhment, in that caſe is juſt and agreeable to reaſon. And this is that which we aſſert and plead for. So that innocency here is not conſidered any other ways, than whether that alone makes it an unlawful puniſhment, which otherwiſe would be lawful, i. e. whether the Magiſtrate in ſuch caſes, where ſubſtitution is admittable by the Laws of Nations (as in the caſes we are now upon) be bound to regard any more than that the obligation to puniſhment now lies upon the perſon who by his own act hath ſubſtituted himſelf in the others room; and if he proceeds upon this, his action is juſtifiable and agreeable to reaſon. If it be ſaid, that the ſubſtitution is unjuſt, unleſs the ſubſtituted perſon hath before-hand deſerved to be puniſhed; it is eaſily anſwered, that this makes not the matter at all clearer; for either the perſon is puniſhed for the former fault, and then there is no ſubſtitution; or if he be puniſhed by way of ſubſtitution; then there is no regard at all had to his former fault, and ſo it is all one as if he were perfectly innocent.

The inſtances of Scripture conſidered.

VI. And by this Crellius his anſwer to the inſtances both in Scripture and elſewhere concerning Childrens being puniſhed for their Parents faults, will appear to be inſufficient, viz. "That God doth never puniſh them for their Parents faults beyond the deſert of their own ſins, and therefore no argument can be drawn from thence, that God may puniſh an innocent perſon for the ſins of others, becauſe he hath puniſhed ſome for what they were innocent: For the force of the argument doth not lie in the ſuppoſition of their innocency, as to the ground of puniſhment in general, for we do not deny, but that they may deſerve to be puniſhed for their own faults: But the argument lies in this, whether their own guilt were then conſidered as the reaſon of puniſhment, when God did puniſh them for their fathers faults? And whether they by their own ſins did deſerve to be puniſhed not only with the puniſhment due to their own Miſcarriages, but with the puniſhment due to their fathers too? If not, then ſome perſons are juſtly puniſhed, who have not deſerved that puniſhment they undergo; if they did deſerve it, then one perſon may deſerve to be puniſhed for anothers ſins. If it be ſaid, as it is by Crellius, that his own ſins make him capable of puniſhment, and God by occaſion of others ſins doth execute that puniſhment, which he might not have done for his own. I anſwer, we are not enquiring into the bare Capacity of puniſhing, but into the reaſon of it: Was the reaſon of puniſhment his own or his Fathers ſins? If his own, then he was puniſhed only for his own ſins? If his Fathers, then the puniſhment may be juſt which is inflicted without conſideration of proper deſert of it; for no man (ſay they) can deſerve to be puniſhed, but for his own ſins. But it's ſaid, that the ſins of Fathers are only an impulſive cauſe for God to puniſh the Children according to the deſert of their own ſins which he might otherwiſe have forborn to puniſh. Then the ſins of the Fathers are no reaſon why the Children ſhould be puniſhed; but their own ſins are the reaſon, and their Fathers the bare occaſion of being puniſhed for them. But in Scripture, the reaſon of puniſhment is drawn from the Fathers ſins, and not from the Childrens: For then the words would have run thus, if the Children ſin, and deſerve puniſhment by their own iniquities, then I will take occaſion from their Fathers ſins, to viſit their own iniquities upon them: Whereas the words refer to the Fathers ſins as the reaſon of the Childrens puniſhment. So in the words of the Law, wherein the reaſon of puniſhment ought to be moſt expreſly aſſigned, it is not, I will certainly puniſh the Children, if they continue in the Idolatry of their Fathers; but, I will viſit the ſins of the Fathers upon the Children, unto the third and fourth Generation of them that hate me. If it were only becauſe of Imitation of the Fathers ſins by the Children, there could be no reaſon for the limitation to the third and fourth Generation; for then the reaſon of puniſhment would be as long as the Imitation continued, whether to the fourth or tenth Generation: And as Alphonſus à Caſtro obſerves, "If the reaſon of puniſhment were the Imitation "of their Fathers ſins, then the Children were not puniſhed for their "Fathers ſins, but for their own; for that Imitation was a ſin of their "own, and not of their Fathers. Beſides, if the proper reaſon of puniſhment were the ſins of the Children, and the Fathers ſins only the occaſion of it, then where it is mentioned that Children are puniſhed for their Parents ſins, the Childrens ſins ſhould have been particularly expreſſed, as the proper cauſe of the puniſhment: But no other reaſon is aſſigned in the Law, but the ſins of the Fathers, no other cauſe mentioned of Canaan's puniſhment, but his Father's ſin; nor of the puniſhment of the people in David's time, but his own ſin; Lo, I have ſinned, and I have done wickedly, but theſe ſheep, what have they done? Which is no hyperbolical Expreſſion, but the aſſigning the proper cauſe of that judgment to have been his own ſin, as the whole Chapter declares: Nor, of the hanging up of Saul*'s Sons by the Gibeonites*, but, that Saul their Father had plotted their deſtruction. And in an inſtance more remarkable than any of thoſe which Crellius anſwers; viz. the puniſhment of the people of Judah, for the ſins of Manaſſes in the time of Joſias; when a through Reformation was deſigned among them, the Prince being very good, and all the places of Idolatry deſtroyed, ſuch a Paſſover kept as had not been kept before in the time of any King in Iſrael, yet it then follows, Notwithſtanding the Lord turned not from the fierceneſs of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled againſt Judah, becauſe of all the provocations wherewith Manaſſes had provoked him withal. Who can ſay here, that the ſins of Manaſſeh were only the occaſion of God puniſhing the people in the time of Joſias for their own ſins, when their ſins were much leſs in the time of Joſias, than in any time mentioned before, after their lapſe into Idolatry? Nay, it is expreſly ſaid, That Joſiah took away all the abominations out of all the countries that pertained to the Children of Iſrael, and made all that were preſent in Iſrael to ſerve, even to ſerve the Lord their God. And all his days they parted not from following the Lord God of their Fathers: To ſay, that this was done in Hypocriſie, and bare outward compliance, is to ſpeak without Book; and if the reaſon of ſo ſevere puniſhments had been their Hypocriſie, that ought to have been mentioned; but not only here, but afterwards it is ſaid, that the reaſon of God's deſtroying Judah, was for the ſins of Manaſſeh; viz. his Idolatries and Murther, which it is ſaid, the Lord will not pardon. And if he would not pardon, then he did puniſh for thoſe ſins, not barely as the occaſion, but as the meritorious cauſe of that puniſhment. What ſhall we ſay then? Did the people in Joſiah's time, deſerve to be puniſhed for the ſins of Manaſſeh, Grandfather to Joſiah? Or was God ſo highly provoked with thoſe ſins, that although he did not puniſh Manaſſeh himſelf upon his Repentance, yet he would let the world ſee how much he abhorred them, them, by puniſhing thoſe ſins upon the people afterwards; although according to the uſual proportion of ſins and puniſhments, the ſins of the people in that age did not exceed the ſins of other ages, as much as the puniſhments they ſuffered, did exceed the puniſhments of other ages: which is neceſſary according to Crellius his Doctrine; for if God never puniſheth by occaſion of their Fathers ſins, the Children beyond the deſert of their own ſins; then it is neceſſary, that where judgments are remarkably greater, the ſins muſt be ſo too; the contrary to which is plain in this inſtance. VII. But hath not God declared, That he will never puniſh the Children for the Fathers ſins? For the ſoul that ſinneth it ſhall die; the Son ſhall not bear the iniquity of the Father, &c. To which I anſwer, Theſe words are to be conſidered, as an anſwer to a complaint made by the Jews, ſoon after their going into Captivity, which they imputed to God's ſeverity in puniſhing them for their Fathers ſins. Now the complaint was either true or falſe; if it were true, then though this was looked upon as great ſeverity in God, yet it was no injuſtice in him; for though God may act ſeverely, he cannot act unjuſtly: If it was falſe, then the anſwer had been an abſolute denial of it, as a thing repugnant to the Juſtice of God. Which we do not find here, but that God ſaith unto them, v. 3. Ye ſhall not have occaſion any more to uſe this Proverb in Iſrael: If the thing had been plainly unjuſt, which they complained of, he would have told them, they never had occaſion to uſe it. But we find the Prophets telling them before-hand, that they ſhould ſuffer for their Fathers ſins, Jer. 15. 3, 4. where he threatens them with deſtruction and baniſhment, becauſe of the ſins of Manaſſeh in Jeruſalem; and in the beginning of the captivity they complain of this, Lam. 5. 7. Our Fathers have ſinned, and are not, and we have born their iniquities. And Jer. 31. 28. God ſaith by the Prophet, that he had watched over them to pluck up, and to pull down, and to deſtroy, and to afflict: But that he would watch over them to build, and to plant, and in thoſe days they ſhall ſay no more, the Fathers have eaten ſowre grapes and the Childrens teeth are ſet on edge; but every one ſhall die for his own iniquity. Which place is exactly parallel with this in Ezekiel, and gives us a clear account of it, which is, that now indeed God had dealt very ſeverely with them, by making them ſuffer beyond what in the ordinary courſe of his providence their ſins had deſerved; but he puniſhed them not only for their own ſins, but the ſins of their Fathers: But leſt they ſhould think, they ſhould be utterly conſumed for their iniquities, and be no longer a people enjoying the Land which God had promiſed them, he tells them by the Prophets, though they had ſmarted ſo much, by reaſon of their Fathers ſins, this ſeverity ſhould not always continue upon them; but that God would viſit them with his kindneſs again, and would plant them in their own Land, then they ſhould ſee no reaſon to continue this Proverb among them, for they would then find, Though their Fathers had eaten ſowre grapes, their teeth ſhould not be always ſet on edge with it. And if we obſerve it, the occaſion of the Proverb, was concerning the Land of Iſrael, עלארעא דישראל ſupra terra Iſrael, as the Chaldee Paraphraſt renders it, more agreeable to the Hebrew, than the other Verſions do. So that the Land of Iſrael was the occaſion of the Proverb, by their being baniſhed out of it for their Fathers ſins. Now God tells them, they ſhould have no more occaſion to uſe this Proverb concerning the Land of Iſrael; for they, notwithſtanding their Fathers ſins, ſhould return into their own Land. And even during the continuance of their Captivity, they ſhould not undergo ſuch great ſeverities for the future, but they ſhould find their Condition much more tolerable than they imagined; only, if any were guilty of greater ſins than others, they ſhould themſelves ſuffer for their own faults, but he would not puniſh the whole Nation for them or their own Poſterity. This I take to be the genuine meaning of this place; and I the rather embrace it, becauſe I find ſuch inſuperable difficulties in other interpretations that are given of it. For to ſay as our Adverſaries do, That what God ſaith, ſhould not be for the future, was repugnant to his nature and juſtice now to do, is to charge God plainly with injuſtice in what he had done: For the Prophets told them they ſhould ſuffer for the ſins of their Fathers: Which ſufferings were the ground of their complaint now, and the anſwer here given muſt relate to the occaſion of the complaint; for God ſaith, They ſhould not have occaſion to uſe that Proverb: Wherein is implyed, they ſhould not have the ſame reaſon to complain which they had then. I demand then, Do not theſe words imply, that God would not do for the future with them, what he had done before; if not, the proper anſwer had been a plain denial, and not a promiſe for the future he would not; if they do, then either God properly puniſhed them for the ſins of their Fathers, and then God muſt be unjuſt in doing ſo, or it was juſt with God to do it, and ſo this place inſtead of overthrowing will prove, that ſome may be juſtly puniſhed, beyond the deſert of their own ſins: or elſe, God did only take occaſion by their Fathers ſins, to puniſh them according to the deſert of their own iniquities: But then they had no cauſe to complain, that they were puniſhed for any more than their own iniquities; and withal, then God doth oblige himſelf by his promiſe here, never to puniſh men for the future by the occaſion of others ſins: Which is not only contrary to their own Doctrine, but to what is plainly ſeen afterwards in the puniſhment of the Jews for their Fathers ſins, mentioned by our Saviour after this; and if this be a certain rule of equity which God here ſaith, that he would never vary from, then the puniſhing of ſome on the occaſion of others ſins, would be as unjuſt, as our Adverſaries ſuppoſe the puniſhing any beyond the deſert of their own ſins to be. But it is not implyed, that Gods ways would be unequal, if he ever did otherwiſe than he there ſaid he would do? No, it is not, if by equal he meant juſt, for his ways never were, or can ſo unequal; but here if it be taken with a reſpect to the main diſpute of the Chapter, no more is implied in them, but that they judged amiſs concerning God's Actions, and that they were juſt, when they thought them not to be ſo: or if at leaſt they thought his ways very ſevere, though juſt, God by remitting of this ſeverity, would ſhew that he was not only juſt, but kind; and ſo they would find his ways equal,

No, it is not, if by equal he meant juſt, for his ways never were, or can ſo unequal; but here if it be taken with a reſpect to the main diſpute of the Chapter, no more is implied in them, but that they judged amiſs concerning God's Actions, and that they were juſt, when they thought them not to be ſo: or if at leaſt they thought his ways very ſevere, though juſt, God by remitting of this ſeverity, would ſhew that he was not only juſt, but kind; and ſo they would find his ways equal, that is, always agreeable to themſelves, and ending in kindneſs to them, though they hitherto were ſo ſevere towards them in their baniſhment and Captivity. Or if they be taken with a reſpect to the immediate occaſion of them both, Ezek. 18.——33. They do not relate to this diſpute about Childrens ſuffering for their Fathers ſins; but to another, which was concerning a righteous mans ſinning and dying in his ſins, and a wicked mans repenting, and living in his righteouſneſs; which were directly contrary to the common opinion of the Jews to this day, which is, that God will judge men according to the greateſt number of their Actions good or bad: As appears by Maimonides and others. Now they thought it a very hard caſe, for a man who had been righteous the far greateſt part of his time, if he did at laſt commit iniquity, that his former righteouſneſs ſhould ſignifie nothing, but he muſt die in his iniquity. To this therefore God anſwers, that it was only the inequality of their own ways, which made them think God's ways in doing ſo unequal. This then doth not make it unequal, for God either to puniſh men, upon the occaſion, or by the deſert of other mens ſins, ſuppoſing ſuch a conjunction between them, as there is in the ſame body of people, to thoſe who went before them. And Crellius himſelf grants, "That Socinus never intended "to prove, that one mans ſuffering for anothers ſins was unjuſt in it "ſelf, from this place: No, not though we take it in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, "for one ſuffering in the ſtead of another.

Crell. c. 4. ſect. 15.

The deliverance of the guilty by the ſufferings of an innocent perſon by his own conſent, makes not the puniſhment unjuſt.

VIII. Having thus far declared, how far it is agreeable to God's Juſtice to puniſh any perſons either by reaſon of his dominion, or the conjunction of perſons, for the ſins of others, and conſequently whether any puniſhment may be undergone juſtly beyond the proper deſert of their own ſins, I now return to the conſent of Mankind in it, on ſuppoſition either of a near conjunction, or a valid conſent which muſt make up the want of dominion in men without it. And the queſtion ſtill proceeds upon the ſuppoſition of thoſe things, that there be a proper dominion in men over that which they part with for others ſakes, and that they do it by their free conſent; and then we juſtifie it not to be repugnant to the principles of Reaſon and Juſtice, for any to ſuffer beyond the deſert of their actions. And Crellius his ſaying, that ſuch a puniſhment is true puniſhment, but not juſt, is no anſwer at all to the conſent of Nations that it is ſo. And therefore finding this anſwer inſufficient; he relies upon another, viz. "That it was never "received by the conſent of Nations, that one man ſhould ſuffer in "the ſtead of another, ſo as the guilty ſhould be freed by the others "ſuffering. For, he ſaith, neither Socinus nor he do deny that one man "may be puniſhed for anothers ſins; but that which they deny is, "that ever the innocent were puniſhed ſo as the guilty were freed by "it; and ſo he anſwers, in the caſe of Hoſtages and Sureties, their puniſhment did never excuſe the offenders themſelves. And to this purpoſe he ſaith, Socinus his argument doth hold good, that though one "mans Money may become anothers, yet one mans ſufferings cannot "become anothers: For, ſaith he, if it could, then it would be all one "who ſuffered, as it is who pays the Money due: And then the offender muſt be preſently releaſed, as the Debtor is upon payment of "the Debt. This is the ſubſtance of what is ſaid by him upon this Argument. To which I reply; 1. That this gives up the matter in diſpute between us; for the preſent queſtion is, Whether it be unjuſt for any one to ſuffer beyond the deſert of his own actions? Yes, ſaith Crellius, it is, in caſe he ſuffers ſo, as that the guilty be freed by his ſufferings. But we are not enquiring, whether it be juſt for another perſon to be freed for a mans ſuffering for him? But whether it be juſt for that man to ſuffer by his own conſent, more than his own actions, without that conſent, deſerved? The releaſe of another perſon by virtue of his ſufferings, is a matter of another Conſideration. Doth the freeing or not freeing of another by ſuffering, add any thing to the deſerting of ſuffering? He that being wholly innocent, and doth ſuffer on the account of anothers fault, doth he not ſuffer as undeſervedly, though another be not freed, as if he were? As in the caſe of Hoſtages or Sureties, doth it make them at all the more guilty, becauſe the perſons they are concerned for, will be puniſhed notwithſtanding, if they come under the power of thoſe who exacted the puniſhment upon them, who ſuffered for them? Nay, is not their deſert of puniſhment ſo much the leſs, in as much as the guilty are ſtill bound to anſwer for their own offences? If we could ſuppoſe the guilty to be freed by the other ſufferings, it would be by ſuppoſing their guilt more fully tranſlated upon thoſe who ſuffer, and conſequently, a greater obligation to puniſhment following that guilt. From whence it follows, that if it be juſt to puniſh, when the perſon is not deliver'd from whom the others ſuffers, it is more juſt when he is; for the tranſlation of the penalty is much leſs in the former caſe, than in the latter; and what is juſt upon leſs grounds of puniſhment, muſt be more juſt upon greater. I look on this therefore but as a ſhift of Crellius, hoping thereby to avoid the conſent of mankind in one mans ſuffering for another, without attending to the main argument he was upon; viz. The juſtice of one perſon ſuffering for another. 2. It is a very unreaſonable thing, to make an action unjuſt for that, which of it ſelf is acknowledged by our Adverſaries to be very juſt; viz. The pardoning the Offenders themſelves. If it were juſt to ſuffer, if the other were not pardoned, and it were juſt to pardon, whether the other were puniſhed or no, how comes this ſuffering to be unjuſt, merely by the others being pardoned by it: Nay, is it not rather an argument, that thoſe ſufferings are the moſt juſt, which do ſo fully anſwer all the ends of puniſhments; that there is then no neceſſity that the offender ſhould ſuffer; but that the Supreme Governour having obtained the ends of Government, by the ſuffering of one for the reſt, declares himſelf ſo well pleaſed with it, that he is willing to pardon the Offenders themſelves. 3. Many of thoſe perſons who have had their ſins puniſhed in others, have themſelves eſcaped the puniſhment due to the deſert of their ſins: As is plain in the caſe of Ahab, whoſe puniſhment was not ſo great as his ſins deſerved, becauſe the full puniſhment of them was reſerved to his Poſterity. If it be ſaid, as it is by Crellius, That Ahab was not wholly freed, his life being taken away for his own ſins: That gives no ſufficient anſwer; for if ſome part of the puniſhment was deferred, that part he was delivered from; and the ſame reaſon in this caſe will hold for the whole as the part. As is plain in the caſe of Menaſſeh, and ſeveral others, the guilt of whoſe ſins were puniſhed on their Poſterity, themſelves eſcaping it. 4. Our Adverſaries confeſs, that in ſome caſes it is lawful and unjuſt for ſome to ſuffer, with a deſign that others may be freed by their ſuffering for them. Thus they aſſert, That one Chriſtian, not only may, but ought to lay down his life for another, if there be any any danger of his denying the truth, or he judges far more uſeful and con- Crell. cap. 6. ſect. 39. ſiderable than himſelf: So likewiſe a Son for his Father, one Brother for another, or a Friend, or any, whoſe life he thinks more uſeful than his own. Now I ask, whether a man can be bound to a thing that is in its own nature unjuſt? If not, as it is plain he cannot, then ſuch an obligation of one man to ſuffer for the delivery of another cannot be unjuſt, and conſequently the ſuffering it ſelf cannot be ſo. But Crellius ſaith, The injuſtice in this caſe lies wholly upon the Magiſtrate who admits it: But I ask, wherefore is it unjuſt in the Magiſtrate to admit it? It is becauſe the thing is in it ſelf unjuſt? If ſo, there can be no Obligation to do it; and it would be as great a ſin to undergo it, as in the Magiſtrate to permit it; but if it be juſt in it ſelf, we have obtained what we contend for, viz. That it may be juſt for a man to ſuffer beyond the deſert of his own actions; for he that lays down his life for his Brethren, doth not deſerve by his own actions that very puniſhment which he undergoes. And if the thing be in it ſelf juſt, how comes it to be unjuſt in him that permits it? 5. The reaſon why among men the offenders themſelves are puniſhed, is becauſe thoſe were not the terms, upon which the perſons ſuffered. For if they had ſuffered upon theſe terms that the other might be freed, and their ſuffering was admitted of by the Magiſtrate on that Conſideration, then in all reaſon and juſtice the offenders ought to be freed on the account of the others ſuffering for them. But among men the chief reaſon of the Obligation to puniſhment of one man for another, is not, that the other might be freed, but that there may be ſecurity given by the publick, that the offenders ſhall be puniſhed: and the reaſon of the Sureties ſuffering is not to deliver the offender, but to ſatisfie the Law, by declaring that all care is taken that the offender ſhould be puniſhed, when in caſe of eſcape, the Surety ſuffers for him. But it is quite another thing when the perſon ſuffers purpoſely that others might be freed by his ſuffering, for then in caſe the ſuffering be admitted, the releaſe of the other is not only, not unjuſt, but becomes due to him that ſuffered, on his own terms. Not as though it followed ipſo facto as Crellius fanſies, but the manner of releaſe doth depend upon the terms which he who ſuffered for them, ſhall make in order to it. For upon this ſuffering of one for another upon ſuch terms, the immediate conſequent of the ſuffering is not the actual diſcharge but the right to it which he hath purchaſed; and which he may diſpenſe upon what terms he ſhall judge moſt for his honour. 6. Although one perſons ſufferings cannot become anothers ſo as one mans Money may; yet one mans ſufferings may be a ſufficient Conſideration on which a benefit may accrue to another. For to that end a Donation, or ſuch a transferring right from one to another as is in Money, is not neceſſary, but the acceptation which it hath from him who hath the power to pardon. If he declare that he is ſo well pleaſed with the ſufferings of one for another, that in Conſideration of them, he will pardon thoſe from whom he ſuffered; where lies the im- Crell. ib. ſect. 28. poſſibility or unreaſonableneſs of the thing? For Crellius grants, that rewards may be given to others than the perſons who did the actions in Conſideration of thoſe Actions; and why may not the ſufferings of one for others, being purpoſely undertaken for this end, be avaliable for the pardon of thoſe whom he ſuffered for? For a man can no more transfer the right of his good Actions, than of his ſufferings. From all which it follows, that one perſon may by his own conſent, and being admitted thereto by him to whom the right of puniſhing belongs, ſuffer juſtly; though it be beyond the deſert of his own Actions; and the guilty may be pardoned on the account of his ſuffering. Which was the firſt thing we deſigned to prove from Crellius, in order to the overthrowing his own Hypotheſis. For it being confeſſed by him that ſuch ſufferings have all that belongs to the nature of puniſhments, and ſince God hath juſtly puniſhed ſome for the ſins which they have not committed; ſince all Nations have allowed it juſt for one man by his own conſent to ſuffer for another; ſince it cannot be unjuſt for the offender to be releaſed by anothers ſufferings, if he were admitted to ſuffer for that end, it evidently follows, contrary to Crellius his main principle, that a perſon may be juſtly puniſhed beyond the deſert of his own Actions: And ſo that firſt argument of Crellius cannot hold, that one man cannot by his own conſent ſuffer for another, becauſe no man can deſerve anothers puniſhment, and no puniſhment is juſt but what is deſerved. His ſecond argument from the nature of Anger and Revenge hath been already anſwered in the firſt Diſcourſe about the nature and ends of puniſhments, and his third argument, that one mans puniſhment cannot become anothers, immediately before. And ſo we have finiſhed our firſt Conſideration of the ſufferings of Chriſt in general, as a puniſhment of our ſins, which we have ſhewed to be agreeable both to Scripture and Reaſon.

The death of Chriſt conſidered as an Expiatory Sacrifice for ſin.

WE come now to conſider the Death of Chriſt, as an Expiatory Sacrifice for the ſins of Mankind: Which is as much denied by our Adverſaries, as that it was a puniſhment for our ſins. For though they do not deny, That Chriſt as a Prieſt did offer up a Sacrifice of Expiation for the ſins of men; yet they utterly deny, that this was performed on Earth, or that the Expiation of ſins did reſpect God, but only us; or, that the death of Chriſt, had any proper Efficacy towards the Expiation of ſin, any further than as it com-

any danger of his denying the truth, or he judges far more uſeful and conſiderable than himſelf: So likewiſe a Son for his Father, one Brother for another, or a Friend, or any whoſe life he thinks more uſeful than his own. Crell. cap. 6. ſect. 39. Now I ask, whether a man can be bound to a thing that is in its own nature unjuſt? If not, as it is plain he cannot, then ſuch an obligation of one man to ſuffer for the delivery of another cannot be unjuſt, and conſequently the ſuffering it ſelf cannot be ſo. But Crellius ſaith, The injuſtice in this caſe lies wholly upon the Magiſtrate who admits it: But I ask, wherefore is it unjuſt in the Magiſtrate to admit it? It is becauſe the thing is in it ſelf unjuſt? If ſo, there can be no Obligation to do it; and it would be as great a ſin to undergo it, as for the Magiſtrate to permit it; but if it be juſt in it ſelf, we have obtained what we contend for, viz. That it may be juſt for a man to ſuffer beyond the deſert of his own actions; for he that lays down his life for his Brethren, doth not deſerve by his own actions that very puniſhment which he undergoes. And if the thing be in it ſelf juſt, how comes it to be unjuſt in him that permits it? 5. The reaſon why among men the offenders themſelves are puniſhed, is becauſe thoſe were not the terms, upon which the perſons ſuffered. For if they had ſuffered upon theſe terms that the other might be freed, and their ſuffering was admitted of by the Magiſtrate on that Conſideration, then in all reaſon and juſtice the offenders ought to be freed on the account of the others ſuffering for them. But among men the chief reaſon of the Obligation to puniſhment of one man for another, is not, that the other might be freed, but that there may be ſecurity given by the publick, that the offenders ſhall be puniſhed: and the reaſon of the Sureties ſuffering is not to deliver the offender, but to ſatisfie the Law, by declaring that all care is taken that the offender ſhould be puniſhed, when in caſe of eſcape, the Surety ſuffers for him. But it is quite another thing when the perſon ſuffers purpoſely that others might be freed by his ſuffering, for then in caſe the ſuffering be admitted, the releaſe of the other is not only, not unjuſt, but becomes due to him that ſuffered, on his own terms. Not as though it followed ipſo facto as Crellius fanſies, but the manner of releaſe doth depend upon the terms which he who ſuffered for them, ſhall make in order to it. For upon this ſuffering of one for another upon ſuch terms, the immediate conſequent of the ſuffering is not the actual diſcharge but the right to it which he hath purchaſed; and which he may diſpenſe upon what terms he ſhall judge moſt for his honour. 6. Although one perſons ſufferings cannot become anothers ſo as one mans Money may; yet one mans ſufferings may be a ſufficient Conſideration on which a benefit may accrue to another. For to that end a Donation, or ſuch a transferring right from one to another as is in Money, is not neceſſary, but the acceptation which it hath from him who hath the power to pardon. If he declare that he is ſo well pleaſed with the ſufferings of one for another, that in Conſideration of them, he will pardon thoſe from whom he ſuffered; where lies the impoſſibility or unreaſonableneſs of the thing? Crell. ib. ſect. 28. For Crellius grants, that rewards may be given to others than the perſons who did the actions in Conſideration of thoſe Actions; and why may not the ſufferings of one for others, being purpoſely undertaken for this end, be avaliable for the pardon of thoſe whom he ſuffered for? For a man can no more transfer the right of his good Actions, than of his ſufferings. From all which it follows, that one perſon may by his own conſent, and being admitted thereto by him to whom the right of puniſhing belongs, ſuffer juſtly; though it be beyond the deſert of his own Actions; and the guilty may be pardoned on the account of his ſuffering. Which was the firſt thing we deſigned to prove from Crellius, in order to the overthrowing his own Hypotheſis. For it being confeſſed by him that ſuch ſufferings have all that belongs to the nature of puniſhments, and ſince God hath juſtly puniſhed ſome for the ſins which they have not committed; ſince all Nations have allowed it juſt for one man by his own conſent to ſuffer for another; ſince it cannot be unjuſt for the offender to be releaſed by anothers ſufferings, if he were admitted to ſuffer for that end, it evidently follows, contrary to Crellius his main principle, that a perſon may be juſtly puniſhed beyond the deſert of his own Actions: And ſo that firſt argument of Crellius cannot hold, that one man cannot by his own conſent ſuffer for another, becauſe no man can deſerve anothers puniſhment, and no puniſhment is juſt but what is deſerved. His ſecond argument from the nature of Anger and Revenge hath been already anſwered in the firſt Diſcourſe about the nature and ends of puniſhments, and his third argument, that one mans puniſhment cannot become anothers, immmediately before. And ſo we have finiſhed our firſt Conſideration of the ſufferings of Chriſt in general, as a puniſhment of our ſins, which we have ſhewed to be agreeable both to Scripture and Reaſon.

The death of Chriſt conſidered as an Expiatory Sacrifice for ſin.

WE come now to conſider the Death of Chriſt, as an Expiatory Sacrifice for the ſins of Mankind: Which is as much denied by our Adverſaries, as that it was a puniſhment for our ſins. For though they do not deny, That Chriſt as a Prieſt did offer up a Sacrifice of Expiation for the ſins of men; yet they utterly deny, that this was performed on Earth, or that the Expiation of ſins did reſpect God, but only us; or, that the death of Chriſt, had any proper Efficacy towards the Expiation of ſin, any further than as it com- comprehends in it all the conſequences of his death, by a ſtrange Catechreſis. I ſhall now therefore prove, that all things which do belong to a proper Expiatory Sacrifice, do agree to the death of Chriſt. There are three things eſpecially conſiderable in it: 1. A Subſtitution in the place of the Offenders. 2. An Oblation of it to God. 3. An Expiation of ſin conſequent upon it. Now theſe three, I ſhall make appear to agree fully to the Death of Chriſt for us.

I. A Subſtitution in the place of the offenders. That we are to prove was deſigned in the Expiatory Sacrifices under the Law, and that Chriſt in his death for us, was ſubſtituted in our place. 1. That in the Expiatory Sacrifices under the Law, there was a Subſtitution of them in the place of the Offenders. This our Adverſaries are not willing to yield us, becauſe of the correſpondency which is ſo plain in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, between thoſe Sacrifices, and that which was offered up by Chriſt. We now ſpeak only of thoſe Sacrifices, which we are ſure were appointed of old for the Expiation of ſin, by God himſelf. As to which the great Rule aſſigned by the Apoſtle was, That without ſhedding of Blood there was no Remiſſion. If we yield Crellius what he ſo often urgeth, viz. That theſe words are to be underſtood, of what was done under the Law; they will not be the leſs ſerviceable to our purpoſe; for thereby it will appear, that the means of Expiation lay in the ſhedding of Blood: Which ſhews, that the very Mactation of the beaſt to be ſacrificed, was deſigned in order to the Expiation of ſin. To an inquiſitive perſon, the reaſon of the ſlaying ſuch multitudes of beaſts in the Sacrifices appointed by God himſelf among the Jews, would have appeared far leſs evident than now it doth, ſince the Author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews hath given us ſo full an account of them. For it had been very unreaſonable to have thought, that they had been merely inſtituted out of compliance with the Cuſtoms of other Nations, ſince the whole deſign of their Religion, was to ſeparate them from them: And on ſuch a Suppoſition the great deſign of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews ſignifies very little; which doth far more explain to us the nature and tendency of all the Sacrifices in uſe among them, that hath any reſpect to the Expiation of ſins, than all the Cuſtoms of the Egyptians, or the Commentaries of the later Jews. But I intend not now to diſcourſe at large upon this Subjuct of Sacrifices, either as to the Nature and Inſtitution of them in general, or with a particular reſpect to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, ſince a learned perſon of our Church, hath already undertaken this Crellius upon Argument, and we hope e'er long will oblige the World with the benefit of his Pains. I ſhall therefore only inſiſt on thoſe things which are neceſſary for our purpoſe, in order to the clearing the Subſtitution of Chriſt in our ſtead, for the Expiation of our ſins by his death; and this we ſay was repreſented in the Expiatory Sacrifices, which were inſtituted among the Jews. If we yield Crellius what he after Socinus contends for; viz. That the Sacrifice of Chriſt was only repreſented in the publick and ſolemn Expiatory Sacrifices for the people, and eſpecially thoſe on the day of Atonement; We may have enough from them to vindicate all that we aſſert, concerning the Expiatory Sacrifice of the Blood of Chriſt.

What the Expiation of ſin was by the Sacrifices under the Law.

II. For that thoſe were deſigned by way of Subſtitution in the place of the Offenders, will appear from the Circumſtances and Reaſon of their Inſtitution: But before we come to that, it will be neceſſary to ſhew what that Expiation was, which the Sacrifices under the Law were deſigned for; the not underſtanding of which, gives a greater force to our Adverſaries Arguments, than otherwiſe they would have. For while men aſſert, that the Expiation was wholly typical, and of the ſame Nature with that Expiation which is really obtained by the death of Chriſt, they eaſily prove, That all the Expiation then, was only declarative, and did no more depend on the Sacrifices offered, than on a Condition required by God, the neglect of which would be an act of diſobedience in them; and by this means it could repreſent, ſay they, no more than ſuch an Expiation to be by Chriſt; viz. God's declaring that ſins are expiated by him, on the performance of ſuch a Condition required in order thereto, as laying down his life was. But we aſſert another kind of Expiation of ſin, by virtue of the Sacrifice being ſlain and offered; which was real, and depended upon the Sacrifice: And this was twofold a Civil, and a Ritual Expiation, according to the double Capacity in which the people of the Jews may be conſidered, either as members of a Society, ſubſiſting by a body of Laws, which according to the ſtricteſt Sanction of it, makes death the penalty of diſobedience, Deut. 27. 26. but by the will of the Legiſlator, did admit of a Relaxation in many Caſes, allowed by himſelf; in which he declares, That the death of the Beaſt deſigned for a Sacrifice ſhould be accepted, inſtead of the death of the offender; and ſo the offence ſhould be fully expiated, as to the Execution of the penal Law upon him. And thus far, I freely admit what Grotius aſſerts upon this Subject, and do yield that no other offence could be expiated in this manner, but ſuch which God himſelf did particularly declare ſhould be ſo. And therefore no ſin which was to be puniſhed by cutting off, was to be expiated by Sacrifice; as wilful Idolatry, Murther, &c. Which it is impoſſible for thoſe to give an account of, who make the Expiation wholly Typical; for why then ſhould not the greateſt ſins much rather have had Sacrifices of Expiation appointed for them: Becauſe the Conſciences of men would be more ſolicitous for the pardon of greater than leſſer ſins; and the Blood of Chriſt repreſented by them, was deſigned for the Expiation of all. From whence it is evident, that it was not a meer Typical Expiation; but it did relate to the Civil Conſtitution among them. But beſides this, we are to conſider the people with a reſpect to that Mode of Divine Worſhip which was among them; by reaſon of which, the people were to be purified from the legal Impurities which they contracted, which hindred them from joining with others in the publick Worſhip of God, and many Sacrifices were appointed purpoſely for the expiating this legal Guilt, as particularly, the aſhes of the red heifer, Numb. 19. 9. which is there called a purification for ſin. And the Apoſtle puts the Blood of Bulls and of Goats, and the aſhes of the heifer ſprinkling the unclean, together; and the effect of both of them, he ſaith, was to ſanctifie to the purifying of the Fleſh; which implies, that there was ſome proper and immediate effect of theſe Sacrifices upon the people at that time, though infinitely ſhort of the effect of the Blood of Chriſt upon the Conſciences of men. By which it is plain, the Apoſtle doth not ſpeak of the ſame kind of Expiation in thoſe Sacrifices, which was in the Sacrifice of Chriſt, and that the one was barely typical of the other; but of a different kind of Expiation, as far as purifying the fleſh is from purging the Conſcience. But we do not deny, that the whole diſpenſation was typical, and that the Law had a ſhadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, i. e. a dark and

and obſcure Repreſentation, and not the perfect Reſemblance of them. There are two things which the Apoſtle aſſerts concerning the Sacrifices of the Law: Firſt, that they had an effect upon the Bodies of men, which he calls purifying the fleſh; the other is, that they had no power to expiate for the Sins of the Soul, conſidered with a reſpect to the puniſhment of another Life, which he calls purging the Conſcience from dead works; and therefore he ſaith, that all the Gifts and Sacrifices under the Law, could not make him that did the ſervice perfect, as pertaining to the Conſcience, and that it was impoſſible that the Blood of Bulls and Goats ſhould take away ſin. So that the proper Expiation which was made by them, was Civil and Ritual, relating either to corporal puniſhment, or to legal uncleanneſs, from whence the Apoſtle well proves the neceſſity of a higher Sacrifice to make Expiation for Sins, as pertaining to the Conſcience: But that Expiation among the Jews did relate to that Polity which was eſtabliſhed among them, as they were a people under the Government of a body of Laws diſtinct from the reſt of the World. And they being conſidered as ſuch, it is vain to enquire, whether they had only Temporal or Eternal Promiſes; for it was impoſſible they ſhould have any other than Temporal, unleſs we imagine, that God would own them for a diſtinct People in another World as he did in this. For what Promiſes relate to a People as ſuch, muſt conſider them as a People, and in that Capacity they muſt be the Bleſſings of a Society, viz. Peace, Plenty, number of People, Length of Days, &c. But we are far from denying that the general Principles of Religion did remain among them, viz. that there is a God, and a rewarder of them that ſeek him; and all the Promiſes God made to the Patriarchs, did continue in force as to another Country, and were continually improved by the Prophetical Inſtructions among them. But we are now ſpeaking of what did reſpect the people in general, by virtue of that Law which was given them by Moſes, and in that reſpect the puniſhment of faults being either Death or Excluſion from the publick Worſhip, the Expiation of them, was taking away the Obligation of either of theſe, which was the guilt of them in that Conſideration.

Heb. 9. 9. 10. 4.

But doth not this take away the typical nature of theſe Sacrifices? No, but it much rather eſtabliſheth it. For as Socinus argues, “If the Expiation was only Typical, there muſt be ſomething in the type Correſpondent to that which is typified by it. As the Brazen Serpent typified Chriſt, and the benefit which was to come by him, becauſe as many as looked up to it were healed. And Noah's Ark is ſaid to be a type of Baptiſm, becauſe as many as entred into that were ſaved from the deluge. So Corinth. 10. the Apoſtle ſaith, that thoſe things happened to them in Types, v. 11. becauſe the Events which happened to them, did repreſent thoſe which would have fall upon diſobedient Chriſtians. So that to make good the true notion of a Type, we muſt aſſert an Expiation that was real then, and agreeable to that diſpenſation, which doth repreſent an Expiation of a far higher Nature, which was to be by the Sacrifice of the Blood of Chriſt.

A ſubſtitution proved from Lev. 17. 11, &c.

III. Which being premiſed, I come to prove, that there was a Subſtitution deſigned of the Beaſt to be ſlain and ſacrificed inſtead of the Offenders themſelves. Which will appear from Levit. 17. 11. For the life of the fleſh is in the Blood, and I have given it you upon the Altar, to make an Atonement for your Souls; for it is the Blood that maketh an Atonement for the Soul. The utmoſt that Crellius would have meant by Crell. c. 10. ſect. 9. this place is, that there is a double reaſon aſſigned of the Prohibition of eating Blood, viz. that the Life was in the Blood, and that the Blood was deſigned for Expiation; but he makes theſe wholly independent upon each other. But we ſay, that the proper reaſon aſſigned againſt the eating of the Blood, is that which is elſewhere given, when this precept is mentioned, viz. that the Blood was the Life, as we may ſee Gen. 9. 4. Lev. 17. 14. but to confirm the Reaſon given, that the Blood was the Life; he adds, that God had given them that upon the Altar for an Atonement for their Souls: So the Arabick Verſion renders it, and therefore have I given it you upon the Altar, viz. becauſe the Blood is the life. And hereby a ſufficient reaſon is given, why God did make choice of Blood for Atonement, for that is expreſſed in the latter Clauſe, for it is the Blood that maketh an Atonement for the Soul; why ſhould this be mentioned here, if no more were intended but to give barely another Reaſon why they ſhould not eat the Blood? What force is there more in this Clauſe to that end, than in the foregoing? For therein God had ſaid, that he had given it them for an Atonement. If no more had been intended, but the bare Prohibition of common uſe of the Blood, on the account of its being Conſecrated to ſacred uſe, it had been enough to have ſaid, that the Blood was holy unto the Lord, as it is in the other inſtances mentioned by Crellius, of the holy Ointment and Perfume, Exod. 30. 32, 33. 37, 38. for no other reaſon is there given, why it ſhould not be profaned to common uſe, but that it ſhould be holy for the Lord; if therefore the Blood had been forbidden upon that account, there had been no neceſſity at all of adding, that the Blood was it that made Atonement for the Soul: Which gives no peculiar Reaſon why they ſhould not eat the Blood, beyond that of bare Conſecration of it to a ſacred uſe; but if we conſider it as reſpecting the firſt Clauſe, viz. For the Life of the fleſh is in the blood, then there is a particular reaſon why the Blood ſhould be for Atonement, viz. Becauſe the Life was in that; and therefore when the Blood was offered, the Life of the Beaſt was ſuppoſed to be given inſtead of the Life of the Offender. According to that of Ovid, Hanc animam vobis pro meliore damus. Ovid. Faſt. l. 6. This will be yet made clearer by another inſtance produced by Crellius to explain this, which is the forbidding the eating of Fat; which ſaith he, is joyned with this of Blood, Levit. 3. 17. It ſhall be a perpetual Statute for your Generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither Fat nor Blood. To the ſame purpoſe, Levit. 7. 23, 25, 26. Now no other reaſon is given of the Prohibition of the Fat, but this, All the Fat is the Lords. Lev. 3. 16. Which was enough to keep them from eating it. But we ſee here in the Caſe of Blood ſomewhat further is aſſigned, viz. that it was the life; and therefore was moſt proper for Expiation, the Life of the Beaſt being ſubſtituted in the place of the Offenders. Which was therefore called animalis hoſtia among the Romans, as Grotius obſerves upon this place, and was diſtinguiſhed from thoſe whoſe entrails were obſerved; for in thoſe Sacrifices as Servius ſaith, ſola anima Deo ſacratur, Servius ad Æneid. 4. the main of the Sacrifice lay in ſhedding of the Blood, which was called the Soul; and ſo it is נפש in this place. From whence it appears that ſuch a Sacrifice was properly ψυχὴ ἀντὶ ψυχῆς, for the ſame word נפש is uſed, both relating to the Blood and the Soul, that is expiated by it: And the LXX do accordingly render it, ψυχὴ πάσης σαρκὸς αἷμα αὐτοῦ ἐστι, and in the laſt Clauſe, τὸ γὰρ αἷμα αὐτοῦ ἀντὶ ψυχῆς ἐξιλάσεται. From whence Euſebius calls theſe Sacrifices of living Creatures, ἀντίψυχα τῆς αὐτῶν ψυχῆς, and afterwards ſaith they were λύτρα τῆς ἑαυτῶν ζωῆς καὶ ἀντίψυχα τῆς οἰκείας φύσεως. And Crellius elſewhere grants, that where ἀντὶ is joyned with ψυχὴ, it doth imply, that one doth undergo the Puniſhment which another was to have undergone, which is all we mean by Subſtitution, it being done in the place of another. From whence it follows, that the Sacrifices under the Law being ſaid to be ἀντὶ ψυχῆς, doth neceſſarily infer a Subſtitution of them in the place of the Offenders. And from hence may be underſtood, what is meant by the Goat of the Sin offering, bearing the iniquity of the Congregation, to make Atonement for them before the Lord, Levit. 10. 17. for Crellius his ſaying, That bearing is as much as taking away, or declaring that they are taken away, hath been already diſproved: And his other anſwer hath as little weight in it; viz. That it is not ſaid, that the Sacrifice did bear their Iniquities, but the Prieſt: For, 1. The Chaldee Paraphraſt, and the Syriack Verſion, underſtand it wholly of the Sacrifice. 2. Socinus himſelf grants, That if it were ſaid, the Prieſt did expiate by the Sacrifices, it were all one as if it were ſaid, that the Sacrifices themſelves did expiate; becauſe the Expiation of the Prieſt was by the Sacrifice. Thus it is plain in the caſe of uncertain Murther, mentioned Deut. 21. from the firſt to the tenth; If a Murther were committed in the Land, and the perſon not known who did it, a Heifer was to have her head cut off by the Elders of the next City; and by this means they were to put away the guilt of the innocent Blood from among them: The Reaſon of which was, becauſe God had ſaid before, That Blood defiled the Land, and the Land cannot be cleanſed of the Blood that is ſhed therein, but by the Blood of him that ſhed it. From whence it appears, that upon the ſhedding of Blood, there was a guilt contracted upon the whole Land wherein it was ſhed, and in caſe the Murtherer was not found to expiate that guilt by his own Blood, then it was to be done by the cutting off the head of a Heifer inſtead of him: In which caſe, the death of the Heifer was to do as much towards the expiating the Land, as the Death of the Murtherer if he had been found: And we do not contend, that this was deſigned to expiate the Murtherers guilt (which is the Objection of Crellius againſt this inſtance) but that a Subſtitution here was appointed by God himſelf, for the Expiation of the People: For what Crellius adds, That the People did not deſerve Puniſhment, and therefore needed no Expiation; it is a flat Contradiction to the Text: For the Prayer appointed in that caſe is, Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy People Iſrael, whom thou haſt Redeemed, and lay not innocent Blood unto thy People Iſrael's Charge, and the Blood ſhall be expiated: For the ſame word כפר is uſed here, which is in the other places where Expiation is ſpoken of. So that here muſt be ſome guilt ſuppoſed, where there was to be an Expiation, and this Expiation was performed by the Subſtitution of a Sacrifice in the place of the Offender. Which may be enough at preſent to ſhew, that a Subſtitution was admitted by the Law, of a Sacrifice inſtead of the Offender, in order to the Expiation of guilt; but whether the Offender himſelf was to be freed by that Sacrifice; depends upon the Terms on which the Sacrifice was offered; for we ſay ſtill, that ſo much guilt was expiated, as the Sacrifice was deſigned to expiate; if the Sacrifice was deſigned to expiate the guilt of the Offender, his ſin was expiated by it; if not his,

in caſe no Sacrifice was allowed by the Law, as in that of Murther, then the guilt which lay upon the Land was expiated, although the Offender himſelf were never diſcovered.

IV. I now come to prove, that in Correſpondency to ſuch a Subſtitution of the Sacrifices for Sin under the Law, Chriſt was ſubſtituted in our room for the Expiation of our guilt; and that from his being ſaid to die for us, and his death being called a Price of Redemption for us.

A ſubſtitution of Chriſt in our room proved by his dying for us.

1. From Chriſt's being ſaid to die for us. By St. Peter, For Chriſt hath alſo once ſuffered for ſins, the juſt for the unjuſt; by whom he is alſo ſaid, to ſuffer ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, for us, and for us in the fleſh: By St. Paul, he is ſaid to die, ὑπὲρ πάντων, for all, and ὑπὲρ ἀσεβῶν, for the ungodly, and to give himſelf ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, a Ranſom for all, and, to taſt Death ὑπὲρ παντὸς, for every Man: By Caiphas, ſpeaking by inſpiration, he is ſaid to die ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ, for the People. So Chriſt himſelf inſtituting his laſt Supper, ſaid, This is my Body which was given, and my Blood which was ſhed ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, for you; and before he had ſaid, That the Son of Man came to give his Life λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ranſom for many. We are now to conſider, what Arts our Adverſaries have made uſe of to pervert the meaning of theſe places, ſo as not to imply a Subſtitution of Chriſt in our room: 1. They ſay, That all theſe phraſes do imply no more than a final Cauſe; viz. That Chriſt died for the good of Mankind; for the Apoſtle tells us, We are bound to lay down our Lives for the Brethren, and St. Paul is ſaid to ſuffer for the Church. To which I anſwer; 1. This doth not at all deſtroy that which we now plead for, viz. That theſe Phraſes do imply a Subſtitution of Chriſt in our room: For when we are bid to lay down our Lives for our Brethren, a Subſtitution is implied therein; and ſuppoſing that dying for another, doth ſignifie dying for ſome benefit to come to him, yet what doth this hinder Subſtitution, unleſs it be proved, that one cannot obtain any benefit for another, by being ſubſtituted in his room. Nay, it is obſervable, that although we produce ſo many places of Scripture, implying ſuch a Subſtitution, they do not offer to produce one that is inconſiſtent with Chriſt's Suffering in our ſtead; all that they ſay is, That ὑπὲρ doth not always ſignifie ſo, which we never ſaid it did, who ſay, that Chriſt ſuffered ὑπὲρ ἁμαρτιῶν, not inſtead of our ſins, but by reaſon of them; but we aſſert, that when one perſon is ſaid to die for others, as in the places mentioned, no other ſenſe can be ſo proper and agreeable, as dying in the ſtead of the other. 2. Socinus himſelf grants, "That there is a peculiarity implied in thoſe Phraſes, when attributed "to Chriſt, above what they have when attributed to any other. And "therefore, he ſaith, it cannot be properly ſaid, That one Brother dies "for another, or that Paul ſuffered for the Coloſſians, or for the "Church, as Chriſt may truly and properly be ſaid to ſuffer and to die "for us. And from hence, ſaith he, St. Paul ſaith, was Paul Crucified "for you? Implying thereby, that there never was or could be any, "who truly and properly could be ſaid to die for Men, but Chriſt a- "lone. How unreaſonable then is it, from the uſe of a Particle as applied to others, to infer, that it ought to be ſo underſtood, when applied to Chriſt? when a peculiarity is acknowledged in the Death of Chriſt for us, more than ever was or could be in one mans dying for another. 3. It is not the bare force of the Particle ὑπὲρ that we inſiſt upon; but that a Subſtitution could not be more properly expreſſed, than it it is in Scripture, by this and other Particles, for not only ὑπὲρ is uſed, Socin. ib. but ἀντὶ too: which Socinus ſaith, although it may ſignifie ſomething elſe beſides in the ſtead of another, yet in ſuch places, where it is ſpoken of a Ranſom or Price, it ſignifies the payment of ſomething which was owing before, as Matt. 17. 27. ἀντὶ ἐμȣ̃ ϗ σȣ̃, and ſo he acknowledges, that where Redemption is ſpoken of, there ἀντὶ doth imply a Commutation, becauſe the Price is given, and the Perſon received, which, he ſaith, holds in Chriſt only Metaphorically: For the Redemption according to him being only Metaphorical, the commutation muſt be ſuppoſed to be ſo too.

In what ſenſe a ſurrogation of Chriſt in our room is aſſerted by us.

V. And this now leads us to the larger Anſwer of Crellius upon this argument. Wherein we ſhall conſider, what he yields, what he denies, and upon what reaſons. 1. He yields, and ſo he ſaith doth Socinus, very freely a commutation; but it is neceſſary that we ſhould throughly underſtand what he means by it: To that end he tells us, That they Crell. c. 9. ſect. 3. ib. ſect. 2. acknowledge a twofold commutation; one of the perſons ſuffering, the kind of ſuffering being changed, not actually but intentionally, becauſe we are not actually freed by Chriſt dying for us, but only Chriſt died for that end, that we might be freed. And this commutation, he ſaith, that Socinus doth not deny to be implied in the Particle ὑπὲρ, in the places where Chriſt is ſaid to die for us. Another commutation, which he acknowledges, is, that which is between a Price, and the thing or perſon which is bought or redeemed by it; where the price is paid, and the thing or perſon is received upon it. And this kind of commutation, he ſaith, is to be underſtood in the places where ἀντὶ is mentioned; which price, he ſaith, by accident may be a perſon; and becauſe the perſon is not preſently delivered, he Ib. ſect. 6. therefore ſaith, that the commutation is rather imperfect than Metaphorical; and although, he ſaith, ἀντὶ doth not of it ſelf imply a commutation, yet he grants, that the Circumſtances of the places do imply it. 2. He Ib. ſect. 7. denies, that there is any proper Surrogation in Chriſt's dying for us, which, he ſaith, is ſuch a commutation of perſons, that the ſubſtituted perſon is in all Reſpects to be in the ſame place and ſtate wherein the other was; and if it refers to ſufferings, then it is when one ſuffers the very ſame which the other was to ſuffer, he being immediately delivered by the others ſufferings. And againſt this kind of Surrogation, Crellius needed not to have produced any Reaſons; for Grotius never aſſerted it; neither do we ſay, that Chriſt ſuffered eternal death for us, or that we were immediately freed by his ſufferings. But that which Grotius aſſerts, that he meant by Subſtitution was this, that unleſs Chriſt had died for us, we muſt have died for our ſelves, and becauſe Chriſt hath died, we ſhall not die eternal- Ib. ſect. 3. ly. But if this be all, ſaith Crellius, he meant by it, we grant the whole thing, and he complains of it as an injury for any to think otherwiſe of them. If ſo, they cannot deny but that there was a ſufficient Capacity in the Death of Chriſt to be made an expiatory Sacrifice for the ſins of the World. But notwithſtanding all theſe fair words, Crellius means no more than Socinus did; and though he would allow the words which Grotius uſed, yet not in the ſenſe he underſtood them in; for Crellius means no more by all this, but that the Death of Chriſt was an antecedent Condition to the Expiation of ſins in Heaven, Grotius underſtands by them, that Chriſt did expiate ſins by becoming a Sacrifice for them in his Death. However, from hence it appears, that our Adverſaries can have no plea againſt the Death of Chriſt's being an expiatory Sacrifice (from want of Subſtitution in our room) ſince they profeſs themſelves ſo willing to own ſuch a Subſtitution. But if they ſay, that there could be no proper Subſtitution, becauſe the Death of Chriſt was a bare Condition, and no Puniſhment, they then expreſs their minds more freely; and if theſe places be allowed to prove a Subſtitution, I hope the former diſcourſe will prove that it was by way of Puniſhment. Neither is it neceſſary, that the very ſame kind of Puniſhment be undergone in order to Surrogation, but that it be ſufficient in order to the accompliſhing the end for which it was deſigned. For this kind of Subſtitution being in order to the delivery of another by it, whatever is ſufficient for that end, doth make a proper Surrogation. For no more is neceſſary to the delivery of another perſon than the ſatisfying the ends of the Law and Government, and if that may be done by an equivalent ſuffering, though not the ſame in all Reſpects, then it may be a proper Surrogation. If David had obtained his wiſh, that he had died for his Son Abſolom, it had not been neceſſary in order to his Son's eſcape, that he had hanged by the hair of his head, as his Son did; but his Death, though in other Circumſtances, had been ſufficient. And therefore when the Lawyers ſay, ſubrogatum, ſapit naturam ejus in cujus locum ſubrogatur: Covarruvias tells us, it is to be underſtood, ſecundum primordialem naturam non ſecundum accidentalem; from whence it appears, that all Circumſtances, are not neceſſary to be the ſame in Surrogation; but that the nature of the Puniſhment remain the ſame. Thus Chriſt dying for us, to deliver us from Death, and the curſe of the Law, he underwent an accurſed Death for that end; although not the very ſame which we were to have undergone, yet ſufficient to ſhew, that he underwent the Puniſhment of our Iniquities in order to the delivering us from it. And if our Adverſaries will yield us this, we ſhall not much contend with them about the name of a proper Surrogation.

Crell. c. 9. ſect. 2.

VI. But in the matter of Redemption, or where ἀντὶ is uſed, Crellius will by no means yield that there was a commutation of perſons between Chriſt and us, but all the commutation he will allow here is only a commutation between a thing, or a Price, and a perſon. Which he therefore aſſerts, that ſo there may be no neceſſity of Chriſt's undergoing the Puniſhment of ſin in order to Redemption, becauſe the price that is to be paid, is not ſuppoſed to undergo the Condition of the perſon delivered by it. Which will evidently appear to have no force at all, in caſe we can prove, that a proper Redemption may be obtained by the Puniſhment of one in the room of another; for that Puniſhment then comes to be the λύτρον or price of Redemption; and he that pays this, muſt be ſuppoſed to undergo Puniſhment for it. So that the commutation between the Puniſhment of the one, and the other Redeemed by it, here is a proper commutation of perſons implied in the payment of the Price. But hereby we may ſee that the great ſubtilty of our Adverſaries is deſigned on purpoſe to avoid the force of the places of Scripture, which are ſo plain againſt them: For when thoſe places where λύτρον and ἀντὶ are joyned together, are ſo clear for a Subſtitution, that they cannot deny it; then they ſay, by it is meant only a commutation of a price for a perſon; but when the word λύτρον is urged to prove a Redemption purchaſed by Chriſt, by the payment of a price for it, then they deny that λύτρον doth ſignifie a proper price, but it is only taken Metaphorically; and yet if it be ſo taken, then there can be no force in what Crellius ſaith, for a bare Metaphorical price may be a real Puniſhment: Two things I ſhall then prove againſt Crellius. 1. That the λύτρον as applied to Chriſt, is to be taken in a proper Senſe. 2. That although it be taken in a proper ſenſe, yet it doth not imply a bare commutation of a price and a perſon, but a Subſtitution of one perſon in the room of another.

Of the true notion of Redemption.

VII. Both theſe will be cleared from the right ſtating the notion of Redemption between our Adverſaries and us. For they will not by any means have any other proper notion of Redemption but from Captivity, and that by the payment of a price to him that did hold in Captivity, and therefore becauſe Chriſt did not pay the price to the Devil, there could be no proper ſenſe either of the Redemption, or the price which was paid for it. This is the main ſtrength of all the Arguments uſed by Socinus and Crellius, to enervate the force of thoſe places of Scripture which ſpeak of our Redemption by Chriſt, and of the price which he paid in order to it. But how weak theſe Exceptions are, will appear upon a true Examination of the proper notion of Redemption, which in its primary importance ſignifies no more, than the obtaining of one thing by another as a valuable Conſideration for it. Thence redimere anciently among the Latins ſignified barely to purchaſe by a valuable price, for the thing which they had a right to by it; and ſometimes to purchaſe that which a Man hath ſold before, thence the pactum redimendi in Contracts: ſtill in whatever ſenſe it was uſed by the Lawyers or others, the main regard was, to the Conſideration upon which the thing was obtained, thence redimere delatorem pecunia, h. e. eum à delatione deducere; ſo redimere litem; and redemptor litis was one that upon certain Conſideration took the whole charge of a ſuit upon himſelf: And thoſe who undertook the farming of Cuſtoms at certain Rates, were called redemptores vectigalium, qui redempturis auxiſſent vectigalia, ſaith Livy. And all thoſe who undertook any publick work at a certain price, redemptores antiquitus dicebantur, ſaith Feſtus and Ulpian. From hence it was applied to the delivery of any perſon from any inconvenience that he lay under, by ſomething which was ſuppoſed a valuable Conſideration for it. And that it doth not only relate to Captivity, but to any other great Calamity, the freedom from which is obtained by what another ſuffers; is apparent from thoſe two remarkable Expreſſions of Cicero to this purpoſe. Quam quidem ego (ſaith he, ſpeaking of the ſharpneſs of the time) à rep. meis privatis & domeſticis incommodis libentiſſimè redemiſſem. And more expreſly elſewhere, Ego vitam omnium civium, ſtatum orbis terræ, urbem hanc denique, &c. quinque hominum amentium ac perditorum pœna redemi. Where it is plain, that Redemption is uſed for the delivery of ſome by the Puniſhment of others; not from mere Captivity, but from a great Calamity which they might have fallen into, without ſuch a Puniſhment of thoſe Perſon. So vain is that Aſſertion of Socinus, Redimere, nihil aliud propriè ſignificat, quam eum captivum è manibus illius, qui eum detinet, pretio illi dato liberare.

No neceſſity of paying the price to him that detains captive.

VIII. And yet ſuppoſing we ſhould grant that Redemption as uſed in ſacred Authors doth properly relate to Captivity, there is no neceſſity at all of that which our Adverſaries contend ſo earneſtly for, viz. That the price muſt be paid to him that detains Captive. For we may very eaſily conceive a double ſort of Captivity, from whence a Redemption may be obtained; the one by force, when a Captive is detained purpoſely for advantage to be made by his Redemption: And the other in a judicial manner, when the Law condemns a perſon to Captivity, and the thing deſigned by the Law is not a meer price, but ſatisfaction to be made to the Law, upon which a Redemption may be obtained;

now in the former caſe it is neceſſary, that the price be paid to the perſon who detains, becauſe the reaſon of his detaining, was the Expectation of the price to be paid; but in the latter, the detainer is meerly the inſtrument for Execution of the Law, and the price of Redemption is not to be paid to him; but to thoſe who are moſt concerned in the Honour of the Law. But Crellius objects, that the price can never be ſaid to be paid to God, becauſe our redemption is attributed to God as the Author of it, and becauſe we are ſaid to be redeemed for his uſe and ſervice, now ſaith he, the price can never be paid to him for whoſe ſervice the perſon is redeemed. Crell. c. 8. ſect. 11. But all this depends upon the former miſtake, as though we ſpake all this while of ſuch a Redemption as that is of a Captive by force: In whom the detainer is no further concerned than, for the Advantage to be made by him; and in that caſe the price muſt be paid to him who detains, becauſe it would otherwiſe be ſucceſsful for his deliverance: But in caſe of Captivity by Law, as the effect of diſobedience, the Magiſtrate who is concerned in the life of the perſon, and his future obedience may himſelf take care that Satisfaction may be given to the Law for his Redemption, in order to his future ſerviceableneſs. From hence we ſee both that the λύτρον, is proper in this caſe of our Redemption, and that it is not a meer commutation of a price for a perſon, but a commutation of one perſons ſuffering for others, which ſuffering being a Puniſhment in order to Satisfaction is a valuable Conſideration, and therefore a price for the Redemption of others by it. Which price in this ſenſe doth imply a proper Subſtitution; which was the thing to be proved. Which was the firſt thing to be made good concerning the Death of Chriſt being a Sacrifice for ſin, viz. that there was a Subſtitution of Chriſt in our ſtead as of the Sacrifices of old under the Law; and in this ſenſe the Death of Chriſt was a proper λύτρον or price of Redemption for us. Nothing then can be more vain, than the way of our Adverſaries, to take away the force of all this, becauſe ἀπολύτρωσις is ſometimes taken for a meer deliverance without any price, which we deny not; but the main force of our Argument is from the importance of ἀπολυτρώσεως, where the λύτρον is mentioned; and then we ſay that ἀπολύτρωσις when applied to ſins, ſignifies Expiation, (as Heb. 9. 15. εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῶν παραβάσεων,) but when applied to perſons, it ſignifies the deliverance purchaſed by the λύτρον, which is not to be conſidered as a bare price, or thing given, but as a thing undergone in order to that deliverance: And is therefore not only called λύτρον, but ἀντίλυτρον too, which Crellius confeſſeth doth imply a commutation, and we have ſhewed, doth prove a Subſtitution of Chriſt in our place.

Of the Oblation made by Chriſt unto God.

I. THE ſecond thing to prove the Death of Chriſt a Sacrifice for ſin, is the Oblation of it to God for that end. " Grotius towards the concluſion of his Book, makes a twofold Oblati- " on of Chriſt, parallel to that of the Sacrifices under the Law, the " firſt of Mactation, the ſecond of Repreſentation; whereof the firſt " was done in the Temple, the ſecond in the Holy of Holies; ſo the " firſt of Chriſt was on Earth, the ſecond in Heaven; the firſt is not " a bare Preparation to a Sacrifice, but a Sacrifice: The latter not ſo " much a Sacrifice, as the Commemoration of one already paſt. Where- " fore, ſince appearing and interceeding are not properly ſacerdotal " Acts, any further than they depend on the efficacy of a Sacrifice alrea- " dy offered, he that takes away that Sacrifice, doth not leave to Chriſt " any proper Prieſt-hood, againſt the plain Authority of the Scrip- " ture, which aſſigns to Chriſt the Office of a Prieſt diſtinct from that " of a Prophet and a King. To which Crellius replies: That the Ex- Crell. c. 10. ſect. 45. piation of ſin doth properly belong to what Chriſt doth in Heaven; and may be applied to the Death of Chriſt only, as the Condition by which he was to Ib. ſect. 55. enjoy that Power in Heaven, whereby he doth expiate ſins; but the Prieſt was never ſaid to expiate ſins when he killed the Beaſt, but when the Blood ~~was ſprinkled or carried into the Holy~~ of Holies, to which the Oblation of Ib. ſect. 47. Ib. ſect. 53. Chriſt in Heaven does anſwer: But Mactation, ſaith he, was not proper to the Prieſts, but did belong to the Levites alſo. For his Prieſtly Office, he ſaith, is never in Scripture mentioned as diſtinct from his Kingly, but is comprehended under it; and the great difference between them is, that one is of a larger extenſion than the other is, the Kingly Office extending to punſhing, and the Prieſtly only to Expiation.

tion. This is the ſubſtance of what Crellius more at large diſcourſeth upon this Subject. Wherein he aſſerts theſe things, That the Prieſtly Office of Chriſt doth not in Reference to the Expiation of ſins reſpect God but us; his Interceſſion and Oblation wherein he makes the ſacerdotal Function of Chriſt to conſiſt, being the exerciſe of his power for the good of his People. 2. That Chriſt did offer up no Sacrifice of Expiation to God upon Earth, becauſe the Mactation had no reference to Expiation, any other than as a Preparation for it; and Chriſt not yet being conſtituted a High-Prieſt till after his Reſurrection from the Dead. Againſt theſe two Aſſertions I ſhall direct my following diſcourſe, by proving; 1. That the Prieſtly Office of Chriſt had a primary Reſpect to God, and not to us. 2. That Chriſt did exerciſe this Prieſtly Office in the Oblation of himſelf to God upon the Croſs.

That the Prieſtly Office of Chriſt had a primary reſpect to God and not us.

II. 1. That the Prieſtly Office of Chriſt had a primary Reſpect to God, and not to us; which appears from the firſt Inſtitution of a High-Prieſt, mentioned by the Apoſtle, Heb. 5. 1. For every High-Prieſt taken from among men, is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and Sacrifices for ſins: Id eſt, ſaith Crellius elſewhere, ut procuret & peragat ea quæ ad colendum ac propitiandum numen pertinent; i. e. That he may perform the things which appertain to the worſhipping and propitiating God: We deſire no more, but that the propitiating God, may as immediately be ſaid to reſpect him, as the worſhipping of God doth; or let Crellius tell us, what ſenſe the propitiating God will bear; if all that the High-Prieſt had to do, did immediately Reſpect the People: Nay, he ſaith not long after, "That it was the chief "Office of a High-Prieſt, to plead the cauſe of Sinners with God, and "to take care, that they may find him kind and propitious, and not "angry or diſpleaſed. In what ſenſe God was ſaid to be moved by the Expiatory Sacrifices, is not here our buſineſs to diſcuſs; it is ſufficient for our purpoſe, that they were inſtituted with a Reſpect to God, ſo as to procure his Favour, and divert his Wrath. In which ſenſe, the Prieſt is ſo often in the Levitical Law ſaid, by the offering up of Sacrifices, to expiate the ſins of the People. But Crellius ſaith, "This "ought not ſo to be underſtood, as though God by Expiatory Sacri"fices, were diverted from his anger, and inclined to Pardon; which is a plain Contradiction, not only to the words of the Law, but to the Inſtances that are recorded therein; as when Aaron was bid in the time of the Plague to make an Atonement for the people, for there is wrath gone out from the Lord: And he ſtood between the Living and the Dead, and the Plague was ſtayed. Was not God's Anger then diverted here, by the making this Atonement? The like inſtance we read in David's time, that by the offering burnt-offerings, &c. the Lord was intreated for the Land, and the Plague was ſtayed from Iſrael: By which nothing can be more plain, than that the primary intention of ſuch Sacrifices, and conſequently of the Office of the Prieſt who offered them, did immediately Reſpect the Atoning God: But yet Crellius urgeth, "This "cannot be ſaid of all, or of the moſt proper Expiatory Sacrifices; but we ſee it ſaid of more than the meer Sacrifices for ſin, as appointed by the Law; viz. of burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, and incenſe, in the Examples mentioned. So that theſe Levitical Sacrifices did all Reſpect the Atoning God; although in ſome particular Caſes, different Sacrifices were to be offered; for it is ſaid, the burnt-offering was to make Atonement for them, as well as the ſin and treſpaſs-offerings (excepting thoſe Sacrifices which were inſtituted in acknowledgment of God's Sovereignty over them, and preſence among them, as the daily Sacrifices, the Meat and Drink offerings, or ſuch as were meerly occaſional, &c.) 1 Chron.6. 49. Thus it is ſaid, that Aaron and his Sons were appointed to make an Atonement for Iſrael: So that as Grotius obſerves out of Philo, "The High- Grot. in Heb. 5. 1. " Prieſt was a Mediator between God and Man, by whom Men might " propitiate God, and God diſpenſe his favours to men. But the means whereby he did procure Favours to Men, was by atoning God by the Sacrifices, which he was by his Office to offer to him. We are now to conſider, how far this holds in reference to Chriſt, for whoſe ſake the Apoſtle brings in theſe words; and ſurely would not have mentioned this as the primary Office of a High-Prieſt, in order to the proving Chriſt to be our High-Prieſt, after a more excellent manner than the Aaronical was, unleſs he had agreed with him in the nature of his Office, and exceeded him in the manner of performance.

Chriſt no barely metaphorical High-Prieſt.

III. For the Apoſtle both proves, that he was a true and proper, and not a bare Metaphorical High-Prieſt, and that in ſuch a Capacity, he very far exceeded the Prieſts after the Order of Aaron. But how could that poſſibly be, if he failed in the primary Office of a High-Prieſt; viz. In offering up gifts and Sacrifices to God? If his Office as High-Prieſt did primarily Reſpect men, when the Office of the Aaronical Prieſt did Reſpect God? To avoid this, Crellius makes *Crell.c.*10. ſect. 3. theſe words to be only an Alluſion to the Legal Prieſthood, and ſome kind of ſimilitude between Chriſt and the Aaronical Prieſts; but it is ſuch a kind of Alluſion, that the Apoſtle deſigns to prove Chriſt to be an High-Prieſt by it; and which is of the greateſt force, he proves the neceſſity of Chriſt's having ſomewhat to offer from hence: For every Heb. 8. 2. High-Prieſt is ordained to offer Gifts and Sacrifices; wherefore it is of neceſſity, that this Man have ſomewhat alſo to offer. This is that which he looks at as the peculiar and diſtinguiſhing Character of a High-Prieſt; for interceding for others, and having Compaſſion upon them, might be done by others beſides the High-Prieſt; but this was that, without which he could not make good his name, what order ſoever he were of. If Chriſt then had no proper Sacrifice to offer up to God, to what purpoſe doth the Apoſtle ſo induſtriouſly ſet himſelf to prove, that he is our High-Prieſt? When he muſt needs fail in the main thing, according to his own Aſſertion? How eaſie had it been for the Jews, to have anſwered all the Apoſtles Arguments concerning the Prieſthood of Chriſt, if he had been ſuch a Prieſt, and made no other Oblation than Crellius allows him? When the Apoſtle proves againſt the Jews, that there was no neceſſity, that they ſhould ſtill retain the Moſaical Diſpenſation, becauſe now they had a more excellent High-Prieſt than the Aaronical were; and makes uſe of that Character of a High-Prieſt, that he was one taken out from among men, in things pertaining to God to offer Gifts and Sacrifices for ſins: "Well, ſay the Jews, we accept of this Character, but how do you prove concerning Chriſt, " that he was ſuch a one? Did he offer up a Sacrifice for ſin to God " upon Earth, as our High-Prieſts do? No, ſaith Crellius, his ſufferings were only a Preparation for his Prieſthood in Heaven: "But did he " then offer up ſuch a Sacrifice to God in Heaven? Yes, ſaith Crellius, he made an Oblation there. "But is that Oblation ſuch a Sacrifice " to God for ſin, as our High-Prieſts offer? Yes, ſaith Crellius, it may be called ſo by way of Alluſion. "Well then, ſay they, you grant

“ that your Jeſus is only a High-Prieſt by way of Alluſion, which was “ againſt your firſt deſign to prove; viz. That he was a true High-Prieſt, “ and more excellent than ours. But ſppoſe it be by way of Alluſion, “ doth he make any Oblation to God in Heaven or not? No, ſaith Crellius, really and truly he doth not: For all his Office doth Reſpect us, but the benefits we enjoy coming originally from the kindneſs of God, you may call it an Oblation to God if you pleaſe. “ But how is it poſſible “ then, ſay the Jews, you can ever convince us, that he is any High-Prieſt, or Prieſt at all, much leſs, that he ſhould ever exceed the “ Aaronical High-Prieſts in their Office? For we are aſſured, that they do “ offer Sacrifices for ſin, and that God is atoned by them: But if your “ High-Prieſt make no atonement for ſin, he falls far ſhort of ours, and “ therefore we will ſtill hold to our Levitical Prieſthood, and not forſake that for one barely Metaphorical, and having nothing really “ anſwering the name of a High-Prieſt. Thus the force of all the Apoſtles Arguments is plainly taken away, by what Crellius and his Brethren aſſert concerning the Prieſthood of Chriſt. But Crellius thinks to make it good by ſaying, That things that are improper and figurative, may be far more excellent than the things that are proper, to which they are oppoſed; ſo that Chriſt's Prieſthood may be far more excellent than the Aaronical, although his be only figurative, and the other proper. But the queſtion is not, Whether Chriſt's Prieſthood by any other adventitious Conſiderations, as of greater Power and Authority than the Aaronical Prieſts had, may be ſaid to be far more excellent than theirs was; but, Whether in the notion of Prieſthood, it doth exceed theirs? Which it is impoſſible to make good, unleſs he had ſome proper Oblation to make unto God, which in it ſelf did far exceed all the Sacrifices and Offerings under the Law.

Crellius deſtroys the Prieſthood of Chriſt.

IV. But what that Oblation of Chriſt in Heaven was, which had any correſpondency with the Sacrifices under the Law, our Adverſaries can never aſſign; nay, when they go about it, they ſpeak of it in ſuch a manner, as makes it very evident they could heartily have wiſhed the Epiſtles to the Hebrews had ſaid as little of the Prieſthood of Chriſt, as they ſay, any other part of the New-Teſtament doth. Thence Smalcius and Crellius inſiſt ſo much upon the Prieſthood of Chriſt, being diſtinctly mentioned by none but the Author to the Hebrews; which, ſay they, had ſurely been done, if Chriſt had been a proper Prieſt, or that Office in him diſtinct from his Kingly. Which ſufficiently diſcovers what they would be at; viz. That the Teſtimony of the Author to the Hebrews, is but a ſingle Teſtimony in this matter; and in truth, they do (as far as is conſiſtent with not doing it in expreſs words) wholly take away the Prieſthood of Chriſt: For what is there which they ſay his Prieſthood implies, which he might not have had, ſuppoſing he had never been called a Prieſt? His being in Heaven, doth not imply that he is a Prieſt, unleſs it be impoſſible for any but Prieſts ever to come there: His Power and Authority over the Church, doth not imply it; for that Power is by themſelves confeſſed to be a Regal Power: His readineſs to uſe that power, cannot imply it, which is the thing Smalcius inſiſts on; for his being a King of the Church, doth neceſſarily imply his readineſs to make uſe of his Power for the good of his Church. His receiving his power from God, doth not imply that he was a Prieſt, although Crellius inſiſt on that, unleſs all the Kings of the Earth are Prieſts by that means too, and Chriſt could not have had a ſubordinate Smalc. c. Smiglet. Crell. cap. 10. p. 544.

Power as King, as well Prieſt. But his death is more implied, ſaith Crellius, in the name of a Prieſt than of a King; true, if his death be conſidered as a Sacrifice, but not otherwiſe: For what is there of a Prieſt in bare dying, do not others ſo too? But this repreſents greater tenderneſs and care in Chriſt, than the meer Title of a King: What kind of King do they imagine Chriſt the mean while, if his being ſo, did not give the greateſt encouragement to all his Subjects? Nay, it is plain the name of a King muſt yield greater comfort to his people, becauſe that implies his power to defend them, which the bare name of a Prieſt doth not. So that there could be no reaſon at all given, why the name of a High-Prieſt ſhould be at all given to Chriſt, if no more were implied in it, than the exerciſe of his power with reſpect to us, without any proper Oblation to God: For here is no proper Sacerdotal Act at all attributed to him; ſo that upon their Hypotheſis, the name of High-Prieſt, is a meer inſignificant Title uſed by the Author to the Hebrews, without any Foundation at all for it. By no means, ſaith Crellius, for his expiation of ſin is implyed by it, which is not implyed in the name of King: True, if the expiation of ſin were done by him in the way of a Prieſt by an Oblation to God, which they deny; but though they call it Expiation, they mean no more than the exerciſe of his Divine Power in the delivering his People. But what parallel was there to this in the Expiation of ſins by the Levitical Prieſthood? That was cetainly done by a Sacrifice offered to God by the Prieſt, who was thereby ſaid to expiate the ſins of the People: How comes it now to be taken quite in another ſenſe, and yet ſtill called by the ſame name?

Levit. 4. 26. v. 34, 35.

No proper expiation of ſin belongs to Chriſt in Heaven, if Crellius his doctrine be true.

*Crell.c.*16. ſect. 2.

V. But this being the main thing inſiſted on by them, I ſhall prove from their own Principles, that no Expiation of ſin in their own ſenſe can belong to Chriſt in Heaven, by virtue of his Oblation of himſelf there, and conſequently that they muſt unavoidably overthrow the whole notion of the Prieſthood of Chriſt. For this we are to conſider, what their notion of the Expiation of ſins is, which is ſet down briefly by Crellius in the beginning of his diſcourſe of Sacrifices, "There is a "twofold Power, ſaith he, of the Sacrifice of Chriſt towards the Ex"piation of ſin, one taking away the guilt and the puniſhment of ſin, "and that partly by declaring, that God will do it, and giving us a "right to it, partly by actual deliverance from puniſhment; the o"ther is by begetting Faith in us, and ſo drawing us off from the Pra"ctice of ſin: Now the firſt and laſt Crellius and Socinus attribute to the Death of Chriſt, as that was a Confirmation of the Covenant God made for the remiſſion of ſin; and as it was an argument to perſwade us to believe the truth of his Doctrine; and the other, viz. the actual deliverance from puniſhment, is by themſelves attributed to the ſecond coming of Chriſt; for then only, they ſay, the juſt ſhall be actually delivered from the puniſhment of ſin, viz. eternal death; and what Expiation is there now left to the Oblation of Chriſt in Heaven? Doth Chriſt in Heaven declare the pardon of ſin any other way than it was declared by him upon Earth? What efficacy hath his Oblation in Heaven upon perſwading men to believe? Or is his ſecond coming when he ſhall ſit as Judge, the main part of his Prieſthood; for then the Expiation of ſins in our Adverſaries ſenſe is moſt proper? And yet nothing can be more remote from the notion of Chriſt's Prieſthood, than that is; ſo that Expiation of ſins according to them can have no Reſpect at all to the Oblation of Chriſt in Heaven, or (which is all one in their ſence) his continuance in Heaven to his ſecond coming. Yes, ſaith Crellius, his continuance there, is a condition in order to the Expiation by actual deliverance, and therefore it may be ſaid, that God is as it were moved by it to expiate ſins. The utmoſt then, that is attributed to Chriſt's being in Heaven in order to the Expiation of ſins, is that he muſt continue there without doing any thing in order to it; for if he does, it muſt either reſpect God or us: But they deny (though contrary to the importance of the words, and the deſign of the places where they are uſed) that the terms of Chriſt's interceding for us, or being an Advocate with the Father for us, do note any reſpect to God, but only to us; if he does any thing with reſpect to us in Expiation of ſin, it muſt be either declaring, perſwading, or actual deliverance; but it is none of theſe by their own Aſſertions; and therefore that which they call Chriſt's Oblation, or his being in Heaven, ſignifies nothing as to the Expiation of ſin: And it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that a thing, which hath no influence at all upon it, ſhould be looked on as a Condition in order to it. From whence it appears, that while our Adverſaries do make the Exerciſe of Chriſt's Prieſthood to reſpect us and not God, they deſtroy the very nature of it, and leave Chriſt only an empty name without any thing anſwering it: But if Chriſt be truly a High-Prieſt, as the Apoſtle aſſerts that he is, from thence it follows that he muſt have a reſpect to God in offering up Gifts and Sacrifices for ſins: Which was the thing to be proved.

Heb. 7.25. Rom. 8. 3. 1 Joh. 2.1.

VI. 2. That Chriſt did Exerciſe his Prieſtly Office in the Oblation of himſelf to God upon the Croſs. Which I ſhall prove by two things. 1. Becauſe the Death of Chriſt is ſaid in Scripture to be an Offering, and a Sacrifice to God. 2. Becauſe Chriſt is ſaid to offer up himſelf antecedently to his entrance into Heaven. 1. Becauſe the Death of Chriſt is ſaid to be an offering and a Sacrifice to God, which is plain from the words of St. Paul, as Chriſt alſo hath loved us, and given himſelf for us an offering and a Sacrifice to God, for a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour. Our Adverſaries do not deny that the Death of Chriſt is here called an Oblation, but they deny, “ That it is meant of an Expiatory Sacrifice, “ but of a Free-will offering; and the reaſon Crellius gives is, becauſe “ that phraſe of a ſweet-ſmelling Savour is generally and almoſt al- “ ways uſed of Sacrifices which are not Expiatory; but if ever they “ be uſed of an Expiatory Sacrifice, they are not applied to that which “ was properly Expiatory in it, viz. the offering up of the Blood, for “ no ſmell, ſaith he, went up from thence, but to the burning of the “ Fat, and the Kidneys, which although required to perfect the Expi- “ ation, yet not being done till the High-Prieſt returned out of the “ Holy of Holies, hath nothing correſpondent to the Expiatory Sacri- “ fices of Chriſt, where all things are perfected before Chriſt the High- “ Prieſt goes forth of his Sanctuary. How inconſiſtent theſe laſt words are with what they aſſert concerning the Expiation of ſin by actual deliverance at the great day, the former diſcourſe hath already diſcovered. For what can be more abſurd, than to ſay, that all things which pertain to the Expiation of ſin perfected before Chriſt goes forth from his Sanctuary, and yet to make the moſt proper Expiation of ſin to lie in that act of Chriſt which is conſequent to his going forth of the Sanctuary, viz. When he proceeds to judge the quick and the dead. But of that already. We now come to a punctual and direct anſwer, as to which two things muſt be enquired into. 1. What the importance of the phraſe Epheſ. 5.2. Proves the death of Chriſt an Expiatory Sacrifice and an oblation to God.

phraſe of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour is? 2. What the Sacrifices are to which that phraſe is applied? 1. For the importance of the phraſe. The firſt time we read it uſed in the Scripture was upon the occaſion of Noah's Sacrifice after the Flood, of which it is ſaid, that he offered burnt-offerings on the Altar, and the Lord ſmelled a ſavour of the reſt, or a ſweet ſavour. Which we are not wont to imagine in a groſs corporeal manner, as Crellius ſeems to underſtand it, when he ſaith, the Blood could not make ſuch a ſavour as the Fat and the Kidnes; for ſurely none ever thought the ſmell of Fleſh burnt was a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour of it ſelf, and we muſt leaſt of all imagine that of God, which Porphyry ſaith, was the property only of the worſt of Dæmons to be pleaſed, and as it were, to grow Fat, ταῖς ἐν τῶν αἱμάτων καὶ σαρκῶν κνίσαις, with the ſmell and Vapours of Blood, and Fleſh, (by which Teſtimony, it withal appears, that the ſame ſteams in Sacrifices were ſuppoſed to ariſe from the Blood as the Fleſh:) But we are to underſtand that Phraſe in a ſenſe agreeable to the divine Nature, which we may eaſily do, if we take it in the ſenſe the Syriack Verſion takes it in, when it calls it, Odorem placabilitatis, or the ſavour of reſt, as the word properly ſignifies; for ניחח is the word formed from the Verb נוח which is uſed for the reſting of the Ark, v. 4. of the ſame Chapter, and ſo it imports a reſt after ſome Commotion, and in that ſenſe is very proper to Atonement, or that whereby God make his anger to reſt; ſo Aben Ezra upon that place expounds the Savour of reſt, to be ſuch a one which makes God ceaſe from his Anger: Thence in Hiphil הניח ſignifies to appeaſe, or to make peace; in which ſenſe it is uſed by R. Solom. upon Iſa. 27. 5. Munſter tells us the ſenſe is, Deus nunc quievit ab ira & placatus fuit, and to the ſame purpoſe Vatablus: Which ſenſe is moſt agreeable to the deſign of the following word, in which God expreſſeth his great kindneſs, and the Lord ſaid in his Heart, I will not again curſe the Ground any more for Mans ſake; which are word highly expreſſing, how much God was propitiated by the Sacrifice which Noah offered, and therefore Joſephus doth well interpret this to be a proper Expiatory Sacrifice; that God would now be atoned, and ſend no more ſuch a deluge upon the World; which he ſaith was the ſubſtance of Noah's Prayer, when he offered this Burnt-offering, and that God would receive his Sacrifice, καὶ μηδεμίαν ὀργὴν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν ὁμοίαν λάβειν, That he would no more receive ſuch diſpleaſure againſt the Earth: So that the firſt time ever this Expreſſion was uſed, it is taken in the proper ſenſe of an Expiatory Sacrifice.

VII. And by that the ſecond enquiry may be eaſily reſolved; viz. What kind of Sacrifices it doth belong to, which we ſee in the firſt place is, to Expiatory, which Crellius denies by a great miſtake of the ſenſe of the Phraſe, and of the nature of the Offerings, concerning which this Expreſſion is moſt uſed; viz. Holocauſts, as though thoſe were not Expiatory Sacrifices: But if we can make it appear, that the Holocauſts were Expiatory Sacrifices, then it will follow, that this Phraſe doth moſt properly agree to a Sacrifice deſigned for Expiation. But Crellius here ſpeaks very confuſedly concerning Sacrifices, oppoſing Holocauſts and Freewill-offerings to Expiatory Sacrifices; whereas the Freewill-offerings might be Expiatory as well as Euchariſtical; that denomination not reſpecting the end the Sacrifices we deſigned for, but that the preciſe time of offering them was not determined by the Law; as in the ſtated and ſolemn Sacrifices. For the general diſtribution of Sacrifices, ſeems proper into Propitiatory and Euchariſtical; which diſtinction is thought by ſome to hold from the firſt time we read of Sacrifices in Scripture; becauſe the Sacrifice of Cain was of the Fruits of the Ground, and of Abel, of the Firſtlings of his Flock. Although there ſeems to be nothing meant by this difference of Sacrifices, but the diverſity of their imployments, either of them Sacrificing according to them; and I cannot ſay what ſome do, that the reaſon of God's rejecting Cain's Sacrifice, was becauſe it was not deſigned for Expiation. But the Practice of after Ages, wherein we have a fuller account of the Grounds of the ſeveral Sacrifices, makes it appear, that the Expiatory Sacrifices before the Law, were all Burnt-offerings; and of all thoſe who were not under the particular obligation of that Law: As is plain in the Expiatory Sacrifices of Job for his Sons, and for his Friends, which were Burnt-offerings; and among the Jews, all the Sacrifices that were offered up before the Levitical Law, were, as the Jews themſelves tell us, only Burnt-offerings: And after the ſettling of their Worſhip among themſelves, they did receive Burnt-offerings for Expiation from ſtrangers, as Mr. Selden at large proves from the Jewiſh Writers. It ſeems then very ſtrange, that ſince Burnt-offerings before the Law were Expiatory, and under the Law they continued ſo for ſtrangers, they ſhould be of another nature for the Jews themſelves. But what reaſon is there for it in the Text? Not the leaſt that I can find, but expreſly the contrary. For in the beginning of Leviticus, where the Law for Burnt-offerings is delivered, the words are, And he ſhall put his hand upon the head of the Burnt-offering, and it ſhall be accepted for him, to make Atonement for him; which is as much as is ever ſaid of any Expiatory Sacrifices: And in the Verſe before, where we render לרצנו of his own voluntary will; it is by the vulgar Latin rendred, Ad placandum ſibi Dominum; by the Syriack Verſion, Ad placationem ſibi obtinendam à Domino; and to the ſame purpoſe by the Chaldee Paraphraſt; but no one Verſion conſiderable that ſo renders it, as to make Burnt-offerings to be Freewill-offerings here, which are ſpoken of diſtinctly, and by themſelves afterwards: And the Chaldee Paraphraſt, Jonathan thus explains, This is the Law of the Burnt-offering; i.e. Quod venit ad expiandum pro cogitationibus cordis; but although the Jews be not fully agreed what the Burnt-offerings were deſigned to expiate, yet they conſent that they were of an Expiatory nature. Which might make us the more wonder, that Crellius and others ſhould exclude them from it, but the only reaſon given by him is, becauſe they are diſtinguiſhed from Sacrifices for ſin, as though no Sacrifices were of an Expiatory nature but they, and then the Treſpaſs-offerings muſt be excluded too, for they are diſtinguiſhed from Sin-offerings as well as the other. The ignorance of the Jews in the reaſon of their own Cuſtoms, hath been an occaſion of great miſtakes among Chriſtians, concerning the nature of them; when they judge of them according to the blind or uncertain Conjectures which they make concerning them: So that the Text is oft-times far clearer than their Commentaries are. Setting aſide then the intricate and unſatisfactory niceties of the Jewiſh Writers, about the ſeveral reaſons of the Burnt-offerings and Sin and Treſpaſs-offerings, and the differences they make between them, which are ſo various and incoherent, I ſhall propoſe this Conjecture concerning the different reaſons of them, viz. That ſome Sacrifices were aſſumed into the Jewiſh Religion, which had been long in uſe in the World before, and were common to them with the Patriarchs, and all thoſe who in that age of the World did fear and ſerve God, and ſuch were the Burnt-offerings for Expiation of ſin, and the Fruits of the Earth by way of gratitude to God. Other Sacrifices were inſtituted among them, with a particular reſpect to themſelves, as a people governed by the Laws of God: And theſe were of ſeveral ſorts; 1. Symbolical, of God's preſence among them, ſuch was the daily Sacrifice, inſtituted as a Teſtimony of God's preſence, Exod. 29. from v. 38. to the end. 2. Occaſional, for ſome great mercies vouchſafed to them, as the Paſſover and the Solemn Feſtivals, &c. 3. Expiatory, for the ſins committed againſt their Law: And theſe were of three ſorts; 1. Such as were wholly conſumed to the Honour of God, which were the Burnt-offerings. 2. Such, of which ſome part was conſumed upon the Altar, and ſome part fell to the ſhare of the Prieſts; and theſe were either ſins particularly enumerated by God himſelf, under the אשם, or elſe generally comprehended under the חטאת as being allowed to be expiated, becauſe committed through inadvertency. 3. Such, whereof a leſs part was conſumed, as in the Peace-offerings of the Congregation, mentioned, Levit. 23. 19. whereof the Blood was ſprinkled, only the inwards burnt, and the Fleſh not eaten by the perſons that offered them, as it was in the Peace-offering of particular perſons (of which as being private Sacrifices, I have here no occaſion to ſpeak) but only by the Prieſts in the Court: And theſe had ſomething of Expiation in them: For thence, ſaith Vatablus, the Peace-offering was called by the Greeks τελεστικὸν, i. e. Expiatorium, and the LXX. commonly render it, θυσία σωτηρίου, and ſeveral of the Jews think the reaſon of the name was, That it made peace between God and him that offered it: But the great reaſon I inſiſt on, is, Becauſe all the things which were uſed in an Expiatory Sacrifice, were in this too; the ſlaying of the Beaſt, the ſprinkling of the Blood, and the conſumption of ſome part of it upon the Altar as an Oblation to God, which are the three ingredients of an Expiatory Sacrifice; for the ſhedding of the Blood, noted the bearing the puniſhment of our iniquity; and, the ſprinkling of it on the Altar, and the conſuming of part of the Sacrifice, or the whole there, that it was deſigned for the Expiation of ſin. From whence it follows, that the Phraſe of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour, being applied under the Law to Expiatory Sacrifices, is very properly uſed by St. Paul, concerning Chriſt's giving up himſelf for us, ſo that from this Phraſe, nothing can be inferred contrary to the Expiatory Nature of the Death of Chriſt, but rather it is fully agreeable to it.

What influence the mactation of the ſacrifice had on expiation. Crell. c. 10. p. 533.

VIII. But Crellius hath yet a farther Argument, to prove that Chriſt's Death cannot be here meant as the Expiatory Sacrifice; viz. That the notion of a Sacrifice, doth conſiſt in the Oblation whereby the thing is conſecrated to the Honour and Service of God, to which the Mactation is but a bare preparation, which he proves, Becauſe the ſlaying the Sacrifice might belong to others beſides the Prieſts, Ezek. 44. 10, 11. but the Oblation only to the Prieſts. To this I anſwer, 1. The Mactation may be conſidered two ways, either with a reſpect to the bare inſtrument of taking away the life, or to the deſign of the Offerer of that which was to be ſacrificed: As the Mactation hath a reſpect only to the inſtruments, ſo it is no otherways to be conſidered than as a puniſhment; but as it hath a Reſpect to him that deſigns it for a Sacrifice, ſo the ſhedding of the Blood, hath an immediate influence on the Expiation of ſin. And that by this clear Argument, The Blood is ſaid to make an Atonement for the Soul; and the reaſon given is, becauſe the Life of the Fleſh is in the Blood: So that which was the life, is the great thing which makes the Atonement; and when the Blood was ſhed, the life was then given; from whence it follows, that the great Efficacy of the Sacrifice for Atonement lay in the ſhedding of the Blood for that end. Thence the Apoſtle attributes Heb. 9 22. remiſſion of ſins to the αἱματεκχυσίαν, the ſhedding of the Blood; and not to the bare Oblation of it on the Altar, or the carrying it into the Holy of Holies, both which ſeem to be nothing elſe but a more ſolemn Repreſentation of that Blood before God, which was already ſhed for the Expiation of ſins, which was therefore neceſſary to be performed, that the concurrence of the Prieſt might be ſeen with the Sacrifice in order to Expiation. For if no more had been neceſſary but the bare ſlaying of the Beaſts, which was the meaneſt part of the Service, the people would never have thought the inſtitution of the Prieſthood neceſſary, and leaſt of all that of the High-Prieſt, unleſs ſome ſolemn Action of his had been performed, ſuch as the entring into the Holy of Holies, on the day of Expiation, and carrying it, and ſprinkling the Blood of the ſin-offering in order to the Expiation of the ſins of the People. And it is obſervable, that although the Levitical Law be ſilent in the common Sacrifices, who were to kill them whether the Prieſts or the Levites; yet on that day whereon the High-Prieſt was to appear himſelf for the Expiation of ſin, it is expreſly ſaid, that he Levit. 16. 11, 15. ſhould not only kill the Bullock of the ſin-offering, which is for himſelf, but the Goat of the ſin-offering, which is for the people. And although the Talmudiſts diſpute from their Traditions on both ſides, whether any one elſe might on the day of Expiation, ſlay the ſin-offerings beſides the High-Prieſt; yet it is no news for them to diſpute againſt the Text, and the Talmud it ſelf is clear, that the High-Prieſt did it. From whence Codex Joma cap. 4. ſect. 3. cap. 5. ſect. 4. it appears, there was ſomething peculiar on that day as to the ſlaying of the ſin-offerings; and if our Adverſaries opinion hold good, that the Sacrifices on the day of Expiation did, if not atone, yet chiefly repreſent the Sacrifice of Chriſt, no greater argument can be brought againſt themſelves than this is, for the Office of the High-Prieſt did not begin at his carrying the Blood into the Holy of Holies, but the ſlaying the Sacrifice did belong to him too: From whence it will unavoidably follow, that Chriſt did not enter into his Office of High-Prieſt, when he entred into Heaven, but when the Sacrifice was to be ſlain which was deſigned for the Expiation of ſins. It is then to no purpoſe at all, if Crellius could prove that ſometimes in ordinary Sacrifices, (which he will not ſay, the Sacrifice of Chriſt was repreſented by) the Levites might kill the Beaſts for Sacrifice; for it appears, that in theſe Sacrifices, wherein themſelves contend that Chriſt's was repreſented, the Office of the High-Prieſt did not begin with entring into the Sanctuary, but with the Mactation of that Sacrifice whoſe Blood was to be carried in thither. Therefore if we ſpeak of the bare inſtruments of Mactation in the Death of Chriſt, thoſe were the Jews, and we make not them Prieſts in it, for they aimed at no more than taking away his life (as the Popæ among the Romans, and thoſe whoſe bare Office it was to kill the Beaſts for Sacrifice among the Jews did:) but if we conſider it with a Reſpect to him that offered up his Life to God, then we ſay, that Chriſt was the High-Prieſt in doing it; it being deſigned for the Expiation of ſin; and by virtue of this Blood ſhed for that end, he enters into Heaven as the Holy of Holies, there ever living to make interceſſion for us. But the virtue of the conſequent Acts, depends upon the Efficacy of the Blood ſhed for Expiation; otherwiſe the High-Prieſt might have entred with the ſame effect into the Holy of Holies with any other Blood beſides that which was ſhed on purpoſe as a ſin-offering, for Expiation of the ſins of the people; which it was unlawful for him to do. And from hence it is, that the Apoſtle to the Hebrews inſiſts ſo much on the Compariſon between the Blood of Chriſt, and the Blood Heb. 9. 13, 14. 10. 4, 10. of the Legal Sacrifices, and the Efficacy of the one far above the other, in its power of Expiation; which he needed not to have done, if the ſhedding of his Blood, had been only a Preparation for his entrance on his Prieſthood in Heaven. So that the proper notion of a Sacrifice for ſin, as it notes the giving the Life of one for the Expiation of the ſins of another, doth properly lie in the Mactation, though other ſacrificial Acts may be conſequent upon it. So it was in the animales Macrob. Saturn. l. 3. c. 5. hoſtiæ among the Romans, in which, ſaith Macrobius, Sola anima Deo ſacratur: of which he tells us Virgil properly ſpeaks in thoſe words,

And that we may the better underſtand what he means by the anima here, he ſaith elſewhere (as Macrobius and Servius obſerve out of his excellent Skill and accuracy in the Pontifical rites)

Sanguine placaſtis ventos & virgine cæſa, Cum primum Iliacas Danai veniſtis ad oras:
Sanguine quærendi reditus, animaque litandum Argolica.

Which ſhews, that the Expiation was ſuppoſed to lie in the Blood which they called the Soul, as the Scripture doth. And the Perſians, as Strabo tells us, looked upon the bare Mactation as the Sacrifice, for they did not porricere as the Romans called it, they laid none of the Strabo, l. 15. parts of the Sacrifice upon the Altar to be conſumed there, τῆς γὰρ ψυχῆς φασὶ τοῦ ἱερείου δεῖσθαι τὸν Θεὸν ἄλλου δ' οὐδενός. For God regarded nothing but the Euſtath. in Hom. Iliad. 1. Soul in the Sacrifice: Which words Euſtathius likewiſe uſeth upon Homer, of the Sacrifices of the Magi. And Strabo affirms of the ancient Strabo, l. 3. Luſitani, that they cut off nothing of the Sacrifice, but conſumed the entrails whole; but though ſuch Sacrifices which were for divination were not thought Expiatory, and therefore different from the animales hoſtiæ, yet among the Perſians, every Sacrifice had a Reſpect to Expiation of the whole People. For Herodotus tells us, that every one that Herod. l. 1. offers Sacrifice among them, πᾶσι τοῖσι Πέρσῃσι κατεύχεται εὖ γίνεσθαι καὶ τῷ βασιλέϊ, prays for good to all Perſians and the King. But thus much may ſerve to prove againſt Crellius, that the Mactation in an Expiatoty Sacrifice, was not a meer Preparation to a Sacrifice, but that it was a proper Sacrificial Act, and conſequently that Chriſt acted as High-Prieſt, when he gave himſelf for us, an offering and a Sacrifice to God for a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour.

Whether Chriſt's Oblation of himſelf once to God, were in Heaven or on Earth.

IX. But this will further appear from thoſe places wherein Chriſt is ſaid to offer up himſelf once to God: The places to this purpoſe are, Heb. 7. 27. Who needeth not daily as thoſe High-Prieſts to offer up Sacrifice, firſt for his own ſins, and then for the peoples, for this he did once, when he offered up himſelf. Heb. 9. 14. How much more ſhall the Blood of Chriſt, who through through the eternal Spirit offered himſelf without ſpot to God, purge your Conſcience from dead works, to ſerve the living God. V. 25, 26, 27, 28. Nor yet that he ſhould offer himſelf often, as the High-Prieſt entreth into the holy place every year with the Blood of others; for then muſt he often have ſuffered ſince the Foundation of the World: But now once in the end of the World hath he appeared to put away ſin by the Sacrifice of himſelf. And as it is appointed to men once to die, but after this the Judgment: So Chriſt was once offered to bear the ſins of many, and unto them that look for him he ſhall appear the ſecond time without ſin unto Salvation. Heb. 10. 10, 11, 12. By the which will we are ſanctified through the offering of the Body of Jeſus Chriſt once for all. And every High-Prieſt, ſtandeth daily miniſtring and offering oftentimes the ſame Sacrifices, which can never take away ſins: But this Man after he had offered one Sacrifice for ſins for ever, ſate down on the right hand of God. To theſe places Crellius gives this anſwer, "That the name of Oblation as applied to Chriſt, primarily ſignifies Chriſt's firſt entrance into Heaven, and appearance before the Face of God, there, but conſequently the continuance of that appearance; ſo that when a thing is once actually exhibited and preſented, it is ſaid to be once offered, although being offered, it always remains in the ſame place, and ſo may be ſaid to be a continual Oblation. But this firſt appearance, ſaith he, hath a peculiar agreement with the Legal Oblation; and therefore the name of Oblation doth moſt properly belong to that, becauſe Chriſt by this means obtained that power on which the perfect Remiſſion of our ſins depends: But although the continuance of that appearance, ſeems only conſequently to have the name of Oblation belonging to it, yet in its own nature, it hath a nearer Conjunction with the effect of the Oblation, viz. the remiſſion of ſins, or deliverance from puniſhment, and doth of it ſelf confer more to it than the other. And therefore in regard of that, Chriſt is ſaid moſt perfectly to exerciſe his Prieſthood, and to offer and intercede for us, from the time he is ſaid to ſit down at the right Hand of God. Crell. cap. 10.ſect.54. Againſt this anſwer, I ſhall prove theſe two things, 1. That it is incoherent, and repugnant to it ſelf. 2. That it by no means agrees to the places before mentioned. 1. That it is incoherent and repugnant to it ſelf in two things. 1. In making that to be the proper Oblation in correſpondency to the Oblations of the Law, which hath no immediate Reſpect to the Expiation of ſins. 2. In making that to have the moſt immediate reſpect to the Expiation of ſins, which can in no tolerable ſenſe be called an Oblation. For the firſt, ſince Crellius ſaith, that the proper notion of Oblation is to be taken from the Oblations in the Levitical Law, we muſt conſider what it was there, and whether Chriſt's firſt entrance into Heaven can have any correſpondency with it. An Oblation under the Law was in general, any thing which was immediately dedicated to God, but in a more limited ſenſe it was proper to what was dedicated to him by way of Sacrifice according to the appointments of the Levitical Law. We are now enquiring what was properly called an Oblation in other Sacrifices, but in thoſe which then were for Expiation of ſin; And in the Oblation was, firſt of the perſons for whom the Sacrifice was offered. So in the Burnt-offering, the perſon who brought it, was to offer it at the door of the Tabernacle of the Congregation: i. e. as the Jews expound it, at the entrance of the Court of the Prieſts, and there he was to lay his hands upon the head of it, and it ſhall be accepted for Lev. 1. 3. Verſ. 4.

for him to make Atonement for him. This Offering was made before the Beaſt was ſlain; after the killing the Beaſt, then the Prieſts were to make an Offering of the Blood, by ſprinkling it round about the Altar of Burnt-offerings; the reſt of the Blood, ſay the Jews, was poured out by the Prieſts, at the South-ſide of the Altar upon the Foundation, where the two holes were for the paſſage into the Channel, which convey'd the Blood into the Valley of Kidron; thus the Blood being offered, the parts of the Beaſt, were by the Prieſts to be laid upon the Altar, and there they were all to be conſumed by Fire; and then it was called an Offering made by Fire, of a ſweet Savour unto the Lord. The ſame Rites were uſed in the Peace-offerings, and Treſpaſs-offerings, as to the laying on of hands, and the ſprinkling the Blood, and conſuming ſome part by Fire: and in the ſin-offerings, there was to be the ſame impoſition of hands: But concerning the ſprinkling of the Blood, and the way of conſuming the remainders of the Sacrifice; there was this conſiderable difference; that in the common ſin-offerings for particular Perſons, Lev 4.25, 30. the Blood was ſprinkled upon the horns of the Altar of Burnt-offerings, but in the ſin-offerings for the High-Prieſt and the Congregation, or all the People, Verſe 6. he was to carry the Blood within the Sanctuary, and to ſprinkle of it ſeven times before the Veil of the Sanctuary; and ſome of the Blood was to be put upon the horns of the Altar of Incenſe; but the remainder of the Blood, and the ſame things (which were offered by Fire in Peace-offerings) were to be diſpoſed of accordingly, on the Altar of Burnt-offerings. And withal, there was this great difference, that in other ſin-offerings the Prieſts were to eat the remainder of the Sacrifice in the Holy place; but in theſe there was nothing to be eaten by them; for Lev. 6 26. the whole Bullock was to be carried forth without the Camp, and there he Lev 4, 11, 12. was to be burned till all were conſumed. For it was an expreſs Law, That no ſin-offerings, whereof any of the Blood is brought into the Tabernacle of Lev. 6 30. the Congregation, to reconcile withal in the Holy-place, ſhall be eaten: It ſhall be burnt in the Fire. All the difference that was on the great day Lev. 16. 14 15. of Atonement, was this, that the High-Prieſt himſelf was to ſlay the ſin-offerings, and then to carry the Blood of them into the Holy of Holies, and there was to ſprinkle the Blood with his Finger towards the mercy-ſeat ſeven times: After which, & the ſending away the Scape-goat, the Ceremonies were the ſame for the Atonement of the People, which were at other ſolemn ſin-offerings, for the Prieſt or the People.

X. From all which being thus laid together, we ſhall obſerve ſeveral things, which are very material to our purpoſe:

All things neceſſary to a legal oblation concur in the death of Chriſt.

1. That in the Oblations which are made for Expiation of ſins, the difference between the Mactation and the Oblation, did ariſe from the difference between the Prieſt and the Sacrifice. For the Prieſt's Office was to atone, but he was to atone by the Sacrifice; on which account, although the Prieſt were to offer the Sacrifice for himſelf, yet the Oblation did not lie in the bare preſenting himſelf before God, but in the preſenting the Blood of that Sacrifice, which was ſhed in order to Expiation. If we could have ſuppoſed, that the High-Prieſt under the Law, inſtead of offering a Goat for a ſin-offering for the People, on the day of Atonement, ſhould have made an Oblation of himſelf to God, by dying for the Expiation of their ſins: In this caſe, his death being the Sacrifice, and himſelf the Prieſt, the Mactation, as it relates to his own Act and his Oblation had been one and the ſame thing. For his death had been nothing elſe, but the offering up himſelf to God, in order to the Expiation of the ſins of the people; and there can be no reaſon, why the Oblation muſt be of neceſſity ſomething conſequent to his Death, ſince all things neceſſary to a perfect Oblation do concur in it. For where there is ſomething ſolemnly devoted to God, and in order to the Expiation of ſins, and by the hand of a Prieſt, there are all things concurring to a Legal Oblation; but in this caſe, all theſe things do concur, and therefore there can be no imaginable neceſſity of making the Oblation of Chriſt, only conſequent to his Aſcenſion, ſince in his Death all things concur to a proper Oblation. In the Law, we grant that the Oblation made by the Prieſt, was conſequent to the Death of the Beaſt for Sacrifice; but the reaſon of that was, becauſe the Beaſt could not offer up it ſelf to God, and God had made it neceſſary, that the Prieſt ſhould expiate ſins, not by himſelf, but by thoſe Sacrifices, and therefore the Oblation of the Blood was after the Sacrifice was ſlain; neither could this have been ſolved barely by the Prieſt ſlaying the Sacrifices; for this being an Act of Violence towards the Beaſts that were thus killed, could not be a proper Oblation, which muſt ſuppoſe a conſent antecedent to it. All which ſhewed the great imperfection of the Levitical Law, in which ſo many ſeveral things were to concur, to make up a Sacrifice for ſin; viz. The firſt offering made by the party concerned, of what was under his Dominion, viz. The Beaſt to be Sacrificed at the door of the Tabernacle of the Congregation, but the Beaſt not being able to offer up it ſelf, it was neceſſary for the offering up its Blood, that it muſt be ſlain by others; and for the better underſtanding, not only of the Efficacy of the Blood, but the Concurrence of the Prieſt for Expiation, he was to take the Blood, and ſprinkle ſome of it on the Altar, and pour out the reſt at the Foundation of it. But ſince we aſſert a far more noble and excellent Sacrifice, by the Son of God freely offering up himſelf, to be made a Sacrifice for the ſins of the World, why may not this be as proper an Oblation made unto God, as any was under the Law, and far more excellent, both in regard of the Prieſt and the Sacrifice: Why ſhould his Oblation of himſelf then be made only conſequent to his Death and Reſurrection? Which latter, being by our Adverſaries made not his own Act, but God's upon him, and his entrance into Heaven, being given him (as they aſſert) as a reward of his ſufferings, in what tolerable ſenſe can that be called an Oblation of himſelf, which was conferred upon him as a reward of his former ſufferings? From whence it follows, that upon our Adverſaries own grounds, the Death of Chriſt may far more properly be called the Oblation of himſelf, than his entrance into Heaven; and that there is no neceſſity of making the Oblation of Chriſt conſequent to his Death, there being ſo great a difference between the Sacrifice of Chriſt, and that of the Sacrifices for ſin under the Levitical Law.

2. We obſerve, That the Oblation as performed by the Prieſt, did not depend upon his preſenting himſelf before God, but upon the preſenting the Blood of a Sacrifice, which had been already ſlain for the Expiation of ſins. If the Prieſt had gone into the Holy of Holies, and there only preſented himſelf before the Mercy-ſeat, and that had been all required in order to the Expiation of ſins, there had been ſome pretence for our Adverſaries making Chriſt's preſenting himſelf in Heaven, to be the Oblation of himſelf to God; but under the Law, the Efficacy of the High-Prieſt's entrance into the Holy of Holies, did depend upon the Blood which he carried in thither, ther, which was the Blood of the ſin-offering, which was already ſlain for the Expiation of ſins: And in correſpondency to this, Chriſt's Efficacy in his entrance into Heaven, as it reſpects our Expiation, muſt have a Reſpect to that Sacrifice which was offered up to God antecedent to it. And I wonder our Adverſaries do ſo much inſiſt on the High-Prieſt's entring into the moſt holy place once a Year, as though all the Expiation had depended upon that; whereas all the promiſe of Expiation, was not upon his bare entrance into it, but upon the Blood which he carried along with him, and ſprinkled there: In Correſpondency to which, our Saviour is not barely ſaid to enter into Heaven, and preſent himſelf to God, but that he did this by his own Blood, having obtained eternal Redemption for us. Heb. 9. 12.

3. We obſerve, That there was ſomething correſpondent in the Death of Chriſt, to ſomewhat conſequent to the Oblation under the Law, and therefore there can be no reaſon to ſuppoſe, that the Oblation of Chriſt muſt be conſequent to his Death: For that deſtroys the Correſpondency between them. Now this appears in this particular, in the ſolemn Sacrifices for ſin, after the ſprinkling of the Blood, which was carried into the Holy place to reconcile withall, all the remainder of the Sacrifice was to be burnt without the Camp, and this held on the day of Atonement, as well as in other ſin-offerings for the Congregation. Now the Author to the Hebrews tells us, That in correſpondency to this, Jeſus that he might ſanctifie the people with his own Blood, ſuffered without the Gate: What force is there in this, unleſs the Blood of Chriſt did anſwer to the ſin-offerings for the People, and his Oblation was ſuppoſed to be made before; and therefore that he might have all things agreeable to thoſe ſin-offerings, the laſt part was to be compleated too; viz. That he was to ſuffer without the Gate; which after the Peoples ſettlement in Jeruſalem, anſwered to the being burnt without the Camp in the Wilderneſs. Heb. 13. 12.

4. We obſerve, That the Oblation in Expiatory Sacrifices under the Law, by the Prieſt, had always Relation to the Conſumption of what was offered: Thus the offering of the Blood, in token of the Deſtruction of the Life of the Beaſt, whoſe Blood was offered; for no Blood was to be offered of a living Creature, nor of one killed upon any other account, but for that end to be a Sacrifice for ſin, and after the ſprinkling and pouring out of the Blood, the inwards of ſome, and all of the other, were to be conſumed by Fire. And it is obſervable, that the greater the Sacrifice for ſin was, always the more was conſumed of it; as appears plainly by the forementioned difference of the ſin-offerings for private Perſons, and for the People; of the former, the Prieſts were allowed to eat, but not at all of the latter. And ſo it was obſerved among the Egyptians, in the moſt ſolemn Sacrifices for Expiation, nothing was allowed to be eaten of that part which was deſigned for that end. For Herodotus gives us an account why the Egyptians never eat the head of any living Creature; which is, That when they offer up a Sacrifice, they make a ſolemn Execration upon it, that if any evil were to fall upon the perſons who Sacrificed, or upon all Egypt, it might be turned upon the head of that Beaſt: And Plutarch adds, that after this ſolemn Execration, They cut off the head, and of old, threw it into the River, but then gave it to Strangers. From which Cuſtom we obſerve, Καταρέονται δὲ τάδε λέγοντες τῇσι κεφαλῇσι, εἴ τι μέλλοι ἢ σφίσι τοῖσι θύουσι, ἢ Αἰγύπτῳ τῇ συναπάσῃ κακὸν γενέσθαι, ἐς κεφαλὴν ταύτην τραπέσθαι. Herodot. l. 2. c 9.

Τῇ μὲν κεφαλῇ τοῦ ἱερείου καταρασάμενοι, καὶ ἀποκόψαντες εἰς τὸν ποταμὸν ἐρρίπτουν πάλαι, νῦν δὲ τοῖς ξένοις ἀποδίδονται. Plutarch. de Iſide.

obſerve, that in a ſolemn Sacrifice for Expiation, the guilt of the Offenders was by this rite of Execration ſuppoſed to be transferred upon the head of the Sacrifice, as it was in the Sacrifices among the Jews, by the laying on of hands; and that nothing was to be eaten of what was ſuppoſed to have that guilt transferred upon it. From hence all Expiatory Sacrifices were at firſt whole Burnt-offerings, as appears by the Patriarchal Sacrifices, and the Cuſtoms of other Nations, and among the Jews themſelves, as we have already proved in all ſolemn offerings for the People. And although in the Sacrifices of private perſons, ſome parts were allowed to be eaten by the Prieſts; yet thoſe which were deſigned for Expiation were conſumed. So that the greater the offering was to God, the more it implied the Conſumption of the thing which was ſo offered: How ſtrangely improbable then is it, That the Oblation of Chriſt ſhould not (as under the Law) have reſpect to his death and ſufferings; but to his entrance into Heaven, wherein nothing is ſuppoſed to be conſumed, but all things given him with far greater Power, as our Adverſaries ſuppoſe, than ever he had before. But we ſee the Apoſtle parallels Chriſt's ſuffering with the burning of the Sacrifices and his Blood with the Blood of them, and conſequently his offering up himſelf, muſt relate not to his entrance into Heaven, but to that Act of his whereby he ſuffered for ſins, and offered up his Blood as a Sacrifice for the ſins of the World.

Chriſt's entrance into Heaven could not be the Oblation of himſelf mentioned.

XI. From all which it appears; how far more agreeably to the Oblations under the Law, Chriſt is ſaid to offer up himſelf for the Expiation of ſins by his death and ſufferings, than by his entrance into Heaven; For it is apparent, that the Oblations in Expiatory Sacrifices under the Law, were ſuch upon which the Expiation of ſin did chiefly depend: but by our Adverſaries own Confeſſion, Chriſt's Oblation of himſelf by his entrance into Heaven, hath no immediate Reſpect at all to the Expiation of ſin: only as the way whereby he was to enjoy that power by which he did expiate ſins, as Crellius ſaith; now, let us conſider, what more propriety there is in making this preſenting of Chriſt in Heaven to have a correſpondency with the Legal Oblations, than the offering up himſelf upon the Croſs. For, 1. on the very ſame reaſon that his entrance into Heaven is made an Oblation, his Death is ſo too; viz. Becauſe it was the way whereby he obtained the power of Expiation; and far more properly ſo than the other, ſince they make Chriſt's entrance and power the reward of his ſufferings, but they never make his ſitting at the Right-hand of God, the reward of his entrance into Heaven. 2. His offering up himſelf to God upon the Croſs, was his own Act, but his entrance into Heaven was God's, as themſelves acknowledge, and therefore could not in any propriety of ſpeech be called Chriſt's offering up himſelf. 3. If it were his own Act, it could not have that Reſpect to the Expiation of ſins, which his death had; for our Adverſaries ſay, that his death was by reaſon of our ſins: and that he ſuffered to purge us from ſin; but his entrance into Heaven was upon his own account, to enjoy that Power and Authority, which he was to have at the Right hand of God. 4. How could Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, be the way for his enjoying that power which was neceſſary for the Expiation of ſin, when Chriſt before his entrance into Heaven, ſaith, that all power was given to him in Heaven and Earth: and the reaſon aſſigned in Scripture of that Power and Authority which God gave him is, becauſe he humbled himſelf, and became obedient to death,

even the Death of the Croſs: So that the entrance of Chriſt into Heaven, could not be the means of obtaining that Power which was conferred before; but the Death of Chriſt is mentioned on that account in Scripture. 5. If the Death of Chriſt were no Expiatory Sacrifice, the entrance of Chriſt into Heaven could be no Oblation proper to a High-Prieſt; for his entrance into the Holy of Holies, was on the account of the Blood of the ſin-offering which was carried in with him. If there were then no Expiatory Sacrifice before, that was ſlain for the ſins of Men; Chriſt could not be ſaid to make any Oblation in Heaven, for the Oblation had Reſpect to a Sacrifice already ſlain; ſo that if Men deny that Chriſt's Death was a proper Sacrifice for ſin, he could make no Oblation at all in Heaven, and Chriſt could not be ſaid to enter thither, as the High-Prieſt entred into the Holy of Holies with the Blood of the Sacrifice; which is the thing which the Author to the Hebrews aſſerts concerning Chriſt.

Chriſt's exerciſe of power in Heaven in no ſenſe an Oblation to God.

XII. 2. There is as great an inconſiſtency in making the Exerciſe of Chriſt's Power in Heaven, an Oblation in any ſenſe, as in making Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, to be the Oblation which had correſpondency with the Oblations of the Law. For what is there which hath the leaſt reſemblance with an Oblation in it? Hath it any Reſpect to God, as all the Legal Oblations had? No, for his interceſſion and power, Crellius ſaith, Reſpect us, and not God. Was there any Sacrifice at all in it for Expiation? How is it poſſible, that the mere Exerciſe of Power ſhould be called a Sacrifice? What Analogy is there at all between them? And how could he be then ſaid moſt perfectly to exerciſe his Prieſthood, when there was no Conſideration at all of any Sacrifice offered up to God? So that upon theſe Suppoſitions the Author to the Hebrews muſt argue upon ſtrange Similitudes, and fancy reſemblances to himſelf, which it was impoſſible for the Jews to underſtand him in, who were to judge of the Nature of Prieſthood and Oblations in a way agreeable to the Inſtitutions among themſelves. But was it poſſible for them to underſtand ſuch Oblations and a Prieſthood which had no Reſpect at all to God, but wholly to the People; and ſuch an entrance into the Holy of Holies without the Blood of an Expiatory Sacrifice for the ſins of the People: But ſuch abſurdities do Men betray themſelves into, when they are forced to ſtrain expreſs places of Scripture to ſerve an Hypotheſis, which they think themſelves oblig'd to maintain.

Crellius his ſenſe repugnant to the circumſtances of the places.

Heb. 7. 27. 9. 26. 10. 10.

XIII. We now come to ſhew that this interpretation of Crellius doth not agree with the Circumſtances of the places before mentioned, which will eaſily appear by theſe brief Conſiderations. 1. That the Apoſtle always ſpeaks of the offering of Chriſt as a thing paſt and once done, ſo as not to be done again; which had been very improper, if by the Oblation of Chriſt, he had meant the continual appearance of Chriſt in Heaven for us, which yet is, and will never ceaſe to be till all his Enemies be made his Footſtool. 2. That he ſtill ſpeaks in Alluſion to the Sacrifices which were in uſe among the Jews, and therefore the Oblation of Chriſt muſt be in ſuch a way as was agreeable to what was uſed in the Levitical Sacrifices, which we have already at large proved he could not do in our Adverſaries ſenſe. 3. That the Apoſtle ſpeaks of ſuch a Sacrifice for ſins to which the ſitting at the right hand of God was conſequent; ſo that the Oblation antecedent to it muſt be properly that Sacrifice for ſins which he offered to God; and therefore the

Exerciſe of his power for Expiation of ſins, which they ſay is meant by ſitting on the right hand of God, cannot be that Sacrifice for ſins: Neither can his entrance into Heaven be it, Heb. 10. 12. which in what ſenſe it can be called a Sacrifice for ſins, ſince themſelves acknowledge it had no immediate Relation to the Expiation of them, I cannot underſtand. 4. The Apoſtle ſpeaks of ſuch an Offering of Chriſt once, which if it had been repeated, doth imply, that Chriſt's ſufferings muſt have been repeated too. For then muſt he often have ſuffered ſince the Foundation of the World: Heb. 9.26. But the repeated Exerciſe of Chriſt's Power in Heaven doth imply no neceſſity at all of Chriſt's frequent ſuffering, nor his frequent entrance into Heaven; which might have been done without ſuffering, therefore it muſt be meant of ſuch an offering up himſelf as was implyed in his death and ſufferings. 5. He ſpeaks of the offering up of Heb. 10.5, 10. that Body which God gave him when he came into the World; but our Adverſaries deny, that he carried the ſame Body into Heaven, and therefore he muſt ſpeak not off an offering of Chriſt in Heaven, but what was performed here on Earth. But here our Adverſaries have ſhewn us a tryal of their Skill, when they tell us with much Confidence that the World into which Chriſt is here ſaid to come, is not to be underſtood of this World, but of that to come, Crell. cap. 10. ſect. 53. which is not only contrary to the general Acceptation of the word when taken abſolutely as it is here, but to the whole Scope and Deſign of the place. For he ſpeaks of that World wherein Sacrifices and Burnt-offerings were uſed, and the Levitical Law was obſerved, although not ſufficient for perfect Expiation, and ſo rejected for that end; and withal he ſpeaks of that World wherein the chearful obedience of Chriſt to the will of his Father was ſeen, for he ſaith, Low I come to do thy will, O God, Heb. 10. 7, 9. which is repeated afterwards; but will they ſay, that this World was not the place into which Chriſt came to obey the Will of his Father? And how could it be ſo properly ſaid of the future World, Lo I come to do thy will; when they make the deſign of his Aſcenſion to be the receiving the reward of his doing and ſuffering the will of God upon Earth?

XIV. But yet they attempt to prove from the ſame Author to the Hebrews, Objections anſwered. that Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, was neceſſary to his being a perfect High-Prieſt; for he was to be made Higher than the Heavens; Heb. 7.26. 8.4. 7.16. and if he were on Earth, he ſhould not be a Prieſt; but he was a Prieſt after the Power of an endleſs life: Neither could he, ſay they, be a perfect High-Prieſt, till thoſe words were ſpoken to him, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee; 5. 5. which as appears by other places, was after the Reſurrection: But all the ſufferings he underwent in the World, were only to qualifie him for this Office in Heaven; therefore it is ſaid, That in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his Brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful High-Prieſt, &c. 2. 17. This is the ſubſtance of what is produced by Crellius and his Brethren, to prove that Chriſt did not become a perfect High-Prieſt, Crell. c. 10. ſect. 53. till he entred into Heaven: But it were worth the knowing, what they mean by a Perfect High-Prieſt; Is it that Chriſt did then begin the Office of a High-Prieſt, and that he made no offering at all before? No, that they dare not aſſert at laſt, but that there was no perfect Sacrifice offered for ſin, otherwiſe Socinus contends, That Chriſt did offer upon Earth, and that for himſelf too: Socin. prælect. c. ult. So that all kind of offering is not excluded by themſelves, before Chriſt's entrance into Heaven: But if they mean by perfect High-Prieſt in Heaven, that his Office of High-Prieſt was not conſummated by what he did on Earth, but that a very conſiderable part of the Prieſthood of Chriſt was ſtill remaining to be performed in Heaven; it is no more than we do freely acknowledge, and this is all we ſay is meant by thoſe places: For the Apoſtles deſign is to prove, the excellency of the Prieſthood of Chriſt above the Aaronical; which he doth, not only from the excellency of the Sacrifice which he offered, above the Blood of Bulls and Goats; but from the excellency of the Prieſt, who did excel the Aaronical Prieſts; both in regard of his calling from God, which is all the Apoſtle deſigns, Heb. 5. 5. not at all intending to determine the time when he was made, but by whom he was made High-Prieſt, even by him that had ſaid, Thou art my Son, &c. and in regard of the excellency of the Sanctuary which he entred into, which was not an earthly, but a heavenly Sanctuary; and in regard of the perpetuity of his Function there, Not going in once a year, as the High-Prieſts under the Law did, but there ever living to make interceſſion for Us; Now this being the Apoſtles deſign, we may eaſily underſtand why he ſaith, That he was to be a heavenly High-Prieſt, and if he had been on Earth, he could not have been a Prieſt: The meaning of which is only this, that if Chriſt's Office had ended in what he did on Earth, he would not have had ſuch an excellency as he was ſpeaking of; for then he had ceaſed to be at all ſuch a High-Prieſt, having no Holy of Holies to go into, which ſhould as much tranſcend the earthly Sanctuary, as his Sacrifice did the Blood of Bulls and Goats: Therefore in correſpondency to that Prieſthood, which he did ſo far excel in all the parts of it, he was not to end his Prieſthood merely with the Blood which was ſhed for a Sacrifice, but he was to carry it into Heaven, and preſent it before God, and to be a perpetual interceſſor in the behalf of his People: And ſo was in regard of the perpetuity of his Office, a Prieſt after the Law of an endleſs Life: But leſt the People ſhould imagine, that ſo great and excellent a High-Prieſt, being ſo far exalted above them, ſhould have no ſenſe or compaſſion upon the Infirmities of his People, therefore to encourage them to adhere to him, he tells them, That he was made like to his Brethren; and therefore they need not doubt, but by the ſenſe which he had of the Infirmities of humane Nature, he will have pity on the weakneſſes of his People; which is all the Apoſtle means by thoſe Expreſſions. So that none of theſe places do deſtroy the Prieſthood of Chriſt on Earth, but only aſſert the excellency, and the Continuance of it in Heaven: Which latter, we are as far from denying, as our Adverſaries are from granting the former. And thus much may ſuffice for the ſecond thing, to prove the Death of Chriſt a proper Sacrifice for ſin; viz. The Oblation which Chriſt made of himſelf to God by it.

Of the true notion of Expiation, as attributed to Sacrifices.

I. THE laſt thing to prove the Death of Chriſt a proper Expiatory Sacrifice, is, That the Effects of a proper Sacrifice for ſin are attributed to it. Which do either reſpect the ſins committed, and are then called Expiation and Remiſſion, or the perſons, who were guilty of them, as they ſtand Obnoxious to the diſpleaſure of God, and ſo the Effect of them is Atonement and Reconciliation. Now theſe we ſhall prove do moſt properly and immediately refer to the Death of Chriſt; and are attributed to it, as the procuring cauſe of them; and not as a bare Condition of Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, or as comprehending in it the conſequents of it. I begin with the Expiation and Remiſſion of ſins; as to which Socinus doth acknowledge, That the great correſpondency doth lie between Chriſt and the Legal Sacrifices. We are therefore to enquire: 1. What reſpect the Expiation of ſins had to the Sacrifices under the Law. 2. In what ſenſe the Expiation of ſins is attributed to the Sacrifice of Chriſt: For the due Explication of the reſpect which Expiation of ſins had to the Legal Sacrifices, we are to conſider in what ſenſe Expiation is underſtood, and in what reſpect it is attributed to them. For this we are to enquire into the importance of the ſeveral Phraſes it is ſet forth by, which are כפר and חטא in the Old Teſtament, καθαρίζειν, ἁγιάζειν, ἱλάσκεσθαι in the New; all which are acknowledged by our Adverſaries to have a peculiar Reſpect to the Expiation made by a Sacrifice. We ſhall begin with the former, becauſe Crellius objects this againſt Grotius, That he imployed his greateſt diligence in the Explication of the Greek and Latin words for Expiation of ſin, and was contented only to ſay, that the Hebrew words would bear the ſame ſignification: Whereas, ſaith he, he ought to have proved, that the Hebrew words do require that ſenſe which he takes them in. But by Crellius his leave, Grotius took the beſt courſe was to be taken in words, whoſe ſignification is ſo obſcure as thoſe are in the Hebrew Language. For כפר being ſo very rarely uſed in Scripture in that which Socinus and Crellius contend to be the proper and natural ſignification of it;

Crell. cap. 10. ſect. 26.

Crell. c. 10. ſect. 38.

viz. To hide or cover, and ſo frequently in the ſenſe of Expiation, what better way could be taken for determining the ſenſe of it, as applied to Sacrifices, than by inſiſting upon thoſe words which are uſed in the New Teſtament, to the very ſame purpoſe that כפר is uſed in the Old? For they cannot pretend that which they ſay is the moſt proper ſenſe, can be applied to this Subject, viz. To cover with Pitch, or a bituminous matter, which is called כפר, Gen. 6. 14. therefore it muſt of neceſſity be taken in another ſenſe here. But Socinus contends, That it ought to be taken in a ſenſe moſt agreeable to that, which is, ſaith he, that the Expiation of ſin be nothing elſe, but the covering of it, by God's Grace and Benignity. Thence, ſaith he, David ſaith, Bleſſed is the Man whoſe iniquity is covered. But how can this prove, that the proper ſignification of כפר as applied to ſin, is covered by God's Grace, when neither the word כפר is here uſed, nor is there any Reſpect at all mentioned of an Expiation by Sacrifice, which is the thing we are diſcourſing of? And is the covering of ſin ſuch an eaſie and intelligible Phraſe, that this ſhould be made choice of to explain the difficulty of כפר by? What is it that they would have us underſtand by the covering ſin? Surely not to make it ſtronger and more laſting, as the Ark was covered with that bituminous matter for that end, and yet this would come the neareſt to the proper ſenſe of כפר. So that from their own interpretation it appears, that כפר as applied to the Expiation of ſin by Sacrifices, cannot be taken ſo much as in Alluſion to that other ſenſe; for their ſenſe of Expiation, is either by the deſtruction of ſin, or deliverance of the ſinner from the Puniſhment of it, but what Reſemblance is there between the covering of a thing, in order to its preſervation, and the making it not to be, or at leaſt deſtroying all the Power of it? But ſuppoſing we ſhould grant that it hath ſome Alluſion to the ſenſe of covering, why muſt it neceſſarily be ſuppoſed to be done by the meer Grace of God, as excluding all antecedent Cauſes which ſhould move to it? Would not the propriety of the ſenſe remain as well, ſuppoſing a moving Cauſe, as excluding it? What ſhould hinder, but that God may be ſaid as well to cover ſin upon a Sactiſice as to forgive it, and this is very frequently uſed upon a Sacrifice, That the ſin ſhall be forgiven? But yet themſelves acknowledge, that the Sacrifices were Conditions required in order to Expiation; if then כפר hath an immediate Reſpect to God's immediate Favour and benignity, how comes it to be uſed where a Condition is neceſſarily ſuppoſed in order to it? Had it not been more agreeable to this Benignity of God to have pardon'd ſin without requiring any Sacrifice for it, than ſo ſtrictly inſiſting upon the offering up Sacrifice in order to it, and then declaring that the ſin is expiated, and it ſhould be forgiven? From hence we ſee that there is no neceſſity why כפר ſhould be uſe as applied to Sacrifices in a ſenſe moſt agreeable to that of covering with Pitch, nor that it is not poſſible it ſhould have ſuch a ſenſe when applied to ſins; and withal that it is very conſiſtent with an antecedent Condition to it, and therefore can by no means deſtroy Satisfaction.

II. Yes, ſaith Crellius, it doth, for Expiation is explained in the Law by non imputation, Deut. 21. 8. Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people Iſrael whom thou haſt redeemed, and lay not innocent Blood unto the people of Iſrael's Charge; and the Blood ſhall be forgiven them. But not to impute, ſaith he, and to receive true and full Satisfaction overthrow each other: And ſo Expiation being the ſame with that, will overthrow it too:

Crell. c. 10. ſect. 9.

To this I anſwer, 1. I grant that כפר is here uſed both as applied to God, and to the ſin, and that the ſenſe of it is uſed as to the people, when the Prayer is that God would not lay it to their Charge, which is the ſame with expiating of it. 2. We are to conſider, what the Foundation of this Prayer was, viz. The ſlaying of the Heifer for Expiation of the uncertain Murder; and when the Elders had waſhed their Hands over the head of the Heifer, then they were to proteſt their own innocency, and to uſe this Prayer. כפר למעך ושראל Expiate thy people Iſrael, &c. i. e. accept of this Sacrifice as an Expiation for them, and ſo charge not on them the innocent Blood, &c. and upon doing of this it is ſaid, ונכפר להם הדם, and the Blood ſhall be expiated, i. e. as the Vulgar Latin explains it, the guilt of the Blood ſhall be taken from them. But how then ſhould the expiating ſin upon a Sacrifice ſlain in order thereto, deſtroy that Satisfaction which we aſſert by the Blood of Chriſt being ſhed in order to the Expiation of our ſins? Nay, it much rather ſheweth the conſiſtency and agreeableneſs of theſe one with another. For we have before proved, that the Sacrifice here did expiate the ſin by a Subſtitution, and bearing the guilt which could not have been expiated without it. But Crellius further urgeth, That God himſelf is here ſaid to expiate, and therefore to expiate cannot ſignifie to atone or ſatisfie; in which ſenſe Chriſt may be ſaid to expiate too, not by atoning or ſatisfying, but by not imputing ſins, or taking away the Puniſhment of them by his power. To which we need no other anſwer than what Crellius himſelf elſewhere gives, viz. That Socinus never denies but that כפר doth ſignifie to appeaſe or atone; which is moſt evidently proved from the place mention'd by Grotius, Gen. 32. 20. אכפרה פניו במנחה Expiabo faciem ejus in munere, ſaith the interlineary Verſion, placabo illum muneribus, the Vulg. Lat. ἐξιλάσομαι τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, the LXX. and all the Circumſtances of the place make it appear to be meant in the proper ſenſe of appeaſing the anger of a perſon by ſomething which may move him to ſhew Favour. And if Crellius will yield this to be the ſenſe of Expiation as applied to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, he need not quarrel with the word Satisfaction. But why ſhould he rather attribute that ſenſe of Expiation to Chriſt, which is alone given to God, wherein the Expiation is attributed to him that receives the Sacrifice, rather than to him that offers the Sacrifice in order to the Atonement of another? Since it is acknowledged that Chriſt did offer a Sacrifice; and therefore there can be no reaſon why that ſenſe of Expiation ſhould not belong to him, which was moſt peculiar to that; which we ſhall now ſhew to be of the ſame kind with what is here mentioned, viz. an appeaſing by a Gift offered up to God. So we find the word uſed to the ſame ſenſe, 2 Sam. 21. 3. ובמה אכפר ἐν τίνι ἐξιλάσομαι, and wherewith ſhall I make the Atonement, i. e. wherewith ſhall I ſatisfie you for all the wrong which Saul hath done unto you? And we ſee afterwards it was by the Death of Saul's Sons. In which place it cannot be denied but that כפר not only ſignifies to appeaſe, but ſuch a kind of Satisfaction as is by the Death of ſome for the faults of others; and ſo comes home, not only to the importance of the Expiation belonging to a Sacrifice in general; but to ſuch a kind of Expiation as is by the ſuffering of ſome in the place of others. Which though it be more clear and diſtinct, where one man ſuffers for others, yet this was ſufficiently repreſented in the Sacrifices under the Law, in which we have already proved that there was a Subſtitution of them in the place of the Offenders.

Cum non neget Socinus hoc verbum placandi ſignificationem habere. Crell. c. 20. ſect. 38.

III. And

Buxtorf. Lexic. Talmud. v. כפר.

III. And in this ſenſe the Jews themſelves do underſtand כפר, viz. ſuch an Expiation as is made by the Subſtitution of one in the place of another. Of which many inſtances are collected by Buxtorf, wherein כפרה is taken by the Rabbinical Writers for ſuch an Expiation, whereby one was to undergo a Puniſhment in the place of another. So when in the Title Sanhedrin the people ſay to the High-Prieſt לו אנו כפרתך ſimus nos expiatio tua, let us be for an Expiation for you, the Gloſs explains it thus, hoc eſt, in nobis fiat expiatio tua, noſque ſubeamus tuo loco quicquid tibi evenire debet. And when they tell us how Children ought to honour their Parents after their Death, they ſay when they recite any memorable Speech of their Fathers, they are not barely to ſay, My Father ſaid ſo: But my Lord and Father ſaid ſo, would I had been the Expiation of his Death: i. e. as they explain it themſelves, would I had undergone what he did, and they give this general rule, where ever it is ſaid, behold I am for Expiation, it is to be underſtood, behold I am in the place of another to bear his Iniquities. So that this ſignifies the ſame with λύτρον or a price of Redemption for others. Hence כפר is taken for a Price of Redemption of the life of another, and rendred by λύτρον, Exod. 21. 30.——30. 12. Numb. 35. 31, 32. where we render it Satisfaction, and by ἐξίλασμα, Pſal. 48. 7. and thereby we fully underſtand, what our Saviour meant when he ſaid, that he gave his Soul, λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ranſome for many, and to this day the Jews call the Cock which they kill for Expiation on the day of Atonement, by the name of Cappara; and when they beat the Cock againſt their heads thrice, they every time uſe words to this purpoſe, Let this Cock be an Exchange for me, let him be in my Room, and be made an Expiation for me: Let death come to him, but to me and all Iſrael Life and Happineſs. I inſiſt on theſe things, only to let us underſtand, that the Jews never underſtood כפר in the ſence our Adverſaries contend for, when applied to an Expiatory Sacrifice, but as implying a Commutation, and a Subſtitution of one in the place of another, ſo as by the Puniſhment of that, the other in whoſe room he ſuffers, may obtain deliverance. Which is the ſenſe we plead for. But the utmoſt which * Socinus and Crellius will allow to the Sacrifices in order to Expiation, is barely this, That the offering of them is to be conſidered as a meer Condition (that hath no other Reſpect to the Expiation of ſins, than the paring a Mans Nails would have had, if God had required it) upon which ſlight obedience, the pardon of ſome light ſins might be obtained. But can any one imagine, that this was all that was deſigned by the Sacrifices of old, who conſiders the Antiquity and Univerſality of them in the World in thoſe elder times before the Law, the great ſeverity by which they were requir'd under the Law, the punctual Preſcriptions that were made in all Circumſtances for them, the vaſt and almoſt ineſtimable Expence the People were at about them, but above all, the reaſon that God himſelf aſſigns in the Law, That the Blood was given for Expiation, becauſe it was the Life, and the correſpondency ſo clearly expreſſed in the New Teſtament, between the Sacrifice of Chriſt, and thoſe Levitical Sacrifices? Can any one, I ſay, imagine upon theſe Conſiderations, that the Sacrifices had no other Reſpect to the Expiation of ſin, than as they were a ſlight Teſtimony of their obedience to God? Why were not an inward ſorrow for ſin, and Tears and Prayers rather made the only Conditions of Expiation than ſuch a burthenſome and chargeable Service impoſed upon them, which which at laſt ſignified nothing, but that a command being ſuppoſed; they would have ſinned if they had broken it? But upon our Suppoſition a reaſonable account is given of all the expiatory Sacrifices; viz. That God would have them ſee, how highly he eſteemed his Laws, becauſe an Expiation was not to be made for the breach of them, but by the ſacrificing of the Life of ſome Creature which he ſhould appoint inſtead of the Death of the Offender; and if the breach of thoſe Laws which he had given them muſt require ſuch an Expiation, what might they then think would the ſins of the whole World do, which muſt be expiated by a Sacrifice infinitely greater than all thoſe put together were; viz. The death and ſufferings of the Son of God for the ſins of Men? But if the offering Sacrifice had been a bare Condition required of the perſon who committed the fault, in order to Expiation; Why is it never ſaid, That the perſon who offered it, did expiate his own fault thereby? For that had been the moſt proper ſenſe; for if the Expiation did depend on the offering the Sacrifice, as on the Condition of it, then the performing the Condition, gave him an immediate right to the benefit of the Promiſe. If it be ſaid, That his own act was not only neceſſary in bringing the Sacrifice, but the Prieſts alſo in offering up the Blood: This will not make it at all the more reaſonable; becauſe the pardon of ſin ſhould not only depend upon a Man's own Act, but upon the Act of another, which he could not in reaſon be accountable for, if he miſcarried in it. If the Prieſt ſhould refuſe to do his part, or be unfit to do it, or break ſome Law in the doing of it, how hard would it ſeem that a Mans ſins could not be expiated, when he had done all that lay in his own power in order to the Expiation of them, but that another perſon, whoſe Actions he had no command over, neglected the doing his Duty? So that if the Sacrifice had no other influence on Expiation, but as a part of obedience, in all reaſon the Expiation ſhould have depended on no other Conditions but ſuch as were under the Power of him, whoſe ſins were to be expiated by it.

IV. But Crellius urgeth againſt our ſenſe of Expiation, That if it were by Subſtitution, then the Expiation would be moſt properly attributed to the Sacrifices themſelves; whereas it is only ſaid, that by the Sacrifices the Expiation is obtained; but that God or the Prieſt do expiate and to God it belongs properly, becauſe he takes away the Guilt and Puniſhment of ſin; which is, ſaith he, all meant by Expiation; to the Prieſt only conſequently, as doing what God requires in order to it; and to the Sacrifices only as the Conditions by which it was obtained. But if the Expiation doth properly belong to God, and implies no more than bare pardon, it is hard to conceive that it ſhould have any neceſſary Relation to the Blood of the Sacrifice: But the Apoſtle to the Hebrews tells us, that Remiſſion had a neceſſary Reſpect to the ſhedding of Blood, ſo that without that there was no Remiſſion. How improperly doth the Apoſtle diſcourſe throughout that Chapter, wherein he ſpeaks ſo much concerning the Blood of the Sacrifices purifying, and in correſpondency to that, the Blood of Chriſt purging our Conſciences; and that all things under the Law, were purified with Blood: Had all this no other ſignification, but that this was a bare Condition that had no other importance, but as a mere Act of obedience when God had required it? Why doth not the Apoſtle rather ſay, without God's Favour there is no Remiſſion, than without the ſhedding of Blood; if all the Expiation did properly belong to that, and only very remotely to the Blood of the Sacrifice? What imaginable neceſſity was there, that Chriſt muſt ſhed his Blood in order to the Expiation of our ſins, if all that Blood of the Legal Sacrifices did ſignifie no more than a bare Condition of Pardon, though a ſlight part of obedience in it ſelf? Why muſt Chriſt lay down his Life in correſpondency to theſe Levitical Sacrifices? For that was ſurely no ſlight part of his obedience. Why might not this Condition have been diſpenſed with in him, ſince our Adverſaries ſay, that in it ſelf it hath no proper Efficacy on the Expiation of ſin? And doth not this ſpeak the greateſt Repugnancy to the kindneſs and Grace of God in the Goſpel, that he would not diſpenſe with the ignominious Death of his Son, although he knew it could have no influence of it ſelf on the Expiation of the ſins of the World? But upon this Suppoſition, that the Blood of Sacrifices under the Law had no proper influence upon Expiation, the Apoſtles diſcourſe proceeds upon weak and inſufficient Grounds. For what neceſſity in the thing was there, becauſe the Blood of the Sacrifices was made a Condition of pardon under the Law, therefore the Blood of Chriſt muſt be ſo now; although in it ſelf it hath no proper Efficacy for that end? But the Apoſtles words and way of Argumentation doth imply, that there was a peculiar Efficacy both in the one and the other, in order to Expiation; although a far greater in the Blood of Chriſt, than could be in the other; as the thing typified, ought to exceed that which was the Repreſentation of it. From hence we ſee, that the Apoſtle attributes what Expiation there was under the Law, not immediately to God, as belonging properly to him, but to the Blood of Bulls and Goats, and the Aſhes of an Heifer, ſprinkling the unclean. Which he had very great reaſon to do, ſince God expreſly ſaith to the Jews, that the Blood was given them לכפר ad expiandum, to expiate for their Souls, for the Blood Lev. 17. 11. כנפש כפר ſhall expiate the Soul. Than which words, nothing could have been more plainly ſaid to overthrow Crellius his Aſſertion, that Expiation is not properly or chiefly attributed to the Sacrifices, but primarily to God, and conſequentially to the Prieſt: Who is never ſaid to expiate, but by the Sacrifice which he offered, ſo that his Office was barely Miniſterial in it. But from this we may eaſily underſtand, in what ſenſe God is ſaid to expiate ſins, where it hath Reſpect to a Sacrifice (which is that we are now diſcourſing of, and not in any larger or more improper uſe of the word) for ſince God himſelf hath declared, that the Blood was given for Expiation, the Expiation which belongs to God, muſt imply his acceptance of it for that end, for which it was offered. For the Execution or diſcharge of the Puniſhment belonging to him, he may be ſaid in that ſenſe to expiate, becauſe it is only in his power to diſcharge the ſinner from that Obligation to puniſhment he lies under by his ſins. And we do not ſay, that where expiating is attributed to him that accepts the Atonement, that it doth imply his undergoing any Puniſhment which is impoſſible to ſuppoſe; but that where it is attributed to a Sacrifice, as the means of Atonement, there we ſay it doth not imply a bare Condition, but ſuch a Subſtitution of one in the place of another, that on the account of that, the fault of the Offender himſelf is expiated thereby.

The importance of καθαρίζειν, and ἁγιάζειν, relating to ſacrifices.

V. And to this ſenſe the other word חטא doth very well agree; for Socinus and Crellius cannot deny, But that Gen. 31. 39. it properly ſignifies Luere, or to bear Puniſhment; although they ſay, it no where elſe ſignifies ſo, and the reaſon is, becauſe it is applied to the Altar, and ſuch other things, which are not capable of it; but doth it hence follow, that it ſhould not retain that Signification where the matter will bear it, as in the caſe of Sacrifices. And although it be frequently render'd by ἁγιάζειν, καθαρίζειν, ἐξιλάσκεσθαι, yet that will be no prejudice to the ſenſe we plead for in reſpect of Sacrifices, becauſe thoſe words when uſed concerning them, do ſignifie Expiation too. “ Grotius proves, “ that they do from their own nature and conſtant uſe in Greek Authors, not only ſignifie an antecedency of order, but a peculiar Effi- “ cacy in order to Expiation. Thence Expiatory Sacrifices among the “ Greeks were called ἱλαστικὰ, ἁγνιστικὰ, καθαρτικὰ and ἱλάσκεσθαι, fre- “ quently in Homer, applied to Sacrifices, ἁγνίζειν τὴν πόλιν καθαρμοῖς “ in Plutarch, and ἁγιάζειν uſed in the ſame ſenſe; an Expiatory Sa- “ crifice in Herodotus is call'd καθάρσιον, and to the ſame purpoſe it is “ uſed in Hermogenes, Plato and Plutarch: As among the Latins, pla- “ care, purgare, purificare, conciliare, luſtrare in the ſame ſenſe, and “ piare when uſed in Sacrifices; he proves to ſignifie Luere per ſucceſſio- “ nem rei alterius in locum pœnæ debitæ. “ Thence piaculum uſed for an “ Expiatory Sacrifice, and expiare is to appeaſe by ſuch a Sacrifice, ſo “ Cereris numen expiare is uſed in Cicero; filium expiare in Livy. So “ that all theſe Sacrifices among them were ſuppoſed ſtill to pertain to “ the atoning the Deity, and obtaining a Remiſſion of ſins committed “ by them. And from hence (becauſe where there was a greater Equa- “ lity and Nearneſs, there might be the greater Efficacy of the Sacrifice “ for Expiation) came the cuſtom of ſacrificing Men, which Grotius at “ large ſhews to have almoſt univerſally obtained before the coming of “ Chriſt. We are now to conſider what Crellius anſwers to this; the ſubſtance of which lies in theſe two things. 1. He denies not but that καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν do in their proper uſe in the Greek Tongue ſignifie the purging of guilt, and the Averſion of the wrath of God and Puniſhment, but that thoſe and ſuch other words are attributed to Sacrifices, becauſe thoſe were ſuppoſed to be the Effects of them among the Heathen; but the attributing ſuch Effects to them, did ariſe from their Superſtition, whereby greater things were attributed to Sacrifices, than God would have given to them, either before or under the Law. 2. He denies not, but that thoſe words, καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν, being uſed by the Author to the Hebrews more than once with reſpect to the Sacrifices and Prieſthood of Chriſt, were taken in the ſame ſenſe in which they are uſed in the Greek Tongue, viz. For the purging of guilt, and the Averſion of the Wrath of God, and the Puniſhment conſequent upon it: But all that he contends for is, That there is a difference in the manner of effecting it, which he acknowledges the words themſelves do not imply; and the reaſons he gives for it are, That the other were proper, but Chriſt's an improper Sacrifice; and that the other Sacrifices were offered by Men to God, but the Sacrifice of Chriſt was given by God to Men, and therefore he muſt be ſuppoſed to be reconciled before. From whence he would at leaſt have other ſenſes of theſe words joyned together with the former; viz. Either for purging away the filth of ſin, or for a declaration of a deliverance from guilt and puniſhment, in imitation of the Idiom of the Hebrew, in which many words are uſed in the New Teſtament. From hence it follows, that Crellius doth yield the main cauſe, if it appear, that Chriſt did offer up an Expiatory

Crell. c. 10. ſect. 13, & 24.

Itaque quod ad voces Græcas καθαρίζειν & ἁγιάζειν attinet, quibus in hoc argumento non ſemel utitur D. ſcriptor ad Heb. eæ ad Chriſti Sacrificium & Sacerdotii functionem relatæ eo etiam ſenſu uſurpantur quem Græca lingua receperat, h. e. de expurgatione reatus & averſione iræ numinis aut pœnæ. Crell. c. 10. p. 499.

tory Sacrifice to God in his Death, for then he grants that καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν being applied to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, are to be taken for the purging away of guilt, and the Averſion of the Wrath of God, and the puniſhment of ſin. And it is to no purpoſe to ſay, that it is not a proper Sacrifice, for if the Effects of a proper Sacrifice do belong to it, that proves that it is ſo; for theſe words being acknowledged to be applied to the Sacrifice of Chriſt by the Author to the Hebrews, what could more evince that Chriſt's was a proper Sacrifice, than that thoſe things are attributed to it, which by the conſent of all Nations, are ſaid to belong to proper Sacrifices, and that in the very ſame ſenſe in which they are uſed by thoſe who underſtood them in the moſt proper ſenſe. And what reaſon could Crellius have to ſay, that it was only the Superſtition of the Heathens, which made them attribute ſuch Effects to Sacrifices; when himſelf acknowledges that the very ſame ſenſe doth belong to the Sacrifice of Chriſt under that Notion? And as to the Jews we have already proved that the ſenſe of Expiation among them was by virtue of the Law to be taken in as proper a ſenſe as among the Heathens, for the purging of guilt, and the Averſion of the Wrath of God. And why ſhould Crellius deny that effect of the Sacrifice of Chriſt as to the Atonement of God, becauſe God's love was ſeen in giving him who was to offer the Sacrifice? Since that effect is attributed to thoſe Sacrifices under the Law which God himſelf appointed to be offered, and ſhewed his great kindneſs to the People in the Inſtitution of ſuch a way, whereby their ſins might be expiated, and they delivered from the Puniſhment of them. But of the conſiſtency of theſe two, I ſhall ſpeak more afterwards, in the Effect of the Sacrifices as relating to Perſons.

Expiation attributed to the Sacrifice of Chriſt in the ſame ſenſe that it was to other Sacrifices.

VI. We now come to conſider in what ſenſe the Expiation of ſins is in Scripture attributed to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, and therein I ſhall prove theſe two things. 1. That the Expiation is attributed to the Sacrifice of Chriſt in the ſame ſenſe that it is attributed to other Sacrifices, and as the words in themſelves do ſignifie. 2. That what is ſo attributed doth belong to the Sacrifice of Chriſt in his Death, antecedent to his entrance into Heaven. 1. That the Expiation is to be taken in a proper ſenſe, when it is attributed to the Sacrifice of Chriſt. Crellius tells us, The controverſie is not about the thing, viz. Whether Expiation in the ſenſe we take it in for purging away guilt, and Averſion of the Wrath of God, doth belong to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, for he acknowledges it doth, but all the queſtion is about the manner of it: Which in the next Section he thus explains: There are three ſenſes in which Chriſt may be ſaid to expiate ſins; either by begetting Faith in us, whereby we are drawn off from the Practice of ſin, in which ſenſe, he ſaith, it is a remoter antecedent to it; or as it relates to the Expiation by actual deliverance from Puniſhment, ſo he ſaith, it is an immediate antecedent to it: Or as he declares that they are expiated, but this, he ſaith, doth not ſo properly relate to Chriſt as a Sacrifice, but as a Prieſt. But never a one of theſe ſenſes comes near to that which Crellius grants to be the proper importance of καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν, as applied to a Sacrifice, viz. The purging away guilt, and the Averſion of the Wrath of God, and Puniſhment, not any way, but by the means of the Sacrifice offered. For in the Legal Sacrifices nothing can be more plain than that the Expiation was to be by the Sacrifice offered for Atonement: Suppoſing then that in ſome other way (which could be by no means proper to thoſe Sacrifices) Chriſt may be ſaid to expiate ſins, what doth this prove that there was an Expiation belonging to his Sacrifice agreeable to the Sacrifices of old? But as I urged before in the caſe of Chriſt's being High-Prieſt, that by their Aſſertions the Jews might utterly deny the force of any Argument uſed by the Author to the Hebrews to prove it: So I ſay as to the Expiation by Chriſt's Sacrifice, that it hath no Analogy or Correſpondency at all with any Sacrifice that was ever offered for the Expiation of ſins. For by that they always underſtood ſomething which was immediately offered to God for that end, upon which they obtained Remiſſion of ſins; but here is nothing anſwerable to it in their ſenſe of Chriſt's Sacrifice; for here is no Oblation at all made unto God for this end; all the Efficacy of the Sacrifice of Chriſt, in order to Expiation doth wholly and immediately Reſpect us; ſo that if it be a proper Sacrifice to any, it muſt be a Sacrifice to us, and not to God: For a Sacrifice is always ſaid to be made to him whom it doth immediately Reſpect; but Chriſt in the planting Faith, in actual deliverance, in declaring to us this deliverance, doth wholly Reſepect us, and therefore his Sacrifice muſt be made to Men, and not to God. Which is in it ſelf a groſs abſurdity, and repugnant to the nature and deſign of Sacrifices from the firſt inſtitution of them; which were always eſteemed ſuch immediate parts of Divine Worſhip, that they ought to reſpect none elſe but God, as the object to which they were directed, though for the benefit and advantage of Mankind. As well then might Chriſt be ſaid to pray for us, and by that no more be meant but that he doth teach us to underſtand our duty; as be made an Expiatory Sacrifice for us, and all the Effect of it only reſpect us and not God. And this is ſo far from adding to the perfection of Chriſt's Sacrifice above the Legal (which is the thing pleaded by Crellius) that it deſtroys the very nature of a Sacrifice, if ſuch a way of Expiation be attributed to it (which though conceived to be more excellent in itſelf) yet is wholly incongruous to the end and deſign of a Sacrifice for Expiation. And the excellency of the manner of Expiation ought to be in the ſame kind, and not quite of another nature; for, will any one ſay, that a General of an Army hath a more excellent Conduct than all that went before him, becauſe he can make finer Speeches; or that the Aſſomanæan Family diſcharg'd the Office of Prieſthood beſt, becauſe they had a greater Power over the People; or that Nero was the moſt excellent Emperour of Rome becauſe he excelled the reſt in Muſick and Poetry: By which we ſee that to aſſert an excellency of one above another, we muſt not go to another kind, but ſhew its excellency in that wherein the Compariſon lies: So that this doth not prove the excellency of the Sacrifice of Chriſt, becauſe he hath a greater Power to perſwade, deliver and govern, than any Sacrifice under the Law; for theſe are things quite of another nature from the Conſideration of a Sacrifice: But therein the excellency of a Sacrifice is to be demonſtrated, that it excells all other in the proper end and deſign of a Sacrifice, i. e. if it be more effectual towards God for obtaining the Expiation of ſin; which was always thought to be the proper end of all Sacrifices for Expiation. Although then Chriſt may be allowed to excel all other Sacrifices in all imaginable Reſpects but that which is the proper intention of a Sacrifice; it may prove far greater excellency in Chriſt, but it doth withall prove a greater Imperfection in his Sacrifice, if it fail in that which is the proper end of it. So that if we ſhould grant that the Expiation attributed to Chriſt's Sacrifice ſignified no more than reclaiming claiming Men from their ſins, or their deliverance by his Power, or a Declaration of God's decree to pardon, this may prove that there are better Arguments to believe the Remiſſion of our ſins now under the Goſpel; but they do not in the leaſt prove that Chriſt is to be conſider'd as a Sacrifice; much leſs that he doth far excell in the notion of an Expiatory Sacrifice all thoſe which were offered up to God for that end under the Law.

Crell c.10 ſect. 26.

Expiation by Chriſt not meerly declarative.

VII. But we muſt now further conſider, whether this be all attributed to Chriſt in order to Expiation in Scripture; i. e. Whether thoſe words which of themſelves do imply the Averſion of the Wrath of God, when uſed concerning other Sacrifices, when applied to the Sacrifice of Chriſt, do only imply the begetting Faith in us, or a Declaration of Pardon. The words which are uſed to this purpoſe, are καθαρίζειν, ἁγιάζειν, ῥαντίζειν, λούειν, which are all applied to the Blood of Chriſt, and the diſpute is, whether they ſignifie no more but a Declaration of Pardon, or a means to beget Faith in us. The firſt words καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν Crellius acknowledgeth do frequently ſignifie deliverance from guilt and puniſhment; but, he ſaith, they may likewiſe ſignifie a Declaration of that deliverance, as decreed by God, or a purging from the ſins themſelves, or from the Cuſtom of ſinning. So that by Crellius his own Confeſſion, the ſenſe we contend for is moſt proper and uſual, the other are more remote, and only poſſible; why then ſhould we forſake the former ſenſe, which doth moſt perfectly agree to the nature of a Sacrifice, which the other ſenſes have no ſuch Relation to, as that hath? For theſe being the words made uſe of in the New Teſtament, to imply the Force and Efficacy of a Sacrifice, why ſhould they not be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe which the Hebrew words are taken in, when they are applied to the Sacrifices under the Law? We are not enquiring into all poſſible ſenſes of words, but into the moſt natural and agreeable to the ſcope of them that uſe them: And that we ſhall make it appear to be the ſame, we plead for in the places in diſpute between us; as, 1 John 1. 7. The Blood of Jeſus Chriſt his Son, καθαρίζει ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ πάσης ἁμαρτίας, purgeth us from all ſin, Heb. 9. 13, 14. If the Blood of Bulls, and of Goats, and the Aſhes of an Heifer, ſprinkling the unclean, ἁγιάζει πρὸς τὴν τῆς σαρκὸς καθαρότητα ſanctifieth to the purifying of the fleſh, How much more ſhall the Blood of Chriſt purge your Conſciences from dead works, καθαρίζει τὴν συνείδησιν? Heb. 1. 3. δι' ἑαυτοῦ καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, when he had by himſelf purged our ſins. So ῥαντίζειν and λούειν are uſed with a Reſpect to the Blood of Chriſt, Heb. 10. 22. Apocalyp. 1. 5. And becauſe Remiſſion of ſin was looked on as the conſequent of Expiation by Sacrifice under the Law; therefore that is likewiſe attributed to the Blood of Chriſt, Matth. 26. 28. This is the Blood of the New Teſtament which was ſhed for many, εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, for the Remiſſion of ſins, Eph. 1. 7. In whom we have Redemption through his Blood, the Remiſſion of ſins, and to the ſame purpoſe, Coloſſ. 1. 14. And from hence we are ſaid to be juſtified by his Blood, Rom. 5. 9. and Chriſt is ſaid to be a Propitiation through faith in his Blood, Rom. 3. 25. The ſubſtance of all that Crellius replies to theſe places is, That thoſe words which do properly ſignifie the thing it ſelf, may very conveniently be taken only for the Declaration of it, when the performance of the thing doth follow by virtue of that Declaration: Which then happens, when the Declaration is made of the thing decreed by another, and that in the name and by the command of him who did decree it. And in this ſenſe, Chriſt

Crell. cap. 10. ſect. 28. p. 506.

Crell. c. 10. ſect. 28.

Chriſt by his Blood may be ſaid to deliver us from the Puniſhment of our ſins, by declaring or teſtifying to us the will and decree of God for that purpoſe. But this anſwer is by no means ſufficient, upon theſe Conſiderations; 1. Becauſe it doth not reach the proper and natural ſenſe of the words, as Crellius himſelf confeſſeth; and yet he aſſigns no reaſon at all, why we ought to depart from it, unleſs the bare poſſibility of another meaning be ſufficient. But how had it been poſſible for the Efficacy of the Blood of Chriſt for purging away the guilt of our ſins, to have been expreſſed in clearer and plainer terms than theſe, which are acknowledged of themſelves to ſignifie as much as we aſſert? If the moſt proper Expreſſions for this purpoſe, are not of Force enough to perſwade our Adverſaries, none elſe could ever do it: So that it had been impoſſible for our Doctrine to have been delivered in ſuch terms, but they would have found out ways to evade the meaning of them. It ſeems very ſtrange, that ſo great an Efficacy ſhould not only once or twice, but ſo frequently be attributed to the Blood of Chriſt for Expiation of ſin, if nothing elſe were meant by it, but that Chriſt by his Death did only declare that God was willing to pardon ſin? If there were danger in underſtanding the words in their proper ſenſe, why are they ſo frequently uſed to this purpoſe? Why are there no other places of Scripture that might help to undeceive us, and tell us plainly, that Chriſt dyed only to declare his Father's will? But what ever other words might ſignifie, this was the only true meaning of them. But what miſerable ſhifts are theſe, when Men are forced to put off ſuch Texts which are confeſſed to expreſs our Doctrine, only by ſaying that they may be otherwiſe underſtood? Which deſtroys all kind of certainty in words; which by reaſon of the various uſe of them, may be interpreted to ſo many ſeveral ſenſes, that if this liberty be allowed, upon no other pretence, but that another meaning is poſſible, Men will never agree about the intention of any perſon in ſpeaking. For upon the ſame reaſon, if it had been ſaid, That Chriſt declared by his death God's readineſs to pardon, it might have been interpreted, That the Blood of Chriſt was therefore the Declaration of God's readineſs to pardon, becauſe it was the Conſideration upon which God would do it: So that if the words had been as expreſs for them, as they are now againſt them, according to their way of anſwering places, they would have been reconcileable to our Opinion. 2. The Scripture in theſe Expreſſions, doth attribute ſomething peculiar to the Blood of Chriſt; but if all that were meant by it were no more, than the declaring God's Will to pardon, this could in no ſenſe be ſaid to be peculiar to it. For this was the deſign of the Doctrine of Chriſt, and all his Miracles were wrought to confirm the truth of that part of his Doctrine, which concerned Remiſſion of ſins as well as any other: But how abſurd would it have been to ſay, that the Miracles of Chriſt purge us from all ſin, that through Chriſt healing the ſick, raiſing the dead, &c. We have Redemption, even the forgiveneſs of ſins, which are attributed to the Blood of Chriſt? But if no other Reſpect, than as a Teſtimony to the truth of the Doctrine of Remiſſion of ſins, they were equally applicable to one as to the other. Beſides, if this had been all intended in theſe Expreſſions, they were the moſt incongruouſly applied to the Blood of Chriſt; nothing ſeeming more repugnant to the Doctrine of the Remiſſion of ſins, which was declared by it, than that very thing by which it was declared, if no more were intended by it: For how unſuitable ſuitable a way was to it declare the pardon of the guilty Perſons, by ſuch Severities uſed towards the moſt Innocent! Who could believe, That God ſhould declare his willingneſs to pardon others, by the Death of his own Son; unleſs that Death of his be conſidered as the meritorious Cauſe for procuring it? And in that ſenſe we acknowledge, That the Death of Chriſt was a Declaration of God's will and decree to pardon, but not meerly as it gave Teſtimony to the truth of his Doctrine (for in that ſenſe the Blood of the Apoſtles and Martyrs might be ſaid to purge us from ſin, as well as the Blood of Chriſt) but becauſe it was the Conſideration upon which God had decreed to pardon. And ſo as the acceptance of the Condition required, or the price paid, may be ſaid to declare or manifeſt, the intention of a perſon to releaſe or deliver a Captive: So God's acceptance of what Chriſt did ſuffer for our ſakes, may be ſaid to declare his readineſs to pardon us upon his account. But then this Declaration doth not belong properly to the Act of Chriſt in ſuffering; but to the Act of God in accepting: And it can be no other ways known, than God's acceptance is known; which was not by the Sufferings, but by the Reſurrection of Chriſt. And therefore the declaring God's will and decree to pardon, doth properly belong to that: And if that had been all which the Scripture had meant, by purging of ſin by the Blood of Chriſt, it had been very incongruouſly applied to that, but moſt properly to his Reſurrection. But theſe Phraſes being never attributed to that which moſt properly might be ſaid to declare the Will of God; and being peculiarly attributed to the Death of Chriſt, which cannot be ſaid properly to do it; nothing can be more plain, than that theſe Expreſſions ought to be taken in that which is confeſſed to be their proper ſenſe; viz. That Expiation of ſin, which doth belong to the Death of Chriſt, as a Sacrifice for the ſins of the World.

The death of Chriſt not taken Metonymically for all the conſequents of it.

VIII. But yet Socinus and Crellius have another ſubterfuge, (for therein lies their great art, in ſeeking rather by any means to eſcape their Enemies, than to overcome them.) For being ſenſible, that the main ſcope and deſign of the Scripture is againſt them, they ſeldom, and but very weakly aſſault: But ſhew all their ſubtlety in avoiding by all imaginable arts, the force of what is brought againſt them. And the Scripture being ſo plain in attributing ſuch great Effects to the Death of Chriſt, when no other anſwer will ſerve turn, then they tell us, That the Death of Chriſt is taken Metonymically for all the conſequents of his Death; viz. His Reſurrection, Exaltation, and the Power and Authority which he hath at the right hand of his Father. But how is it poſſible to convince thoſe, who by Death, can underſtand Life: by ſufferings, can mean Glory; and by the ſhedding of Blood, ſitting at the right hand of God? And that the Scripture is very far from giving any Countenance to theſe bold Interpretations, will appear by theſe Conſiderations; 1. Becauſe the Effect of Expiation of our ſins, is attributed to the Death of Chriſt, as diſtinct from his Reſurrection; viz. Our Reconciliation with God, Rom. 5. 10. For if when we were Enemies, we were reconciled to God by the Death of his Son; much more being reconciled, we ſhall be ſaved by his Life. To which Crellius anſwers, That the Apoſtle doth not ſpeak of the Death of Chriſt alone, or as it is conſidered diſtinct from the conſequences of it; but only that our Reconciliation was effected by the Death of Chriſt intervening. But nothing can be more evident to any one, who conſiders the Deſign of the Apoſtles diſcourſe, than that he ſpeaks of what was peculiar to the Death of Chriſt: For Rom. 5. 6.

thoſe words follow, For if when we were Enemies, we were reconciled to 10.
God by the Death of his Son, &c. The Reconciliation here mentioned, is attributed to the Death of Chriſt in the ſame ſenſe, that it is mentioned before; but there it is not mentioned as a bare Condition intervening in order to ſomething farther; but as the great inſtance of the love both of God and Chriſt, of God, in ſending his Son; of Chriſt, in laying down his life for ſinners, in order to their being juſtified by his Blood. But where is it that St. Paul ſaith, that the Death of Chriſt had no other influence on the Expiation of our ſins, but as a bare Condition intervening in order to that Power and Authority whereby he would expiate ſins? What makes him attribute ſo much to the Death of Chriſt, if all the benefits we enjoy depend upon the Conſequences of it; and no otherwiſe upon that, than meerly as a Preparation for it? What peculiar Emphaſis were there in Chriſt's dying for ſinners, and for the ungodly; unleſs his Death had a particular Relation to the Expiation of their ſins? Why are Men ſaid to be juſtified by his Blood, and and not much rather by his glorious Reſurrection, if the Blood of Chriſt be only conſidered as antecedent to the other? And that would have been the great Demonſtration of the love of God which had the moſt immediate influence upon our advantage: Which could not have been the Death in this ſenſe, but the Life and Glory of Chriſt. But nothing can be more abſurd than what Crellius would have to be the meaning of this place, viz. That the Apoſtle doth not ſpeak of the proper force of the Death of Chriſt diſtinct from his Life; but that two things are oppoſed to each other, for the effecting of one of which the Death of Chriſt did intervene, but it ſhould not intervene for the other; viz. It did intervene for our Reconciliation, but it ſhould not for our Life. For did not the Death of Chriſt equally intervene for our Life as for our Reconciliation? Was not our eternal deliverance the great thing deſigned by Chriſt, and our Reconciliation in order to that end? What oppoſition then can be imagined, that it ſhould be neceſſary for the Death of Chriſt to intervene in order to the one than in order to the other? But he means, that the Death of Chriſt ſhould not intervene any more; what need that, when it is acknowledged by themſelves, that Chriſt died only for this end before, that he might have Power to beſtow eternal Life on them that obey him? But the main force of the Apoſtles Argument lies in the Compariſon between the Death of Chriſt having Reſpect to us as Enemies in order to Reconciliation, and the Life of Chriſt to us conſidered as reconciled; ſo that if he had ſo much kindneſs for Enemies, to die for their Reconciliation, we may much more preſume that he now living in Heaven will accompliſh the end of that Reconciliation, in the eternal Salvation of them that obey him. By which it is apparent that he ſpeaks of the Death of Chriſt, in a notion proper to it ſelf, having influence upon our Reconciliation; and doth not conſider it Metonymically as comprehending in it, the conſequents of it.

Expiation attributed to Chriſt antecedently to his entrance into heaven.

IX. 2. Becauſe the Expiation of ſins is attributed to Chriſt antecedently to the great conſequents of his Death, viz. his ſitting at the right hand of God, Heb. 1. 3. When he had by himſelf purged our ſins, ſate down on the right hand of his Majeſty on high, Heb. 9. 11. But by his own Blood he entred in once into the Holy Place, having obtained eternal Redemption for us. To theſe places Crellius gives a double anſwer, Crell.c.10. ſect. 50. 1. That indefinite Particles (εὑράμενος and ποιησάμενος) being joyned with Verbs of the preterperfect tenſe do not always require that the Action expreſſed by them, ſhould precede that which is deſigned in the Verbs to which they are joyned; but they have ſometimes the force of Particles of the preſent or imperfect tenſe; which ſometimes happens in Particles of the preterperfect tenſe, as Matth. 10. 5. ἀπέστειλαν παραγγείλας αὐτοῖς, ſo ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν; and ſeveral other inſtances produced by him: According to which manner of Interpretation the ſenſe he puts upon thoſe words, Heb. 9. 12. is Chriſt by the ſhedding of his Blood entred into the Holy of Holies, and in ſo doing he found eternal Redemption, or the Expiation of ſins. But not to diſpute with Crellius concerning the importance of the Aoriſt being joyned with a Verb of the preterperfect tenſe, which in all reaſon and common Acceptation doth imply the Action paſt by him who writes the words antecedent to his writing of it, as is plain in the inſtances produced by Crellius; but according to his ſenſe of Chriſt's Expiation of ſin, it was yet to come after Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, and ſo it ſhould have been more properly εὑρησόμενος than εὑράμενος; not I ſay to inſiſt upon that, the Apoſtle manifeſts, that he had a Reſpect to the Death of Chriſt in the obtaining this eternal Redemption, by his following diſcourſe: For v. 14. he compares the Blood of Chriſt in point of Efficacy for Expiation of ſin, with the Blood of the Legal Sacrifices: Whereas if the Expiation meant by him had been found by Chriſt's Oblation of himſelf in Heaven, he would have compared Chriſt's entrance into Heaven in order to it, with the entrance of the High-Prieſt into the Holy of Holies, and his Argument had run thus. For if the High-Prieſt under the Law did expiate ſins by entring into the Holy of Holies; How much more ſhall the Son of God entring into Heaven expiate the ſins of Mankind? But we ſee the Apoſtle had no ſooner mention'd the Redemption obtained for us; but he preſently ſpeaks of the Efficacy of the Blood of Chriſt in order to it, and as plainly aſſerts the ſame, v. 15. And for this cauſe he is the Mediator of the New Teſtament, that by means of death, for the Redemption of the Tranſgreſſions which were under the firſt Teſtament, they which were called might receive the promiſe of eternal Inheritance. Why doth the Apoſtle here ſpeak of the ἀπολυτρώσεως τῶν παραβάσεων, the Expiation of ſins by the means of Death; if he had ſo lately aſſerted before that the Redemption or Expiation was found not by his death, but by his entrance into Heaven? And withal the Apoſtle here doth not ſpeak of ſuch a kind of Expiation as wholly Reſpects the future, but of ſins that were under the firſt Teſtament, not barely ſuch as could not be expiated by virtue of it, but ſuch as were committed during the time of it, although the Levitical Law allowed no Expiation for them. And to confirm this ſenſe, the Apoſtle doth not go on to prove the neceſſity of Chriſt's entrance into Heaven; but of his dying, v. 16, 17, 18. But granting that he doth allude to the High-Prieſt's entring into the Holy of Holies, yet that was but the Repreſentation of a Sacrifice already offer'd, and he could not be ſaid to find Expiation by his entrance; but that was already found by the Blood of the Sacrifice, and his entrance was only to accompliſh the end for which the Blood was offer'd up in Sacrifice. And the benefit which came to Men is attributed to the Sacrifice, and not to the ſprinkling of Blood before the Mercy-ſeat: And whatever effect was conſequent upon his entrance into the Sanctuary, was by virtue of the Blood which he carried in with him, and was before ſhed at the Altar. Neither can it with any reaſon be ſaid, that if the Redemption were obtained by the Blood of Chriſt, there could be no need of his entrance into Heaven; ſince we do not make the Prieſthood of Chriſt to expire at his Death; but that he is in Heaven a merciful High-Prieſt in negotiating the Affairs of his People with God, and there ever lives to make interceſſion for them.

No diſtinction in Scripture of the effects of Chriſt's entrance into Heaven from his ſitting at the right hand of God. Crell. c. 10. ſect. 50. p. 537.

X. Crellius anſwers, That granting the Aoriſt being put before the Verb, ἐκάθισεν ſhould imply ſuch an Action which was antecedent to Chriſt's ſitting at the right hand of God, yet it is not there ſaid, that the Expiation of ſins was made before Chriſt's entrance into Heaven; for thoſe, ſaith he, are to be conſidered as two different things; for a Prince firſt enters into his Palace, before he ſits upon his Throne. And therefore, ſaith he, Chriſt may be ſaid to have made Expiation of ſins, before he ſate down at the right hand of his Father, not that it was done by his death but by his entrance into Heaven, and offering himſelf to God there, by which means he obtained his ſitting on the right hand of the Majeſty on High, and thereby the full Power of Remiſſion of ſins, and giving eternal Life. To which I anſwer, 1. That the Scripture never makes ſuch a diſtinction between Chriſt's entrance into Heaven, and ſitting at the right hand of God; which latter implying no more but the glorious ſtate of Chriſt in Heaven, his entrance into Heaven doth imply it: For therefore God exalted him to be a Prince and a Saviour: And the reaſon of the Power and Authority given him in Heaven is no where attributed to his entrance into it as the means of it; but our Saviour before that tells us, that all Power and Authority was committed to him; and his very entrance into Heaven was a part of his Glory; and given him in Conſideration of his Sufferings; as the Apoſtle plainly aſſerts; and he became obedient to death, even the death of the Croſs, wherefore God hath highly exalted him, &c. There can be then no imaginable reaſon to make the entrance of Chriſt into Heaven, and preſenting himſelf to God there, a Condition or means of obtaining that Power and Authority which is implyed in his ſitting at the right hand of God. 2. Suppoſing, we ſhould look on theſe as diſtinct, there is as little reaſon to attribute the Expiation of ſin to his entrance, conſidered as diſtinct from the other: For the Expiation of ſins in Heaven being by Crellius himſelf confeſſed to be by the Exerciſe of Chriſt's Power, and this being only the means to that Power, how could Chriſt expiate ſins by that power which he had not? But of this I have ſpoken before, and ſhewed that in no ſenſe allowed by themſelves the Expiation of ſins can be attributed to the entrance of Chriſt into Heaven as diſtinct from his ſitting at the right hand of God. Thus much may ſuffice to prove, that thoſe effects of an Expiatory Sacrifice, which do reſpect the ſins committed, do properly agree to the Death of Chriſt.

Phil. 2. 8, 9.

Of the Atonement made by Chriſt's death.

XI. I now come to that which reſpects the Perſon, conſidered as obnoxious to the Wrath of God by reaſon of his ſins: And ſo the Effect of an Expiatory Sacrifice is Atonement and Reconciliation. By the Wrath of God, I mean, the reaſon which God hath from the Holineſs and juſtice of his nature, to puniſh ſin in thoſe who commit it: By the means of Atonement and Reconciliation, I mean, that in Conſideration of which, God is willing to releaſe the ſinner from the Obligation to Puniſhment he lies under by the Law of God, and to receive him into favour upon the terms which are declared by the Doctrine of Chriſt. And that the Death of Chriſt was ſuch a means of Atonement and Reconciliation for us, I ſhall prove by thoſe places of Scripture which Crell. c. 7. ſect. 3. ſpeak of it. But Crellius would ſeem to acknowledge, That if Grotius ſeem to contend for no more, than that Chriſt did avert that Wrath of God which Men had deſerved by their ſins, they would willingly yield him all that he pleads for: But then he adds, That this deliverance from the Wrath to come, is not by the Death, but by the Power of Chriſt. So that the queſtion is, Whether the Death of Chriſt were the means of Atonement and Reconciliation between God and us? And yet Crellius would ſeem willing to yield too, that the Death of Chriſt may be ſaid to avert the Wrath of God from us, as it was a Condition in order to it; for in that ſenſe it had no more influence upon it than his Birth had: But we have already ſeen, that the Scripture attributes much more to the Death and Blood of Chriſt, in order to the Expiation of ſin. We do not deny, that the Death of Chriſt may be called a Condition, as the performance of any thing in order to an end, may be called the Condition upon which that thing is to be obtained; but we ſay, that it is not a bare Condition, but ſuch a one as implies a Conſideration, upon which the thing is obtained, being ſuch as anſwers the end of him that grants it: By which means it doth propitiate or atone him, who had before juſt reaſon to puniſh, but is now willing to forgive and be reconciled to them, who have ſo highly offended him. And in this ſenſe we aſſert, that Chriſt is ſaid to be ἱλασμὸς, a propitiation for our ſins, 1 Joh. 2. 2——4. 10. which we take in the ſame ſenſe that ἱλασμὸς is taken for the ſin-offering, for Atonement, Ezek. 44. 27. προσοίσουσι ἱλασμὸν, they ſhall offer a ſin-offering; for ſo חטא there ſignifies, and in the ſame ſenſe ἐξιλασμὸς is taken, Ezek. 45. 19. and the Ram for Atonement is called κριὸς τοῦ ἱλασμοῦ, Numb. 5. 8. And thence the High-Prieſt when he made an Atonement, is ſaid ποιεῖν τὸν ἱλασμὸν, 2 Maccab. 3. 33. which is of the greater conſequence to us, becauſe Crellius would not have the Crell. 7. ſect. 10. ſenſe either of ἱλασμὸς or ἱλάσκεσθαι, to be taken from the common uſe of the word in the Greek Tongue; but from that which ſome call the Helleniſtical uſe of it; viz. That which is uſed in the Greek of the New Teſtament, out of the LXX. and the Apocryphal Greek; in both which we have found the word ἱλασμὸς; in a ſenſe fully correſpondent to what we plead for. But he yet urges, and takes a great deal of pains to prove, that ἱλάσκεσθαι and ἐξιλάσκεσθαι do not always ſignifie to be appeaſed by another, but ſometimes ſignifies to be Propitious and Merciful in pardoning; and ſometimes to expiate, and then ſignifies the ſame with καθαρίζειν and ἁγιάζειν: Which if it be granted, proves nothing againſt us, having already proved, that thoſe words do ſignifie the Averſion of the Wrath of God by a Sacrifice, and that there is no reaſon to recede from that Signification, when they are applied to the Blood of Chriſt. And we do not contend, that when the word ἱλασμὸς or ἱλάσκεσθαι is applied to him that doth forgive, it doth imply appeaſing; but the effect of it, which is pardoning; but that which we aſſert, is, that when it is applied to a third perſon, or a thing made uſe of in order to forgiveneſs, then we ſay it ſignifies the propitiating him that was juſtly diſpleaſed: So as by what was done or ſuffered for that end, he is willing to pardon what he had juſt reaſon to puniſh. So Moſes is ſaid, to make Atonement for the People by his Prayers, καὶ ἱλάσθη κύριος περὶ τῆς κακίας, Exod. 34. 14.

and we may ſee Verſe 11. how much God was diſpleaſed before. And Moſes beſought the Lord his God, and ſaid, Why doth thy Wrath wax hot againſt thy People? And Verſe 12. Turn from thy fierce Wrath, and repent of this evil againſt thy People, and then it is ſaid, Verſe 14. The Lord was atoned for the evil which he thought to do unto his People. I would therefore willingly know, why Moſes might not here properly be ſaid, ἱλάσκεσθαι θεὸν περὶ τῆς κακίας, as it is ſaid ἱλάσθη κύριος περὶ τῆς κακίας, and therefore ſince it is ſo very often ſaid in the Levitical Law, ἱλάσκεσθαι and ἐξιλάσκεσθαι περί τινος, as περὶ αὐτῶν, περὶ τῆς οἰκίας, περὶ ψυχῶν, and the Accuſative caſe ſcarce ever put but in two Caſes; (viz. When theſe words are applied to inanimate things, as the Altar, &c. or when to God himſelf, implying forgiveneſs) what reaſon can we aſſign more probable for this different Conſtruction, than that when περὶ is uſed, the Verb hath a Reſpect to the offended party as the Accuſative underſtood? As Chriſt is ſaid in the places mentioned to be ἱλασμὸς περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν, which ought in reaſon to be underſtood as thoſe words after Moſes his interceſſion, καὶ ἱλάσθη κύριος περὶ τῆς κακίας. But Crellius asks, Why then do we never read once concerning the Prieſt, that he did ἱλάσκεσθαι τὸν θεὸν περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν or περί τινος, but we read that he did ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὸ ἅγιον τὸ θυσιαστήριον, and God is ſaid, ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας. To this I anſwer, 1. That the reaſon why the perſon propitiated, is not expreſſed, is, becauſe it was ſo much taken for granted, that the whole Inſtitution of Sacrifices did immediately Reſpect God, and therefore there was no danger of miſtaking, concerning the perſon who was to be atoned. 2. I wonder Crellius can himſelf produce no inſtance where ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας is uſed with a Reſpect to the Sacrifices, and the Perſons whoſe Offences are remitted by the Atonement; but where ἱλάσκεσθαι hath a Relation to that, it is ſtill joyned with a Prepoſition relating either to the Perſon or to the Offences; if no more were underſtood when it is ſo uſed, than when God himſelf is ſaid to do it, why is not the Phraſe ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας as well ſaid of the Prieſt, as it is of God? From whence Grotius his ſenſe of Heb. 2. 17. εἰς τὸ ἱλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας for ἱλάσκεσθαι θεὸν περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, is far more agreeable to the uſe of the Phraſe in the Old Teſtament, than that which Crellius would put upon it. Therefore ſince the ἱλασμὸς περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν is attributed to Chriſt, we ought to take it in the ſenſe proper to a Propitiatory Sacrifice: So it is ſaid by Moſes, where God is left out, but is neceſſarily underſtood, after the People had provoked God by their Idolatry; Ye have ſinned a great ſin: And now I will go up unto the Lord, ἵνα ἐξιλάσωμαι περὶ τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὑμῶν, That I may make an Atonement for your ſin: What way could Moſes be ſaid to make this Atonement, but by propitiating God; yet his name is not there expreſſed, but neceſſarily underſtood. So ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὸ πρόσωπον is uſed in the moſt proper ſenſe for appeaſing the anger of a Perſon, Gen. 32. 20. And ἐν τίνι ἐξιλάσομαι, 2 Sam. 21. 3. Which places have been already inſiſted on, in the Signification of the word כפר. And that thoſe places wherein Chriſt is ſaid to be a propitiation for our ſins, are capable of no other ſenſe, will appear from the Conſideration of Chriſt, as a middle perſon between God and us; and therefore his being ἱλασμὸς περὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, cannot be parallel with that Phraſe, where God himſelf is ſaid, ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας, for Chriſt is here conſidered as interpoſing between God and us, as Moſes and the Prieſts under the Law did between

God and the People in order to the averting his Wrath from them. And when one doth thus interpoſe in order to the Atonement of the offended party, ſomething is always ſuppoſed to be done or ſuffered by him, as the means of that Atonement. As Jacob ſuppoſed the preſent he made to his Brother would propitiate him; and David appeaſed the Gibeonites by the Death of Saul's Sons, both which are ſaid ἐξιλάσκεσθαι. So the ſhedding of the Blood of Sacrifices before and under the Law, was the means of atoning God for the ſins they committed. What reaſon can there be then why ſo receiv'd a ſenſe of Atonement, both among the Jews, and all other Nations at that time when theſe words were Written, muſt be forſaken; and any other ſenſe be embraced, which neither agrees with the Propriety of the Expreſſion, nor with ſo many other places of Scripture, which make the Blood of Chriſt to be a Sacrifice for the Expiation of ſin?

XII. Neither is it only our Atonement, but our Reconciliation is attributed to Chriſt too, with a Reſpect to his Death and Sufferings. As in the place before inſiſted on. For if when we were Enemies, we were reconciled to God by the Death of his Son; (Rom. 5. 10.) and more largely in the ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians. (2 Cor. 18, 19, 21.) And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt, and hath given to us the miniſtry of Reconciliation: To wit, that God was in Chriſt reconciling the World unto himſelf, not imputing their Treſpaſſes unto them, and hath committed to us the Word of Reconciliation For he hath made him to be ſin for us who knew no ſin, that we might be made the Righteouſneſs of God in him. (Eph. 2. 16.) And to the Epheſians, And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by his Croſs, having ſlain the enmity thereby. To the ſame purpoſe (Col. 1. 20, 21, 22.) to the Coloſſians, And having made peace through the Blood of his Croſs, by him to reconcile all things to himſelf, by him I ſay whether they be things in Heaven or in Earth; and you that were ſometimes alienated and Enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled, in the body of his fleſh through Death. Two things the ſubſtance of Crellius his (Crell. c. 7. ſect. 15, 16, 17, 18, &c.) anſwer may be reduced to concerning theſe places. 1. That it is no where ſaid that God was reconciled to us, but that we are reconciled to God, and therefore this Reconciliation doth not imply any averting of the anger of God. 2. That none of theſe places do aſſert any Reconciliation with God antecedent to our Converſion, and ſo that the Reconciliation mention'd implies only the laying aſide our Enmity to God by our ſins. I begin with the firſt of theſe, concerning which we are to conſider not barely the Phraſes uſed in Scripture, but what the nature of the thing implies; as to which a difference being ſuppoſed between God and Man on the account of ſin, no Reconciliation can be imagined but what is mutual. For did Man only fall out with God, and had not God juſt reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Men for their Apoſtaſie from him? If not, what made him ſo ſeverely puniſh the firſt ſin that ever was committed by Man? What made him puniſh the old World for their impieties by a Deluge? What made him leave ſuch Monuments of his anger againſt the ſins of the World in ſucceeding Ages? What made him add ſuch ſevere Sanctions to the Laws he made to the People of the Jews? What made the moſt upright among them ſo vehemently to deprecate his Wrath and Diſpleaſure upon the ſenſe of their ſins? (Pſal. 6. 1. 38. 1. Pſal. 5. 5. 7. 11. 11. 5. Levit. 26. 30.) What makes him declare not only his hatred of the ſins of Men, but of the Perſons of thoſe who commit them; ſo far as to expreſs the greateſt abhorrency of them? Nay, what makes our Adverſaries themſelves to ſay, (Crell. de Deo & Attrib. l. 1. c. 30.) that impiety is in its own nature hateful to God, and ſtirs him up to anger againſt all who commit it? What means, I ſay, all this, if God be not angry with Men on the account of ſin? Well then; ſuppoſing God to be averſe from Men by reaſon of their ſins, ſhall this diſpleaſure always continue or not? If it always continues, Men muſt certainly ſuffer the deſert of their ſins; if it doth not always continue, then God may be ſaid to be reconciled in the ſame ſenſe that an offended party is capable of being reconciled to him who hath provoked him. Now there are two ways whereby a party juſtly offended may be ſaid to be reconciled to him that hath offended him. Firſt, when he is not only willing to admit of terms of agreement, but doth declare his acceptance of the Mediation of a third Perſon, and that he is ſo well ſatisfied with what he hath done in order to it, that he appoints this to be publiſhed to the World to aſſure the offender, that if the breach continues, the fault wholly lies upon himſelf. The ſecond is, when the offender doth accept of the terms of agreement offered, and ſubmits himſelf to him whom he hath provoked, and is upon that received into Favour. And theſe two we aſſert muſt neceſſarily be diſtinguiſhed in the Reconciliation between God and us. For upon the Death and ſufferings of Chriſt, God declares to the World he is ſo well ſatisfied with what Chriſt hath done and ſuffered in order to the Reconciliation between himſelf and us, that he now publiſhes Remiſſion of ſins to the World upon thoſe terms which the Mediator hath declared by his own Doctrine, and the Apoſtles he ſent to preach it: But becauſe Remiſſion of ſins doth not immediately follow upon the Death of Chriſt, without ſuppoſition of any Act on our part, therefore the ſtate of Favour doth commence from the performance of the Conditions which are required from us. So that upon the Death of Chriſt God declaring his acceptance of Chriſt's Mediation, and that the Obſtacle did not lie upon his part; therefore thoſe Meſſengers who were ſent abroad into the World to perſwade men to accept of theſe terms of Agreement, do inſiſt moſt upon that which was the remaining Obſtacle, viz. The ſins of Mankind, that Men by laying aſide them, would be now reconciled to God, ſince there was nothing to hinder this Reconciliation, their obſtinacy in ſin excepted. Which may be a very reaſonable account why we read more frequently in the Writings of the Apoſtles, of Mens duty in being reconciled to God; the other being ſuppoſed by them as the Foundation of their preaching to the World, and is inſiſted on by them upon that account, as is clear in that place to the Corinthians, That God was in Chriſt reconciling the World to himſelf, not imputing unto Men their Treſpaſſes, and hath committed to us the word of Reconciliation; and therefore adds, Now then we are Ambaſſadors for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by us, we pray you in Chriſt's ſtead be ye reconciled to God: And leſt theſe words ſhould ſeem dubious, he declares that the Reconciliation in Chriſt was diſtinct from that Reconciliation he perſwades them to; for the Reconciliation in Chriſt he ſuppoſeth paſt, v. 18. All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt, and v. 21, he ſhews us how this Reconciliation was wrought. For he hath made him to be ſin for us who knew no ſin, that we might be made the Righteouſneſs of God in him. Crellius here finds it neceſſary to acknowledge a twofold Reconciliation, but hopes to eſcape the force of this place by a rare Diſtinction of the Reconciliation as preached by Chriſt, and by his Apoſtles; and ſo God's having reconciled the World to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt is nothing

2 Cor. 5. 19, 20.

elſe but Chriſt's preaching the Goſpel himſelf, who afterwards committed that Office to his Apoſtles. But if ſuch ſhifts as theſe will ſerve to baffle Mens underſtandings, both they were made, and the Scriptures were written to very little purpoſe; for if this had been all the Apoſtle had meant, that Chriſt preached the ſame Doctrine of Reconciliation before them, what mighty matter had this been to have ſolemnly told the World, that Chriſt's Apoſtles preached no other Doctrine, but what their Maſter had preached before? Eſpecially if no more were meant by it, but that Men ſhould leave their ſins, and be reconciled to God. But beſides, why is the Miniſtry of Reconciliation, then attributed only to the Apoſtles, and not to Chriſt, which ought in the firſt place to have been given to him, ſince the Apoſtles did only receive it from him? Why is that Miniſtry of Reconciliation ſaid to be, viz. That God was in Chriſt reconciling the World to himſelf? Was this all the Subject of the Apoſtles preaching, to tell the World, that Chriſt perſwaded Men to leave off their ſins? How comes God to reconcile the World to himſelf by the preaching of Chriſt, ſince Chriſt himſelf ſaith, he was not ſent to preach to the World; but to the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael? Was the World reconciled to God by the preaching of Chriſt, before they had ever heard of them? Why is God ſaid not to impute to Men their Treſpaſſes by the preaching of Chriſt, rather than his Apoſtles; if the not imputing were no more than declaring God's readineſs to pardon; which was equally done by the Apoſtles as by Chriſt himſelf? Laſtly, what force or dependence is there in the laſt words, For he made him to be ſin for us, who knew no ſin, &c. If all he had been ſpeaking of before had only related to Chriſt's preaching? How was he made ſin more than the Apoſtles, if he were only treated as a ſinner upon the account of the ſame Doctrine which they preached equally with him? And might not Men be ſaid to be made the Righteouſneſs of God in the Apoſtles, as well as in Chriſt, if no more be meant, but being perſwaded to be Righteous, by the Doctrine delivered to them?

In the two latter places, Eph. 2. 16. Coloſſ. 1. 20, &c. it is plain, that a twofold Reconciliation is likewiſe mentioned, the one of the Jews and Gentiles to one another, the other of both of them to God. For nothing can be more Ridiculous than the Expoſition of Socinus, who would have τῷ Θεῷ not to be joyned with the Verb ἀποκαταλλάξῃ, but to ſtand by it ſelf, and to ſignifie that this Reconciliation of the Jews and Gentiles did Crell. c. 7. ſect. 30. tend to the Glory of God. And Crellius, who ſtands out at nothing, hopes to bring off Socinus here too; by ſaying, that it is very common, for the end to which a thing was appointed to be expreſſed by a Dative Caſe following the Verb; but he might have ſpared his pains in proving a thing no one queſtions; the ſhorter anſwer had been to have produced one place where ἀποκαταλλάσσειν Θεῷ ever ſignifies any thing but to be reconciled to God as the offended Party; or where-ever the Dative of the perſon following the Verb importing Reconciliation, did ſignifie any thing elſe but the Party with whom the Reconciliation was to be made. As for that objection concerning things in Heaven being reconciled; that Phraſe doth not import ſuch a Reconciliation of the Angels as of Men, but that Men and Angels upon the Reconciliation of Men to God, become one body under Chriſt, and are gathered together in him, as the Apoſtle expreſſeth it, Eph. 1. 10.

Objections anſwered. XIII. 1. Having thus far proved, that the Effects of an Expiatory Sacrifice do belong to the Death of Chriſt, nothing now remains but an anſwer to be made to two Objections, which are commonly inſiſted on by our Adverſaries. The firſt is, That God was reconciled before he ſent his Son, and therefore Chriſt could not die to reconcile God to us. The ſecond is, That the Doctrine of Satisfaction aſſerted by us, is inconſiſtent with the freeneſs of God's Grace in the Remiſſion of ſins: Both which will admit of an eaſie Solution upon the Principles of the foregoing Diſcourſe. To the firſt I anſwer, That we aſſert nothing inconſiſtent with that love of God, which was diſcovered in ſending his Son into the World; we do not ſay, That God hated Mankind ſo much on the account of ſin, that it was impoſſible he ſhould ever admit of any terms of Reconciliation with them, which is the only thing inconſiſtent with the greatneſs of God's Love in ſending Chriſt into the World; but we adore and magnifie the infiniteneſs and unexpreſſible greatneſs of his Love, that notwithſtanding all the contempt of the former kindneſs and mercies of Heaven, he ſhould be pleaſed to ſend his own Son to die for ſinners, that they might be reconciled to him. And herein was the great Love of God manifeſted, that while we were Enemies and Sinners, Chriſt died for us, and that for this end, that we might be reconciled to God by his Death. And therefore ſurely, not in the ſtate of Favour or Reconciliation with God then. But it were worth the while, to underſtand what it is our Adverſaries mean, when they ſay, God was reconciled when he ſent his Son, and therefore he could not die to reconcile God to us. Either they mean, that God had decreed to be reconciled upon the ſending his Son, or that he was actually reconciled when he ſent him: If he only decreed to be reconciled, that was not at all inconſiſtent with Chriſt's dying to reconcile God and us in purſuance of that decree: If they mean, he was actually reconciled, then there was no need for Chriſt to die to reconcile God and us; but withal, actual Reconciliation implies pardon of ſin; and if ſin were actually pardoned before Chriſt came, there could be no need of his coming at all, and ſins would have been pardoned before committed; if they were not pardoned, notwithſtanding that Love of God, then it can imply no more, but that God was willing to be reconciled. If therefore not-remiſſion of ſins were conſiſtent with that Love of God, by which he ſent Chriſt into the World, then notwithſtanding that he was yet capable of being reconciled by his Death. So that our Adverſaries are bound to reconcile that Love of God, with not preſently pardoning the ſins of the World, as we are to reconcile it with the ends of the Death of Chriſt, which are aſſerted by us.

The freeneſs of Grace aſſerted in Scripture, deſtroys not ſatisfaction.

XIV. To the other Objection, concerning the inconſiſtency of the Freeneſs of God's Grace with the Doctrine of Satisfaction, I anſwer, Either God's Grace is ſo free as to exclude all Conditions, or not: If it be ſo free, as to exclude all Conditions, then the higheſt Antinomianiſm is the trueſt Doctrine; for that is the higheſt degree of the Freeneſs of Grace, which admits of no Conditions at all. If our Adverſaries ſay, That the Freeneſs of Grace is conſiſtent with Conditions required on our part, Why ſhall it not admit of Conditions on God's part? Eſpecially, when the Condition required, tends ſo highly to the end of God's governing the World, in the manifeſtation of his hatred againſt ſin, and the Vindication of the Honour of his Laws by the Sufferings of the Son of God in our ſtead, as an Expiatory Sacrifice for our ſins. There are two things to be conſidered in ſin, the diſhonour done to God, by the breach of his Laws, and the injury Men do to themſelves by it; now Remiſſion of ſins, that Reſpects the injury which Men bring upon themſelves by it; and that is Free, when the Penalty is wholly forgiven, as we aſſert it is by the Goſpel to all penitent ſinners: But ſhall not God be free to vindicate his own Honour, and to declare his Righteouſneſs to the World, while he is the Juſtifier of them that believe? Shall Men in caſe of Defamation, be bound to vindicate themſelves, though they freely forgive the Authors of the ſlander, by our Adverſaries own Doctrine? And muſt it be repugnant to God's Grace, to admit of a Propitiatory Sacrifice, that the World may underſtand, that it is no ſuch eaſie thing to obtain pardon of ſin committed againſt God; but that as often as they conſider the bitter Sufferings of Chriſt, in order to the obtaining the forgiveneſs of our ſins, that ſhould be the greateſt Argument to diſſwade them from the Practice of them? But why ſhould it be more inconſiſtent with the Sacrifice of Chriſt, for God freely to pardon ſin, than it was ever preſumed to be in all the Sacrifices of either Jews or Gentiles? Who all ſuppoſed Sacrifices neceſſary in order to Atonement; and yet thought themſelves obliged to the Goodneſs of God in the Remiſſion of their ſins? Nay we find that God himſelf, Gen. 20.7. in the caſe of Abimelech, appointed Abraham to pray for him, in order to his pardon; and will any one ſay, this was a derogation to the Job 42.7. Grace of God in his Pardon? Or to the Pardon of Job's Friends, becauſe Job was apponited to Sacrifice for them? Or to the pardon of the Iſraelites, becauſe God out of kindneſs to them, directed them by the Prophets, and appointed the means in order to it? But although God appointed our High-Prieſt for us, and out of his great Love ſent him into the World, yet his Sacrifice was not what was given him, but what he freely underwent himſelf; he gave us Chriſt, but Chriſt offered up himſelf a full, perfect and ſufficient Sacrifice, Oblation and Satisfaction for the ſins of the World.

Thus, Sir, I have now given you a larger account of what I then more briefly diſcourſed of concerning the true Reaſon of the Sufferings of Chriſt; and heartily wiſhing you a right underſtanding in all things, and requeſting from you an impartial Conſideration of what I have Written, C

I am, SIR, Yours, &c.

The Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith Aſſerted and Vindicated: In a SERMON Preached at St. Laurence-Jewry in London, April the 7th. 1691.

1 TIM. I. 15.

This is a faithful ſaying and worthy of all acceptation, That Chriſt Jeſus came into the World to ſave Sinners, of whom I am chief.

IF theſe Words were to be underſtood without any Reſtriction or Limitation that Chriſt Jeſus came into the World to ſave ſinners, they would overthrow the great Deſign of the Goſpel, and make its Excellent Precepts Uſeleſs and Ineffectual. For, to what purpoſe ſhould Men be put upon the ſevere Practice of Repentance, Mortification tion and a continued Courſe of a Holy Life, if the meer being Sinners did ſufficiently qualifie them for Salvation? This indeed would be thought a Doctrine worthy of all Acceptation by the greateſt Sinners; but it could not be a faithful ſaying, being not agreeable either to the Nature of God, or Revelation of his Will by Chriſt Jeſus. But St. Paul ſpeaks of ſuch Sinners as himſelf had been, i. e. ſuch as had been great ſinners, but had truly and ſincerely Repented. Of whom I am chief, What then? Muſt we look on him as the Standard and Meaſure of ſuch Sinners whom Chriſt Jeſus came to ſave? What will then become of all thoſe who have been Sinners of a higher Rank than ever he was? It's true in the Verſes before the Text, he ſets out his Sins, as a humble Penitent is wont to do, with the worſt Colours and deepeſt Aggravations, Who was before a Blaſphemer and a perſecutor, and injurious; but yet he adds, that he obtained Mercy becauſe he did it ignorantly, in unbelief. How then is St. Paul the Chief of Sinners? Are Sins of Ignorance and Miſtake the greateſt of Sins, for which Chriſt died? Is there no Expiation for any other by Jeſus Chriſt? What will become then of all ſuch who ſin againſt Knowledge and Conſcience, and not in Ignorance and Unbelief? Can none of theſe hope for Mercy by Chriſt Jeſus, although they do truly Repent? But the Blood of Chriſt is ſaid elſewhere to cleanſe us from all Sin; not, while we continue in them, but if we repent and forſake them. And Jeſus Chriſt is ſaid to be a Propitiation for our Sins; and not for ours only, but for the Sins of the whole World. And therefore this Expreſſion of St. Paul notes his great Humility and and deep Senſe of his own Sins; but doth not exclude others from the hopes of Pardon whoſe Sins have other Aggravation than his had. For, if we leave out the laſt words as peculiar to his Caſe, yet the other contain in them a true Propoſition and of the greateſt Importance to Mankind; This is a faithful ſaying and worthy of all Acceptation, that Chriſt Jeſus came into the world to ſave ſinners.

1 Joh. 1. 7.

Ch. 2. v. 2.

This, you may ſay, is a matter out of all doubt among all ſuch who hope for Salvation by Chriſt Jeſus; for all are agreed, that one way or other we are to be ſaved by him. But there is great Difficulty as to the Way of ſaving Sinners by Chriſt Jeſus; whether by the Doctrine and Example of the Man Chriſt Jeſus, by the Power he attained through his Sufferings; Or, by the Eternal Son of God's aſſuming our Nature and Suffering in our ſtead in order to the Reconciling God to us and making a Propitiation for our Sins. Theſe are two very diffent Hypotheſes or Notions of Chriſt's coming to ſave Sinners; and the former ſeems more eaſie to be underſtood and believed; and the other ſeems to have inſuperable Difficulties in point of Reaſon; and to run our Religion into Myſteries, which expoſe our Faith and make Chriſtianity appear Contemptible to Men of Senſe and Underſtanding. Is it not therefore better much to embrace ſuch a Scheme of it, as will have the leaſt Objection againſt it, that ſo Men of Reaſon may not be tempted to Infidelity, and Men of Superſtition may not under the Colour of Myſteries bring in the moſt Abſurd and Unreaſonable Doctrines?

Theſe are plauſible Inſinuations, and would be apt to prevail on conſidering Mens Minds, if they were to form and make a Religion that might be moſt accommodated to the Genius and Humour of the Age they live in. And truly no Men (by their own Authority) can pretend to a Right to impoſe on others any Myſteries of Faith, or any ſuch things which are above their Capacity to underſtand. But that is not our caſe; for we all profeſs to believe and receive Chriſtianity as a Divine Revelation; and God (we ſay) may require from us the belief of what we may not be able to comprehend, eſpecially if it relates to himſelf, or ſuch things which are Conſequent upon the Union of the Divine and Human Nature. Therefore our buſineſs is to conſider, whether any ſuch things be contained in that Revelation which we all own; and if they be, we are bound to believe them, although we are not able to comprehend them.

Now here are two Remarkable Characters in theſe Words, by which we may examin theſe different Hypotheſes concerning the way of Salvation by Jeſus Chriſt.

I. It is a faithful ſaying, and therefore muſt be contained in that Revelation which God hath made concerning our Salvation by Chriſt.

II. It is worthy of all Acceptation; i. e. moſt uſeful and beneficial to Mankind.

Now by theſe two I ſhall proceed in the Examination of them.

I. Which is moſt agreeable to the Revealed Will of God,

II. Which doth offer faireſt for the Benefit and Advantage of Mankind.

I. Which is moſt agreeable to the revealed Will of God. For that we are ſure is the moſt faithful ſaying; ſince Men of Wit and Reaſon may deceive us, but God cannot. When the Apoſtles firſt preached this Doctrine to the World, they were not bound to believe what they affirmed to be a faithful ſaying till they gave ſufficient Evidence of their Authority from God, by the wonderful Aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt. But now this faithful ſaying is contained in the Books of the New Teſtament, by which we are to judge of the Truth of all Chriſtian Doctrines. And when two different Senſes of Places of Scripture are offer'd, we are to conſider, which is moſt Reaſonable to be preferr'd. And herein we are allow'd to Exerciſe our Reaſon as much as we pleaſe; and the more we do ſo, the ſooner we ſhall come to Satisfaction in this matter.

Now according to Reaſon we may judge that Senſe to be preferr'd,

(1.) Which is moſt plain and eaſie and agreeable to the moſt receiv'd Senſe of Words: not that which is forced and intricate, or which puts improper and Metaphorical Senſes upon Words which are commonly taken in other Senſes; eſpecially when it is no Sacramental thing, which in its own Nature is Figurative.

(2.) That which ſuits moſt with the Scope and Deſign not only of the particular Places, but of the whole New Teſtament; which is, to magnifie God and to depreſs Man? To ſet forth the infinite Love and Condeſcenſion of God in giving his Son to be a Propitiation for our Sins; to ſet up the Worſhip of one true God in Oppoſition to Creatures; to Repreſent and Declare the mighty Advantages Mankind receive by the Sufferings of Chriſt Jeſus.

(3.) That which hath been generally receiv'd in the Chriſtian Church to be the Senſe of thoſe places. For, we are certain, this was always look'd on as a matter of great Concernment to all Chriſtians; and they had as great Capacity of underſtanding the Senſe of the Apoſtles: And the Primitive Church had greater Helps for knowing it than others at ſo much greater Diſtance. And therefore the Senſe is not to be taken from modern Inventions, or Criticiſms, or Pretences to Revelation; but that which was at firſt deliver'd to the Chriſtian Church, and hath been ſince received and embraced by it in the ſeveral Ages; and hath been moſt ſtrenuouſly aſſerted, when it hath met with Oppoſition, as founded on Scripture and the general Conſent of the Chriſtian Church.

(4.) That which beſt agrees with the Characters of thoſe Perſons from whom we receive the Chriſtian Faith; and thoſe are Chriſt Jeſus and his Holy Apoſtles. For, if their Authority be loſt, our Religion is gone; and their Authority depends upon their Sincerity and Faithfulneſs, and Care to inform the World aright in matters of ſo great Importance.

(1.) I begin with the Character which the Apoſtles give of Chriſt Jeſus himſelf; which is, that he was a Perſon of the greateſt Humility and Condeſcenſion, that he did not aſſume to himſelf that which he might juſtly have done. For let the words of St. Paul be underſtood either as to the Nature, or Dignity of Chriſt, it is certain that they muſt imply thus much, that when Chriſt Jeſus was here on Earth, he was not of a vain aſſuming humour, that he did not boaſt of himſelf, nor magnifie his own Greatneſs, but was contented to be look'd on as other Men; although he had at that time far greater and Diviner Excellency in him than the World would believe. Leſs than this, cannot be made of thoſe Words of the Apoſtle, Who being in the form of Phil. 2. 6, 7. God, he thought it not Robbery to be equal with God, but made himſelf of no Reputation, and took upon him the form of a Servant.

Now this being the Character given of him, let us conſider what he doth affirm concerning himſelf. For although he was far from drawing the People after him, by ſetting forth his own Perfections; yet upon juſt Occaſions, when the Jews conteſted with him, he did Aſſert ſuch things, which muſt ſavour of Vanity and Oſtenation, or elſe muſt imply that he was the Eternal Son of God. For, all Mankind are agreed that the higheſt degree of Ambition lies in Affecting Divine Honour, or for a meer Man to be thought a God. How ſeverely did God puniſh Herod for being pleaſed with the Peoples folly in crying out, the Voice of God and not of Man? Act. 12. 22. And therefore he could never have born with ſuch poſitive Aſſertions and ſuch repeated Defences of his being the Son of God in ſuch a manner as implied his being ſo from Eternity. This in his Diſputes with the Jews he affirms ſeveral times, that he came down from Heaven, not in a Metaphorical but in a proper Joh. 6. 32, 33. Senſe, as appears by thoſe words, What and if ye ſhall ſee the Son of Man aſcend up where he was before? 38. 50. 58 62. In another Conference he aſſerted, that he was before Abraham. Joh. 8. 58. Which the Jews ſo literally underſtood, that without a Metaphor they went about to ſtone him; v. 59. little imagining that by Abraham the calling of the Gentiles was to be underſtood. But above all, is that Expreſſion which he uſed to the Jews at another Conference, I and my Father are one; Joh. 10. 30. which they underſtood in ſuch a manner that immediately they took up ſtones to have ſtoned him. v. 31. What means all this Rage of the Jews againſt him? What? for ſaying that he had Unity of Conſent with his Father? No certainly. But the Jews miſunderſtood him. Let us ſuppoſe it; would not our Saviour have immediately explained himſelf to prevent ſo dangerous a Miſconſtruction? But he asked them, what it was they ſtoned him for? They anſwer him directly and plainly, becauſe that thou being a man makeſt thy ſelf God. v. 32, 33. This was home to the purpoſe. And here was the time for him to have denied it, if it had not been ſo. But doth he deny? Doth he ſay, it would be Blaſphemy in him to own it? No; but he goes about to defend it; and proves it to be no Blaſphemy for him to ſay that he was the v. 36. Son

Son of God; i. e. ſo as to be God, as the Jews underſtood it. Can we imagine that a meer Man knowing himſelf to be ſuch, ſhould aſſume this to himſelf; and yet God to bear witneſs to him not only by Miracles
Mat. 3. 17. but by a Voice from Heaven, wherein he was called his beloved Son in whom he was well pleaſed? Could God be pleaſed with a mortal, finite, deſpicable Creature, as the Jews thought him, that aſſumed to himſelf to be God, and maintained and defended it among his own People, in a ſolemn Conference at a very Publick Place, in one of the Portico's of the Temple? And this he perſiſted in to the laſt. For, when Matth. 26. 63. the High Prieſt adjured him by the living God to tell, whether he were the Chriſt the Son of God, (for he, no doubt, had heard of the Reſult of
v. 64. this Conference in Solomon's Porch) Jeſus ſaid unto him, Thou haſt ſaid, Mark 14. 62. St. Mark, more expreſly, Jeſus ſaid, I am. And this was the Blaſphemy, v. 64. for which they put him to death; as appears by the Evangeliſts.
Matth. 26. 66. So that this ought to be a Diſpute only between Jews and Chriſtians; ſince it was the very point, for which they condemned him to death.
And in his laſt moſt Divine Prayer juſt before his Suffering, he owns the Luk. 22. 71. Glory which he had with the Father before the World had a Being. And now, O Father, glorifie thou me with the Glory which I had with thee, before Joh. 17. 5. the World was. Was this nothing but the Glory which God had deſigned to give him? This is ſo far from being peculiar to Chriſt, that it is common to all whom God deſigns to glorifie; and takes away the diſtinction between the Decree and the Execution of it.

(2.) As to the Apoſtles, the Reaſon we believe their Teſtimony is, that they were Men of great Sincerity and Plainneſs, and of great Zeal for the Honour and Glory of God. And according to this Character, let us examine what they ſay concerning Chriſt Jeſus.

He that was moſt converſant with him, and beloved by him, and lived to ſee his Divinity conteſted by ſome, and denied by others, is Joh. 1. 1, 2, &c. moſt ample in ſetting it forth in his Admirable, Sublime, and Divine Introduction to his Goſpel. Which all the Wit of Mankind can never make tolerable Senſe of, if they deny Chriſt's being the Eternal Son of God; and it is he, that hath preſerved thoſe Conferences with the Jews, wherein he aſſerts his own Divinity.

S. Paul was a Stranger to him while he lived; but at the ſame time when he was ſo zealous to perſwade the Gentiles to the Worſhip of God
Rom. 9. 5. and not of Creatures, he calls him God over all, bleſſed for evermore.
Rom. 1. 20. And when he ſaith, that the Eternal Power and Godhead are known Col. 1. 16. by the Creation of the World, he attributes the Creation of all things to Heb. 1. 2, 10. Chriſt, applying to him thoſe words of the Pſalmiſt. Thou Lord in the beginning haſt laid the Foundation of the Earth and the Heaven, the Work of thy hands. Which cannot be underſtood of any Metaphorical Creation.

And after the ſtricteſt Examination of Copies, thoſe will be found the beſt, which have that Reading on which our Tranſlation is grounded.
1 Tim. 3. 16. And without Controverſie great is the Myſtery of Godlineſs, God was manifeſt in the Fleſh. So that God's being manifeſt in the Fleſh is made a great part of the Myſtery of Chriſtianity.

But here ariſes a Difficulty, which deſerves to be conſidered; i. e.
" If there were nothing in the Chriſtian Doctrine, but the Way of ſaving " Sinners by the Doctrine and Example of Chriſt, there would be " little Objection to be made to it; ſince the obtaining Eternal Life is " certainly the beſt thing can be propoſed to Mankind, and the Precepts “cepts of Chriſt are Divine and Spiritual, Plain and Eaſie to be Underſtood, and Agreeable to the Reaſon of Mankind; but many other things are impoſed on Men as neceſſary to be believed concerning Chriſt Jeſus, as to his Divinity, Incarnation, and the Hypoſtatical Union of both Natures, which perplex and confound our underſtandings; and yet theſe things are not only deliver'd as Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith; but the Belief of them is required as neceſſary to the Salvation of Sinners; whereas, if they are Revealed they are no longer Myſteries; and if they are not Revealed, how come they to be made Articles of Faith? The Scripture knows of no other Myſteries of Faith but ſuch as were hidden before the Revelation of them, but ſince they are Revealed they are plain and open to all Mens Capacities; and therefore it is a great Injury to the Plainneſs and Simplicity of the Goſpel to impoſe ſuch incomprehenſible Myſteries, as Neceſſary Articles of Faith; and it is abuſing the Credulity of Mankind, to make ſuch things neceſſary to be believed, which are impoſſible to be underſtood. But thoſe who have ever loved to deceive and abuſe the reſt of the World, have been always fond of the Name of Myſteries; and therefore all ſuch things are to be ſuſpected which come under that Name. For, all ſuch Points which will not bear Examination, muſt be wrapt up and Reverenced under the Name of Myſteries, that is, of things to be ſwallow'd without being underſtood. But the Scripture never calls that a Myſtery which is Incomprehenſible in it ſelf, though never ſo much revealed.

Diſcourſe of the Word Myſtery, &c. p. 5.

This is the main force of the Objection, which I ſhall endeavour to remove by ſhewing, (1.) That God may juſtly require from us in general, the Belief of what we cannot comprehend.

(2.) That which way ſoever the Way of Salvation by Chriſt be explained, there will be ſomething of that Nature found in it; and that thoſe who Reject the Myſteries of Faith run into greater Difficulties than thoſe who aſſert them.

(3.) That no more is required as a Neceſſary Article of Faith than what is plainly and clearly Revealed.

(1.) That God may juſtly require from us in general, the Belief of what we cannot comprehend. It is to very little purpoſe to enquire whether the Word Myſtery in Scripture be applied to ſuch particular Doctrines, whoſe Subſtance is revealed, but the manner of them is incomprehenſible by us; for why may not we make uſe of ſuch a Word whereby to expreſs things truly revealed, but above our Comprehenſion? We are certain the Word Myſtery is uſed for things far leſs difficult and abſtruſe; and why may it not then be fitly applied to ſuch matters, which are founded on Divine Revelation, but yet are too deep for us to go to the bottom of them? Are there not Myſteries in Arts, Myſteries in Nature, Myſteries in Providence? And what Abſurdity is there to call thoſe Myſteries, which in ſome Meaſure are known, but in much greater unknown to us? Although therefore in the Language of Scripture it be granted, that the word Myſtery is moſt frequently applied, to things before hidden, but now revealed, yet there is no Incongruity in calling that a Myſtery, which being revealed, hath yet ſomething in it which our underſtandings cannot reach to. But it is meer Cavilling to inſiſt on a Word, if the thing it ſelf be granted. The chief thing therefore to be done is, to ſhew that God may require from us the belief of ſuch things which are incomprehenſible by us. For, God may require any thing from us, which it is reaſonable for us to do; if it be then reaſonable for us to give Aſſent where the manner of what God hath revealed is not comprehended, then God may certainly require it from us. Hath not God revealed to us, that in ſix days he made Heaven and Earth and all that is therein? But is it not reaſonable for us to believe this, unleſs we are able to comprehend the manner of God's Production of things? Here we have ſomething revealed and that plainly enough, viz. That God created all things, and yet, here is a Myſtery remaining as to the manner of doing it. Hath not God plainly revealed that there ſhall be a Reſurrection of the Dead? And muſt we think it unreaſonable to believe it, till we are able to comprehend all the Changes of the Particles of Matter from the Creation to the General Reſurrection? But it is ſaid that there is no Contradiction in this, but there is in the Myſtery of the Trinity and Incarnation. It is ſtrange Boldneſs in Men to talk thus of Monſtrous Contradictions in things above their Reach. The Atheiſts may as well ſay, Infinite Power is a Monſtrous Contradiction; and God's Immenſity and his other unſearchable Perfections are Monſtrous Paradoxes and Contradictions. Will Men never learn to diſtinguiſh between Numbers and the Nature of Things? For three to be one is a Contradiction in Numbers; but whether an Infinite Nature can communicate it ſelf to three different Subſtances without ſuch a Diviſion as is among Created Beings, muſt not be determined by bare Numbers, but by the Abſolute Perfections of the Divine Nature; which muſt be owned to be above our Comprehenſion.

For let us examine ſome of thoſe Perfections which are moſt clearly revealed and we ſhall find this true. The Scripture plainly reveals, that God is from everlaſting to everlaſting; that he was and is and is to come; but ſhall we not believe the Truth of this till we are able to fathom the Abyſs of God's Eternity? I am apt to think (and I have ſome thoughtful Men concurring with me) that there is no greater Difficulty in the Conception of the Trinity and Incarnation, than there is of Eternity. Not, but that there is great Reaſon to believe it; but from hence it appears that our Reaſon may oblige us to believe ſome things which it is not poſſible for us to comprehend. We know that either God muſt have been for ever, or it is impoſſible he ever ſhould be; for if he ſhould come into Being when he was not, he muſt have ſome Cauſe of his Being; and that which was the firſt Cauſe would be God. But, if he was for ever he muſt be from himſelf; and what Notion or Conception can we have in our Minds concerning it? And yet, Atheiſtical Men can take no Advantage from hence; becauſe their own moſt abſurd Hypotheſis hath the very ſame Difficulty in it. For ſomething muſt have been for ever. And it is far more reaſonable to ſuppoſe it of an Infinite and Eternal Mind, which hath Wiſdom and Power and Goodneſs to give Being to other things, than of dull, ſtupid and ſenſleſs Matter, which could never move it ſelf, nor give Being to any thing beſides. Here we have therefore a thing which muſt be owned by all; and yet ſuch a thing which can be conceived by none. Which ſhews the narrowneſs and ſhortneſs of our Underſtandings, and how unfit they are to be the Meaſures of the Poſſibilities of things. Vain Men would be Wiſe; they would fain go to the very bottom of things, when alas! They ſcarce underſtand the very Surface of them. They will allow no Myſteries in Religion; and yet every thing is a Myſtery to them. They cry out of Cheats and Impoſtures under the Notion of Myſteries; and yet there is not a Spire of Graſs but is a Myſtery to them; they will bear with nothing in Religion which they cannot comprehend, and yet there is ſcarce any thing in the World which they can comprehend. But above other things the Divine Perfections, even thoſe which are moſt Abſolute and Neceſſary are above their Reach. For let ſuch Men try their Imaginations about God's Eternity, not meerly how he ſhould be from himſelf, but how God ſhould coexiſt with all the Differences of Times, and yet there be no Succeſſion in his own Being. I do not ſay there is ſuch Difficulty to conceive a Rock ſtanding ſtill when the Waves run by it; or the Gnomon of a Dial when the Shadow paſſes from one Figure to another; becauſe theſe are groſs unactive things; but the Difficulty is far greater where the Being is Perfect and always Active. For, where there is Succeſſion there is a paſſing out of not being in ſuch a duration into being in it; which is not conſiſtent with the Abſolute Perfection of the Divine Nature. And therefore God muſt be all at once what he is, without any Reſpect to the Difference of time paſt, preſent or to come. From whence Eternity was defined by Boethius to be a perfect and complete Poſſeſſion of all at once of everlaſting Life. De Conſol. l. 3. But how can we from any Conception in our Minds of that being all at once, which hath ſuch different Acts as muſt be meaſur'd by a long Succeſſion of Time? As, the Creating and Diſſolving the Frame of the World; the promiſing and ſending the Meſſias; the Declaring and Executing a general Judgment; how can theſe things be conſiſtent with a Permanent Inſtant, or a Continuance of being without Succeſſion? For, it is impoſſible for us in this Caſe, as to God's Eternity, to form a clear and diſtinct Idea in our Mind, of that which both Reaſon and Revelation convince us muſt be. The moſt we can make of our Conception of it is, that God hath neither Beginning of Being, nor end of Days; but that he always was and always muſt be. And this is rather a neceſſary Concluſion from Reaſon and Scripture, than any diſtinct Notion or Conception of Eternity in our Minds. From whence it evidently follows, that God may reveal ſomething to us, which we are bound to believe, and yet after that Revelation the Manner of it may be incomprehenſible by us, and conſequently a Myſtery to us.

Hath not God Revealed to us in Scripture the Spirituality of his own Nature? That he is a Spirit, and therefore will be worſhipped in Spirit and in Truth; S. Joh. 4 24. For, that is a true Reaſon why Spiritual Worſhip ſhould be moſt agreeable to him. Now, if we could have a clear, diſtinct, poſitive Notion in our Minds of God's Spiritual Nature, we might then pretend that there is nothing Myſterious in this, ſince it is revealed.

But let ſuch Men Examine their own thought about this matter; and try, whether the utmoſt they can attain to, be not ſomething Negative, viz. becauſe great Abſurdities would follow if we attributed any thing Corporeal to God; for, then he muſt be compounded of Parts, and ſo he may be diſſolv'd; then he muſt be confined to a certain place, and not every-where preſent; he cannot have the Power of Acting and Self-determining which a meer Body hath not. For the cleareſt Notion we can have of Body, is; that it is made up of ſome things as parts of it, which may be ſeparated from each other; and is confined to a certain place, and hath no Power to move or act from it ſelf. But ſome of theſe Men who cry down Myſteries and magnifie Reaſon, to ſhew how ſlender their pretences to Reaſon are, have aſſerted a Corporeal God, with Shape and Figure. It was indeed, well thought of by thoſe who would make a Man to be God, to bring God down as near to Man as might be. But how to Reconcile the Notion of a Body with Infinite Perfections, is a Myſtery to me, and far above my Comprehenſion. But if it be no Myſtery to ſuch Men, they muſt either deny God's Infinite Perfections or ſhew how a bodily Shape can be capable of them. But ſome Men can confound Finite and Infinite, Body and Spirit, God and Man, and yet are for no Myſteries; whereas theſe things are farther from our Reach and Comprehenſion, than any of thoſe Doctrines which they find fault with. But to proceed,

If we believe Prophecy, we muſt believe God's fore-knowledge of future Events: For, how could they be foretold if he did not fore-know them? And if he did fore-know thoſe which he did fore-tell, then it was either becauſe thoſe only were revealed to him which is inconſiſtent with the Divine Perfections; or that he doth fore-know all other Events and only thought fitting to reveal theſe: But how can they ſolve the Difficulties about Divine Preſcience? Is there no Myſtery in this? Nothing above their Comprehenſion? What then made their great Maſter deny it, as a thing above his Comprehenſion? Becauſe nothing can be fore-known but what hath a certain Cauſe, and therefore, if evil Actions be fore-told, God muſt be the Cauſe of them, and Men will not be free Agents in them. And yet it is moſt certain, that the Sufferings of Chriſt by the Wickedneſs of Men, were fore-told. What then? Muſt we make God the Author of Sin? God forbid. Will the Righteous Judge of all the Earth, puniſh Mankind for his own Acts, which they could not avoid? Then we muſt yield, that there is ſomething in the manner of the Divine Preſcience, which is above our Comprehenſion. And the moſt Searching and Inquiſitive Men have been forc'd to yield it at laſt, as to the Connection between the Certainty of Preſcience and the Liberty of humane Actions. Is it not then much better to ſit down quietly at firſt, Adoring the Infiniteneſs of God's incomprehenſible Perfections, than after all the Huffings and Diſputings of Men to ſay, In Ignorantiâ ſolâ quietem invenio, as the great School-man did? Surely then, here is ſomething plainly revealed, and yet the manner of it is ſtill a Myſtery to us.

I ſhall not now inſiſt on any more of the particular Attributes of God, but only in general I deſire to know, whether they believe them to be finite or infinite? If to be finite, then they muſt have certain bounds and limits which they cannot exceed; and that muſt either be from the imperfection of Nature, or from a Superiour Cauſe, both which are repugnant to the very Being of God. If they believe them to be infinite how can they comprehend them? We are ſtrangely puzled in plain, ordinary, finite things; but it is madneſs to pretend to comprehend what is Infinite; and yet if the Perfections of God be not Infinite they cannot belong to him.

I ſhall only add, in Conſequence to this Aſſertion, That if nothing is to be believed, but what may be comprehended, the very Being of God muſt be rejected too. And therefore I deſire all ſuch who talk ſo warmly againſt any Myſteries in Religion, to conſider whoſe work it is they are doing; even theirs who under this pretence go about to overthrow all Religion. “ For, ſay they, Religion is a Myſtery in its own Nature;

" not this or that, or the other Religion; but they are all alike, all " is Myſtery; and that is but another Name for Fraud and Impoſture. " What were the Heathen Myſteries but tricks of Prieſt-craft; and ſuch " are maintained and kept up in all kinds of Religion. If therefore " theſe Men, who talk againſt Myſteries underſtand themſelves, they " muſt in purſuance of their Principles reject one God, as well as three " Perſons; For, as long as they believe an Infinite and Incomprehenſible Being, it is Nonſenſe to reject any other Doctrine, which relates " to an Infinite Being, becauſe it is Incomprehenſible.

But yet theſe very Men, who ſeem to purſue the Conſequence of this Principle to the utmoſt, muſt aſſert ſomething more incomprehenſible than the Being of God. For, I appeal to any Man of common Underſtanding, whether it be not more agreeable to Reaſon to ſuppoſe Works of Skill, Beauty and Order to be the Effects of a Wiſe and Intelligent Being, than of Blind Chance and Unaccountable Neceſſity; whether it be not more agreeable to the Senſe of Mankind to ſuppoſe an Infinite and Eternal Mind endued with all poſſible Perfections to be the Maker of this viſible World; than that it ſhould ſtart out from it ſelf, without Contrivance, without Order, without Cauſe? Certainly ſuch Men have no Reaſon to find fault with the Myſteries of Religion becauſe they are incomprehenſible, ſince there is nothing ſo Abſurd and Incomprehenſible, as their darling Hypotheſis; And, there is nothing which can make it prevail, but to ſuppoſe Mankind to be as Dull and Inſenſible as the firſt Chaos.

Thus I have ſhewn that it is not unreaſonable for God to require from us the Belief of ſomething which we cannot comprehend.

(2.) I now come to conſider, whether thoſe who are ſo afraid of incomprehenſible Myſteries in our Faith, have made it ſo much more eaſie in the Way they have taken. And notwithſtanding all the Hectoring talk againſt Myſteries and things incomprehenſible in Religion, I find more inſuperable Difficulties in point of Reaſon in their Way than in ours. As for inſtance,

(1.) It is a more Reaſonable thing to ſuppoſe ſomething Myſterious in the Eternal Son of God's being with the Father before the World was made by him; (as St. John expreſſes it in the beginning of his Goſpel) than in ſuppoſing that although John the Baptiſt were born ſix Months before Jeſus Chriſt; that yet Chriſt was in Dignity before him. What a wonderful Myſtery is this? Can Men have the Face to cry down Myſteries in deep Speculations, and matters of a high and abſtruſe Nature, when they make ſuch Myſteries of plain and eaſie things? And ſuppoſe the Evangeliſt in profound Language and lofty Expreſſions to prove a thing, which was never diſputed, viz. although Chriſt Jeſus were born ſix Months after John, yet he was in Dignity before him?

(2.) It is a more Reaſonable thing to ſuppoſe that a Divine Perſon ſhould aſſume humane Nature, and ſo the Word to be made Fleſh; than to ſay, that an Attribute of God, his Wiſdom or Power is made Fleſh, which is a Myſtery beyond all Comprehenſion; There may be ſome Difficulties in our Conception of the other, but this is a thing beyond all Conception or Imagination; For an Accident to be made a Subſtance is as abſurd, as to imagine it to ſubſiſt without one.

(3.) It is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe that the Son of God ſhould come down from Heaven and take our Nature upon him, than that a Man ſhould be rapt up into Heaven, that it might be ſaid that he came down from thence. For in the former Suppoſition we have many other places of Scripture to ſupport it, which ſpeak of his being with God, and having Glory with him before the World was; whereas there is nothing for the other, but only that it is neceſſary to make ſome tolerable Senſe of thoſe words.

(4.) It is more more Reaſonable to believe that God ſhould become Man by taking our Nature upon him, than that Man ſhould become God. For in the former, there is nothing but the Difficulty of conceiving the Manner of the Union, which we all grant to be ſo between Soul and Body; but in the other there is a Repugnancy in the very Conception of a Created God, of an Eternal Son of Adam, of Omnipotent Infirmity, of an Infinite finite Being. In the former Caſe, an Infinite is united to a Finite; but in the other a Finite becomes Infinite.

(5.) It is more Reaſonable to believe that Chriſt Jeſus ſhould ſuffer as he did for our ſakes than for his own. We are all agreed that the Sufferings of Chriſt were far beyond any thing he deſerved at God's hands; but what Account then is to be given of them? We ſay that he made himſelf a voluntary Sacrifice for Expiation of the Sins of Mankind; and ſo there was a great and noble end deſigned, and no Injury done to a willing Mind; and the Scripture as plainly expreſſes this, as it can do in Words. But others deny this, and make him to ſuffer as one wholly Innocent; for what Cauſe? To make the moſt Innocent Perſons as apprehenſive of Suffering as the moſt Guilty; and the moſt righteous God to put no difference between them, with Reſpect to Suffering.

(6.) It is more Reaſonable to ſuppoſe ſuch a Condeſcenſion in the Son of God to take upon him the Form of a Servant for our Advantage; than that a meer Man ſhould be exalted to the Honour and Worſhip which belongs only to God. For, on the one ſide, there is nothing but what is agreeable to the Divine Nature, viz. Infinite Love and Condeſcenſion and Pity to Mankind; on the other, there is the greateſt Deſign of Self-Exaltation that ever was in Humane Nature, viz. for a meer Man to have the moſt Eſſential Attributes and Incommunicable Honour which belongs to God. And whether of theſe two is more agreeable to the Spirit and Deſign of the New Teſtament, let any Man of underſtanding judge. For as it is evident, that the great Intention of it is to magnifie the wonderful Love of God in the ſending of his Son; ſo it is as plain that one great end of the Chriſtian Doctrine was to take Mankind off from giving Divine Worſhip to Creatures; and can we then ſuppoſe that at the ſame time it ſhould ſet up the Worſhip of a meer Man with all the Honour and Adoration which belongs to God? This is to me an incomprehenſible Myſtery indeed, and far beyond all that is implied in the Myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation. For it ſubverts the very Foundation of the Deſign of Chriſtianity as to the Reforming Idolatry then in being: it lays the Foundation for introducing it into the World again; for ſince the Diſtance between God and his Creatures is taken away, in the matter of Worſhip, there is nothing left but the Declaration of his Will; which doth not exclude more Mediators of Interceſſion but upon this Ground, that the Mediation of Redemption is the Foundation of that of Interceſſion. And it is far more eaſie for us to ſuppoſe there may be ſome things too hard for us to underſtand in the Myſtery of our Redemption by Jeſus Chriſt, than that at the ſame time it ſhould be both a Duty and a Sin to worſhip any but the true God with proper Divine Worſhip.

ſhip. For if it be Idolatry to give it to a Creature, then it is a great Sin; for ſo the Scripture ſtill accounts it; but if we are bound to give it to Chriſt who is but a Creature, then that which in it ſelf is a Sin, is now become a neceſſary Duty; which overthrows the natural Differences of Good and Evil, and makes Idolatry to be a meer Arbitrary thing. And I take it for granted, that in Matters of Religion, Moral Difficulties are more to be regarded than Intellectual; becauſe Religion was far more deſigned for a Rule of our Actions, than for the Satisfaction of our Curioſity. And upon due Examination we ſhall find that there is no ſuch frightful Appearances of Difficulties in the Myſtery of the Incarnation, as there is in giving Divine Worſhip to a Creature.

And it ought to be obſerved, that thoſe very Places which are ſuppoſed to exclude Chriſt from being the true God; muſt, if they have any force exclude him from Divine Worſhip. For they are ſpoken of God, as the Object of our Worſhip; but if he be not excluded from Divine Worſhip, then neither is he from being the true God; which they grant he is by Office, but not by Nature.

1 Cor. 6. 6.
Wick. c. 11. Catech. Racov. p. 65.

But a God by Office who is not ſo by Nature is a new and incomprehenſible Myſtery. A Myſtery hidden from Ages and Generations as to the Church of God; but not made known by the Goſpel of his Son.

This is ſuch a kind of Myſtery as the Heathen Prieſts had, who had Gods many and Lords many, as the Apoſtle ſaith, i. e. many by Office although but one by Nature. But if the Chriſtian Religion had owned one God by Nature and only one by Office, the Heathens had been to blame chiefly in the Number of their Gods by Office, and not in the Divine Worſhip which they gave to them. But S. Paul blames the Heathens for doing Service to them which by Nature are no Gods; not for doing it without Divine Authority, nor for miſtaking the Perſon who was God by Office, but in giving Divine Worſhip to them who by Nature were no Gods; which he would never have ſaid, if by the Chriſtian Doctrine, Divine Worſhip were to be given to one who was not God by Nature.

1 Cor. 8. 5.
Gal. 4. 8.

But theſe are indeed incomprehenſible Myſteries how a Man by Nature can be a God really and truly by Office; how the Incommunicable Perfections of the Divine Nature can be communicated to a Creature; how God ſhould give his Glory to another, and by his own Command require that to be given to a Creature, which himſelf had abſolutely forbidden to be given to any beſides himſelf. It is ſaid by a famous Jeſuit (I will not ſay how agreeably to their own Doctrines and Practices about Divine Worſhip) that the Command of God cannot make him worthy of Divine Worſhip, who without ſuch a Command is not worthy of it. And it is very abſurd to ſay, that he that is unworthy of it without a Command, can become worthy by it; for it makes God to command Divine Honour to be given to one who cannot deſerve it. (For no meer Man can deſerve to be made God.) But it is more agreeable to the Divine Nature and Will not to give his Honour to a Creature.

Smiglec. de Divin. Verb. Incarn. Nat. p. 45.
Nova Monſtra, &c. p. 42.

(3.) But after all the Invectives of theſe Enemies to Myſteries, we do not make that which we ſay is Incomprehenſible to be a Neceſſary Article of Faith as it is Incomprehenſible; but we do aſſert that what is Incomprehenſible as to the Manner, may be a Neceſſary Article as far as it is plainly Revealed. As in the Inſtances I have already mentioned of the Creation and Reſurrection of the Dead; would they in earneſt have Men turn Infidels as to theſe things till they are able to comprehend all the difficulties which relate to them? If not, why ſhould this Suggeſtion be allow'd as to the Myſteries which relate to our Redemption by Jeſus Chriſt? If it be ſaid, the Caſe is not alike for thoſe are clearly Revealed and theſe are not; this brings it to the true and proper Iſſue of this matter, and if we do not prove a clear Revelation, we do not aſſert their being Neceſſary Articles of Faith; but my preſent buſineſs was only to take off this Objection, That the Myſteries were Incomprehenſible and therefore not to be received by us.

II. And ſo I come to the ſecond Way, by which we are to Examine the ſeveral Senſes of Chriſt Jeſus coming to ſave Sinners: Which of them tends more to the Benefit and Advantage of Mankind; or which is more worthy of all Acceptation.

And that will appear by conſidering theſe things;

(1.) Which tends moſt to the raiſing our Eſteem and Love of Chriſt Jeſus.

(2.) Which tends moſt to the begetting in us a greater Hatred of Sin.

(3.) Which tends moſt to the ſtrengthning our Hope of Salvation by Jeſus Chriſt.

(1.) As to the raiſing in us a greater Eſteem and Love of Chriſt. We are certain that the Infinite Love and Condeſcenſion of Chriſt Jeſus in undertaking ſuch a Work as the ſaving of Sinners makes it moſt worthy of all Acceptation. Some Men may pleaſe themſelves in thinking that by taking away all Myſteries they have made their Faith more eaſie, but I am certain they have extremely leſſen'd the Argument for our Love, viz. the Apprehenſions of the wonderful Love and Condeſcenſion of Chriſt in coming into the World to ſave Sinners. And yet this is the great Argument of the New Teſtament to perſwade Mankind to the Joh. 3. 16. Love of God and of his Son: God ſo loved the World that he gave his only begotten Son, &c. This is indeed a mighty Argument of Love, if v. 13. by the only begotten Son be meant the Eternal Son of God, who came down from Heaven, as S. John ſpeaks juſt before; but if no more be meant but only that God made a meer Man to be his Son, and after he had preached a while here on Earth and was ill uſed and crucified by his own People, he Exalted him to be God and gave him Divine Attributes and Honours; this were an Argument of great Love to the Perſon of Chriſt, but not to the reſt of Mankind. But God's Love in Scripture is magnified with Reſpect to the World in the ſending of his 1 Joh. 4. 9. Son. In this was manifeſted, ſaith the Apoſtle, the Love of God towards us, becauſe that God ſent his only begotten Son into the World that we v. 10. ſhould live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and ſent his Son to be a Propitiation for our Sin. The great Love we ſtill ſee is toward us, i. e. towards Mankind; but according to the other Senſe it muſt have been, herein was the Love of God manifeſted to his Son, that for his Sufferings he exalted him above all Crea- Rom. 8. 32. tures. He that ſpared not his own Son, ſaith S. Paul, but delivered him up for us all. If he were the Eternal Son of God who came to ſuffer for us, there is a mighty force and Emphaſis in this Expreſſion, and very apt to raiſe our Admiration and our Love; But what not ſparing his own Son is there, if nothing were meant but that he deſigned by Sufferings to Exalt him? For not ſparing him ſuppoſes an Antecedent Relation of the higheſt Kindneſs, but the other is only deſigning extraordinary Kindneſs for the ſake of his Sufferings. Therefore, the Argument for the Love of God is taken from what his Son was, when he deliver'd him up for us all; he was his own Son; not by Adoption as others are;

S. John calls him, his only begotten Son; and God himſelf, his beloved Joh. 1. 14.

diately after his Baptiſm, when as yet, there was nothing extraordina- Luk. 3. 22.
ry done by him, as to the great Deſign of his coming. Which ſhews, that there was an Antecedent Relation between him and the Father; and that therein the Love of God and of Chriſt was manifeſted, that being the only begotten Son of the Father, he ſhould take our Nature upon him and for our ſakes do and ſuffer what he did. This is indeed an Argument great enough to raiſe our Admiration, to excite our Devotion, to inflame our Affections; but how flat and low doth it appear, when it comes to no more than this, that there was a Man, whom, after his Sufferings God raiſed from the Dead and made him a God by Office? Doth this carry any ſuch Argument in it for our Eſteem and Love and Devotion to him as the other doth upon the moſt ſerious Conſideration of it?

(2.) Which tends moſt to beget in us a greatter Hatred of Sin. For that is ſo contrary to the Way of our Salvation by Jeſus Chriſt, that what tends moſt to our Hatred of it, muſt conduce moſt to our Happineſs, and therefore be moſt worthy of all Acceptation. It is agreed on all hands, that Chriſt did ſuffer very much both in his Mind and in his Body. In his Mind, when it is ſaid, that he was troubled in Spirit; that he began to be ſorrowful and very heavy; and ſoon after, My Soul is ex- John 13. 21.
ceeding ſorrowful, even unto death. S. Luke ſaith, that he was in an Agony; Matt. 26.

and dreadful Agony in the mind of the moſt innocent Perſon in the 33, 34.
World? Was it meerly the Fear of the Pains of Death which he was Luke 22. 44. to undergo? That is impoſſible, conſidering the Aſſurance which he had of ſo glorious a Reward ſo ſoon following after; when ſo many Martyrs endured ſuch exquiſite Torments for his ſake without any ſuch Diſturbance or Conſternation. But the Apoſtles give us another Account of it. St. Peter ſaith, he was to bear our Sins in his own Body on 1 Pet. 2.
the Tree; that Chriſt ſuffered for Sins, the juſt for the unjuſt. S. Paul, that 24. 3. 18.
God made him to be Sin for us who knew no Sin, that we might be made the 2 Cor. 5.
Righteouſneſs of God in him. Hereby we underſtand how ſo innocent a 21.
Perſon came to ſuffer; he ſtood in our ſtead; he was made Sin for us; and therefore was to be treated as a Sinner; and to ſuffer that on our Account, which he could not deſerve on his own. If he ſuffer'd on his own Account, this were the way to fill our Minds with Perplexity concerning the Juſtice of Providence with Reſpect to his dealings with the moſt innocent and holy Perſons in this World; if he ſuffer'd on our Account, then we have the Benefit of his Sufferings, and therein we ſee how diſpleaſing to God ſin is, when even his own Son ſuffer'd ſo much by taking the guilt of our Sins upon him. And what can tend more to the begetting in us a due hatred of Sin, than to conſider what Chriſt himſelf ſuffer'd on the Account of it? What can make us have more dreadful thoughts of it, than that the great and merciful God when he deſigned to ſave Sinners, yet would have his own Son to become a Propitiation for the Sins of Mankind? And unleſs we allow this, we muſt put force upon the plaineſt Expreſſions of Scripture; and make Chriſt to ſuffer meerly to ſhew God's Power over a moſt innocent Perſon, and his Will and Pleaſure to inflict the moſt ſevere Puniſhment without any Reſpect to Guilt. And ſurely ſuch a Notion of God, cannot be worthy of all Acceptation.

(3.) Which tends moſt to ſtrengthen our Hope of Salvation by Chriſt Jeſus. If we believe that he ſuffer'd for our Sins, then we have great Reaſon to hope for the Forgiveneſs of them; although they have been many and great, if we ſincerely Repent; becauſe the moſt prevailing Argument for Deſpair will be removed; which is taken from the Juſtice of God, and his declared Hatred of Sin and Diſpleaſure againſt Sinners. If God be ſo much in earneſt diſpleaſed with the Sins of Mankind, and his Juſtice be concerned in the Puniſhment of Sinners, how can they ever hope to eſcape, unleſs there be a way for his Diſpleaſure to be removed, and his Juſtice to be ſatisfied? And this the Scripture tells us is done by Chriſt, who died that he might be a Sacrifice of Atonement to Reconcile us to God by his Death; as S. Paul expreſly affirms. And by this means, we may have ſtrong Conſolation from the Hopes of Forgiveneſs of our Sins. Whereas, if this be taken away, either Men muſt believe that God was not in earneſt diſpleaſed with the Sins of Mankind; which muſt exceedingly leſſen our Eſteem of the Holineſs and Juſtice of God; or if he were ſo diſpleaſed, that he laid aſide his Diſpleaſure, without any Atonement or Sacrifice of Expiation. And ſo, as many as look on God's Juſtice and Holineſs as neceſſary and eſſential Attributes of God, will be in danger of ſinking into the Depths of Deſpair, as often as they Reflect ſeriouſly on the Guilt of their Sins. But on the other ſide, if we believe that while we were Enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; then we may have Peace with God through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and have reaſon to believe that there will be no Condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Jeſus by a lively Faith and ſincere Repentance; then they may with Comfort look up to God as a Reconciled Father, through Jeſus Chriſt our Mediator: Then they may with inward Satisfaction look beyond the Grave, and ſtedfaſtly hope for that Salvation which Chriſt purchaſed on Earth and will at laſt beſtow on all ſuch as Love and Obey him. To which God of his Infinite Mercy bring us all through Jeſus Chriſt. For, This is a faithful ſaying and worthy of all Acceptation, that he came into the World to ſave Sinners.

PART II.

THE BOOKSELLER TO THE READER.

THIS Second Diſcourſe concerning the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction, was left prepared for the Preſs, by the Right Reverend and Learned Author, under his own Hand-writing, except the two laſt Heads mentioned in the Third Chapter of the Contents, which he was prevented from finiſhing by that Diſtemper he laboured under, and which at laſt put an end to his Life. However, it was thought convenient that this ſhould be publiſhed as it is, rather than the World ſhould be deprived of any thing written by ſo great a Man; and as this finds Acceptance, it may encourage the Printing of ſome other Manuſcripts his Lordſhip left.

Henry Mortlock.

A LETTER from the Right Reverend Dr. Stillingfleet, late Biſhop of Worceſter, in Anſwer to one from Mr. Williams, who deſired his Judgment as to the following Queſtions; becauſe his Lordſhip's Book is in the firſt Paper, and the Report pleaded againſt Mr. Williams.

SIR,

I Return you Thanks for the Papers you were pleaſed to ſend me, by which I am able to underſtand ſomething more than formerly of the preſent State of the Difference about the Change of Perſons between Chriſt and us: But I ſhall meddle no farther in it, than I am obliged to do in Anſwer to the Queſtions you propoſe to me. And I wiſh I may be able to do any Service therein.

The firſt is about my Senſe of Commutation of Perſons. It is ſaid in the firſt Paper, That I do with Grotius expreſſy affirm, and irrefragably prove it with the common Sentiment of Proteſtants, and that the Doctrines of Juſtification and Chriſt's Satisfaction, cannot be duly explained and defended conſiſtently with the Denial of any Commutation of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers.

This had been fairly repreſented, in Caſe there could be no other Senſe of Commutation of Perſons than what is aſſerted by Dr. Criſp, but there is a threefold Senſe of it, very different from each other.

1. Such a Change of Perſons, as implies that one is appointed and allowed to act on behalf of others, and for their Advantage; and this ſort of Commutation of Perſons the Socinians never denied, as I have ſhewed in the Diſcourſe of Satisfaction, p. 62, 190, 191. It is not therefore the uſe of the Words, but the Senſe of them is to be enquired into. For ſome may affirm a Change of Perſons, and yet be Socinians; and others may deny a Change, and be far enough from Socinianiſm, according to the Senſe in which they are underſtood.

In 8vo. Second Edit.

2. Such a Change of Perſons as ſuppoſes one to be ſubſtituted in the Place of others, to become an Atonement for them in order to their Redemption and Deliverance. And when ſuch a Subſtitution is by the Will of God, and Conſent of the Perſon who ſuffers, here is a real Change of Perſons, as to that particular End which is deſigned by it. And in this Senſe I did aſſert a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and us, becauſe by the Will of the Father, and his own Conſent, he became a Sacrifice of Propitiation for our Sins, in order to their Remiſſion, and our Reconciliation with God on ſuch Terms as are declared in the Goſpel; as may be ſeen at large in the Diſcourſe already mentioned, particularly Ch. 4. Sect. 4.

3. Such a Change of Perſons as implies an actual Tranſlation of the Perſonal Guilt of all the Sins of Believers on Chriſt, and his Perſonal Righteouſneſs on them, without regard to any Conditions on their Part, but merely by the free Grace and Favour of God. And this I take to be Dr. Criſp's Senſe of the Change of Perſons; of which I ſhall diſcourſe when I come to the laſt Queſtion.

But the Authors of the firſt Paper, and of the Report, p. 4. ſeem to take it for granted, that there can be but one Senſe of Commutation of Perſons, wherein they do not diſcover their profound Knowledge in theſe Matters, if they thought ſo; or their Ingenuity, if they knew otherwiſe, and deſigned to impoſe upon thoſe who did not. For it appears that there is a Senſe in which it may and ought to be denied, without the leaſt prejudice to the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction. Although that cannot be explained or defended without ſome kind of Commutation of Perſons; yet it very well may and ought to be defended without and againſt Dr. Criſp's Senſe of it, as will be made appear afterwards.

The Author of the Report, p. 5. ſaith, This is the very Hinge on which the Controverſy between the Orthodox and Socinian doth turn; which ſhews him to be not very deeply skilled in it; for the Hinge of the Controverſy is not about the Words, but the Senſe of Commutation of Perſons: And even the Senſe is not the Original Controverſy, but conſequential upon our aſſerting Chriſt's Sacrifice to be a Propitiation for our Sins; for upon this they ask how the Act of one Perſon can be ſo beneficial to others? And to that we anſwer, That although one Man's Act cannot become anothers, yet if by Conſent both of the Father and Son, he becomes our Mediator, and ſuffers in our ſtead, in order to our Reconciliation, then as to that End and Purpoſe, here is a Change of Perſons: for whereas in ſtrictneſs we ought to have ſuffered the Deſert of our own Sins, God was pleaſed to accept of his Suffering inſtead of ours, and ſo by vertue of that Propitiation, we hope for the Remiſſion of Sins, and the Favour of God, according to the Terms of the Goſpel. And therein conſiſts the true Controverſy between the Socinians and us, viz. Whether the Sufferings of Chriſt were to be conſidered as a Puniſhment for our Sins, and as a propitiatory Sacrifice to God for them, or only as an Act of Dominion over an innocent Perſon in order to his Advancement to glory.

But it is ſaid in the Report, p. 5. That if there be no Change of Perſons between Chriſt and us, there can be no Tranſlation of the Guilt, nor a juſt Infliction of the Puniſhment of our Sins on Chriſt; that is, there can be no proper Satisfaction.

To this I anſwer, That there is a twofold Tranſlation of Guilt to be conſidered.

1. Of the Perſonal Guilt, which reſults from the Acts of Sin committed by ſuch Perſons. If this Guilt be tranſlated, Chriſt muſt become the very Perſon who committed the Sins; and ſo he muſt be looked on not only as an actual Sinner, but as the Perſon that committed all the Sins of thoſe for whom he died: Which comes ſo near to horrid Blaſphemy, that I wonder Perſons that bear any Reverence to our Bleſſed Saviour do not abhor the very Thoughts of it.

2. Of Legal Guilt, which lies in the Obligation to Puniſhment, by vertue of the Sanction of the Divine Law. Now this Guilt implies two things:

1. The Deſert of Puniſhment which follows perſonal Guilt, and cannot be transferred by a Change of Perſons; for no Man can ceaſe to deſerve Puniſhment for his own Faults, nor deſerve that another ſhould be puniſhed for them.

2. The Obligation to undergo the deſerved Puniſhment: But becauſe the Execution of Puniſhment depends both on the Wiſdom and Juſtice of the Legiſlator, therefore here a Change of Perſons may intervene, and by the Wiſdom and Juſtice of God a Mediator may be accepted in ſuch a manner as himſelf determines, and upon the Acceptance of his Sacrifice the Offenders may be pardoned, and received into the Grace and Favour of God, on ſuch Terms as he hath declared in the Goſpel. And in this Senſe the Guilt of our Sins was charged upon Chriſt as our Mediator, who was to bear the Puniſhment of our Sins, ſo as by vertue of his Sufferings, we may not only hope to eſcape the juſt Puniſhment of our Offences, but to be admitted into the Privileges of the Children of God.

But the Reporter, out of a certain Manuſcript, gives another Account of Commutation of Perſons, viz. That Commutation in a legal Senſe is the ſame with a proper Surrogation, where the Surety puts on the Perſon, and ſtands in the Quality, State and Condition of the Debtor, and lies under the ſame Obligation to anſwer for him.

But this I have ſhewed long ſince to be a very wrong Notion of Chriſt's Satisfaction, and which in effect gives up the Cauſe to the Socinians; for if Sins be conſidered as Debts, God may freely forgive them (without Diſparagement to his Wiſdom and Juſtice) without any Satisfaction; and the right of Puniſhment then depends on God's abſolute Dominion, and Satisfaction muſt be by way of Compenſation; of which I have treated at large, Ch. 1. Sect. 2. ult. But I cannot but wonder at the learned Author of the MS. that he doth at the ſame time aſſert our Sins to be conſidered as Debts, and the Neceſſity of vindictive Juſtice; for what vindictive Juſtice belongs to a Creditor? May not a Creditor part with his own Right, and forgive what and whom he pleaſes, without any Violation of Juſtice? I can hardly think, that thoſe who write ſo rudely and inconſiſtently, ever penetrated into theſe Matters in their own Thoughts, but only take up with a Set of Phraſes and common Expreſſions among thoſe they converſe with, which they look on as the Standard and Meaſure of Truth about theſe Matters.

But he finds fault with ſome Men, who hold that Chriſt only ſuffered in the Perſon of a Mediator, and not in the Perſon of Sinners. What is the Meaning of this? I had thought that a Mediator interpoſing for that end, that by his Sufferings there might be a Propitiation for Sins, did ſo far ſuſtain the Perſon of Sinners, as to take upon himſelf the Puniſhment of their Sins, and procure Grace and Favour for them. But if he means any thing beyond this, he muſt explain himſelf. Chriſt ſuffered in the Perſon of Sinners. Is it that he ſuffered that others might not ſuffer? That is not denied by thoſe who ſay that Chriſt ſuffered in the Perſon of a Mediator. For a Mediator is a publick Perſon, and acts in the ſtead, and on the behalf of others; and if this be called ſuſtaining the Perſon of Sinners, I ſuppoſe they will not quarrel with the Expreſſion. But if more be meant by it, viz. That the perſonal Guilt of Sinners, in Dr. Criſp's Senſe, is transferred upon Chriſt, that they have to deny; as I hope to make it appear in Anſwer to the third Queſtion.

The ſecond Queſtion is, Whether the Author of Goſpel-Truth ſtated, viz. Mr. Williams, be chargeable with Socinianiſm, in what he ſaid, p. 37, 40?

The Charge ſtands thus in the Report, p. 4. That he ſaith, there is no Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Sinners; which is there ſaid to be inconſiſtent with the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction, which muſt ſuppoſe a Commutation of Perſons. And therefore he that denies any Change, cannot aſſert the Doctrine of Satisfaction.

This is the Force of the Objection. And being deſired to give my Opinion of it, I examin'd and compar'd ſeveral Paſſages in that Book, that I might judge truly and impartially concerning it. And I found the Author, p. 3. ſaying concerning the Difference with Dr. Criſp, That it was not whether Chriſt had made full Atonement for Sin; which he thereby owned to be his Senſe. And, p. 7. more fully he owns, That our Sins were imputed to Chriſt, with reſpect to the Guilt thereof; ſo that he by the Father's Appointment, and his own Conſent, became obliged as Mediator, to bear the Puniſhments to the full Satisfaction of Juſtice, and to our actual Remiſſion when we believe. Can any thing be more clear and expreſs againſt Socinianiſm than this? There are other Paſſages, p. 10, 19, 28, &c. to the ſame purpoſe; but theſe are ſufficient to ſhew, that he could not abſolutely deny any Commutation of Perſons.

But in what Words doth he deny it? For it is poſſible there may be ſuch Words uſed as may reſtrain and limit the Senſe; and then it is very hard to force ſuch a Senſe upon them, as is inconſiſtent with what he had ſaid before; for no Man loves to contradict himſelf, eſpecially when he knows what Advantage will be taken by it. The Words are theſe, p. 40. The Difference lies in theſe Points. 1. Whether there be a Change of Perſon between Chriſt and the Elect? Yea, or betwixt Chriſt and Believers. This the Doctor affirms, and I deny. How can any Perſons, in common Ingenuity, underſtand this otherwiſe than that he denied ſuch Change of Perſons, as Dr. Criſp affirmed? But againſt this it is urged by the Author of the MS. in the Report, p. 81. That his Denial of a Change of Perſons is ſo expreſs and full, as leaves no room for any Diſtinction, Limitation or Reſtriction, or for an owning it in any ſenſe. What! not in the Senſe that himſelf had owned it in before? This is very hard, eſpecially when he mentions what the Doctor affirmed, and he denied. There is a very good Paſſage to this Purpoſe in the firſt Paper, mentioned in the Report, p. 12. Not thinking it reaſonable or juſt to charge upon any Brother ſuch Conſequences of any Expreſſion or Opinion of his, which he himſelf ſhall diſown. Why then ſhould ſuch a Senſe be charged upon him, which he diſowns at the ſame time? There muſt be ſomething farther in this Matter, than appears to an indifferent and impartial Reader; what it is, is no part of my Buſineſs to enquire.

But that which muſt give the beſt light into it, will be the Reſolution of the laſt Queſtion.

The third Queſtion is, concerning Dr. Criſp's Senſe of the Change of Perſons, whether it be true or falſe? Which, I ſuppoſe, is truly ſet down by the Author of the Goſpel Truth ſtated, in theſe Words, p. 38. Mark it well, Chriſt himſelf is not ſo compleatly righteous, but we are as righteous as he; nor we ſo completely ſinful, but Chriſt became, being made Sin, as ſinful as we: Nay more, we are the ſame Righteouſneſs; for we are made the Righteouſneſs of God; that very Sinfulneſs that we were, Chriſt is made that very Sinfulneſs before God. So that here is a direct Change, Chriſt takes our Perſon and Condition, and ſtands in our ſtead, and we take Chriſt's Perſon, and ſtand in his ſtead.

Here is indeed a Change of Perſons ſuppoſed, but I do not find it proved; and therefore is only to be looked on as an imaginary Change, which it is poſſible for Men to fanſy: But that is no ground to build a matter of Faith upon, and ſuch as the Salvation of their Souls is ſo nearly concerned in. But to deliver my Opinion freely and diſtinctly about it, I ſhall ſhew,

1. That it hath no Foundation in Scripture.

2. That it is contrary to the Tenor of it, and the Terms of Salvation contained in the Goſpel.

3. That it is attended with very bad Conſequences, which naturally follow from it.

1. That it hath no Foundation in Scripture. For which I deſire it may be conſidered, that our bleſſed Saviour himſelf in all his Preaching, who came to reveal the Will of God to Mankind, ſaith nothing at all of it; and can any poſſibly think, that he would omit ſuch a Point, wherein, I perceive, ſome do think the Subſtance of the Goſpel is contained? All that our Saviour ſaith to this Purpoſe, is, That he came to give his Life a Ranſom for many, Mat. 20 28. and that his Blood was ſhed for many for the Remiſſion of Sins, Mat. 26. 28. What other Change of Perſons is here implied, but that of a Ranſom, and a Sacrifice of Propitiation? He that knew beſt for what end he ſuffered, ſaith not one Word of his taking upon himſelf the Perſon of Sinners, in any other Senſe than as he ſuffered in their ſtead, and for their Advantage. Here is nothing like his being as compleatly ſinful as we; and our being made as righteous as he. And yet certainly he communicated to his Diſciples thoſe Points on which their Juſtification and Salvation depended. But how could they apprehend any ſuch Change of Perſons in this Senſe, from any Words uſed by himſelf to them? And all neceſſary Points of Faith were delivered by our Saviour to his Diſciples: And therefore to make ſuch a Change of Perſons neceſſary, and yet not mentioned by him, is to charge him with failing in his prophetical Office, which all thoſe ought to conſider, who lay ſuch a ſtreſs upon this Matter.

But doth not St. Paul ſay, that God hath made him to be Sin for us, who knew no Sin, that we might be made the Righteouſneſs of God in him? 2 Cor. 5. 21. I grant he doth ſo. But do not theſe Words imply ſuch a Change of Perſons, as Dr. Criſp aſſerts? By no means: Which I thus prove: Dr. Criſp's Notion of the Change of Perſons, ſuppoſes the Benefits of this Change to be antecedent to any Conditions on our ſide, viz. that it was by a Tranſaction between the Father and the Son, without regard to any Act of ours: But when the Apoſtle ſpeaks of Chriſt's being made Sin for us, and our being made the Righteouſneſs of God in him, he ſuppoſes, that before we can have the Benefit of it, we muſt be firſt reconciled to God, which is an Act on our part. For to this purpoſe he ſaith, ver. 18, 19. that after the Reconciliation made by Chriſt at his Death, he had given to the Apoſtles the Miniſtry of Reconciliation. To what purpoſe? Was it only to let them know what Chriſt had already done for Mankind? That were to ſet up a Miniſtery of Conſolation for Believers, but not of Reconciliation. But the Apoſtle lays great Force upon it, that God had committed to them the Word of Reconciliation. Now then, ſaith he, we are Ambaſſadors for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by us, we pray you in Chriſt's ſtead, be ye reconciled to God, ver. 20. They were by this Miniſtry of Reconciliation, after what Chriſt had done and ſuffered, prayed, and with great Earneſtneſs, to be reconciled to God: To what end? If according to this Change of Perſons, they were more than reconciled to God already, if they were true Believers; for they were as righteous as Chriſt himſelf, and therefore muſt be in the Grace and Favour of God. If they were not Believers, then, according to this Scheme of the Change of Perſons, they could have no Benefit by it; and conſequently this Miniſtery of Reconciliation is wholly ſubverted, as to the great Purpoſe and Deſign of it. For either they were reconciled already, or they never could be. And yet the Apoſtle, after thoſe Words, ver. 21. immediately ſubjoins, ch. 6. 1. We then as Workers together with him, beſeech you alſo, that ye receive not the Grace of God in vain. What can the meaning of theſe Words be, if Dr. Criſp's Senſe of the Change of Perſons hold good? Can they who are compleatly righteous, ever receive the Grace of God in vain? And to what purpoſe doth he ſpeak of their working together with God, and beſeeching them not to do a thing utterly impoſſible? For it would be to undo what had long ſince been done between the Father and the Son in the Change of Perſons. So that this Notion of the Change of Perſons is as different from St. Paul's as may be; for that ſuppoſes no Conditions on our ſide; and the Miniſtery of Reconciliation in St. Paul, is wholly founded upon it, and really ſignifies nothing, as to the ends he propoſes without it. For to what purpoſe is that appointed to perſwade Men to be reconciled to God, if all that ever ſhall be admitted to Heaven, were long ſince reconciled at the Death of Chriſt, and they were made as compleatly righteous as Chriſt himſelf?

It may be ſaid, That the Miniſtery of Reconciliation is not uſeleſs, becauſe it is the Means whereby God doth effectually convey his Grace into the Hearts of Believers. But this cannot ſatisfy any one that conſiders St. Paul's Expreſſions: For his Words are, We pray you in Chriſt's ſtead, be ye reconciled to God If he had ſaid, That God had made Chriſt to be Sin for you already, and you as righteous as Chriſt was; how would it have looked to have ſaid after this, We pray you to be reconciled to God? For what need they any Reconciliation, who were already ſo much in his Favour?

But is there no Change of Perſons then implied in thoſe Words of St. Paul; Who made him to be Sin for us, who knew no Sin, that we might be made the Righteouſneſs of God in him? Yes certainly. Such a Change, whereby Chriſt did undergo the Puniſhments of our Sins; and ſo Eraſmus obſerves, that Chriſt is not called a Sinner here, as Dr. Criſp would have it, but Sin; i. e. a Sacrifice for Sin, according to the Scripture-ſenſe: And we are made the Righteouſneſs of God in him, i. e. That God upon the account of his Sacrifice, and our Reconciliation to him, would treat us as Righteous Perſons, or receive us into his Grace and Favour; which is all that I can find that St. Paul underſtood by this Expreſſion.

2. I am now to ſhew, that this Notion of the Change of Perſons, which Dr. Criſp aſſerts, is contrary to the whole Tenor of the Scripture, and the Terms of Salvation contained in the Goſpel. I am ſenſible how large a Field I am entred upon: And if I ſhould purſue this matter as it deſerves, it would take up much more room than I can allow this to Anſwer. I could eaſily prove that in all the Tranſactions between God and Mankind, ſome Conditions on our ſide were required in order to his Favour. So it was in the ſtate of Innocency; ſo it continued after Man's Fall, as appears by thoſe remarkable Words of God to Cain; If thou doſt well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? If thou doſt not well, Sin lieth at thy Door, Gen. 4. 7. So it was in God's Dealing with the Patriarchs, and the moſt excellent Perſons in the Old Teſtament, Abraham, Moſes, David, Job, &c. But I paſs over theſe, (although I ſuppoſe they will not be denied to have been of the Elect, and to have had the Benefit of Chriſt's Righteouſneſs as well as Chriſtians) and come to the Terms of Salvation, as declared by Chriſt himſelf. Let any one ſeriouſly peruſe the Doctrine which he preached from the time, when he began to preach, and to ſay, Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand, Mat. 4. 17. And he ſhall find the main Buſineſs of his Preaching was to put Men upon performing ſuch Conditions as were neceſſary to their Salvation, and for that reaſon; as may be ſeen in his Sermon on the Mount, in which he begins with promiſing Bleſſedneſs to the humble, merciful, pure in Heart, Mat. 5. 3, 4, &c. What do theſe things mean, if they be not Conditions on our parts neceſſary in order to Happineſs? And that they are conſidered by God as ſuch? Why doth he ſay, Except your Righteouſneſs exceed the Righteouſneſs of the Scribes and Phariſees, ye ſhall in no caſe enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, Mat. 5. if ſuch a Righteouſneſs be not a Condition required in order to ſuch Entrance? And if it be, no Change of Perſons without inward and real Righteouſneſs, can be ſufficient. Our Saviour doth not ſpeak of what will be eventually ſome Perſons, but of what is required to be done in order to an end. And therefore he concludes his Sermon with ſaying, Whoſoever heareth theſe Sayings of mine, and doth them, I will liken him to a wiſe Man, who built his Houſe upon a Rock, &c. Mat. 7. 24. Not he that believes that he is one of thoſe who is made compleatly righteous by a Change of Perſons, without any Change of Temper, or Diſpoſition of Mind: He never promiſes the leaſt degree of Happineſs to ſuch; but ſtill inſiſts on our own Endeavours, By ſtriving to enter in at the ſtrait Gate, which St. Paul calls, working out our own Salvation with Fear and Trembling, and St. Peter, giving all diligence to make our Calling and Election ſure. For, ſaith he, If ye do theſe things ye ſhall never fall.

Do not theſe Expreſſions note the Neceſſity of the performance of Conditions on our ſide? And therefore all imaginary Notions of ſuch a Change of Perſons, as hath no regard to any Acts of ours, is wholly repugnant to the main Scope and Deſign of the Goſpel. I meddle not with the Diſpute about the Moral Law, which muſt continue to oblige us, as long as the Reaſon of it continues; but the main Argument to me is from the Goſpel, as it is delivered by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, who certainly underſtood the Subſtance and Deſign of it far better than Dr. Criſp, or the Reporter doth. What was tranſacted between the Father and the Son, we know no more than they have revealed to us; and we know they had no deſign to impoſe upon Mankind, by laying ſo much Weight upon ſuch Conditions as God had no regard to, and by concealing from them ſuch a Change of Perſons, as made them compleatly righteous without any Act of theirs. Men could never be reconciled to the juſt Veneration and Eſteem we have of the Sacred Penmen of the Scriptures, nor to their Knowledge of the Myſteries of the Goſpel, nor to their Fidelity in declaring them for the good of Mankind. So that if we find nothing of this Change of Perſons in their Writings, and ſo much as is utterly inconſiſtent with it, we have all the reaſon in the World to reject it.

This Notion of the Change of Perſons is attended with very bad Conſequences. Which I do not charge on thoſe who do not ſee them, or are carried by ſome higher Principles above them; but we are not to judge of Perſons, but of Things, and the natural Tendency of Principles.

And ſo the Change of Perſons, in this Senſe, hath theſe very bad Conſequences: That it is apt to leſſen our Reverence of the Divine Perfections; our juſt Senſe of the Differences of Good and Evil; our Obligations to all ſorts of Duties: It tends to the Diſparagement of that free Grace they pretend to exalt; and expoſes the Goſpel to the Reproach and Contempt of Infidels; and leaves the

Theſe things I can only mention, becauſe you deſired a ſhort Anſwer to your Queſtions; and I have brought it into as narrow a Compaſs as I could.

I am, SIR,

Nov. 10. 97. Your Faithful Friend and Servant,

ED. WIGORN.

Mr. St. Lobb's Firſt Letter, Nov. 18. 1697.

My Lord,

THere being a Controverſy among Diſſenters about the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction, ſome of the moſt eminent among them, ſuch as Dr. B. Mr. H. &c. did, in a Paper ſent to ſome other Brethren for Conciliation, mention your Lordſhip's Senſe about the aſſerting a Commutation of Perſons between Chriſt and Us, as neceſſary to a due Explanation and Defence of the ſaid Doctrine: And on the other hand, there is another of Eſteem among us, who is for caſting off the Phraſe of a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Us, allowing only a Change of Perſon; upon which, he ſaith, your Lordſhip hath put an honeſt Senſe, viz. a Subſtitution of one Perſon in the room and place of another. Your Lordſhip's Judgment therefore being referr'd unto, it will be a moſt Chriſtian part, if you ſhall condeſcend to give us your impartial Thoughts of this point, as being likely, on both hands, to be ſo received, as to compoſe the Difference between us.

I am the more earneſt in this, becauſe I ſee that ſome are labouring to make Chriſt's Sufferings ſo merely voluntary, as not to be pœnal, or not properly pœnal, but improperly and materially ſo: and our Sins not to be the impulſive, or not the near impulſive meritorious Cauſe of them.

There being no other end in ſending this, I hope your Lordſhip will both pardon and anſwer the Requeſt of,

My LORD,

Your Lordſhip's moſt obedient Servant, and ſincere Honourer,

Stephen Lobb.

Anſwer to Mr. St. Lobb's Firſt Letter, Dec. 12. 1697.

S I R,

YOUR Letter, which bears date, Nov. 18. came not to my hands till Dec. 10. and in the mean time, I doubt not but you have ſeen my Letter to Mr. W. wherein I have given my Senſe of the things which are mentioned in yours, and that with great Freedom and Impartiality, after I had peruſed the Papers on both ſides, which came to my hands. And I heartily wiſh you had ſent me your Letter after you had ſeen mine, that I might have removed any Difficulties you apprehend therein: For I deſire to prevent all needleſs, as well as dangerous Controverſies among thoſe who truly own the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction. And I cannot think a Form of Words, capable of a very bad ſenſe, is to be inſiſted ſo much upon; although others may have uſed it in a good ſenſe. And therefore there is no need to diſpute your Authorities about the Sound and Orthodox Senſe ſome Divines have uſed thoſe Expreſſions you mention in: But the plain ſtate of the Caſe at preſent is this.

Dr. Cr. hath aſſerted ſuch a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers, from whence all the Antinomian Principles do neceſſarily follow; as That God ſeeth no Sin in his People, that no Conditions are required on our Parts, to make us Partakers of the Benefits of Chriſt's Sufferings, that Juſtification is before Faith, &c. This Senſe of the Change of Perſons was denied, as it ought to be, by Mr. W. but allowing what is underſtood by it, as to Chriſt's undergoing the Puniſhment of our Sins; upon this he is accuſed as rejecting ſuch a Change of Perſons as is neceſſary to maintain the Doctrine of Satisfaction. This, I confeſs, appeared to me a very hard and unreaſonable Proceeding; as I have ſhewed in my Letter. But I perceive by the Papers you ſent me, that you diſown the Antinomian Principles, which I was glad to find; and therefore you cannot but diſown ſuch a Change of Perſons from whence they follow; or elſe you muſt ſhew, that thoſe Principles do not follow from it, which I think you will hardly do.

Sir, I am ſo far from thinking you need to ask Pardon for your writing to me about ſuch matters, that I ſhall be glad to hear farther from you, and to underſtand what your Senſe is of my former Letter to Mr. W. as well as of this. For by what I can obſerve from the ſeveral Papers, it is a Fondneſs for Dr. C's Notions, which lies at the bottom of all theſe Heats; which ſeems to me to have been the true reaſon why thoſe Propoſitions were not condemned, which were taken out of his Books, and of others of his way.

I cannot but look on thoſe Antinomian Doctrines as of very dangerous conſequence to all that underſtand them, as well as to thoſe who do not.

But I find by what you affirm of your ſelf, that all thoſe who oppoſe Mr. W. are not for Dr. C's Notions; and as to ſuch there is nothing but a Miſunderſtanding of each other, which may be eaſily rectified, if Perſons be inclined to think well of one another.

I am, S I R,

Your Faithful Friend and Servant,

E. W.

Mr. Lobb's Second Letter, Dec. 18. 1697.

My Lord,

ON a Peruſal of your Letter to Mr. W. I was abundantly ſatisfied, in what you write about a Commutation of Perſons, the Guilt of Sin, and your Confutation of Dr. Criſp; only I wiſhed your Information had been more full than I perceive it was; for then you would have ſeen that the Authors of the firſt Paper, and the Report, are not for a Commutation of Perſons in the Senſe of Dr. C. That your Lordſhip therefore may have a fuller ſtate of matters in Controverſy among us, I have prepared ſome Sheets for the Preſs, in which I have given the true Reaſons of the Diſſatisfactions of ſome with Mr. W. directing it to your Lordſhip; becauſe you have ſo clearly ſtated our true Senſe about Chriſt's Satisfaction. It is almoſt finiſhed, and I ſend you this humbly to beg your Lordſhip's Pleaſure, whether I ſhall ſend it unto you now in MS. or not till printed.

My Lord, My hopes are, that God will bleſs your farther Endeavours for compoſing our Differences, at leaſt in the point of Satisfaction, about which I am moſtly concerned.

Yours of the 12th came to my hands this Evening; for which I render your Lordſhip my humbleſt Thanks.

In the Papers above-mentioned, you will ſee my Senſe of your Letter to Mr. W.

That Dr. C. hath aſſerted ſuch a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers, as from whence all the Antinomian Principles do neceſſarily follow; as, That God ſeeth no Sin in his People, That no Conditions are required on our parts to make us Partakers of the Benefit of Chriſt's Sufferings, That Juſtification is before Faith, &c. we entirely agree with your Lordſhip, whilſt we are neceſſitated to diſſent from you in what you add about your Charity to Mr. W. not doubting but that we ſhall be able to evince, that it is not a Fondneſs for Dr. C's Notions, that lieth at the bottom of all theſe Heats. The true Reaſon why the Propoſitions were not condemned, you will find in the Papers prepared for the Preſs, in which your Lordſhip will alſo obſerve, why the controverted Phraſes are rejected by Mr. W. and Mr. A. I will wait for your Lordſhip's Commandments, being,

My LORD,

Your moſt Obedient Humble Servant,

Anſwer to Mr. St. Lobb's Firſt Letter, Dec. 12. 1697.

S I R,

YOUR Letter, which bears date, Nov. 18. came not to my hands till Dec. 10. and in the mean time, I doubt not but you have ſeen my Letter to Mr. W. wherein I have given my Senſe of the things which are mentioned in yours, and that with great Freedom and Impartiality, after I had peruſed the Papers on both ſides, which came to my hands. And I heartily wiſh you had ſent me your Letter after you had ſeen mine, that I might have removed any Difficulties you apprehend therein: For I deſire to prevent all needleſs, as well as dangerous Controverſies among thoſe who truly own the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction. And I cannot think a Form of Words, capable of a very bad ſenſe, is to be inſiſted ſo much upon; although others may have uſed it in a good ſenſe. And therefore there is no need to diſpute your Authorities about the Sound and Orthodox Senſe ſome Divines have uſed thoſe Expreſſions you mention in: But the plain ſtate of the Caſe at preſent is this.

Dr. Cr. hath aſſerted ſuch a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers, from whence all the Antinomian Principles do neceſſarily follow; as That God ſeeth no Sin in his People, that no Conditions are required on our Parts, to make us Partakers of the Benefits of Chriſt's Sufferings, that Juſtification is before Faith, &c. This Senſe of the Change of Perſons was denied, as it ought to be, by Mr. W. but allowing what is underſtood by it, as to Chriſt's undergoing the Puniſhment of our Sins; upon this he is accuſed as rejecting ſuch a Change of Perſons as is neceſſary to maintain the Doctrine of Satisfaction. This, I confeſs, appeared to me a very hard and unreaſonable Proceeding; as I have ſhewed in my Letter. But I perceive by the Papers you ſent me, that you diſown the Antinomian Principles, which I was glad to find; and therefore you cannot but diſown ſuch a Change of Perſons from whence they follow; or elſe you muſt ſhew, that thoſe Principles do not follow from it, which I think you will hardly do.

Sir, I am ſo far from thinking you need to ask Pardon for your writing to me about ſuch matters, that I ſhall be glad to hear farther from you, and to underſtand what your Senſe is of my former Letter to Mr. W. as well as of this. For by what I can obſerve from the ſeveral Papers, it is a Fondneſs for Dr. C's Notions, which lies at the bottom of all theſe Heats; which ſeems to me to have been the true reaſon why thoſe Propoſitions were not condemned, which were taken out of his Books, and of others of his way.

I cannot but look on thoſe Antinomian Doctrines as of very dangerous conſequence to all that underſtand them, as well as to thoſe who do not.

But I find by what you affirm of your ſelf, that all thoſe who oppoſe Mr. W. are not for Dr. C's Notions; and as to ſuch there is nothing but a Miſunderſtanding of each other, which may be eaſily rectified, if Perſons be inclined to think well of one another.

I am, S I R,

Your Faithful Friend and Servant,

Mr. Lobb*'s Second Letter,* Dec. 18. 1697.

My Lord,

ON a Peruſal of your Letter to Mr. W. I was abundantly ſatisfied, in what you write about a Commutation of Perſons, the Guilt of Sin, and your Confutation of Dr. Criſp; only I wiſhed your Information had been more full than I perceive it was; for then you would have ſeen that the Authors of the firſt Paper, and the Report, are not for a Commutation of Perſons in the Senſe of Dr. C. That your Lordſhip therefore may have a fuller ſtate of matters in Controverſy among us, I have prepared ſome Sheets for the Preſs, in which I have given the true Reaſons of the Diſſatisfactions of ſome with Mr. W. directing it to your Lordſhip; becauſe you have ſo clearly ſtated our true Senſe about Chriſt's Satisfaction. Yours of the 12th came to my hands this Evening; for which I render your Lordſhip my humbleſt Thanks.

In the Papers above-mentioned, you will ſee my Senſe of your Letter to Mr. W.

That Dr. C. hath aſſerted ſuch a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers, as from whence all the Antinomian Principles do neceſſarily follow; as, That God ſeeth no Sin in his People, That no Conditions are required on our parts to make us Partakers of the Benefit of Chriſt's Sufferings, That Juſtification is before Faith, &c. we entirely agree with your Lordſhip, whilſt we are neceſſitated to diſſent from you in what you add about your Charity to Mr. W. not doubting but that we ſhall be able to evince, that it is not a Fondneſs for Dr. C's Notions, that lieth at the bottom of all theſe Heats. Anſwer to Mr. St. Lobb's Second Letter, Dec. 22. 1697.

SIR,

I Am very glad my Letter to Mr. W. gave you any Satisfaction, as to the point of Commutation of Perſons, &c. Only you wiſh I had received fuller Information of ſome matters of fact; which was a thing out of my power, and I could only judge by what I had ſeen. By the firſt Paper it did appear to me, that Mr. W. was charged with denying ſuch a Commutation as was neceſſary to explain the Doctrine of Satisfaction; whereas he only denied ſuch a Change as was affirmed by Dr. C. If there be any thing more in Mr. W's caſe, I ſuppoſe I ſhall ſee it in the Papers you are preparing for the Preſs; which I ſhall be glad to ſee when they are printed. I would not have you give your ſelf the trouble to ſend them before. For ſince they relate to matters of fact, I can be no competent judge of them.

I am very well pleaſed to find that you diſown Dr. C's Antinomian Principles: I think you would do your ſelves a great deal of right to condemn the Propoſitions which they inſiſt upon. For I had ſome reaſon to believe that they were too much favoured by ſome of your Brethren, but I ſhall not be ſorry to find my ſelf therein miſtaken.

I am, SIR,

Your Faithful Friend and Servant,

E. W.

An Anſwer to Mr. Lobb's Printed Appeal.

CHAP. I.

Of the true Occaſion of the preſent Difference.

SIR,

I Have read and conſidered your Appeal; and I am very willing to do my Endeavours in order to the compoſing thoſe Differences among you, which relate to the Antinomian and Socinian Controverſies; and which, I think, cannot be ended without a clearer underſtanding of the true ſtate of both of them. For, if I be not much miſtaken, the one hath given occaſion to the other; and if the juſt bounds between them be duly ſetled, the preſent Diſpute about the ſignification of ſome doubtful Words and Phraſes will fall to the ground, (as I hope to make it appear in the Progreſs of this Diſcourſe.) And I ſhall be heartily glad to contribute any thing towards the leſſening any needleſs, as well as dange- rous Controverſies among thoſe who truly own the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satiſfaction ; ſince it is now out of my Power to prevent them.

But it was a Civility greater than I had reaſon to expect, that you ſhould in the beginning of your Appeal, render me your unfeigned Thanks, not only for what relates to the Article of Satiſfaction, but for my Confutation of Dr. Criſp ; ſince I had intimated to you in one of my Letters, that I apprehended, that a Fondneſs for his Notions lay at the bottom of all theſe Heats. And I cannot ſay, that my Opinion is altered by your Appeal ; of which I ſhall preſently give my Reaſons.

But I muſt firſt take notice, that you tell me, that I have not been ſo fully acquainted with the matters in difference as could be wiſhed. Truly, when I wrote my Letter to Mr. W. I went chiefly upon the Report which you had publiſhed ; and I thought I might rely upon it. But I find ſince, ſome of your Brethren charging it with Diſingenuity, Prevarication, and Partiality, (Reb. p. 3.) but I ſaw no cauſe to ſuſpect any ſuch thing, as to what I was concerned in ; which was the giving an Anſwer to the three Queſtions propoſed to me. But wherein is it that I have ſhewed my ſelf not ſo fully acquainted with the matters in difference among you ? Is it that I ſay, that the Authors of the firſt Paper, and the Report, ſeem to take it for granted, that there can be but one Senſe of Commutation of Perſons ? But if you reflect upon the uſe made in the Report of Mr. W's denying a Commutation of Perſons, as Dr. Criſp had affirmed it ; that therefore he muſt deny ſuch a Commutation as is eſſential to the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satiſfaction, you will eaſily perceive, that the whole force of this Reaſoning depends upon this, that he that denies it in any Senſe, muſt deny it in all. Which I ſhewed to be very unreaſonable, ſince there may be and are ſuch different Senſes of it. For there is a Senſe, as I ſaid, wherein it may and ought to be denied, without the leaſt Prejudice to the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satiſfaction ; and although that cannot be explained and defended without ſome kind of Commutation of Perſons, yet it very well may and ought to be defended, without and againſt Dr. Criſp's Senſe of it. For in one of your Letters, you grant, That the Antinomian Doctrines do neceſſarily follow Dr. C's Notion of the Change of Perſons : Either then they muſt be owned to be true, or his Senſe of it muſt be falſe. But you deny the former, and therefore you muſt yield the latter, and confeſs that Mr. W. had reaſon to deny the Change of Perſons in his ſenſe. But of this more afterwards.

Or, do you think it argues my not being ſo fully acquainted with the matters in difference among you, becauſe I intimated, That I ſuſpected a fondneſs for Dr. Criſp's Notions lay at the bottom of all theſe Heats ? I muſt deal ſo freely with you, as to let you know, that the way you have taken to remove this Suſpicion, hath confirmed me in it. You put me at firſt in very great hopes of ſeeing an effectual Confutation of it ; for you ſay, That the condemning the Propoſitions by your Brethren, will evince the contrary. This is indeed to the purpoſe. But where is this Condemnation to be ſeen ? I hoped to find it in your Appeal, or at the end of it. But I was utterly diſappointed ; and inſtead of it you tell me, p. 43. that the reaſon why they had not done it was, " That none of the 49, " whoſe Names were to the Teſtimonial before Mr. W's Book, called " Goſpel-Truth ſtated, had recalled their hands ; or expreſſed ſo much Diſ- " ſatiſfaction with what he had aſſerted, as was expected : Beſides, you " ſay, Having ſince diſcourſed ſeveral of them, you find them very wil- " ling to declare their diſlike of the Propoſitions, and you are perſwaded

‘‘ they will chearfully do it, (but when?) whenever Satisfaction ſhall ‘ be given to what Mr. W. is charged with. And is this the condemning the Antinomian Doctrines, which you promiſed? This only relates to ſome, whom you diſcourſed with; and even theſe are for putting it off to the longeſt day, or till Mr. W. confeſſes he hath wrongfully denied Dr. C's Change of Perſons, i. e. they will renounce Antinomianiſm, when Mr. W. confeſſes himſelf to be an Antinomian: For you grant, he cannot own Dr. Criſp's Senſe of the Change of Perſons, but the Antinomian Doctrines muſt follow from it. I do not by this intend to call in queſtion your Sincerity in oppoſing Antinomianiſm; for you have declared it ſo often, and in ſuch a manner, that I muſt think very hardly of you, if I thought you could conceal a Fondneſs for that Doctrine, under ſuch Expreſſions againſt it. For you not only tell me, that you have formerly written againſt it; but you ſpeak againſt ſome of the Doctrines of it with great Indignation, p. 8. and you have ſeverely rebuked ſome of your Brethren for trimming too much in favour of Antinomianiſm; and ſay, That you refuſed to ſet your Name to the new Impreſſion of Dr. Criſp's Sermons (when others did it who now blame you) becauſe it looked like giving too much countenance to the Notions in them. So that I do not at all queſtion your Zeal againſt Antinomianiſm; and I do ſuppoſe ſome more of your Acquaintance may be of your Mind. But that which ſticks with me is, that the firſt Heat which began among you, was upon that new Impreſſion of Dr. Criſp's Sermons, which hath continued ever ſince, but not managed ſo openly as at firſt; and therefore was wiſely turned into a charge of Socinianiſm, and put into your hands, who could not be ſuſpected for Antinomianiſm.

Defence of the Report, p. 85.

But I am now ſo much better acquainted with the matters in difference among you, that I doubt not, from the Papers on both ſides, to make this matter clear to any unprejudic'd Perſons; which will give great light to the following Diſcourſe, and, as you deſire, lay open the Wound in order to a Cure.

We are then to take notice, that about 7 or 8 years ſince, Dr. Criſp's Sermons were thought fit to be reprinted, with the addition of ſome new ones; and your ſelf confeſs (which is very material) That you were deſired among others to ſet your Name to the Atteſtation before it; but you very honeſtly refuſed it, becauſe you apprehended it would be taken for granted, at leaſt by the common People, that your Name ſhould ſtand there as an Approval of all the Notions in that Book, and enſnare many to a Cloſure with the Errors contained in it. Which was a ſufficient Reaſon. But it ſeems others were more eaſie in the matter; for twelve venerable Names, in great Letters, appear in the beginning of it: (whom I forbear to mention.) It's true, that the Words of the Atteſtation go no farther than, that the additional Sermons were faithfully tranſcribed by the Author's Son from his own Notes. But what need ſuch an Atteſtation of twelve Reverend Perſons, that Mr. Sam. Criſp did not falſify his Father's hand? Was there ever ſuch an Atteſtation given to a Perſon of any tolerable Credit? What muſt the World think, if no more were intended, of the Veracity of that Gentleman? But it may be ſaid, That ſome of theſe Perſons afterwards cleared themſelves in another Teſtimonial to Mr. Flavel's Book againſt Antinomianiſm.

I grant, that ſome of them being ſenſible of the Reproach they lay under by that Atteſtation, did endeavour to clear their Reputation, as to this matter, in theſe Words, That whereas ſome weak People had miſunderſtood that Certificate, as if they intended an Approbation of all that is contained in that Volume, they declare they had no ſuch Intention. But you tell us, that you refuſed to join in that Atteſtation, becauſe it would be ſo underſtood. And ſo you muſt be under the weak People, who did ſo apprehend the Deſign of it, or they who did not apprehend that ſuch uſe would be made of it. But as you very well obſerve, Defence of the Report, p. 86. Theſe very Perſons in that new Teſtimonial do affirm, That the difference between Dr. Criſp and others ſeems to lie not ſo much in the things, which the one or the other of them believe, as about their order and reference to one another. But you truly anſwer, That you look on the difference between the Orthodox and Dr. Criſp to be much greater than this ſort of palliating Preface will allow it to be. And that if there be any thing dangerous in Dr. Criſp's Writings, as you believe there is, the Expreſſions there uſed, tend to enſnare poor People to believe them as ſound and true. So that you can by no means think, that theſe Perſons have acquitted themſelves from giving too much countenance to Dr. Criſp's Opinions. And one of thoſe Subſcribers hath ſince ingenuouſly confeſſed, That this Impreſſion of Dr. Criſp's Sermons awakened ſome of the more zealous among the united Brethren, to conſider of ſome proper Expedient to obviate the growth of thoſe Errors.

Rebuke, p. 10.

And this was the Occaſion of Mr. D. Williams's publiſhing his Book, called Goſpel-Truth ſtated, wherein ſome of Dr. Criſp's Opinions are conſidered, &c. A Book, ſaith the ſame Perſon, to ſay no more, ingeniouſly penned, exactly methodized, the Truths and Errors fairly ſtated, and for ought I can ſee, piouſly deſigned. This Book came forth at firſt with the Atteſtation of ſeveral of his Brethren, not merely as to the right ſtating of Truths and Errors, but as a conſiderable ſervice to the Church of Chriſt; and as a means for the reclaiming of thoſe who have been miſled into ſuch dangerous Opinions, and for the eſtabliſhing thoſe that waver in any of theſe Truths. Which are the Words of it.

Mr. Williams declares in the beginning of his Preface, That he had been often ſollicited to this work by ſeveral of his Brethren; and that he was convinced, that the Revival of theſe Errors muſt make their Miniſtery uſeleſs, and Unity impoſſible. This bears date, May 4. 1692.

But as the Author of the Rebuke expreſſes it, p. 15. upon the coming forth of this Book, Such a ſtorm of Paſſion, ſuch Indignation againſt the Author and his Book broke out, as had almoſt overſet the united Brethren with their Union. The firſt publick Act, whereby any diſcovered their Reſentments, was a Paper delivered in to the united Brethren, Oct. 17. 1692. Importing a high and heavy Charge againſt the Author and his Work, and ſubſcribed by ſix, three whereof never entred into the Union, and yet now joined in accuſing him for breaking it, p. 18. But it ſeems theſe united Brethren looked upon theſe Accuſations either as frivolous, or ungrounded; for ſay they, They recited as Mr. Williams's Words, what they found quite contrary to the Letter of his Expreſſions. Upon this one of the Subſcribers, a warm Advocate for Dr. Criſp, (as he hath ſince abundantly diſcovered himſelf) declared in a meeting of the united Brethren, That he would break off from their Union, becauſe they had taken no notice of the Paper of Objections againſt Mr. Williams's Book.

Anſwer to the Report, p. 3.

Which Paper is ſince printed by the ſame Perſon; and to be ſure to have it ſeen, both at the beginning and end of one of his learned Treatiſes againſt Mr. W. but with ſome variety. But the only thing conſiderable in it, is, that among all the Exceptions then given in, there is not one word tending to the Charge of Socinianiſm againſt Mr. W. Can we imagine theſe zealous Brethren ſhould omit ſo material a Charge, if they had had ſuſpected it, or have been ignorant of it, if there had been ground for it? So that if it be a juſt Charge, it is a great Reproach upon thoſe who delivered in their Exceptions, and wholly left it out. It is true, they very prudently reſerve to themſelves a liberty of bringing in farther Exceptions afterwards; but it is not conceivable that they would have omitted this, if they had ſeen any ground for it; becauſe it would have made much more noiſe, as it hath done ſince, than any of thoſe ungrounded Exceptions (as the united Brethren called them) which they delivered in.

But it is farther obſervable, that ſome conſiderable time after this, other ways being found unſucceſsful, a Perſon was appointed (whom I need not name) to examine Mr. Williams's Books, and to collect out of them what Errors he could diſcover. And accordingly a Paper was drawn up of Objections againſt Mr. W. which coming to Mr. H's hand, he printed it, which occaſioned a ſhort Reply by Mr. W. And here the Charge of Socinianiſm began, which Mr. W. calls ſlanderous in his Anſwer to Mr. H's Letter, p. 7. and makes this ſolemn Proteſtation: That he owned Chriſt's eternal Generation as the Son of God, of one Eſſence with the Father; that he owned the Doctrine of Satisfaction, by the Sufferings of Chriſt in our ſtead; and that his Sufferings were Puniſhments ſatisfactory to Divine Juſtice for our Sins; that Chriſt was a proper Sacrifice, and himſelf the Prieſt that offered it upon Earth; that his Obedience is properly meritorious of all our ſaving Benefits; and himſelf a proper Ἀντίψυχος in his Death.

Now I appeal to your ſelf, whether any Perſon can in more proper and effectual terms clear himſelf from the charge of Socinianiſm, than he hath done in theſe Words. I believe you to be no Antinomian, becauſe you have ſo expreſly declared your ſelf to be none; but not in Words which can ſignify it more than theſe are againſt Socinianiſm: And why muſt I not in equal Juſtice and Charity believe him to be no Socinian? But if after all he may be a Socinian, and not know it; why may not others as well ſay, you may be an Antinomian, and not know it? You may ſay, That he uſes ſome Phraſes and Expreſſions as they do; but doth he uſe them in their Senſe? It's poſſible I may think you may uſe ſome Expreſſions, as the Antinomians do, muſt I therefore think you an Antinomian againſt your expreſs Declaration to the contrary? Why ſhould not the ſame meaſure of Juſtice and Charity be uſed to Mr. W. which you would think reaſonable in your own Caſe? But of this more at large hereafter. That which I now obſerve, is, that this charge of Socinianiſm was ſo lately begun, although it had been carried on with ſo much noiſe and earneſtneſs ſince. For in your Letter to Dr. Bates, in Anſwer to Mr. Williams his ſhort Vindication, you have theſe words: Why did you make the Intimation of Socinianiſm thus publick? Mr. H. carefully concealed that part from the World; and it was my Reſolution to have confined all Debates of it among our ſelves. As to your Inſtances, they muſt be conſidered in their due place; but you take no notice of his Proteſtation againſt Socinianiſm, which I think you ought to have done.

Letter to Dr. Bates, *p.*15.1695.

The next thing fit to be obſerved as to this matter, is, that it appears by the Anſwer of the united Brethren to your Report, p. 3. that a number of the Brethren was appointed to conſider the Objections againſt Mr. W's Book, who with the Objectors came to an Accommodation in that affair, by a Subſcription to certain Doctrinal Propoſitions, wherein no notice is at all taken of theſe Phraſes, which ſo much weight is now laid upon; and therein is contained, ſay they, a Promiſe to their utmoſt to avoid all Appearance of oppoſition to one another; and among thoſe Subſcribers your Name appears, p. 5. I hope I may upon this Appeal aſk you, whether at that time you knew of this charge of Socinianiſm to lie againſt Mr. W. or not? If you did not, yet you promiſed no oppoſition as long as perſons kept within the bounds of that agreement; if you did know it, the matter lies harder upon you. For you to promiſe no oppoſition, and yet think your ſelf at that time bound to oppoſe. But rather than charge you with this, I believe this about Socinianiſm to be a game ſtarted afterwards, upon a freſh Examination of his Books.

But in the mean time, what was done againſt the Antinomian Errors? For we are to conſider, that notwithſtanding the expedient, the Union was ſoon broken, as the united Brethren ſay, and thoſe called congregational Brethren held a diſtinct and ſeparate meeting, the very day and hour of the Week of their aſſembling as united Brethren. To prevent a total breach, in the latter end of 1694. a number was appointed to treat with the diſſenting Brethren in order to a Re-union; and they pretended nothing for their Separation, but that there were erroneous Perſons in the Union. But to give Satisfaction, a new Paper of Propoſitions was drawn up, on the one ſide, againſt ſuch Errors as they ſuſpected, and on the other againſt Criſpian and Antinomian Errors; and they tell us, That your ſelf, with three more, were employed in it; and that you were the Perſon pitched upon to carry it to the diſſenting Brethren, Jan. 7. 1694. But they tell us withal, That this Paper was rejected by them, and no Anſwer ſent them concerning it to that Day. And the Author of the Rebuke ſaith, p. 27. That no Satisfaction could be obtained, they were inflexible; and would not comply in any one of the ſeven Articles propoſed to them; and thus the breach became beyond the united Brethren's making up. And he adds, That ſome of the chief of the diſſenting Brethren did, both from Preſs and Pulpit, diſſeminate ſuch horrid Opinions, as filled all intelligent Perſons with equal Aſtoniſhment and Indignation; a number of which he there ſets down, which are all Antinomian Doctrines. And the united Brethren in their Anſwer repeat the ſame, p. 22. and offer to prove them from the Books of the aforeſaid Authors, and a great deal more, if not worſe of the ſame ſort: By theſe things, ſay the united Brethren, it's manifeſt what the difference is about, though a noiſe hath been raiſed about things remote from the true occaſion, that while we ſeemed to be only on the defenſive part, their Errors might receive Countenance, as if unoppoſed, and the Abettors thereof might leſs appear the cauſe of our Diviſions.

*Anſwer to the Re-*port, p. 6.

P. 7.

P. 25.

Notwithſtanding all theſe Diſcouragements, they tell us, That three Papers were drawn up in order to an Accommodation The firſt Paper, they ſay, was concerted by one of their Brethren, with ſome of the Diſſenters; but it was unanimouſly agreed to be laid aſide, with a ſecond Paper, that had been brought to them by another Brother; but they appointed ſix of their Brethren to draw up a Third Paper, which they, after ſeveral days conſideration, unanimouſly agreed to ſend in a Letter to the diſſenting Brethren; which is extant in their Anſwer to the Report, p. 10. wherein they declare, That they come as near to them as they could with Truth and Freedom from ambiguity in points of ſo great concernment, and in a time, when ſo many are at work to propagate Criſpianiſm and Antinomianiſm, p. 14. The event of theſe Papers, as they inform us, was, That the diſſenting Brethren adhered to their own Paper, called the Firſt, and refuſed theirs, becauſe (ſay they, p. 25.) this doth provide ſome defence againſt ſome of the

P. 13.

Errors which our difference is about. And after all, p. 27. they make this offer, That if the diſſenting Brethren will declare with them in renouncing thoſe Antinomian Errors there ſet down, they would ſubſcribe with them to P. 29. ſuch a ſenſe of the doubted Expreſſions, as might give them Satisfaction; and to uſe their very Words and Phraſes explained in the Orthodox ſenſe. Which if they refuſe, it will then appear, that it was not any difference in the Doctrines pretended by the Report, which was the reaſon why they did not unite; but that the differences are kept up from their Zeal for the forenamed Opinions of Dr. Criſp, and the Antinomians, which they think to be very erroneous.

Thus I have ſhewed with as clear and convincing Evidence as theſe Papers would afford, what was the true occaſion of the difference, and what it is which keeps it up.

I muſt not now paſs over what you have ſaid for the clearing the diſſenting Brethren from countenancing Antinomianiſm. And it is in your Obſervations on the firſt Paper, called Remarks, p. 9. where you ſay, that the publiſhing this Paper clears the Congregational Brethren from Antinomianiſm. It was very good ſervice to them, if it be found ſo to do. But I think I have ſome reaſons to doubt it.

For, (1.) Why are not the Antinomian Errors, which you look on as dangerous, plainly and expreſly condemned in it? You knew very well, that they inſiſted upon this before, and your ſelf carried a Paper to that purpoſe, to which no manner of ſatisfaction was given; but inſtead of it, they went on preaching ſuch Opinions which they accounted horrid, ſcandalous, and deſtructive to their Miniſtery. Either this Accuſation was true or not. If not, thoſe Brethren ought to have been required in common juſtice to make good their Charge, by a ſolemn Meeting on both ſides. But this was never called for; and therefore a ſuſpicion of guilt muſt remain on the Party accuſed, when they refuſe to make their defence before competent Judges, and upon fair notice of the matters they intended to proceed upon. This was ſufficiently intimated in the ſeven Propoſitions, Jan. 7. 1694. and more fully expreſſed in the Vote of the united Brethren, Sep. 15. 1695. Where they ſet down diſtinctly the Errors they had collected out of their Books, and offered to prove them by Book and Page, when it ſhould be called for. The Author of the Rebuke calls them abominable Doctrines, p. 25. and ſaith he will give a little taſt of ſome few of them; and cautions the Readers to implore the ſpecial Grace of God to fortify themſelves with that Antidote, leaſt this little taſt ſhould prove their Bane and Poiſon. And this little taſt amounts to 21. Not one of which is renounced in this firſt Paper, which you ſay, doth clear the Congregational Brethren from Antinomianiſm. I do think they had great reaſon to inſiſt upon a plain and direct renouncing thoſe Errors, if they believed thoſe Accuſations true; and if they did not, they did very ill to publiſh them. For this muſt fill the World with ſuch Jealouſies of them, as they can never be cleared from, but either by their renouncing the Errors, or the others renouncing the Accuſation. And I am of opinion, that neither the firſt nor the third Paper can give any reaſonable Satisfaction as to this matter, without a renouncing the Antinomian Doctrines. For the Accuſation is now made publick, and the Nation is concerned as to the diſhonour done to Religion by them. But the united Brethren have ſo much more reaſon to inſiſt ſtill upon it, becauſe in that which you call the healing Paper, (Rep. p. 14. Remark, p. 6.) Mr. W. is required to give Satisfaction, not only as to the Doctrine of Juſtification, fication, and Change of Perſons, &c. but about any thing elſe, that any Brother excepts againſt in the reſt of his Writings. Now this ſeems to me very hard and unequal meaſure, that the one muſt be required to give ſuch a ſatisfaction as is hardly poſſible to be given, to he knows not whom, nor in what manner ; and on the other ſide, when the whole Body of the united Brethren deſire ſatisfaction in Doctrines of ſuch Importance, none in effect is thought fit to be given them. This to me looks like a kind of Inequality and Superiority, which the diſſenting Brethren challenge over the united : I do not mean in a legal Juriſdiction, but in that which is worſe, which is Will and Pleaſure. And I think thoſe very eaſy Brethren, who ſubmitted to the firſt Paper, which was after rejected at the Meeting of their Body : But it ſeems although nine of them did it in ſeveral manners, yet the diſſenting Brethren gave a very cold and indifferent Approbation of it, not as a foundation of Re-union, but only, that they are glad to find ſo good an agreement, as that Paper doth expreſs. Which being penned in ſuch general terms, was juſt none at all; as will appear by the next Reaſon. Which is,

2. That there is no ſuch renouncing the Antinomian Errors in it, but thoſe who hold ſome of the groſſeſt of them may comply with them in it.

To make out this, I ſhall inſtance in ſome of thoſe which the united Brethren charge the others with preaching and publiſhing. As,

1. That Pardon is rather the condition of Faith, and much more having a cauſal influence thereunto, than Faith and Repentance are of Pardon.

2. That ſin it ſelf, as oppoſed to guilt, is laid upon Chriſt ; and Chriſt was reputed a Criminal, not only by Man but by God.

3. That the Doctrine of Juſtification before Faith is not an Error, but a great and glorious Truth ; and therefore we believe, that we may be juſtified declaratively.

4. Union with Chriſt is before Faith, at leaſt Nature, and we partake of the Spirit by vertue of that Union ; there is a compleat Union with Chriſt before the Act of Faith.

5. It's a great Truth, that God ſees no Sin in a Believer ; and, Sin can do no real hurt to a Believer ; God is not diſpleaſed with his People, and is not angry with the Perſons of Believers for their Sins.

6. Believers are as righteous as Chriſt, not in a way of Similitude but Equality.

Theſe are the expreſs Words which are charged by the united Brethren, Anſw. to the Reply, p. 12, 13, 14. And I think the Fundamentals of Antinomianiſm are contained in them ; let us now ſee how far theſe are cleared by the firſt Paper.

1. It is ſaid, That Regeneration, Repentance towards God, Faith in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and holy Converſation, are by God's expreſs Word manifeſtly neceſſary to the Salvation of a Sinner, &c. But this doth by no means reach to the Antinomian Doctrine, which is not that theſe are not neceſſary to Salvation, as the Scripture hath declared God's purpoſe to work theſe things in thoſe he deſigns for Salvation ; but that theſe are not made any Conditions of the new Covenant on our part, in order to our obtaining Juſtification and Salvation.

Dr. Criſp doth ſeem to exclude the neceſſity of our Obedience in order to Salvation, when he ſaith, It is a received Conceit among many Perſons, that our Obedience is the way to Heaven ;—— but I muſt tell you, that all

all this Sanctification of Life is not a jot the way of that juſtified Perſon to Heaven. But we muſt take his whole Senſe together; for he ſaith however, That Sanctification of Life is an inſeparable Companion with the Juſtification of a Perſon by the free Grace of Chriſt. And what is an inſeparable Concomitant in a Perſon to be ſaved, is neceſſary by way of Connexion to Salvation. He ſaith indeed, that Salvation is not the end of any good Work; but he adds, that there are other ends of good works; as the manifeſtation of our Obedience and Subjection, the ſetting forth of the praiſe of the glory of God's Grace; the doing good to others, to be profitable to men; which, he ſaith, are the ſpecial ends that Obedience is ordained for, Salvation being ſetled firm before. Here we ſee, that Obedience and good Works are made neceſſary as Concomitants to Salvation, but not as neceſſary Conditions in order to it, but for other ends, as Gratitude and P. 152. Uſefulneſs to the World. In another place, he ſaith, That without reſpect to good or evil, the Lord hath everlaſtingly eſtabliſhed all that ever he meant to do. And there are no intervening Acts or Carriages of yours that make any alteration at all in the Lord, at all to croſs what he hath written, to put in what he hath left out: The Lord doth nothing to his People, upon Conditions in his People, as if he did refer himſelf ſtill to thoſe Conditions, and did ſuſpend what he meant to do to his People, till he did perceive how they would carry themſelves to him. But what then, are they to do nothing? Nothing that concerns the Peace, Comfort and Good of his People, that is already firmly eſtabliſhed; nothing with an eye to their own advantage, that being already perfectly compleated to their hands before they do any thing; but ſimply with an eye to glorify God, and to ſerve their Generation. And to the ſame purpoſe he ſpeaks in other places. In one of the additional P. 141, 183, 322. Sermons, he ſaith, That God himſelf hath inſeparably joined Salvation and P. 35. a holy Life, and hath promiſed the one as well as the other. So that Dr. Criſp himſelf could have ſubſcribed your third Paper in the Words you have drawn up; and have been glad, as others were, that you were ſo far agreed.

But wherein then lies the difference? Dr. Criſp utterly denies, that in the new Covenant there are any Conditions on our part. Mark what I ſay, P. 81, 186, 255, 433. ſaith he, I ſay the new Covenant is without any Condition whatſoever on Man's part. And this he goes about to prove, and after ſaith, P. 83. that in way of Condition of the Covenant ye muſt do nothing. But he objects, Conditions or no Conditions, P. 81. ſomething muſt be done: It is true, ſaith he, by way of conſequence, that after we are in Covenant with God, he will beſtow theſe things upon us, as Fruits and Effects of that Covenant; but it is not true, by way of Antecedence, that God doth require theſe things at our hands before we ſhall be Partakers of the Covenant. Again he objects, If all lies on God's part, and Man muſt do nothing, then all his Life-time he may do what he liſt. He anſwers, You muſt make a difference between doing any thing in reference to the Covenant, as the Condition thereof; and in doing ſomething in reference to Service and Duty to that God, who freely enters into Covenant with you. I ſay only that in way of Condition of the Covenant you muſt do nothing. But is there no obligation on Man's part to perform ſome Conditions as to the benefits of the Covenant? No; P. 82. he ſaith expreſly, That the whole performance of the Covenant lies only upon God himſelf, and that there is not one Bond or Obligation on Man to the fulfilling of the Covenant, or partaking in the benefits of the Covenant. This ſeems to be ſtrange Doctrine; but he goes farther, and denies even Faith it ſelf to be the Condition of the Covenant. He objects that it is ſaid, That he that believes ſhall be ſaved, and he that believes not ſhall be damned. P. 84. But he anſwers, That there is no Perſon ſhall be ſaved, till he have believed. This I grant; yet this will not make Faith the Condition of the Covenant; for then the Covenant would depend upon a Work; for our act of believing is a Work. And in another place he ſaith, That it is a bringing back a Covenant of Works to Believers, to ſay, that it ſhall fare well or ill with them, as they can obey, or as they do diſobey the Lord God. P. 153. Here we ſee that he makes Conditions on our part to be no leſs than making void the Covenant of Grace, and ſetting up the Covenant of Works.

And is this part of Dr. Criſp's Doctrine diſowned or renounc'd by thoſe who are called diſſenting Brethren? So far from it, that one of them hath ſet himſelf to defend it: and he lays down this Aſſertion, That neither Faith, nor any other gracious Qualifications are federal Conditions, or Conditions of the Covenant of Grace. Neonom. Part 3. p. 135. And this Man's name is among the Subſcribers of the firſt Paper, by which we may judge how it was underſtood by them. The force of all his Reaſons, ſuch as they are, is built on this Suppoſition, That all federal Conditions are meritorious, and make the reward of Debt, and not of Grace; and then there is no difference between a Covenant of Works and of Grace. From hence he ſaith, That Chriſt is the ſole Condition of the Covenant of Grace; and that it's impoſſible any thing elſe ſhould be the Condition of it. P. 138.

But by Condition he means the Foundation; for, ſaith he, nothing elſe can reconcile us to God in bearing the Sin and Curſe. But this is far enough from being the true ſtate of the queſtion; which doth not relate to the fundamental condition of the Covenant of Grace it ſelf; but to the manner of the Communication of the benefits of it to us. And one would think it were eaſy for Men to conſider the difference between a condition of Purchaſe, and a condition of Poſſeſſion, the Purchaſe being paid. Will any Man ſay, that there can be no condition of Poſſeſſion, but it muſt have the price of the Purchaſe in it? The ſole queſtion in this caſe, is not, whether by any conditions on our part, we can merit pardon of Sin, or eternal Life, or increaſe of Grace; for we utterly renounce all ſuch Doctrines as are repugnant to the deſign and grace of the Goſpel; but whether Chriſt, who alone hath purchaſed Redemption for us, hath not required ſome conditions on our parts to fit us for the Participation of the benefits of this Redemption? And the Covenant of Grace being founded in the Satiſfaction of Chriſt, the conditions on our part can be no other than conditions of Intereſt, Reception, or Participation of the ſaid Covenant. But even theſe are denied by Dr. Criſp; for he will not allow ſo much as fitneſs on our ſide; as appears by theſe remarkable Words of his: Chriſt looks not for fitneſs, but People may be capable of Communion with him without fitneſs; he takes them into Communion with himſelf, and afterwards fits them for ſuch Communion as he would have them, but beforehand there is no fitneſs; ſuppoſe what fitneſs you will in expecting of the Grant, I ſay, in expecting the Grant of Chriſt, fitneſs or not fitneſs is all one. Serm. p. 208.

But do not all Conditions ſuppoſe the reward to be of Debt upon the performance of them, and conſequently imply ſomething of merit of Congruity, although there be no Condignity in them?

I anſwer, that where there is any true Merit, which makes the Reward of Debt, there is, as St. Paul ſaith, a foundation of Boaſting; i. e. a right to challenge the reward as due on the account of the performance. But where only a Fitneſs is required; and that Fitneſs depending upon divine Aſſiſtance, and the Reward infinitely beyond the Performance, there is not the leaſt colour for Merit, or for any ground of Boaſting.

CHAP. II.

The Myſtery of Antinomianiſm laid open.

BUT concerning this whole matter, it may be ſaid, That as long as both Parties are agreed, that there is a neceſſary Connexion between Holineſs and Happineſs; and that there are relative Conditions on our parts required, although not federal; all the reſt ſeems to be a diſpute about Words, and ſo any reaſonable terms of Accommodation ought to be accepted.

To which I anſwer, That if there had been no more in the Controverſy than what is contained in thoſe Terms, it might have been fairly and eaſily accommodated; but I am of Opinion, that there is a greater Myſtery in Antinomianiſm than this, which ought to be laid open to prevent the Miſchief of it. For all this Diſpute about Conditions on our part depends upon another, and if that hold, this muſt follow as the conſequence of it, and ſeveral other things which Dr. Criſp ſaw very well had a neceſſary Connexion with each other; and like a fair dealer in Controverſy, owned them all.

I come therefore to the next thing in the firſt Paper, which you ſay, clears the diſſenting Brethren from the charge of Antinomianiſm. Your Words are, That touching a Change of Perſons between Chriſt and Believers, there is no phyſical Change, whereby Chriſt and Believers do in ſubſtance become one another; nor a moral Change, whereby Chriſt ſhould become inherently ſinful, and Believers thereby become immediately innocent and ſinleſs; but the Change is only in a legal ſenſe: Chriſt, by conſent between the Father and him, putting on the Perſon, and coming into the room and ſtead of Sinners. Now I ſhall make it appear, that you have not herein diſowned Dr. Criſp's Senſe of the Change of Perſons, from whence his other Doctrines follow.

Report, p. 13. Rem. p. 11.

To make this out, I ſhall prove, that Dr. Criſp did not aſſert ſuch a Change, from whence it followed that Chriſt was inherently ſinful.

In his firſt Sermon, p. 10. he hath theſe Words, In one word, Beloved, miſtake me not; I am far from thinking any Believer is freed from Acts of Sin, (i. e. from having been an actual Tranſgreſſor) but he is freed only from the charge of Sin. All his Sins are charged upon Chriſt, he being Sin for him; yet Chriſt is not an actual Sinner, but Chriſt is all the Sinners in the World by Imputation. By Imputation he means a real Tranſaction, as will appear afterwards. Again, p. 267. Beloved, miſtake me not, I ſay not that ever Chriſt was or could be the Actor or Committer of any Tranſgreſſion, for he never committed any Sin himſelf. Not that he was the Actor of any Tranſgreſſion. And more fully, p. 283. I ſay here is a real Act, God doth really paſs over Sin upon him, ſtill keeping this faſt, that Chriſt acted no Sin; ſo that in reſpect of the Act, not one Sin of the Believer is Chriſt's, but in reſpect of Tranſgreſſion. In reſpect of Conveyance, in reſpect of paſſing Accounts from one Head to another, in reſpect of that, there is a re- reality of making of Chriſt to be Sin. So that when you deny Chriſt to have been inherently ſinful, you ſay no more than Dr. Criſp himſelf hath done; for he could not be inherently ſinful, unleſs he were an actual Sinner. But we muſt obſerve, that although he denies this, yet he affirms, That Chriſt was as really the Tranſgreſſor, as the Perſon that did commit the Sin; or as if himſelf had actually committed Tranſgreſſion. Now I would fain know, why thoſe Words, inherently ſinful were put in, inſtead of being as really a Tranſgreſſor; unleſs it were to do Dr. C. and his Friends a kindneſs. For when in your Appeal you diſown the Principles of Antinomianiſm, p. 8. you ſay, That you reject the Opinion of thoſe who hold, That upon transferring the Guilt of our Sins upon Chriſt, he is to be eſteemed the Perſon that committed all the Sins of thoſe for whom he died; or that the turpitude and filth of our Sins was transferred upon him, which is a Notion equally falſe, blaſphemous and impoſſible. This is as much as can be expected, ſuppoſing that you mean, that he was neither the actual Tranſgreſſor, which Dr. C. denies; nor that he had the perſonal Guilt of our ſins upon him, which Dr. C. did aſſert, and built his whole Hypotheſis upon it, as I ſhall now make it plain.

This ſeems to be a great Myſtery, but it is really the foundation of Antinomianiſm, viz. That Chriſt had the perſonal guilt of our Tranſgreſſions charged upon him, and ſo he was as ſinful as we; and that by his diſcharge of it, the guilt of their ſins is removed from them, and ſo no longer chargeable upon them; and by their Change of Perſon with Chriſt, they become as compleatly righteous as he. Dr. Criſp himſelf calls it a Myſtery, and well he might. Beloved, ſaith he, here is a ſtrange Myſtery; the World will not receive it, unleſs they receive this Principle we are now upon, namely, That the Iniquity it ſelf of his People is laid upon the Back of Chriſt. P. 269. By Iniquity it ſelf, he ſaith, he means the fault of the Tranſgreſſion it ſelf. P. 270. If thou haſt part in the Lord Chriſt, all theſe Tranſgreſſions of thine become actually the Tranſgreſſions of Chriſt, and ſo ceaſe to be thine, and thou ceaſeſt to be a Tranſgreſſor from that time they were laid upon Chriſt, to the laſt hour of thy Life. Ib. So that now thou art not an Idolater, &c. Reckon what ſin ſoever you commit, when as you have part in Chriſt, you are all that Chriſt was, Chriſt is all that you were. ——Mark it well; Chriſt himſelf is not ſo compleatly righteous, but we are as righteous as he was; nor we ſo compleatly ſinful, but Chriſt became, being made ſin, as compleatly ſinful as we: nay more, the righteouſneſs that Chriſt hath with the Father, we are the ſame righteouſneſs, for we are made the righteouſneſs of God; that very ſinfulneſs that we were, Chriſt is made that very ſinfulneſs before God. So that here is a direct change; Chriſt takes our perſon and condition, and ſtands in our ſtead; we take Chriſt's perſon and condition, and ſtand in his ſtead. Theſe are his own Words, and contain in them the very foundation of Antinomianiſm.

But my buſineſs at preſent is about the transferring our very faults upon Chriſt, which he calls the guilt of the fact, and not the mere guilt of Puniſhment. Many Men, ſaith he, p. 266. are ready to think, that the guilt (ſuch as they call guilt) and the puniſhment of ſin lay upon Chriſt indeed, but ſimply the very faults that Men commit, that is, that the Tranſgreſſion it ſelf is become the Tranſgreſſion of Chriſt is ſomewhat harſh. Yes indeed it is, and more than ſomewhat. But let us ſee how he proves it; and he undertakes to do it by Scripture and Reaſon. But the miſchief of it is, that in the one he argues like a Papiſt, and in the other like a Socinian.

Firſt, he ſaith, he will endeavour to clear it by manifeſt Scripture, that ſimply, without any Equivocation, ſimply, I ſay, Iniquity it ſelf not in any figure, but plainly ſin it ſelf was laid upon Chriſt.

Some have been ready to conceive, that Iniquity in the Text is ſpoken figuratively; Iniquity, that is, the puniſhment of Iniquity was laid upon him. Juſt as the Proteſtants, when they are told, This is my Body is in the Text, ſay, it is to be figuratively underſtood. But ſee, ſaith he, how careful the Spirit of God is, to take away all ſuſpicion of figure in the Text; there is Iniquity, Tranſgreſſion, and Sin. And it is ſtrange, that all thoſe three Expreſſions ſhould ſtill be underſtood of puniſhment, and not ſimply of ſin it ſelf without any figure. Not one jot ſtranger, than that This is my Body ſhould be figuratively underſtood, when the literal ſenſe is neither agreeable to Scripture nor Reaſon.

For the Objection about guilt, that the Lord lays the guilt and puniſhment, and not ſimply the ſin it ſelf for ought that I can ſee, ſaith he, it is a ſimple Objection. So do the Papiſts ſay, as to our Objections againſt Tranſubſtantiation, that they are ſimple Objections taken from carnal reaſon; but we ought to ſubmit to the plain Letter of Scripture.

But how is this ſimple Objection anſwer'd?

(1.) That the Scripture doth not mention the guilt of ſin as diſtinct from ſin it ſelf, and Chriſt is never ſaid to bear the guilt of ſin, but to bear ſin.

And is this a wiſe Anſwer to the ſimple Objection? When every one that is converſant in the Idiom of Scripture, knows that the ſame word is often uſed for the ſin and the puniſhment of it; and the beſt Interpreters cannot tell ſometimes which to render the original Word by. Why then may not Chriſt be ſaid to bear our Sins, when he bears the Puniſhment of them? But Puniſhment is not Guilt. But it is ſuch a Conſequence of Guilt, that therefore one is often taken for the other. But to ſay, that he had the Guilt laid upon him, and not the Sin, is to contradict Scripture. How can that be, if the Puniſhment and the Sin be of the ſame importance, when Chriſt is ſaid to bear Sin? But the Puniſhment muſt then have relation to the Sin as in the ſame Perſon.

To anſwer this diſtinctly and clearly, I ſay, that there are three ways our Sins may be ſaid to have a relation to Chriſt's Sufferings, as a Puniſhment for them.

(1.) As a mere external impulſive Cauſe, which being conſidered alone, amounts to no more than an occaſional Cauſe, and gives no proper Reaſon for Puniſhment; and ſo far the Socinians will go.

(2.) As this impulſive Cauſe becomes meritorious by the voluntary Act of Chriſt's undertaking to ſatisfy Divine Juſtice for our Sins, by making himſelf a Sacrifice of Atonement for them. But ſtill they are conſidered as our Sins, and not as his own, any farther, than that by his conſent he took upon himſelf to bear that guilt which relates to Puniſhment, and ſo they come to be juſtly charged upon him.

(3.) As the perſonal Guilt of our Sins is ſaid by Dr. Criſp to be transferred on Chriſt; the fault of our Tranſgreſſions themſelves, ſaith he, is
P. 170. ſaid to be upon him; ſo that in reſpect of the reality of being a Tranſgreſſor, Chriſt is as really the Tranſgreſſor, as the Perſon that did commit the ſin
P. 267. was a Tranſgreſſor before Chriſt took the Tranſgreſſion upon him. Theſe are his own Words, and leaſt any ſhould miſtake him in a point of ſuch conſequence, he repeats them; And this act of God's laying them upon him makes Chriſt as really a Tranſgreſſor, as if he himſelf had actually commit-P. 281. ted Tranſgreſſion. And again, Chriſt by this Tranſaction, and laying on of ſin,

ſin, doth now become or did become when they were laid, as really and truly the Perſon that had all theſe ſins, as thoſe Men who did commit them really and truly had them themſelves. In another place, The Lord hath laid this P. 358.
Iniquity upon him, he makes a real Tranſaction, Chriſt ſtands as very a Sinner in God's eyes, as the Reprobate, though not as the Actor of theſe Tranſgreſſions; yet as he was the Surety, the Debt became as really his, as it was the Principals before it became the Sureties.

But do not theſe Words explain the reſt, and that he doth not ſpeak of ſin as a phyſical act; for he denies Chriſt to have been an actual Tranſgreſſor; but only in a moral ſenſe, that he did bear our Sins by Imputation.

To this I anſwer, (1.) That he utterly denies the ſenſe of Imputation, as it is oppoſed to a real Tranſaction; and ſaith, it ſuppoſes a miſtake P. 280, in God to eſteem of things otherwiſe than really they are; and that there 281, 286.
is not one Paſſage of Scripture, which ſpeaks of imputing our ſins to Chriſt. But if the word be allowed, he ſaith, it hath reference to the truth and reality of the thing; as Lev. 17. 4. 1 Sam. 22. 15. Beſides, he ſaith, That God hath no other Thoughts of things than as they are, he himſelf P. 281.
doth either make or diſpoſe of things. So doth he eſteem and think of things, and conſequently of ſin. If he ſay, he doth lay or hath laid Iniquity upon Chriſt, and that he hath diſcharged the Believer from all Iniquity, certainly God doth ſuppoſe and eſteem things to be thus as he hath diſpoſed of them.

(2.) He doth aſſert ſuch a laying Iniquity upon Chriſt, from whence the immediate Diſcharge follows as to the actual Sinner, who hath any ſhare in him. So that the Tranſlation is ſuch, as from that time no actual Tranſgreſſion lies upon him; and he ceaſes to be a Tranſgreſſor, and his Sins are no longer his but Chriſt's, as appears from his Words.
His meaning then is, that there is ſuch a real Tranſlation of the guilt of ſin upon Chriſt, that no kind of guilt doth from thenceforward remain as to the actual Tranſgreſſor. And ſo there can be no Remiſſion of Sins, nor Juſtification afterwards; no condition in order to Pardon; no charging Sin upon Believers; no true Faith, but believing that their Sins are already forgiven, &c. And if theſe things do not ſubvert the whole Order and Deſign of the Goſpel, it is hard to contrive a Scheme of Doctrines which doth it, and yet retain the Profeſſion of it. But theſe are Dr. Criſp's words in another place; All the Weight, all the Burden, all the very Sin it ſelf is laid upon Chriſt; and that laying of it upon him, is a full diſcharge P. 298.
and general releaſe and acquittance unto thee, that there is not any one Sin now to be charged upon thee. So that a full diſcharge is the immediate conſequence of laying our ſins upon Chriſt.

(2.) He anſwers about Guilt, That it is not an Obligation to Puniſhment, P. 272.
but that it relates to the Fact; as when a Malefactor pleads guilty or not guilty; the meaning is, whether the Fact was done by him or not. And therefore to ſay the Guilt is laid upon Chriſt, but not the Sin, is to ſay the Sin is laid upon Chriſt, and Sin is not laid upon Chriſt, which is a contradiction.

In anſwer to this, it will be neceſſary to clear this matter about Guilt; for a great deal depends upon it, both as to the Antinomian and Socinian Controverſies.

In every Act of Sin there is a twofold Guilt to be conſidered.

1. The Guilt of the Fact, as it is a Tranſgreſſion of the Law.
2. A Guilt conſequent upon the Fact, by virtue of the Sanction of the Law. For although the Deſert of Puniſhment naturally follows the Fact; yet the Obligation to it comes not from the Sinners Act, but from the will of the Law-giver, who by the Law binds the Sinner to Puniſhment: So that this ſort of Guilt depends upon the Law, as the other did upon the Fact.

Now it is of great conſequence for us to conſider, how far Guilt is ſeparable from the Act of Sin; and ſo whether it be poſſible for the actual Guilt of the Fact to be tranſferred from the Tranſgreſſor; and if it be not, there is no more ground for Dr. C's Hypotheſis, than for Tranſubſtantiation. For both have the words of Scripture, as they ſuppoſe; and if one be no more poſſible than the other, we ſhall find as little reaſon to embrace one as the other.

As to the Act of Sin, theſe things are inſeparable from it.

1. The Guilt of the Fact. For he that hath been an actual Tranſgreſſor, can never be made not to have been ſo: For what is paſt, can never be made by any power whatſoever not to have been; and ſo the Guilt of the fact muſt remain upon the Perſon that committed it. It may be ſaid, That this holds only as to the phyſical Act, and not as to the moral Obliquity of it. But the committing of the fact with the moral circumſtances of it, was a perſonal Act; and how then can one be tranſferred more than the other? Beſides, when the Obliquity of the fact lies in a mere Privation of that Rectitude, which ought to have been in it, how can that which is no real thing in it ſelf, be tranſferred to another?

P. 270. But Dr. Criſp ſaith, A Believer ceaſeth to be a Tranſgreſſor from that time his ſins were laid upon Chriſt to the laſt hour of his life. So that now thou art not an Idolater, &c. thou art not a ſinful Perſon, &c. It's poſſible for ſuch a one to ceaſe committing his ſin, or to have his ſins forgiven him; but how it is poſſible for a fact already paſt not to continue as a fact paſt, is a thing I cannot underſtand. But he ſtill conſiders Sins as Debts, that when they are once paid, are no longer Debts. But there is a great difference between the guilt of a fact, and the contracting of a Debt; for a Debt conſiſting in a thing real, whoſe property may be alter'd and tranſferred from one to another, it is eaſy to apprehend how that may ceaſe by being paid; but in criminal matters nothing is capable of being tranſferred, but the Puniſhment, which is a thing real; but the Obliquity and Guilt of the fact is a privative and perſonal thing.

2. The deſert of Puniſhment, which follows the actual Tranſgreſſion, cannot be ſeparated from it. For let what Grace or Favour ſoever be ſhewed, the Deſert of Puniſhment remains ſtill; or elſe there would be no ſuch Grace and Favour, if that could be taken away. But this Deſert follows inherent Guilt; for no Sinner can deſerve that one that was not a Sinner ſhould ſuffer for his faults. Nor can the Law or Act of any perſon transfer the deſert of Puniſhment from him that was the actual Tranſgreſſor.

3. The Turpitude, as to the Act of Sin, cannot be removed from it. For where-ever the Act of Sin is, it muſt be diſpleaſing to God; but the Turpitude, as it affects the Perſon of the Sinner, muſt have another conſideration. For God may ſee cauſe to forgive the Sinner, and receive him into his Favour, although he ſtill continues to hate and abhor the ſin.

As to the Guilt of Sin, as it relates to the Puniſhment, theſe things are to be conſidered.

1. That although divine Juſtice requires Satisfaction for Sin, yet it is not neceſſary that the actual Tranſgreſſors ſhould undergo that Puniſhment, which they have deſerved by their Sins. For then there would be no room for Grace and Favour to them.

2. That it is conſiſtent with the Juſtice and Wiſdom of God to accept of a Mediator, to interpoſe between the Severity of the Law, and the Puniſhment of Tranſgreſſors, upon terms agreeable to the Divine Wiſdom and Mercy.

3. That ſuch a Mediator, undertaking to make an Atonement for our Sins, by ſuffering in our place and ſtead, may truly and properly be ſaid to undergo the Puniſhment of our Sins, and our Sins to be the meritorious Cauſe of it. But if Deſert adhere to the Perſonal Guilt, how can our Sins be the meritorious Cauſe of another's Puniſhment? I anſwer, that a meritorious Cauſe may be conſidered two ways.

1. In the Natural Courſe of things; and ſo Deſert follows the Fact; ſo that the Sinner always deſerves to be puniſhed; and no interpoſition by another Perſon can take away this Original Deſert of Puniſhment: For although our Sins be forgiven, yet we ſtill deſerve to ſuffer for them; which we ſhould not do, if Deſert in this ſenſe could be transferred.

2. As Deſert implies only a juſt reaſon of Puniſhment; and ſo there may be a meritorious Cauſe in extraordinary Caſes, when the Legiſlator conſents that another ſhall undergo the Puniſhment, which others have deſerved. Immeritò quenquam punire eſt injuſtè punire; as I have elſewhere obſerved out of Crellius: And Immerito in the Greek Gloſſes is render'd Ἀλόγως, and Merito by Εἰκότως and Εὐλόγως, and in Cicero, jure & merito are moſt commonly joined together. Diſ. 1. of Satisfaction, p. 145.

Theſe things I only mention at preſent; and as occaſion offers, I ſhall diſcourſe more of them afterwards.

I come now to conſider Dr. C's Arguments from Reaſon, that Chriſt muſt bear Iniquity it ſelf.

(1.) It had been otherwiſe the extremeſt Injuſtice in the World for God to wound and bruiſe him, page 273. For vindictive Juſtice doth imply and ſignify ſome Fault committed. That God therefore might be juſt in puniſhing Chriſt, and do no more upon Chriſt than what was deſerved; he muſt firſt have the Iniquity laid upon him, that is, the merit of that bruiſing, that there might be upon him the deſert of that bruiſing he did ſuſtain, p. 274. And again, p. 283. There muſt of neceſſity be a preſent Deſert upon a perſon, before the Judge can inflict any thing upon the perſon. A Fault muſt be found upon a Man, before he may be executed legally and juſtly. Therefore the Fault muſt be found really upon Chriſt himſelf, before there can be an Act of God's Juſtice in wounding Chriſt.

This is juſt the Socinian way of arguing. Chriſt could not ſuffer the Puniſhment of our Sins, becauſe he was perfectly innocent, and therefore could not deſerve to be puniſhed; but Puniſhment without Deſert is unjuſt. The Antinomians we ſee join with the Socinians in the main Principle, That unleſs there be perſonal Guilt, the Puniſhment of Chriſt would be unjuſt. But then they give a wonderful Advantage to the Socinians; becauſe they put the main of the Cauſe upon an Iſſue which can never be defended, viz. that our perſonal Guilt, and the Deſert of Puniſhment was transferred upon Chriſt. For let any Man conſider with himſelf, whether he can think it poſſible for thoſe Circumſtances of Fact to be transferred to another, which inſeparably follow and adhere to the Perſon who committed the Fact. Suppoſe Dr. Criſp's own Caſe: A Malefactor is accuſed of a Crime, to which he is to plead Guilty or not Guilty; ſuppoſe it be Murder, or Adultery, can he that really did commit the Fact, ever truly plead that he did not commit it? It may be ſaid, As to Men he could not, but as to God he might; becauſe Chriſt taking his actual Tranſgreſſions upon him, the Sin is no longer his but Chriſt's. So that as to the juſt and righteous Judgment of Men, he continues ſtill guilty of the Fact, but not as to God's. But if Mens Judgments be true and righteous, then he muſt remain really guilty; and if God always doth judge according to Right, he muſt be ſo in God's Judgment too; or elſe a Man may be truly guilty before Men, and not guilty before God, as to the ſame Fact. I do not mean that a Man may not be juſtly found guilty before Men, whoſe Sins may be forgiven by the mercy of God; for that relates to the Guilt of Puniſhment, which God may remit as to his Tribunal, and yet the Perſon may juſtly ſuffer by humane Laws: But if the Guilt of the Fact were taken away by God's Remiſſion, then there would be no Foundation left for the Laws of Men to proceed upon. But if it be granted, that God doth judge him guilty of the Fact, then that Guilt muſt remain upon him; and ſo he cannot ceaſe to be an actual Tranſgreſſor in that Fact which the Law doth juſtly charge upon him. And if the Guilt of the Fact ſtill remains upon him, then it cannot be transferred to another; for two diſtinct Perſons, who did not join in the Fact, cannot be guilty of the ſame Fact, eſpecially ſo as he that committed it ſhall be free, and he that did not ſhall be charged with it. Theſe things are ſo agreeable to the natural ſenſe of Mens Minds, that if they did allow themſelves the liberty of thinking, they could be in no doubt concerning them.

And as it is as to the Guilt of the Fact it ſelf, ſo it is as to the natural deſert of Puniſhment, which follows from it. No Man hath committed a Fault, which the Law hath appointed a Puniſhment to, but he deſerves to be puniſhed for the violation of it. And although it be poſſible for him to be pardoned, yet the deſert of Puniſhment muſt ſtill remain upon him; becauſe that reſults from his actual violation of the Law, which cannot be unacted. But cannot this Deſert be transferred to another? No more than the Fact it ſelf. And Puniſhment taken in its moſt ſtrict and proper ſenſe, muſt follow perſonal Guilt, and that Deſert which ariſes from the actual Tranſgreſſion.

But do we not by this means take away the proper Puniſhment of Chriſt for our Sins, and ſo overthrow the Doctrine of Satisfaction? By no means. For I take away nothing but the Puniſhment which follows Perſonal Guilt; and if this be not taken away, the Antinomian ſenſe muſt be allowed; and Chriſt muſt be charged with the actual Guilt of our Sins. But if this be, as you confeſs, Falſe, Blaſphemous, and Impoſſible, then another Notion of Puniſhment muſt be pitched upon, which may agree to the Sufferings of Chriſt in our ſtead; and ſuch a one is that of the Suffering of Chriſt as our Mediator, by the Father's Appointment, and his own Conſent, which takes off all Appearance of Injuſtice in it: Since there is a concurrence of the Will of the Supreme Legiſlator, the free conſent of him who had the only cauſe to complain, and all this done to promote the wiſeſt and beſt Deſign for the good of Mankind.

But before I proceed farther, it will be neceſſary here to take notice of an Expreſſion of yours in your Appeal, which may be of uſe afterwards. Your words are, page 55. Miſtake me not, I don't believe that the Perſonal Guilt of our Sins, or that their Filth and Turpitude were transferred upon Chriſt: Nothing more abhorred by me than ſuch abominable Blaſphemies. By this one would think you were the fartheſt from the Antinomian Doctrine of any one. But then it follows; However I am per- perſwaded—— that the Lord Jeſus Chriſt voluntarily, on the Father's Invitation, coming under the Sanction of the violated Law, was juſtly charged with the Guilt of our Sins, found guilty, condemned, ſentenced, and executed as ſuch, even by that God who laid on him the Iniquity of us all. Now if I do not miſunderſtand both Dr. Criſp and you, you ſay as much in Conſequence as he doth in theſe latter words, and therefore you cannot diſown the transferring our perſonal Guilt upon Chriſt. For, I pray conſider the force of Dr. Criſp's Reaſoning: If the Fault be not found upon Chriſt he could not be juſtly puniſhed; and you ſay, that he was juſtly charged with the Guilt of our Sins, and therefore was juſtly puniſhed. But what Guilt was this, which was thus charged upon Chriſt? The Guilt of our Sins, you ſay, but not the Perſonal Guilt. What Guilt was it then? Not the meer Puniſhment; for we are now enquiring what that Guilt was which made the Puniſhment juſt; and there muſt be a Transferring of Guilt before to make the Proceedings juſt. Now what Guilt could that be, but the Perſonal Guilt of our Sins, as Dr. Criſp aſſerted, and you denied? And this appears more by your following words, p. 56. And ſeeing Chriſt's Sufferings were a Judicial Act of God, it could not be otherwiſe; for Juſtice condemns none to Puniſhment, but upon the account of Sin; and puniſheth none, but under the notion of Criminals: If Jeſus Chriſt had been only treated as if he had been a Criminal, and died not as a Criminal in foro Poli, his Sufferings could not have been a proper Puniſhment flowing from that punitive Juſtice which is natural to God. And wherein is this different from what Dr. Criſp had ſaid? For if Chriſt were a real Criminal in Gods Eſteem and Judgment, then he was an actual Tranſgreſſor, and had the Guilt of our Faults upon him; for he had none of his own. And what Guilt could make him to die as a Criminal in foro Poli (as you call it) but the Guilt of our Facts, with the Deſert and Turpitude which followed them? For nothing could make him ſuffer as a real Criminal but actual Guilt; and having none of his own, ours muſt be transferred upon him in your opinion; and yet you deny that he had the Perſonal Guilt of our Sins. How can you make theſe things to conſiſt? You muſt aſſign ſomething that is not Perſonal Guilt which can make a real Criminal; which I think is very hard to do. We ſay, that Chriſt did really ſuffer on the account of our Sins, and that Juſtice was ſatisfied by his Sufferings; and that he took upon him the Guilt of our Tranſgreſſions, by undergoing the Puniſhment for them, as our Sacrifice of Atonement; and that this was a real Puniſhment as to him, but made Juſt by the Father's Will, and his own voluntary undertaking. But to ſay, that he ſuffered as a real Criminal, and was ſo puniſhed by God, is, I think, impoſſible to be underſtood, unleſs Dr. Criſp's ſenſe of the Tranſlation of Perſonal Guilt be allowed, which you profeſs to abhor as falſe and blaſphemous.

(2.) Dr. Criſp's ſecond Reaſon is, That without this Tranſlation of our Perſonal Guilt, no Advantage could come to us by Chriſt's Sufferings, pag. 272. For what Reaſon? Becauſe a Man ſuffers only for his own Fault, unleſs the Fault of another be laid upon him. Here is no Queſtion, but our Iniquities were laid upon Chriſt, and that he ſuffered in our ſtead; but the Diſpute is about the Manner how they were laid upon him; whether our very Tranſgreſſions themſelves were ſo laid upon him? And how doth it appear that we can have no benefit by Chriſt's Sufferings, unleſs that were done which was impoſſible to be done? But he makes it good by a Suretyſhip for Debt: For (ſaith he) the bare Impriſonment of another Man doth not releaſe the Debtor in Priſon, unleſs he be P. 274.

Surety for him. Very true. So we ſay that Chriſt's Sufferings had not availed us, unleſs he had been our Mediator, and appeared in our ſtead. But how doth it appear, that we cannot receive the benefits of Chriſt's Mediatorſhip, unleſs our Perſonal Guilt were transferred upon him? Are not the Divine Appointment, the Deſign of Chriſt, and the Promiſes of the Goſpel ſufficient for that purpoſe?

And this is his great Argument on all Occaſions, That our Sins are Debts, and they are reckon'd to Chriſt as our Surety, and he hath fully diſcharged them, and therefore they cannot juſtly be charged upon us. This runs thro' all Dr. Criſp's Diſcourſes, and he manages it with all advantage to his Cauſe, and therefore muſt be more conſidered.

In his firſt Sermon, p. 8. he ſaith, That although a Believer doth ſin, he is not to be reckon'd a Sinner; for his Sins are reckon'd to be taken away from him. A Man borrows a hundred pound, ſome man will ſay, doth not he owe this hundred pound, ſeeing he borrowed it? I ſay no, in caſe another hath paid the hundred pound for him. A man doth ſin againſt God, God reckons not this Sin to be his, he reckons it Chriſt's, therefore he cannot reckon it his. If the Lord did lay the Iniquity of Men upon Chriſt, then how can he lay it upon their Perſons? Thou haſt ſinned, Chriſt takes it off; ſuppoſing, I ſay, thou haſt receiv'd Chriſt. And as God doth reckon Sin to Chriſt, and charges Sin upon him; ſo if thou be of the ſame mind with God, thou muſt alſo reckon this Sin of thine upon Chriſt; his back hath born it, he hath carried it away.

And, p. 283. When one man becomes a Debtor in another man's room legally and by conſent, this Surety that doth become the Debtor, he is not barely ſuppoſed to be the Debtor; but by undertaking of it, and legally having it paſt upon him, he is as really and truly the Debtor, as he was that was the Principal before; I ſay as truly and really the Debtor: So that there is an abſolute truth and reality of God's Act in paſſing over Sins upon Chriſt, and laying them upon Chriſt.

Again, p. 289. There is therefore a certain tranſacting of Sin upon Chriſt, ſo real, that indeed the Believer, though an Actor of Tranſgreſſion, is as truly and abſolutely diſcharged of his Sins, as if he himſelf had not committed them; I ſay, ſo diſcharged as if he had not committed them. As a Debtor, when a Surety hath taken the Debt upon him, and the Debtor receives an Acquittance and Diſcharge, he is as free of the Debt now, as if he had never run into that Debt; ſo I ſay it is with a Believer, Chriſt being made a Surety of a better Teſtament, and thereby becoming truly and really the Debtor inſtead of Believers, he ſo bears all the Debt himſelf, that they are altogether releaſed, and diſcharged, and freed, as if they had never been in Debt.

I need not to produce any more places to this purpoſe, although it were eaſy to do it; for in this Similitude lies the main ſtrength and ſupport of his Cauſe.

But to ſhew how little force there is in it, we need only theſe Conſiderations.

(1.) That there is no ſufficient Foundation in Scripture, for our Sins being thus transferred to Chriſt as our Debts, and his undertaking as our Surety to pay them. If one reads Dr. Criſp's Sermons, one would conclude, that there is nothing plainer, nor more frequently inculcated in Scripture than this: For he ſeems to lay the Foundation of all upon it, as though there were no other true way of underſtanding the Doctrine of Chriſt's Satiſfaction but by it. The Title of one of his Sermons, Vol. ii. Serm. 3. is, Chriſt the great Paymaſter of all the Debts of his People; and he grounds it on that Text, Iſa. 53. v. 6. The Lord hath laid on him the Iniquity of us all. Now, ſaith he, p. 263. as in Suretyſhip, our Debt becoming our Surety's, the Execution goes juſtly out againſt him; and ſo God can give a juſt Account of wounding him, &c. Here it is taken for granted, that Chriſt is made Surety for all our Sins as Debts, without the leaſt ground in the Text for it, which wholly relates to Puniſhment. For the Words properly ſignify, That he made our Iniquities to meet, or to fall upon him; as a Man falls upon his Enemy when he meets him. So the Jewiſh Interpreters underſtand the Word; and to the ſame purpoſe Symmachus renders it; the LXX. God gave him up to our Sins; which Procopius expreſſes by ὥπερ ἀντίψυχον ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, as one that ſuffered in our ſtead. St. Jerom, Tradidit eum pro peccatis noſtris; or as he tranſlates the LXX. Dominus tradidit eum propter iniquitates noſtras. Here is nothing like Chriſt's Suretyſhip to pay onr Debts for us; and yet, as if it had been the neceſſary ſenſe of the words, a great many Doctrines and Inferences are drawn from it; as of wonderful Conſequence for right underſtanding what Chriſt had done for us. God forbid that we ſhould go about to leſſen any thing of the Deſign of Chriſt's ſuffering for us, on which our Salvation ſo much depends. But the preſent Queſtion only relates to the Manner of his doing it, whether as a Surety for our Debts or no. Some will ſay, What harm is there in this, ſince it is an eaſie Similitude, which People may apprehend without Trouble? But it may be not without great Danger; for they can as eaſily draw Conſequences from it too; "As "that Chriſt hath then fully diſcharged our Debts already; and they can "no more be charged upon us, than a Creditor can demand a Sum of "Money from a Debtor, which was fully paid to a Farthing by his "Surety; and therefore all that we have to do is to believe, and to be "thankful; for all this Tranſaction was long ſince paſt without the "conſideration of any Act on our parts; and they muſt be great Ene-"mies to the Privileges of Believers, that can now talk of Conditions "on our parts; for this is no leſs than bringing us back to a Covenant "of Works, and making void the Covenant of Grace. Theſe are Conſequences of a very high nature, and have no Foundation but this Suppoſition, That all our Sins as Debts are transferred upon Chriſt as our Surety; and he hath actually diſcharged the whole Debt, which therefore cannot lie upon thoſe whom he ſuffered for; and conſequently we cannot ſuffer for thoſe Sins, which are already diſcharged; nor do any thing in order to our Juſtification and Salvation; whatever the Scripture ſeems to expreſs to the contrary. But ſurely Men cannot build their Faith on ſuch Suppoſitions, unleſs they had other places of Scripture beſides this for their Foundation. Dr. Criſp looked as far into this matter, as any one ſince, and it may be more; he turned the Scriptures over and over, and examined them with great care to find out what ſerved his purpoſe; for his Heart ſeemed to be ſet upon it, and as his Son ſaith, it ran in his Head when he was dying; and ſpeaking of thoſe who diſputed againſt his Notions of Free Grace, he ſaid, Where are they? I am now ready to anſwer them all. Which ſhewed the earneſtneſs of his Zeal about them. But there is but one place of Scripture which he could find, that ſeem'd to favour his Senſe, and that is, Heb. 7. 22. where Chriſt is ſaid to be the Surety of a better Teſtament. God, ſaith he, takes Chriſt for a Surety, as Men will do, ſo doth God with Chriſt.—— Man is a broken Debtor, and Chriſt is a Surety; one that is rich and able to pay, and therefore God will P. 277.

will look after none but him ; for this cauſe Chriſt gives his own ſingle Bond, and God is content to take Chriſt's ſingle Bond, and looks for no other Paymaſter but Chriſt. What ſtrange Deductions are here made from one word, quite beſides the Intention and Scope of the Apoſtle ? who doth not ſpeak of a Surety for Debt, but of the Surety of a Covenant ; not of one that was to pay our Debts to God ; but of ſuch a Surety as was to give us Satisfaction by his unchangeable Prieſthood, of the Performance of thoſe Promiſes which God made to us in this better Covenant. But of this more afterwards.

I now only take notice, that ſome of the Diſſenting Brethren I find charged with talking much of a Suretiſhip, Righteouſneſs, and of an Equality of Believers with Chriſt as to it: Which is another ſtrange Conſequence from Chriſt's being our Surety as to the payment of our Debts, becauſe the Debtor may be ſaid to pay that Sum which the Surety lays down for him ; and that God doth account that Believers have paid that Debt of Obedience which Chriſt hath paid in their ſtead ; becauſe they are one legal Perſon with Chriſt. All this depends upon this miſtaken Notion of Suretyſhip: But if it be once ſuppoſed, that we perfectly obeyed the Law in Chriſt, there can be no room for Remiſſion of Sins ; for how can Sins be forgiven to thoſe who have perfectly obey'd the Law ? Or how can they be ſaid to obey the Law perfectly in Chriſt, whoſe Sins being laid upon Chriſt, do ſhew that they have not obey'd it ? For can they be ſaid to pay for their Diſobedience, and to give perfect Obedience at the ſame time.

That the Argument doth not hold, that becauſe a Debt may be transferred to a Surety, and the Debtor be diſcharged on the Surety's undertaking the Debt, that therefore our Sins may be transferred to Chriſt, and we receive a Diſcharge by his becoming our Surety.

For (1.) there is no difficulty in conceiving the transferring of Debts, and diſcharge of a Debtor by a Surety. But in Sins the Guilt cannot be transferred as Money may ; for the guilt of the Fact remains a perſonal thing ; and although the Sinner be ſaid to owe a Debt to the Law, yet that Debt lies in the Obligation to Puniſhment, which he is liable to by the Guilt of the Fact ; but although the Puniſhment may be transferred by the Legiſlator's conſent, yet the perſonal fault cannot. But doth not this Debt ariſe from the Guilt of the Fact, how then can any diſcharge the Debt without taking the Fault ? I anſwer, That taking the Fault can ſignify no more than being anſwerable to the Law for it ; which muſt reſpect the Debt of Puniſhment, which the Law inflicts ; and he that takes away the Guilt of Puniſhment doth ſatisfy the Juſtice of the Law.

But we are told, That nothing is a Demerit of Puniſhment but Reatus Culpæ, and therefore if Chriſt did undergo the Puniſhment of our Sins, he muſt bear the Guilt of our Sins as to the Fault.

In the Guilt as to the Fault there are two diſtinct Conſiderations. 1. The Fault it ſelf, or the actual Violation of the Law by him that committed it ; and this can never be transferred. 2. Of the Debt to the Law, which follows the Fact, and this reſpects the Puniſhment, which may be transferred.

How can this be, unleſs he be made liable to the Puniſhment, and that is only by the Fault ?

Being made liable doth naturally and in ordinary courſe follow the Guilt of the Fact; but Laws and Puniſhments being made for wiſe Ends, the Legiſlator himſelf may interpoſe, and for great and wiſe Ends may change the ordinary courſe of Juſtice, and accept of another Perſon to ſuffer inſtead of the Offenders, (as I obſerved before.)

But ſuppoſe the Fault could be transferred as a Debt may, how doth it follow, that upon this Tranſlation there muſt be a preſent Diſcharge, as there is upon a Surety's being accepted inſtead of the Debtor? For in the caſe of a Debt, there is nothing looked after but payment of the Money; but in the Remiſſion of Sins, there are very weighty Conſiderations, as to the manner of diſcharging the Obligation to Puniſhment: For the true Honour of God, and Religion, and the real Intereſt of Mens Souls, as to the working out their own Salvation are deeply concerned in this matter. It is very poſſible for Men to frame a Scheme of Religion to themſelves from ſome peculiar Phraſes of Scripture, and general Promiſes, which may be fitted to ſome particular uſes, as to give ſatisfaction to ſome Perſons Doubts, (which ſeemed to be Dr. Criſp's Intention) but upon Conſideration of the whole Deſign of the Goſpel, they may be of dangerous Conſequence to Mankind; who are too apt to make ill uſe of ſuch Principles, by drawing ſuch Deductions from them, which tend to encourage them in the neglect, or careleſs performance of that ſtrict Obedience which they owe to God with reſpect to himſelf, and to their Neighbours. And it is of little moment to them to be told, That God will carry on his own Work of Grace in thoſe whom he intends to bring to Salvation: For this naturally diſpoſes Mens Minds to a paſſive careleſs Temper, as though they had nothing to do, but to wait for Supplies from above; and to depend upon God's working in them to will and to do of his good pleaſure, without ſetting themſelves to work out their own Salvation with fear and trembling. And yet St. Paul, who certainly underſtood the Power and Deſign of God's Free Grace, uſes one as the ſtrongeſt Argument for the other. What would he have ſaid to ſuch Phil. 2. 12, 13. Men, who according to theſe Principles muſt have told him, That he diſcharged the freeneſs of God's Grace, by putting Men upon working out their own Salvation; for this was to bring in a Covenant of Works again, and a Bargain and Sale with God, and to ſet up the Merit of Man's Works to Salvation; for every Condition gives a Right, and what gives Right may be challenged as due, and what may be challenged as due is meritorious. If there be any thing in ſuch kind of Arguments St. Paul was as much concerned to have anſwered them, as any now a-days; but he thought a great deal lay upon Mankind to do, notwithſtanding that wonderful Grace of God in the manner of our Salvation by Jeſus Chriſt; and that by patient Rom. 2. 7. continuance in well-doing, men ought to ſeek for glory, and honour, and immortality; which they could not do, unleſs they had a regard to it in the ſeeking of it, as the way to attain it. Doth not he bid Chriſtians ſo run that they might obtain? Doth not this make running a Condition of 1 Cor. 9. 24. obtaining? And what is obtaining but Salvation? What doth he mean by his preſſing toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Chriſt Phil. 3. 14. Jeſus? Do not theſe Expreſſions imply a great care to obtain the Reward of another Life? Here is ſomething beyond meer Gratitude and Service; for he doth ſuppoſe a Connexion in way of Duty and Means in order to the End; and not meer Connexion in a way of Event; ſo that to thoſe to whom God will give Glory, he will give Grace to fit Perſons for it. But St. Paul intimates far more, when he ſaith, That he kept his Body in ſubjection;

for what reaſon? Was it meerly to teſtify his Thankfulneſs? He gives 1 Cor. 9. 29. another account of it; leſt that by any means while I preach to others, I my ſelf become a caſt-a-way. Was St. Paul ſo ignorant of the ſureneſs of the Goſpel Covenant, as to ſuppoſe that by any Act of his he could make void that Covenant, which hath no relation to Conditions on our part? Either he was ſo ignorant, or others muſt be extremely miſtaken, who can hardly allow him to ſpeak tolerable ſenſe about this matter, if he doth exclude Conditions on our part in order to Salvation: But as no Man magnifies the Riches and Freeneſs of Grace more than he, ſo no one preſſes the Heb. 12. 14. Neceſſity of Holineſs more, as that, without which no Man ſhall ſee the Lord. Is this only to tell them, That God will make them holy, if he deſigns to make them happy? No, but he puts them upon purſuing after Rom.8.13. Holineſs, for that Reaſon. For if ye live after the Fleſh ye ſhall die; but if ye through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the Body ye ſhall live. Is not this acting for Life, and not merely from it? He ſuppoſes the Spirit ready to aſſiſt them in doing their Duty, and the greateſt encouragement to the performance of it. And in general, he perſwades Chriſtians to Col. 3. 23. great Sincerity in doing their Duties from this Conſideration; Knowing that of the Lord ye ſhall receive the Reward of the Inheritance, for ye ſerve 24. the Lord Chriſt. But he that doth wrong ſhall receive for the wrong that he 25. hath done; and there is no reſpect of Perſons. Could any Man more plainly inforce Mens doing their Duties with reſpect to Rewards and Puniſhments, according to the performance of them, than St. Paul here doth? And that from this Conſideration, that there is no reſpect of Perſons; which in this place muſt imply, that God will have a regard to Mens Actions, and not to their Privileges.

Neonom. Part 3. p. 286. Some may perhaps ſay, What is this, but to make the Promiſe to ſecure Life upon doing our Duties? And if this be not to make the Goſpel a more overgrown and ſwinging Covenant of Works, than ever the old Law was, they have loſt all their Theological Meaſures. I know not from whence ſuch men take their Theological Meaſures, nor of what kind they are, nor by what Standard they are to be tried; but I know of no Infallible Standard but the Holy Scriptures; and therefore all Theological Meaſures are to be examin'd by them. And I think St. Paul may as little be ſuſpected for ſetting up a Covenant of Works, as any Penman of the New Teſtament; and it is from him I have choſen to produce my Teſtimonies, becauſe it is he that attributes ſo much to the Grace of God in order to our 2 Tim. 1. 19. Salvation. It is he that hath ſaid, That God hath called us with an holy calling, not according to our Works, but according to his own Purpoſe and Grace which was given us in Chriſt Jeſus before the world began. It is he Tit. 3. 5. that hath ſaid, Not by Works of Righteouſneſs which we have done, but 6. according to his Mercy he ſaved us by the waſhing of Regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghoſt; which he ſhed on us abundantly through Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour; that requires men to work out their Salvation with fear and trembling. St. Paul uſeth the ſame word, Rom. 7. 18. where it ſignifies bringing a thing to effect, and is oppoſed to meer willing, and we render it to perform; in the LXX it is uſed for finiſhing and carrying on a thing already begun; and can imply no leſs than great Diligence in doing all ſuch things as tend to our Salvation; for that is the thing we are to work out by Divine Aſſiſtance; and therefore our own Working is required by the Author of our Salvation: Although he ſaves us not for the ſake of any Works of Righteouſneſs which we can do; yet his way of ſaving us is by working out our own Salvation. But we are told, no more is meant by this, but a continual maintaining a holy Jealouſy of our ſelves, leſt we ſhould fail of the Grace of God by truſting in our ſelves; for it's immediately added, For it's God that worketh in you both to will and to do. And is this all that St. Paul means? By Fear and Trembling indeed he underſtands great Humility of Mind, which carries along with it a Jealouſy of our ſelves; but what is working out our Salvation? That is not truſting in our ſelves, but depending on God to do it for us. But is there nothing then we are to do with that Divine Aſſiſtance promiſed? Are we to ſit ſtill, and only expect when God will work in us to will and to do? Then working out our own Salvation are inſignificant Words, and imply doing nothing; which is ſuch a ſenſe of the words as was never thought on before, and will not be again by any that do think what they write.

Neonom. Part 3. p. 286.

But St. Paul gives another ſenſe when he perſwades Rich Men that they do good, that they be rich in good works—— laying up in ſtore for themſelves a good foundation againſt the time to come, that they may take hold of eternal Life. How is this? What? Do good works that they may take hold of eternal Life? What is this but a ſwinging Covenant of Works of St. Paul's ſetting up? What is become now of the Theological Meaſures? Had St. Paul forgot himſelf? Or did he, who became all things to all men, here deal with Rich Men in their own method, by way of Bargain and Sale? But ſurely he would never accommodate himſelf to their way of dealing, ſo as to overthrow the Covenant of Grace; as theſe men imagine ſuch Conditions would do it. And he very well underſtood the difference between the Foundation of the Covenant it ſelf, which was certainly nothing but the Grace and Mercy of God through Jeſus Chriſt, and the foundation of our hopes as to our obtaining the Benefits of it, which ſuppoſes the performance of ſuch Conditions as are required from us; not as Works meritorious of a Reward, but as Means which God hath appointed in order to an End. As a Son that hath an Eſtate promiſed him of the free Gift of his Father; but yet he requires ſome Conditions to be performed by him before he comes to the poſſeſſion of it; can any one think this a Bargain and Sale between Father and Son? Or that he is to purchaſe the Eſtate by theſe Conditions? If theſe be their Theological Meaſures they had need to ſeek for new ones, for theſe will never hold according to the Standard of Scripture or Reaſon.

1 Tim. 6. 18. 19.

Which will yet more appear by what our Bleſſed Saviour himſelf hath ſaid concerning this matter; and ſurely we may moſt ſafely take our Theological Meaſures from him: For he knew beſt, how far and in what ſenſe the Guilt of our Sins was transferred upon him; and whether there followed an immediate Diſcharge upon it, without any regard to Conditions on our part. He had the Queſtion of the higheſt importance in this matter twice put to him; What ſhall I do to inherit eternal Life? At one time it was to try him, by a captious Perſon; and after his repeating the two great Commandments of the Law of God and our Neighbour, our Saviour ſaid to him, Thou haſt anſwered well, this do and thou ſhalt live. Had our bleſſed Saviour only a mind to banter him? Or was it to convince him of the impoſſibility of his doing what was neceſſary for eternal Life? It is not improbable that he intended to convince him of his folly, who ſuppoſed he had kept theſe Commandments in the Jewiſh ſenſe of them; which he doth in a ſerious manner by the Parable of the Samaritan. But what can be ſaid to the other Caſe, where a young Man of Quality and Eſtate came to him with the ſame Queſtion, but with a different Intention; for to ſhew he Mark 10. was in earneſt, St. Mark obſerves, that he kneeled to him, and asked him, 17. Good Maſter, what ſhall I do that I may inherit eternal Life? And when

21. he anſwered well, it is ſaid, That Jeſus loved him; which ſhews his ſincerity ſo far: But there was an immoderate love to the World in his Heart which he was not aware of, till our Saviour put him upon a ſevere Trial of himſelf; Go thy way, ſell whatever thou haſt, and give to the poor. And what then? And thou ſhalt have Treaſure in Heaven. Doth Chriſt himſelf make it a matter of Bargain and Sale for Heaven? Doth the Surety of the better Covenant eſtabliſh a Covenant of Works? And Matt. 19. that when one came to him for direction to attain eternal Life? Yet the
21. three Evangeliſts who report this Story, differ not as to this particular.
Luke 18. But what was our Saviour's Deſign in it? Not barely to convince 18. him, that he had greater and more prevailing Paſſions within him than he was aware of; but that there was ſuch a uſe to be made of the the things of this World, that they may be ſerviceable to another. And Luk. 16. 9. ſo he ſaith in another place, Make to your ſelves Friends of the Mammon of Unrighteouſneſs, that when ye do fail they may receive you into everlaſting Habitations. Not by way of Merit, or any fooliſh Imagination of that ſort; but in Obedience to the Will of Chriſt, who hath made it ſo neceſſary a Duty for thoſe who hope to be happy in another World, Matt. 25. to do good in this; which is evidently declared by the Account which 34. himſelf gives of the proceedings of the great Day. Which are far more to be regarded than mens Theological Meaſures. According to which, I confeſs, I know not what to make of the main Scope and Deſign of our Saviour's Preaching. For he was ſtill preſſing Men to do the Will of the Father, to keep his Sayings, to obey his Commandments, and upbraided Men for not doing it; and yet, according to theſe Meaſures, he knew it was impoſſible for them to do it; and that Mens Salvation was determined, without any Regard to Conditions on our parts.

If theſe be the right Theological Meaſures, what doth our Saviour Luke 13. mean when he bids Men ſtrive to enter in at the ſtrait Gate; for many
24. ſhall ſeek to enter in, and ſhall not be able? By which, it ſeems, that bare ſeeking by faint and weak Endeavours is not ſufficient; but by ſtriving we may enter, or elſe it is to no purpoſe to put Men upon it. What can this mean, if our Endeavours are not made Conditions; for as he Mat. 7. 14. ſaith elſewhere, Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto Life, and few there be that find it. To what purpoſe is this ſpoken, but to ſtir Men up to greater care and endeavour to attain to eternal Life; ſince ſo many do miſs of it, for want of diligence in the enquiry and purſuit after it?

Serm. p. But Dr. Criſp, by his new Theological Meaſures, hath found out an 56. extraordinary ſenſe of theſe words, viz. That they are not to be underſtood of ſtrictneſs of Converſation; but that it hath not that latitude in it that generally Men think it hath; for they think, that beſides Chriſt, there is ſomething in the way that leadeth to Life, and that is a Man's own Righteouſneſs; but if a Man's own Righteouſneſs be taken in, then it is a broader Way than Chriſt allows. But how could it enter into any Man's Head that reads our Saviour's words to the end of the Chapter, to think this could be his meaning? ver. 21. Not every one that ſaith unto me, Lord, Lord, ſhall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he that doth the will of my Father which is in Heaven; and v. 24. Whoſoever heareth theſe Sayings

of mine and doth them, I will liken him unto a wiſe Man, &c. What can be more evident, than that our Saviour here ſpeaks of Obedience to his Will, as that ſtrait gate and narrow way which leadeth unto life? So that if Chriſt and his Apoſtles taught true Doctrine (as no doubt they did) it was not meer transferring our Sins to Chriſt that is ſufficient for our Diſcharge and Salvation; but the Conditions of Faith, Repentance, and ſincere Obedience are required on our parts.

(3.) If there be no Conditions on our parts in order to the partaking the Benefit of Chriſt's Sufferings in our ſtead, how can Men have any good ground to ſatisfy themſelves, that the Guilt of their Sins is tranſferred upon Chriſt? This was a difficulty which Dr. Criſp was aware of; and therefore labours much for the clearing of it. The ſhort of it is, If Men can believe it to be ſo, that is the beſt Evidence that the thing is really ſo. Theſe are his words, If thou believe with all thy P. 128. Heart thy Sins are forgiven thee; (though the very believing it ſelf do not infeoff thee in that freedom) but if you would know whether you have any part in this freedom or not, the believing in the Lord Chriſt is a ſufficient manifeſtation. Again, If the Lord hath laid Iniquity, and our Iniquity up- P. 295. on Chriſt, then whoſoever thou art to whom the Lord will be pleaſed to give the believing of this truth, that the Lord hath laid thy Iniquity upon him; that laying thy Iniquity upon him is an abſolute and full diſcharge to thee, that there neither is, nor can be any Iniquity, that for the preſent or for hereafter, can be laid to thy charge, let the Perſon be who he will: If the Lord, I ſay again, give to any to believe this truth, that it is his Iniquity the Lord hath laid upon Chriſt, God himſelf cannot charge any one Sin upon that Perſon.

Theſe are very bold Expreſſions, and ought to have had plain Scripture, or evident Reaſon to ſupport them, but they have neither. The place of Scripture he brings is, Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's Elect? But is believing that our Sins are forgiven an infallible mark of God's Elect? Is it not poſſible for one not Elect to believe it, or for one Elect not to believe it? If ſo, how can it be any reaſonable Argument to conclude, That a Man's Sins are forgiven becauſe he believes that they are? Is Preſumption a thing poſſible or not? If it be poſſible, is it not the greateſt Preſumption to believe without grounds? And what ground can any one have to believe that his Sins are forgiven becauſe he believes it? Where hath God declared this in Scripture? And what ground can there be for true Faith without Divine Revelation?

But Dr. Criſp was aware of the Objection about Preſumption, and he gives this Anſwer to it, Let the Perſon be what he will be, if there be P. 493. but a real receiving of Chriſt, there is not Preſumption but true Believing; which is not at all to the purpoſe: for the Queſtion is not about Receiving of Chriſt, as to his Word and Promiſes; which is, no doubt, a real Act of Faith; nor about a firm perſuaſion of the Mind as to the truth of what God hath revealed; but it is about that particular Act of Faith whereby we believe that our Sins are forgiven; and this is ſuppoſed to be the firſt Act of Saving Faith, and to be the true Manifeſtation, that ſuch a Perſon's Sins are forgiven. And this is that which leads Men, we ſay, to Preſumption, and hath no ground at all in Scripture. It is far from Preſumption to believe what God hath declared and promiſed; for this is our Duty: It is no Preſumption to apply the general Promiſes of Forgiveneſs of Sins to our ſelves; for without that, they cannot reach to our caſe, and therefore cannot afford ſufficient ground of inward Peace and Satisfaction of Mind: It is no Preſumption to rely upon the truth of Divine Promiſes, nor to depend upon our Bleſſed Saviour for the performance of them; for this is conſequent upon our perſuaſion that theſe Promiſes are Divine: But yet it may be great Preſumption to conclude, that a Man's Sins are forgiven becauſe he believes that they are forgiven, being laid upon Chriſt: For on what is this Connexion founded? Where is it revealed? And if to believe a thing without ground be Preſumption, this muſt be ſo.

P. 105. But Dr. Criſp urges that Scripture, While we were yet Sinners Chriſt died for us: If thou art a Sinner therefore, Chriſt died for thee. And how then? Muſt every Sinner believe, not only that Chriſt died for him, and that his Sins are forgiven, and if he can believe this, it is a mark of his Election; and what follows? Then here is univerſal Redemption aſſerted in its full extent; and what is more, here is an univerſal Election too, if all Men can believe that their Sins are forgiven: At leaſt it is a Conditional Election; and that is ground enough for Preſumption as to all ſuch as can believe that their Sins are forgiven. What can hinder any Man more from Repentance and forſaking his Sins, than to be told, that the firſt Act of Saving Faith is to believe that his Sins are forgiven? But the Goſpel preaches Repentance in order to Remiſſion of Sins; for when Chriſt ſent abroad his Apoſtles to preach to the World, the Meſſage Luke 24. 47. was, That Repentance and Remiſſion of Sins ſhould be preached in his Name among all Nations. Not that Men were to believe that their Sins are already forgiven, being laid upon Chriſt in his Suffering, although the Suffering of Chriſt be mentioned juſt before. And when St. Peter had the Holy Ghoſt upon him, and ſpake of the Sufferings of Chriſt, it Act. 3. 19. is obſervable what preſently follows, Repent ye therefore and be converted, that your Sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreſhing ſhall come from the preſence of the Lord. What a different account is this from believing that your Sins are forgiven, and you may be ſure they are forgiven? Act. 2. 38. And upon the very day of Pentecoſt, he ſaid, Repent and be baptized every one of you in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt, for the Remiſſion of Sins. Here is not only Repentance required for the Remiſſion of Sins, but Baptiſm too. And is not the Baptiſmal Covenant a Condition on our parts? It muſt be a mere piece of Pageantry, and an inſignificant Ceremony, if it doth not imply a Stipulation on the part of thoſe who are baptized. And what is a Stipulation, but a federal Condition? So that thoſe who exclude Conditions from the Covenant of Grace, muſt make nothing of the Baptiſmal Covenant, as to any real Obligation on the Conſciences of Men. And how can thoſe be accounted Chriſtians who do ſo? Theſe things are ſo plain in Scripture, that I wonder how thoſe can account it the Rule of their Faith who deny them; but whatever ſuch Men pretend, they muſt take up their Theological Meaſures, as they call them, ſome other way. And it is not hard to gueſs what it is which makes ſuch Doctrines ſo popular with thoſe, who have a mind to reconcile the Practice of gainful, and trading, and faſhionable Sins with an Intereſt in Chriſt; which is eaſily done, if no more be neceſſary to Remiſſion of Sins, but ſuch a Faith whereby they believe their Sins are already pardoned.

Whether this be the Reaſon of ſome Mens liking ſuch Doctrines above others I cannot ſay; but it is no wonder if they ſhould; and it is a dangerous Temptation for others to preach ſuch pleaſing Opinions, eſpecially when they are covered over with the very ſpecious Pretence of advancing the free Grace of God; which muſt be free indeed if no Conditions be required on our parts. But then methinks they might as well exclude a Condition without as well as within them; and ſo there would be no need of the Satisfaction of Chriſt. For the Abſolute Promiſes of the New Covenant, on which ſo much weight is laid (without comparing them with other places of Scripture) ſpeak no more of Chriſt's Sufferings than they do of any Conditions in us: But to this they think they have a full Anſwer, by attributing to God ſuch a ſort of vindictive Juſtice, as requires an abſolute, and rigid, and perfect Satisfaction in the ſame kind for the Sins of Mankind. Now this one would think doth not agree well with the Notion of Debts (already examined) for what ſort of Vindictive Juſtice is that, which makes Debts ſo neceſſary to be paid to the utmoſt Farthing? But Dr. Criſp hath put both theſe together in ſeveral places.

The truth is, ſaith he, where-ever Sin is, the Juſtice of God will have plenary Satisfaction; for all the Sins in the World God will have full Satisfaction either by the Sinner himſelf, or by ſome Surety for him; Chriſt, ſeeing he hath taken the Sins of the Elect upon him, he muſt pay the full value, and his pay muſt be as full as the Rebrobates in Hell, God will have the utmoſt Farthing. P. 275.

Again, When Chriſt came into the World, he paid down ready Money all at once, he paid for every Parcel at one Payment; God hath all from him, as they ſay, in ready Caſh. P. 335.

And again, From the actual laying Iniquity upon Chriſt, at that inſtant when he was upon the Croſs, God nailed the Sins of Men to the Croſs of Chriſt; and from that time there was not one Sin to be reckoned, either to Believers, who are the Members of Chriſt, or to Chriſt himſelf; he having made Satisfaction, and upon it given out to the World, it is finiſhed. What is finiſhed? It is the payment of the Price ſo long look'd for; the utmoſt Farthing is now laid down. P. 357.

But in other places he ſpeaks of Chriſt's wearing out the Rod of Vengeance to the very Stumps: P. 394. And of God's Juſtice, as a Blood-hound following the Scent of Blood, and ſeizes where-ever he finds it. If Chriſt take our Blood upon him, Juſtice will follow him, and ſeize upon him, as if he had been the very Perſon acting the Sin. P. 274.

What mean and unworthy Repreſentations are theſe of the Divine Juſtice, which is always accompanied with infinite Wiſdom; and acts not here for Vengeance, but to prevent it! God hath great, and wiſe, and becoming Ends to all the Divine Perfections in the Sufferings of Chriſt for us, in order to our Redemption and Salvation. But ſuch kind of Notions as theſe, made Men abhor the Notion of Satisfaction, and gave all the advantages which they ever had againſt it. Therefore, if we would defend it ſucceſsfully, we muſt have a great deal of care not to run upon theſe Antinomian Principles; which muſt unavoidably carry us into ſuch Abſurdities, which will make our Adverſaries inſult and triumph, as we find they do in their late Pamphlets, whenever they encounter this Notion of Satisfaction. And they would make the World believe that there is no other, which is a piece of Artifice in them; and if ever they prevail in their Undertakings, it muſt be only with ſuch Perſons who have eſpouſed ſuch an indefencible Notion of it: For the ſtrength of all they ſay againſt the Doctrine of Satisfaction in the moſt correct Edition of the Racovian Catechiſm, (which, if they have any, is Catech. Racov. p. 146.

to be look'd on as the Standard of their Doctrine) is, that the Payment of the utmoſt Farthing muſt exclude all Conditions on our ſide: So that the Notion of Satiſfaction doth lay the Foundation of Antinomianiſm; which Dr. Criſp very well ſaw, and therefore by juſt Conſequence built his Doctrine upon it.

CHAP. III.

The State of the Socinian Controverſy explain'd, with reſpect to the preſent Differences among Diſſenters about it.

HAving thus far endeavoured to lay open the Myſtery of Antinomianiſm, and thereby to remove the falſe Principles on which the Doctrine of Satiſfaction hath been maintained, I now come more cloſely to conſider the Charge of Socinianiſm upon thoſe who have appeared moſt vigorouſly againſt it. Among theſe, in your Appeal, you have ſingled out Mr. Baxter, who was remarkable for his ſucceſsful writing againſt them; and Mr. Dan. Williams, who hath made himſelf known to the World by his Examination of Dr. Criſp's Opinions. I do not ſay it is upon that Account that you have endeavoured to repreſent them, as yielding too much to the Socinians; for you declare againſt ſome of them your ſelf with great vehemency; but I may ſay, and hope to make it out, that it hath been only a miſtaken apprehenſion of the true ſtate of the Controverſy, which hath been the occaſion of all theſe Heats; and that there is no Cauſe for any real Difference among thoſe who are not Antinomians, either in the Principles, or the Conſequences which follow from them.

And therefore I ſhall immediately apply my ſelf to the ſeveral Heads of your Appeal, in the Order you have placed them; and bring under each of them the Matters which lie diſperſed in your Book.

1. About Chriſt's Sufferings being a proper Puniſhment of our Sins.

As to this you produce ſeveral Paſſages out of Mr. Baxter's Writings; wherein he denies Chriſt's Sufferings to have been a proper Puniſhment of our Sins, but only ſaith that they were Improperly, Analogically, and Materially penal: That our Sins were not a proper Meritorious Cauſe, but only Occaſional of Chriſt's Sufferings; and that they were not from the Obligation of the Law, but only from his voluntary Undertaking; and that Mr. Williams follows him in thoſe Notions. For you look on him only as the Acceſſory, and the other the Principal.

In examining this matter, we have two things to conſider.

1. In what Senſe this is aſſerted by Mr. Baxter.

2. How far this Senſe doth overthrow the Doctrine of Satiſfaction, and how far Mr. W. is concerned in it.

1. As to the Senſe in which theſe things are aſſerted by Mr. Baxter: For which we muſt have recourſe to his Writings, where he hath delivered his Opinion moſt clearly. I paſs over therefore his Aphoriſms, becauſe he declared afterwards, that he had expreſſed his Mind more fully ly in his other Books; eſpecially in his Confeſſion of Faith, purpoſely written for the clearing of himſelf. In that Book, he owns, p. 3. that in his younger Days, he was near being enſnared by the Antinomian Doctrines; but afterwards he found them to be not only falſe but dangerous, and very apt to prevail upon weak and injudicious Minds, which excited his Zeal againſt them; which expoſed him, as he ſaith, ſo much to the Hatred and Reproaches of thoſe who favoured them.

In the Confeſſion of his Faith, p. 12. he expreſly owns not only Chriſt to be God, and one with the Father; but that taking our Nature upon him, he gave up himſelf a Sacrifice for our Sins, and a Ranſom for us in ſuffering Death upon the Croſs. And afterwards, p. 152. he ſets down the Antinomian Doctrine on one ſide, the Socinian on the other, and his own as the Truth in the middle. The Antinomian is thus delivered. Jeſus Chriſt ſatisfied God's Juſtice as in the Perſon of all his Elect, ſo that in Law-ſenſe and God's account, they themſelves did ſatisfy in and by Chriſt. So that Chriſt's Sufferings were the full and proper Execution of the threatning of the Law to Man; and ſo acquits them ipſo facto, on the meer Suffering; and ſo it is theirs as paid and ſuffered by Chriſt, and accepted by God, without or before any further means of Conveyance or Application to give them a Right in it, or to its Fruits.

The Socinian Doctrine is thus expreſſed. That Jeſus Chriſt did not undergo any Penalty for our Sins, as the Meritorious, or Pro-meritorious Cauſe, but only as Occaſions; and that he did not make any Satisfaction to God's Juſtice for us, but only ſuffer from the cruelty of wicked Men, and not as from a juſt and offended God, and ſet us a Copy or Example of Patience by his Death for our Imitation.

That which he puts down as the Truth is this. Jeſus Chriſt as the Publick Sponſor did bear the Puniſhment deſerved by the Sins of the World, and made to his Father a Satisfaction ſufficient for all. I need not repeat any more in this place; this being ſufficient to ſhew that he did reject the Socinian Doctrine; and owned that Chriſt did bear the Puniſhment deſerved by Mankind, and made full Satisfaction to the Father.

You may ſay, It is no news for Mr. Baxter to be charged with contradicting himſelf. And it is poſſible for a Man who writes much, and lives long, to fall into ſuch different ways of expreſſing his Mind, as by others may be taken for Self-Contradictions which really are not ſo. But this muſt be narrowly examin'd, leſt we do him or the Truth injury. We muſt therefore conſider the force of thoſe Expreſſions you produce out of him.

In his Methodus Theologiæ you ſay, That he expreſly declares that the Sufferings of Chriſt as to the Reaſon of the thing, were only a Natural Evil undergone by Occaſion, and the remote Cauſality of the Sins of Mankind. Not that our Sins deſerved his Puniſhment; but becauſe unleſs our Sins had deſerved Puniſhment he had not undergone it. Becauſe there is no proper Puniſhment but for Sin; and ſo the Sufferings of Chriſt are only Puniſhment in an Improper and Analogical ſenſe.

This is the force of what you cite out of him, and to the ſame purpoſe you quote his Book of Univerſal Redemption, lately printed, but long ſince written; as appears by the Poſtſcript to his Aphoriſms, and by the Book it ſelf.

The chief Expreſſion in it, p. 91. is, That Chriſt's Sufferings had no proper Meritorious Cauſe, but yet Man's Sins were the Pro-cauſa Meritora; he undertook to bear that Suffering which for them was due to us (not to him.) And therefore when I ſay he bore the Sufferings due to us, I mean it materialiter only; ſuch Sufferings for kind and weight he bore, but his Obligation to bear them was only from his own Sponſion, and not from the Law. From theſe paſſages, you ſay, you fear a Deſign in ſome Followers againſt the Doctrine of a Real, Full, and Proper Satisfaction to God's Juſtice for our Sins. To which it is Eſſential, that Chriſt's Sufferings be truly and properly Penal; and that our Sins be the near Impulſive Meritorious Cauſe of them; and that the Obligation thereunto ariſe from the ſanction of the Law. This latter part muſt be examined afterwards.

2. I now come to conſider how far this overthrows the Doctrine of Satisfaction. To which I anſwer,

1. It doth not appear how this touches Mr. D. W. the Principal in the Accuſation; although you ſuppoſe him but an Acceſſory in the Doctrine. And therefore it ought to have been made out, that Mr. W. had eſpouſed theſe Notions of Mr. B. for he might follow him in other things, and find reaſon to diſſent from him in this. Therefore I expected to find ſome Proof that Mr. W. had ſaid the ſame things as to this matter, which P. 13. Mr. B. had done. But you only produce the Complexion of his Writings, and their Tendency, and his Notions, Phraſes, Terms and Arguments, to prove this Charge: From whence you infer, That he muſt with Mr. B. deny Chriſt's Sufferings to be properly Penal. Now I appeal to your ſelf, whether in a matter of ſuch Conſequence as you apprehend this to be it be juſt and reaſonable to charge one Man with another's Opinions, from general Preſumptions and Surmiſes? Eſpecially when he frequently owns the Sufferings of Chriſt to be a Puniſhment for our Sins, in oppoſition to the Socinian Doctrine. Either Mr. B's Doctrine as to this matter falls in with the Socinians or it doth not; if not, why ſo much heat againſt it? If it doth, Mr. W. utterly diſowns it; for he expreſly rejects the Socinian Notion; as will appear by theſe places which I have obſerved in him. In the firſt place he makes no ſuch Diſtinctions of a Pro-meritorious Cauſe and Analogical Puniſhments as Mr. B. did. And he aſſerts Chriſt's Sufferings to be a Puniſhment for our Sins in ſeveral places; Man made Righteous p. 41. as in theſe Words: But he was willing to bear the Puniſhment of our Crimes, that thereby he might merit our Forgiveneſs. True, it was for Sin P. 18. or it had not been neceſſary; nor yet a Puniſhment, &c. Again, Chriſt ſuffered the utmoſt Puniſhment which Juſtice required, and God propoſed for the Expiation of Sin. And when he was accuſed of Principles tending P. 229. to Socinianiſm, he gave this Anſwer. The Socinian Principles are ſummarily reduced to that of the Trinity, and that of Chriſt's Satisfaction. They deny the Deity of Chriſt, as the Son of God by Eternal Generation, we affirm it: They deny the Perſonality of the Holy Ghoſt, we affirm it. The malice of our Adverſaries cannot pretend to touch us here. The Socinians deny that Chriſt died a proper Sacrifice for Sin, we affirm it. They deny that Chriſt's Sufferings were the Puniſhment of our Sins, we affirm it. They deny that Chriſt ſatisfied Divine Juſtice, or died in our place, we affirm that he ſatisfied Juſtice, and that Chriſt died in our place and ſtead. And in another place, I aſſert Chriſt's Sufferings to be Puniſhment ſatisfactory to Anſw. to Mr. J. H. p. 7. Juſtice for our Sins. And you tell me, you agree with me, That the true Controverſy between the Socinians and us lies here, Whether the Appeal, p. 7. Sufferings of Chriſt were to be conſidered as a Puniſhment for our Sins, or as Dominion only over an innocent Perſon in order to his Advancement to Glory. If you agree in this, and Mr. W. ſo freely owns that Chriſt's Sufferings were a Puniſhment for our Sins, how come you to ſuſpect that his Notions tend to Socinianiſm? And in his late Animadverſions on your Defence of the Report, p. 80. he ſaith, That he joined with his Brethren in ſaying that the Puniſhment of our Sins was inflicted on Chriſt; that God might without injury to his Juſtice, pardon and ſave Penitent Believers. Is this a Socinian Error? Or is a Word wanting to make Chriſt's Sufferings proper Puniſhments? Nay, what is it to anſwer for our Violations? Is not to anſwer for our Sins another thing than Socinians hold? Even this is no leſs than ſuffering the Puniſhment of our Sins, if we were for violating the Law under its Obligations to ſuffer thoſe Puniſhments.

But you may ſay, That all this is meer Sophiſtry, and that he means only Puniſhment Materially and Analogically, as Mr. B. doth, although he finds it neceſſary to be more cautious and reſerved in his Expreſſions: But I ſee no cauſe for ſuch a ſuſpicion as to Mr. W. I come therefore,

(2.) To conſider whether Mr. Baxter's own words do lay him open to the ſuſpicion of going too far towards the Socinians in this matter. For in this caſe we muſt diſtinguiſh the Scripture Notion of Puniſhment from a ſtrict and Philoſophical ſenſe of it. The Scripture ſpeaks in general of Chriſt's bearing our Sins, and our Iniquities being laid upon him, and his being made Sin for us, &c. but not a word of ſtrict and proper Puniſhment; but of that which was appointed and accepted in order to Atonement for our Sins, as the Impulſive Cauſe, becauſe the nature of the Expreſſions do imply it; which becomes Meritorious by his voluntary undertaking it.

But Mr. Baxter it ſeems could not ſatisfy himſelf with the General Terms of Scripture; but was reſolved to enquire into the Nature and Reaſon of the thing it ſelf; and from thence he found theſe things, as to Sin and Puniſhment, which he thought fit to be conſidered.

Meth. Theol. Part 3. c. 1. Def. 5.

1. That Puniſhment is a Natural Evil inflicted for a Moral Evil, wherein the Matter is the Evil it ſelf as Natural; the Form, as he calls it, the reſpect to the Meritorious Cauſe.

2. That the Name of Puniſhment is in it ſelf ambiguous; becauſe it relates to Puniſhment juſtly inflicted, and that which is not; the former is proper Puniſhment, the 2d is only Analogically ſo. Here Analogical Puniſhment is that which is unjuſtly inflicted, if it be therefore juſtly it muſt be proper Puniſhment.

3. The firſt and moſt natural ſenſe of Puniſhment is, when the Offender himſelf ſuffers for his Fault: But there may be two other Reaſons of Puniſhment, which he calls Analogical, becauſe they do not immediately follow Perſonal Guilt; and thoſe are either from nearneſs of Relation, as Subjects for Princes, and Children for Parents; or by voluntary Sponſion, as in vicarious Puniſhments. (By which we are not to underſtand, as you ſeem to eſtimate, that which is vice pœnæ, or Infliction inſtead of Puniſhment; but it is a real Puniſhment by Subſtitution of one in the place of another.)

Def. of the Report.

From hence he infers, That ſince Chriſt did not ſuffer as a Sinner, therefore his Puniſhment could not be proper in the ſtricteſt ſenſe; and ſo it muſt be Analogical, becauſe not immediately conſequent upon the Fault, but by the voluntary Act of another perſon. For in the Reaſon of the thing he allows only the Sinner himſelf to be capable of the Puniſhment; i. e. in the primary ſenſe of it. But if he that undergoes the Puniſhment for another by his own Act, be juſtly puniſhed upon his voluntary Sponſion, then, I ſay, the Fault of another becomes a meritorious Cauſe as to him, or there muſt be Injuſtice in the Puniſhment. For he diſtinguiſhes between a Puniſhment upon a falſe Imputation, which he calls Unjuſt, but Analogical; and a Puniſhment of another by Conſent, which he calls Analogical, but not Unjuſt. But if the Puniſhment be juſt, the Cauſe muſt be juſt; it could not be juſt with reſpect to his own Fault, for none is ſuppoſed; therefore there may be a juſt Puniſhment for another's Fault; and if ſo, that may be truly ſaid to be the Meritorious Cauſe of it, and the Puniſhment a proper Puniſhment, although for another's Fault. But that which led Mr. B. into the denying of it was, the Antinomians making Chriſt to undergo the proper Puniſhment of our Sin, becauſe our Perſonal Guilt was, according to them, transferred upon him; but he finding this Principle to be the Foundation of Antinomianiſm, and that this could not be true, he therefore denied Chriſt's Puniſhment to be proper, as it is oppoſed to Analogical. For he ſaith, That in a proper ſenſe our Sins could never be the Sins of Chriſt, becauſe the ſame Accident cannot belong to divers Subjects. Which is true: But from thence he concludes, That ſince our Sins could not be in Chriſt, he could not be ſaid to be properly puniſhed for them; ſince the Guilt of the Fault as ſuch muſt ſtick to the Sinner, but the Guilt of the Fault as to the Puniſhment may be transferred: And becauſe there can be no Puniſhment without reſpect to a Fault, therefore, he ſaith, they were Analogical Puniſhments on the Account of the Sins of Mankind. But then, as you truly cite his words, he makes our Sins not to be the Meritorious Cauſe of them, but a kind of Pro-meritorious or Occaſional Cauſe.

Def. 7.

But we muſt do him right, ſo far as to take notice, that in ſtating the Socinian Controverſy, he makes it to conſiſt, in denying that Chriſt did undergo any Penalty for our Sins as the Meritorious or Pro-meritorious Cauſe, but only as Occaſions. And yet here he makes the Pro-meritorious Cauſe and the Occaſional to be ſame; and he denies, That our Sins were the Meritorious Cauſe, but only becauſe if we had not ſinned he had not ſuffered.

These Expreſſions, I grant, taken alone, yield too much to the Socinians, who do not deny our Sins to have been a Remote, Impulſive and Occaſional Cauſe of Chriſt's Sufferings, but deny them to be the Meritorious Cauſe of them.

What then? Muſt we give up Mr. B. to them? By no means. For how could he be a Socinian, who ſo frankly on all occaſions owned the Doctrines of the Trinity and Satisfaction? But theſe things may be ſaid for his Vindication.

1. That by laying all the Paſſages together, he muſt mean ſomething more by his Pro-meritorious Cauſe, than merely a Remote Occaſional Cauſe; becauſe in ſetting down the Socinian Doctrine, he plainly diſtinguiſhes between the Pro-meritorious Cauſe and the Occaſions; and ſaith, the Socinians allow one and not the other. How can this be, if they were the ſame? How came his Pro-meritorious Cauſe to be in one place the ſame with Occaſional, Occaſional, and in the other as diſtinct from it as the Socinian Doctrine is from ours? Therefore it is but a reaſonable Interpretation of his latter words, to ſuppoſe that he meant more than that our Sins were only a Remote Occaſion of Chriſt's Sufferings.

2. A Meritorious Cauſe may be conſidered two ways.

1. Antecedently to any Act of the Legiſlator; and as it relates to what follows from the nature of the thing, of which Mr. B. ſpeaks, and ſo Inherent Guilt is the only Meritorious Cauſe of Puniſhment; for that doth naturally belong to it, and Puniſhment can be only deſerved by it, as Mr. B. truly obſerves.

2. Conſequently to the Legiſlator's Act in admitting another by his own Conſent to undergo the Puniſhment which the Offender deſerved; and ſo the Law transfers the Guilt of the Puniſhment to the innocent Perſon without any Injuſtice; as Mr. B. confeſſes, when he allows vicarious Puniſhments, or one ſuffering by voluntary Sponſion in another's place. Now in this caſe, no Man can ſay, that Antecedently the Fault of the Offender was any more than an Occaſional Cauſe of the innocent Perſon's ſuffering; but taking all together, when he is admitted to ſuffer in the place of the Guilty, the Law with the Puniſhment makes the Impulſive Cauſe become Meritorious, as it is the immediate Reaſon of his Sufferings. The only Queſtion then is, whether this can properly be called a Meritorious Cauſe? To anſwer this, that Expreſſion may be taken in two Senſes.

1. In the ſtrict and proper Senſe, and ſo it follows Perſonal and Inherent Guilt; and this your ſelf deny to have been in Chriſt.

2. In the Senſe of the Law; and ſo that which is the near Impulſive Cauſe may be truly ſaid to be Meritorious as to his Sufferings: For our Sins were the immediate Reaſons of them; becauſe they made it an Act of Juſtice, which otherwiſe had been only an Act of Power and Dominion.

3. The main Point in Controverſy between us and the Socinians, is not about the Senſe of a Meritorious and Pro-meritorious Cauſe, and how they are to be diſtinguiſhed from each other; nor about the moſt ſtrict and proper Senſe of Puniſhment, which muſt ſuppoſe Inherent Guilt, which cannot be in the Caſe of our Saviour; (and your ſelf grant, that the Suppoſition is falſe and blaſphemous) but it is, whether Chriſt did really undergo the Puniſhment of our Sins, in order to the being a Sacrifice of Atonement for them. And in this we have Mr. B's Conſent expreſſed on all Occaſions; and ſome Liberty muſt be allow'd to Metaphyſical Heads to ſhew their Skill in Diſtinctions above other Men; and ſometimes when there is no cauſe for them. But we muſt not preſently charge Men with Hereſy for new invented Diſtinctions; wherein they may be allowed to pleaſe themſelves, ſo they do not cumber the Faith with them; nor be too ſharp upon their Brethren for not apprehending the uſe of them.

There is a remarkable Story in the Hiſtory of the Synod of Dort, which may not be improper in this place. There were in one of the Univerſities of that Country two Profeſſors, both very warm and extremely zealous for that which they accounted the moſt Orthodox Doctrine; but it happened, that one of theſe accuſed the other before the Synod for no fewer than 50 Errors, tending to Socinianiſm, Pelagianiſm, &c. and wonderful Heat there was on both ſides. At laſt, a

S. Lubbertus.
I. Maccovius.

Committee was appointed to examine this dreadful Charge, and upon Examinations they found no ground for the Charge of Socinianiſm, or any other Hereſie, but only that he had aſſerted too much the uſe of Ambiguous and Scholaſtick Terms, and endeavoured to bring in the way of the School-men in his Writings; and therefore the Synod diſmiſs'd him with that prudent Advice, rather to keep to the Language of the Scripture than of the Schools. I ſhall make no Application.

Where we are well aſſured, that Perſons keep to the main Point of Faith, we ought to give the moſt favourable Interpretation to ſome peculiar Modes of ſpeaking, which appear to have more Subtilty and Art in them; for ſome Men will be always ready to ſhew the goodneſs and ſtrength of their Eye-ſight by diſtinguiſhing things quite out of the view of other Men; and ſometimes it is poſſible that they may take the Shadows in their Eyes for real and diſtinct Objects without them. All that I aim at is, to keep Men as much as may be, within the Bounds of the Chriſtian Faith, without raiſing new Difficulties by new Phraſes and Subtilties, which reach not to the common Faith; but if any will do ſo, let not others make more than there is of ſuch Peculiarities, and preſently ſuſpect that they are carrying on Deſigns to undermine the fundamental Articles of our Religion.

But before I diſmiſs this Particular, I muſt take notice of what you ſay relating to it.

P. 3. As, (1.) That the Unitarians in one of their late Pamphlets do ſay, That though Chriſt did not undergo Puniſhment properly ſo called, yet he did ſo in a popular Senſe of Puniſhment; and ſo they grant as much as Mr. B.

To this I anſwer, That the Caſe is not the ſame: For Mr. B. we find on all occaſions aſſerts Chriſt's being the Eternal Son of God, and taking our Nature upon him, and bearing the Puniſhment deſerved by our Sins, and making Satisfaction to the Father for the Sins of Mankind. Can any Unitarian ſay this, and be ſtill an Unitarian? I know their preſent Writers are a ſort of ſlippery Gentlemen, who will pretend to very ſmooth things that you may take no hold of them. And even in the Article of the Trinity, which they have endeavoured with all their Buffoonry to expoſe and ridicule, now they find that will not do, they would fain come to Terms of Accommodation, and claim the Benefit of Explications; which others, ſay they, are excuſed by. So in one of their lateſt Pamphlets, we are told, That they profeſs to believe the Article of the Trinity: they may as well ſay, They profeſs to believe Tranſubſtantiation; and may as well call themſelves Divines of the Church of Rome, as of the Church of England. For it is inconſiſtent with Moral Honeſty, or the Probity of a Deiſt, for any Man who is in his Heart an Unitarian, to profeſs himſelf a Divine of the Church of England; for he muſt be a Divine without Conſcience, or any regard to the Faith or Worſhip which he joins in the profeſſion of. For can any Church more expreſly declare her Senſe as to the Doctrine of the Trinity than ours has done, in her Articles, Creeds, Doxologies, Litanies, &c. And can any Men that in their Hearts believe not a tittle of it, (as it hath been always underſtood in the Chriſtian Church) yet profeſs themſelves to be Divines of ſuch a Church? They may better call themſelves Jews and Mahometans for they agree far better with them as to the Doctrine of the Trinity. But theſe theſe Men of Sincerity only pretend not to litigate about Terms and Words, P. 32. and therefore are for taking them in their own Senſe; and ſo will interpret away our Creeds, and Articles, and Prayers, if they can but find out ſome kind of Senſe which they can underſtand them in. And by this new Invention a Man may profeſs to believe a God, and mean no more by it than Spinoza did; ſo that there can be no certainty of any Mens Faith or Religion by their Profeſſions, and Subſcriptions, and outward Acts of Worſhip.

But, ſay they, Why may not ſome mens Explications be allowed as well as others? For very good Reaſons: Becauſe ſome mens Explications are conſiſtent with the Articles of Faith and others are not; and becauſe ſome men give not ſo much occaſion to ſuſpect their Sincerity as others do; and for this cauſe I do think a more favourable Senſe ought to be put on Mr. Baxter's words than on theirs.

But their greateſt Clamour is, That ſuch Explications are allowed as P. 12, 22. infer arrant Tritheiſm; and although Men out of their Charity may forgive the Tritheiſm of theſe Heatheniſh Writers, yet they can never make Three Infinite Minds to be but one God. But the true Queſtion is not, Whether Three Diſtinct and Separate Minds make Three Gods? But whether Three Perſons in the Trinity do ſo? And even Crellius himſelf could have told Crell. Eth. Chriſtian. l.3.c.2. in Addend. Ed. 1681. them, That the holding Three Perſons in one and the ſame Individual Eſſence cannot make any real or perfect Tritheiſm. And although he doth not allow the Notion to be True or Conſiſtent, yet he thinks the charge of Tritheiſm doth not hold, becauſe of that cloſe and inſeparable union between the Perſons and the Divine Eſſence. And although men may put a wrong Notion upon Perſon or Hypotheſis; yet as long as they aſſert One Individual Divine Eſſence in the Three Diſtinct Perſons, the Error lies rather in the Explication than in the Doctrine of the Trinity. But there is a great difference between theſe, and thoſe who believe no Diſtinction of Perſons at all; and although they would now ſeem to oppoſe only the Tritheiſtick Doctrine, as they call it, yet Mankind cannot be ſo forgetful, as not to call to mind that their firſt oppoſition was to what they called the Athanaſian Religion, or that Doctrine of the Trinity which is contained in the Creed under the Name of Athanaſius, which we take to be a true Explication of it; and therefore thoſe who contradict that, cannot by us be allowed the Benefit of their Explications.

(2.) You object, That Legal Guilt lying in an Obligation to Puniſhment, P. 7. where Puniſhment is juſtly inflicted, Guilt muſt be ſuppoſed as a neceſſary Antecedent thereto. Of this there is no Queſtion; for Sin and Puniſhment have a neceſſary Reſpect to each other: But the Queſtion is, Whether Perſonal Guilt muſt be ſuppoſed; for then it follows, either that Chriſt's Death could not be a Puniſhment for Sin in any true Senſe, or that our Perſonal Guilt muſt be transferred upon Chriſt, which you deny. But we ſay that Puniſhment may be juſtly inflicted, where there was a Tranſlation of Guilt by Relaxation of the Law as to Perſonal Offenders, and admitting a Mediator to ſuffer in their ſtead.

But, ſay you, Rectoral Juſtice doth eſſentially reſpect the Law in its Diſtributions, and never inflicts Sufferings on any but for Sin as their Meritorious Cauſe. If a Rector ſentenceth any to Sufferings without a Regard to Sin, it is unjuſt. Whatever a Sovereign in exerting Acts of Dominion may do in this caſe, a Rector cannot juſtly inflict Sufferings on an Innocent Perſon as ſuch. Here I grant, you have come up to the true ſtate of the Caſe between the Socinians and Us. For whatever they ſometimes ſeem to pretend, they do not allow Chriſt's Sufferings to have any Relation to Juſtice as a Puniſhment for Sin in any true Senſe; but only that they were the Exerciſe of God's Dominion over him, or of his Sovereign Power. It's true, they ſay, that the Sins of Mankind may be ſaid to have been an Occaſional Cauſe in this Reſpect, that if we had not ſinned Chriſt had not ſuffered: But this kind of Cauſe hath no Influence upon the Effect which follows upon it, which is produced by its true and proper Cauſes. As for inſtance, a modern Philoſopher, of great Eſteem among ſome, hath aſſerted, That Mankind are only the Occaſional Cauſes of their own Senſations, i. e. That nothing done by us in Seeing or Hearing is the Cauſe of that we call Senſation; but that ſuch a Local Motion being ſuppoſed, God himſelf doth immediately produce in us thoſe Ideas which we call Senſations; and ſo he takes away all Efficacy from Second Cauſes, and thereby makes Mankind to have lived under a perpetual Deluſion, and God to be the Soul of the World. But I only mention it here to ſhew, that thoſe who aſſert ſuch Occaſional Cauſes, do take away all kind of Efficacy from them. For an Occaſional Cauſe is really no Cauſe at all; but ſomething that is ſuppoſed in order to the true Cauſe's producing its Effect. As the Bleſſed Virgin Mary being at Bethlehem in the time of the Inrolment was the Occaſional Cauſe of our Saviour's being born there; but will any one ſay, that this was a True Cauſe of our Saviour's being born at Bethlehem? And yet we may ſay, that if there had been no ſuch place as Bethlehem, and the Bleſſed Virgin had not been there, he could not have been born there. And ſo the Fire of London was the Occaſional Cauſe of the Monument, for if there had been no Fire, there had been no Monument; but will any man ſay therefore, that this was a Cauſe of the Monument? The moſt that can be allowed to an Occaſional Cauſe is to make it a Remote Impulſive Cauſe; and ſo the Miſery of Mankind by Sin was the Cauſe of Chriſt's Sufferings; as the Diſeaſes of Mankind are the Occaſional Cauſe of the Study and Practice of Phyſick: for if there had been no Diſeaſes, there would have been no need of Phyſicians. And this is all that they can make of our Sins being the Cauſes of Chriſt's Death, viz. that they were an Occaſion of his coming to bear the Diſeaſes of Mankind; which becauſe his Preaching the Doctrine of the Goſpel could not extend far enough to do, therefore he thought fit to confirm his Doctrine by his Death: Upon which followed the Preaching of it to the World, and upon that Repentance and Amendment of Life; and ſuch a Power in Chriſt, as to be able to ſave all ſuch as truly repented.

This is the true Account of the Socinian Scheme, after all their Refinings of it in the laſt Edition of the Racovian Catechiſm: By which it appears that they do not allow the Sufferings of Chriſt to be a Puniſhment for Sin in any true and proper Senſe; but only an Act of Sovereignty in God. What you ſay, That a Rector cannot inflict juſtly Sufferings on an Innocent Perſon, is the Socinian Argument againſt Chriſt's Satisfaction; but when you add as ſuch, I ſuppoſe you thereby allow Chriſt's Suffering juſtly as taking our Sins upon him, which is the thing we aſſert againſt them; and if he ſuffered juſtly on that account, then his Sufferings were a true and proper Puniſhment. For whatever is inflicted ſo Sin is ſo, although not in the moſt ſtrict and proper ſenſe, which ſuppoſes inherent Guilt. And this is all that Grotius and Voſſius mean in the places you cite out of them; viz. That our Sins were an P. 39, 40. Antecedent and Impulſive Cauſe as to Chriſt's Sufferings, and ſo they were a true and proper Puniſhment; but they never could imagine it in the moſt ſtrict and proper Senſe, for they never ſaid that Chriſt ſuffered the very ſame which we were to have ſuffered, which was Puniſhment in the ſtricteſt Senſe; but that which was properly a Puniſhment with reſpect to Sin, and which God accepted as a full, perfect, and ſufficient Sacrifice for the Sins of Mankind.

The Sum of what I have ſaid on this Argument is this; That the moſt proper Senſe of Puniſhment is that which belongs to Perſonal Guilt; ſo that either Chriſt could not ſuffer the moſt proper Puniſhment, or the Perſonal Guilt of our Sins muſt be transferred upon him. But ſince you deny this, you muſt yield Puniſhment to be taken in a Senſe leſs proper, but yet a true Puniſhment for Sin, and properly ſo called, becauſe Sin was the near Impulſive Cauſe of it. Therefore, thoſe who do aſſert the Sufferings of Chriſt to have been a true Puniſhment for Sin, have no reaſon to be condemned and cenſured as approaching to Socinianiſm: For if this hold, all muſt be either Antinomians or Socinians. But as you deſire to avoid both extremes your ſelf, ſo I hope you will allow your Brethren the ſame liberty, although they may differ in ſome Modes of Expreſſion from you.

This Article about the Commutation of Perſons, was thought fit to be pitched upon as the Foundation of a new Charge upon Mr. W's Book. From hence a great Heat hath riſen about the Senſe of it; and I perceive by your Appeal, p. 43. that there is ſo much Diſſatisfaction ſtill among the Diſſenting Brethren, that they will not renounce the Antinomian Errors till ſatisfaction be given as to what Mr. W. is charged with. Now this to me ſeems to be a very ſtrange method of Proceeding. If they do really think the Antinomian Errors to be Errors indeed, why muſt the renouncing them depend upon Mr. W's giving them ſatisfaction in this matter? Suppoſe the other ſide had ſaid, That they would not renounce the Socinian or Arminian Doctrines till Mr. C. Mr. Ch. Mr. M. &c. had cleared themſelves of Antinomianiſm. Would this have been thought a reaſonable Excuſe? Would they not have ſaid, that now they ſhew indeed what Fondneſs they had for thoſe Opinions, when they put it upon ſuch terms which they thought would never be accepted of? If it hold on one ſide, it muſt on the other too. But I ſhall take no advantage of ſuch an unaccountable Stiffneſs, but proceed to an impartial Examination of this matter, as it lies on both ſides; which will require the laying open briefly the Riſe and Progreſs of this Diſpute, and then conſider what Difference there ſtill remains, and what are the beſt means to compoſe it.

1. As to the Riſe and Progreſs of the Diſpute, we muſt look for it in Dr. Criſp, whoſe Opinions Mr. W. undertook to confute. Now his words are, Mark it well, Chriſt himſelf is not ſo compleatly Righteous, but P. 270.

we are as righteous as he was; nor we ſo compleatly ſinful, but Chriſt became, being made Sin, as compleatly ſinful as we—— So that here is a direct Change; Chriſt takes our Perſons and Condition and ſtands in our ſtead, we take Chriſt's Perſon and Condition and ſtand in his ſtead. Theſe words are not denied to be Dr. Criſp's, and they are no ſudden or occaſional Expreſſions, but are grounded upon his main Principle of the Tranſlation of our Perſonal Guilt upon Chriſt, and his Perſonal Righteouſneſs on Believers: So that here is no force or ſtrain upon his words.

Now to this Mr. W. ſaith, The Difference is, whether there be a Change of Perſon between Chriſt and Believers? This the Doctor affirms and I deny. The Queſtion hence aroſe, whether theſe Words could be reaſonably extended beyond that Senſe in which the Dr. aſſerted it? None could deny but there might be other Senſes of the Change of Perſons; but in ſuch a caſe, by all reaſonable ways of interpreting the Senſe of ambiguous Words, we muſt have recourſe to the true Occaſion of them. And I muſt declare that I can ſee no reaſon for the heat that hath been about the Difference of the Phraſe, of Change of Perſon, and Change of Perſons. But that I may expreſs my Senſe of this matter more diſtinctly, I ſhall do it in theſe particulars.

Def. of the Rep. p. 35.

(1.) That Mr. W. did not invent the Phraſe of Change of Perſon to cover an ill meaning: But you ſeem to intimate ſo much, when you ſay, That it was not known till he ſtarted it; and that it is a Phraſe only adjuſted to expreſs no more than what the Socinians do conſtantly grant; and by it, you think, is meant a Change of Chriſt's Perſon from Eaſe to Pain for our Good. But if you had carefully looked into the words of Dr. Criſp, you could not but obſerve that he took the Phraſe from him. Chriſt takes our Perſons and Condition and ſtands in our ſtead, we take Chriſt's Perſon and Condition and ſtand in his ſtead. And ſoon after, So that if you will reckon well, you muſt always reckon your ſelf in another's Perſon, and that other in your Perſon. Here is a Change of Perſon owned by Dr. Cr. and by it he underſtands the Tranſlation of Believers Perſonal Guilt upon Chriſt, and his Perſonal Righteouſneſs on them; ſo that thereby Chriſt is become as ſinful as they, and they as compleatly righteous as he. His words can have no other meaning. And not long after, That Sacrifice of his made the Exchange, that by virtue of this we became that which Chriſt was, and Chriſt became that which we were. Why then do you charge Mr. W. with inventing this Phraſe to ſerve the Socinians, when he denied it, becauſe he found it uſed by the Antinomians? But how came this Phraſe to be invented by Mr. W. to gratify the Socinians, when he ſaith that Dr. Cr. affirmed the Change of Perſon, and he denied it? Would he invent it on purpoſe to ſerve them, and deny it when he had done? This makes him not very capable of doing them any great Service, if he had a mind to it. But Mr. W. ſaith for himſelf, That he did not invent the Phraſe of Change of Perſon, but uſed and cited it as Dr. Criſp's; and that this was all denied, and not a Change of Perſons, which he fully aſſerted. What is to be done in this caſe? You charge him with inventing a Phraſe to ſerve the Socinians, and he denies the Phraſe and the Senſe of it; you charge him with denying the Change of Perſons, and he expreſly owns and aſſerts it.

All that I can find that you have to plead for your ſelf is, That his Friend and Defender denies the Change of Perſons, and aſſerts that a Change of Perſon may be allowed in a good ſenſe ; that he oppoſes a Change of Perſons, and ſets up a Change of Perſon ſingular. Suppoſe all this to be true ; what follows ? Then he took a wrong way to defend him. Grant that, how doth it appear from thence that Mr. W. muſt ſuffer for the Miſtakes of a Friend ? And yet even he hath ſufficiently cleared his meaning when he ſaith, That Mr. W. denied nothing, was concerned to deny nothing but what the Dr. had affirmed ; but the Dr. had affirmed a wild monſtrous Senſe of Change of Perſons between Chriſt and the Elect or Believers ; and therefore Mr. W. did not, could not deny any thing elſe, according to all the Rules and Laws of pertinent Diſcourſe. This is plain Reaſoning without any quirks of Wit to leſſen the force of it. And ſoon after, ſetting down Dr. Criſp's words, he ſaith, And now you have it, what is that Change of Perſons which the Dr. affirms and Mr. W. denies, which had he not, he had denied his Redeemer, and betrayed the Goſpel. Theſe are ſevere Words, but they ſhew what his true Apprehenſion was of the Change of Perſons as denied by Mr. W. which could be no other than that Senſe in which Dr. Cr. aſſerted it, whether it be Change of Perſon, or Change of Perſons.

IN
Vindication of the DOCTRINE of the TRINITY: With an Anſwer to the late Socinian Objections againſt it from Scripture, Antiquity and Reaſon. And a PREFACE, Concerning the different Explications of the Trinity, and the Tendency of the preſent Socinian Controverſie.

The PREFACE.

WHen I was deſir'd, not long ſince, to reprint the Diſcourſe lately publiſhed, concerning the* Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction, I thought it neceſſary to look into the Socinian Pamphlets, (which have ſwarmed ſo much among us within a few Years) to ſee how far an Anſwer had been given in them to any of the Arguments contained in it; but I found the Writers of them thought it not for their purpoſe to take any notice at all of it; but rather endeavour'd to turn the Controverſie quite another way, and to cover their true Senſe under more plauſible Expreſſions. Of which I have given a full account in the Preface to the late Edition of it. But among thoſe Treatiſes (which for the general good of the Nation are gather'd into Volumes and diſpers'd abroad, to make either Proſelytes or Infidels*) I found one, wherein there is pretended to be an Anſwer to my Sermon about* the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, (reprinted with the former Diſcourſe) and therein I meet with a paſſage, which hath given occaſion to this Vindication. For there are theſe Words, That I had utterly miſtaken, in thinking that they deny the Articles of the new Creed, or Athanaſian Religion, becauſe they are Myſteries, or becauſe, ſay they, we do not comprehend them; we deny them, becauſe we do comprehend them; we have a clear and diſtinct Perception, that they are not Myſteries, but Contradictions, Impoſſibilities and pure Nonſenſe. Which Words contain in them ſo ſpiteful, ſo unjuſt, and ſo unreaſonable a Charge upon the Chriſtian Church in general, and our own in particular, that I could not but think my ſelf concerned, eſpecially ſince they are addreſſed to me, to do what in me lay (as ſoon as my uncertain State of Health would permit) towards the clearing the fundamental Myſtery of the Athanaſian Religion, as they call it, viz. The Doctrine of the Trinity, (which is chiefly ſtruck at by them) without running into any new Explications, or laying aſide any old terms, for which I could not ſee any juſt occaſion.

For however thoughtful Men may think to eſcape ſome particular difficulties better, by going out of the common Roads; yet they may meet with others which they did not foreſee, which may make them as well as others judge it, at laſt, a wiſer and ſafer courſe to keep in the ſame way, which the Chriſtian Church hath uſed, ever ſince it hath agreed to expreſs her Senſe in ſuch Terms, which were thought moſt proper for that purpoſe. For in ſuch caſes, the Original and Critical Signification of Words is not ſo much to be attended, as the uſe they are applied to, and ſince no other can be found more ſignificant or proper for that end; it looks like yielding too great advantage to our Adverſaries, to give up the Boundaries of our Faith. For although there be a difference between the neceſſary Article of Faith it ſelf, and the manner of expreſſing it, ſo that thoſe may truly believe the Subſtance of it, who differ in the Explication; yet ſince the Senſe of the Article hath been generally received under thoſe Terms, there ſeems to be no ſufficient reaſon to ſubſtitute new ones inſtead of the old, which can hardly be done without reflecting on the Honour of the Chriſtian Church, and giving occaſion for very unreaſonable Heats and Diſputes, among thoſe, who, if we may believe their own Words, agree in the ſame fundamental Doctrine, viz. a Trinity in Unity, or three Perſons in the ſame undivided divine Eſſence.

I am ſo little a Friend to any ſuch Heats and Differences among our ſelves, eſpecially when we are ſo violently attacked by our common Adverſaries, that were there no other reaſon, I ſhould for the ſake of that alone forbear making uſe of new Explications; but there is another too obvious, which is, the mighty advantage they have taken from hence to repreſent our Doctrine as uncertain, as well as unintelligible. For as ſoon as our Unitarians began to appear with that Briskneſs and Boldneſs they have done now for ſeveral Years, ſome of our Divines thought themſelves oblig'd to write in Defence of the Doctrine of the Trinity. Thence came ſeveral Anſwers to them, and in ſeveral Methods, as the Perſons thought moſt ſubſervient to the ſame end; but whatever their Intentions were, our Adverſaries were too much pleaſed to conceal the Satisfaction which they took in it. For ſoon after, we had the ſeveral Explications ſet forth and compared with each other; and all managed ſo, as to make the Cauſe to ſuffer by the diſagreement of the Advocates for it. And from hence they have formed a fivefold Trinity. 1. The Ciceronian Trinity; becauſe Tully had uſed the Word Perſonæ for different Reſpects; Suſtineo ego tres Perſonas; and according to this Acceptation, Three Perſons in the Godhead are no more than three Relations, Capacities or Reſpects of God to his Creatures, which ſay they, is downright Sabelliániſm, and is no manner of Myſtery, but the moſt intelligible and obvious thing in the World. 2. The Carteſian Trinity, which maketh three divine Perſons, and three infinite Minds, Spirits and Beings to be but one God. 3. The Platonick Trinity, of three divine Co-eternal Perſons, whereof the ſecond and third are ſubordinate or inferiour to the firſt in Dignity, Power and all other Qualities, except only Duration. 4. The Ariſtotelian Trinity, which ſaith the Divine Perſons are one God, becauſe they have one and the ſame numerical Subſtance. 5. The Trinity of the Mobile, or that which is held by the common People, or by ſuch lazy Divines, who only ſay in ſhort, that it is an unconceivable Myſtery; and that thoſe are as much in fault who go about to explain it, as thoſe who oppoſe it.

Conſiderat. on the Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Dr. W. &c. p. 10.

But that which hath made the moſt noiſe, and cauſed the greateſt Heat and Ferment among us, hath been a difference firſt begun between two learned Divines of our Church, about the ſecond and fourth; and the account which our Unitarians give of both, is this, That the one is a rational and intelligible Explication, but not true nor Orthodox; the other is true and Orthodox; but neither rational, intelligible nor poſſible. I do not mention this, as though their Words were to be taken as to either; but only to ſhew what advantage they take from both, to repreſent that which is ſet up for the Churches Doctrine, either not to be truly ſo, or to be neither rational nor intelligible.

p. 13.

The deſign of the following Diſcourſe, is to make it appear, (1.) That the Churches Doctrine, as to the Trinity, as it is expreſſed in the Athanaſian Creed, is not liable to their charges of Contradiction, Impoſſibilities and pure Nonſenſe.

ſenſe. (2.) That we own no other Doctrine than what hath been received by the Chriſtian Church in the ſeveral Ages from the Apoſtles Times: (3.) And that there are no Objections in point of reaſon, which ought to hinder our Aſſent to this great point of the Chriſtian Faith.

But the chief Deſign of this Preface, is to remove this Prejudice which lies in our way from the different manners of Explication, and the warm Diſputes which have been occaſion'd by them.

It cannot be denied, that our Adverſaries have taken all poſſible advantage againſt us from theſe unhappy differences; and in one of their lateſt Diſcourſes they glory in it, and think they have therein out-done the foreign Unitarians: For, ſay they, We have ſhewed, that their Faiths concerning this pretended Myſtery are ſo many and ſo contrary, that they are leſs one Party among themſelves, than the far more learned and greater number of them are one Party with us: this is ſpoken of thoſe they call Nominal Trinitarians; and for the other whom they call Real, they prove them guilty of manifeſt Hereſie; the one they call Sabellians, which they ſay is the ſame with Unitarians, and the other Polytheiſts or diſguiſed Pagans, and they borrow arguments from one ſide to prove the charge upon the other; and they confidently affirm that all that ſpeak out in this matter, muſt be driven either to Sabellianiſm, or Tritheiſm. If they are Nominal Trinitarians, they fall into the former, if Real into the latter.

Diſcourſe concerning the Real and Nominal Trinitarians, A. D. 1695, p. 3.

Letter to the Univerſities, p. 15.

This is the whole Deſign of this late Diſcourſe, which I ſhall here examine, that I may remove this ſtumbling Block, before I enter upon the main buſineſs.

1. As to thoſe who are called Nominal Trinitarians. Who are they? And from whence comes ſuch a Denomination? They tell us, That they are ſuch who believe three Perſons, who are Perſons in Name only; indeed and in truth they are but one ſubſiſting Perſon. But where are theſe to be found? Among all ſuch, ſay they, as agree that there is but one only and ſelf-ſame divine Eſſence and Subſtance. But do theſe aſſert, that there is but one ſubſiſting Perſon, and three only in Name? Let any one be produced who hath written in defence of the Trinity; for thoſe who have been moſt charged, have utterly deny'd it. That learned Perſon, who is more particularly reflected upon in this Charge, is by them ſaid to affirm, That God is one divine intellectual Subſtance, or really ſubſiſting Perſon, and diſtinguiſhed and diverſified by three relative Modes, or relative Subſiſtences. And Mr. Hooker is produced to the ſame purpoſe, That there is but one Subſtance in God, and three diſtinct relative Properties, which Subſtance being taken with its peculiar Property, makes the diſtinction of Perſons in the Godhead. But ſay they, Theſe Modes and Properties do not make any real ſubſiſting Perſons; but only in a Grammatical and Critical Senſe, and at moſt this is no more than one Man may be ſaid to be three Perſons on the account of different Relations, as Solomon was Son of David, Father of Rehoboam, and proceeding from David and Bathſheba, and yet was but one ſubſiſting Perſon. This is the force of what they ſay. But then in a triumphing manner they add, That the Realiſts have ſo manifeſt an advantage againſt them, that they have no way to defend themſelves but by Recrimination, i. e. by ſhewing the like Abſurdity in their Doctrine. And thus they hope either ſide will baffle the other, and in the mean time, the Cauſe be loſt between them.

But in ſo nice a matter as this, we muſt not rely too much on an Adverſary's Repreſentation; for the leaving out ſome expreſſions, may make an Opinion look with another Appearance, than if all were taken together, it would have. We muſt therefore take notice of other paſſages which may help to give the true Senſe of the learned Author, who is chiefly aimed at.

1. In the very ſame Page he aſſerts, That each of the divine Perſons has an abſolute Nature diſtinctly belonging to him, though not a diſtinct abſolute Nature; and to the ſame purpoſe in another place.

Tritheiſm charged, &c. p. 157.

Animadv. p. 245. Animadv. &c. p. 243. 2. That the eternal Father is and ſubſiſts as a Father, by having a Son, and communicating his Eſſence to another. And elſewhere, that the Relation between Father and Son is founded on that eternal Act, by which the Father communicates his divine Nature to the Son.

Ib. p. 240. 3. That the foundation of the Doctrine of the Trinity is this, 1. That there can be but one God. 2. That there is nothing in God, but what is God. 3. That there can be no compoſition in the Deity with any ſuch poſitive real Being, diſtinct from the Deity it ſelf. But the Church finding in Scripture mention of three, to whom diſtinctly the Godhead does belong, expreſſed theſe three by the Name of Perſons, and ſtated their Perſonalities upon three diſtinct Modes of Subſiſtence, allotted to one and the ſame Godhead, and theſe alſo diſtinguiſhed from one another by three diſtinct Relations.

What do theſe Men mean, to charge one who goes upon theſe grounds with Sabellianiſm ? Doth he make the three Perſons to be mere Names, as St. Baſil in few Words expreſſes the true nature of Sabellianiſm, that it was ἓν πρᾶγμα πολυώνυμον, One thing with different Denominations ? Can the communicating the divine Eſſence by the Father to the Son, be called a Name, or a Mode, or a Reſpect only ? And theſe Men of wonderful Subtilty, have not learnt to diſtinguiſh between Perſons and Perſonalities.

Baſil. Ep. 64.

Where is the leaſt Intimation given, that he look'd on the divine Perſons as Modes and Reſpects only ? That is impoſſible, ſince he owns a Communication of the divine Eſſence, and that each of the divine Perſons hath the divine Nature belonging to him ; could it ever enter into any Man's head to think, that he that owns this ſhould own the other alſo ? But the Perſonality is a thing of another conſideration. For it is the reaſon of the diſtinction of Perſons in the ſame undivided Nature. That there is a diſtinction, the Scripture aſſures us ; and withall, that there is but one divine Eſſence. How can this diſtinction be ? Not by eſſential Attributes, for thoſe muſt be in the divine Eſſence, and in every Perſon alike, otherwiſe he hath not the entire divine Nature ; not by accidents, as Men are diſtinguiſhed from each other, for the divine Nature is not capable of theſe ; not by ſeparate or divided Subſtances, for that would be inconſiſtent with the perfect Unity of the Godhead ; ſince therefore there can be no other way of diſtinction, we muſt conſider how the Scripture directs us in this caſe ; and that acquaints us with the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, as having mutual Relation to each other ; and there is no Repugnancy therein to the Divine Nature, and therefore the diſtinction of the Perſons hath been fixed on that, as the moſt proper Foundation for it. And theſe are called different Modes of Subſiſtence, on which the diſtinct Perſonalities are founded, which can be no other than relative. But a Perſon is that which reſults from the divine Nature and Subſiſtence together ; and although a Perſon cannot be ſaid to be a relative, conſider'd as ſuch, yet being joyned with the manner of Subſiſtence, it doth imply a Relation, and ſo a Perſon may be ſaid to be a relative Being.

Conſiderat. on the Explication, p. 23. But ſay they, If the three Perſons have all the ſame individual Subſtance, then they are truly and properly only three Modes ; and therefore although among Men, Perſonalities are diſtinct from the Perſons, becauſe the Perſons are diſtinct intelligent Subſtances, yet this cannot hold where there is but one individual Subſtance.

The Queſtion is, Whether thoſe they call Nominal Trinitarians, are liable to the charge of Sabellianiſm ; the anſwer is, That they cannot, becauſe they aſſert far more than three Names, viz, That each Perſon hath the divine Nature diſtinctly belonging to him. But ſay they, Theſe Perſons are but mere Modes. No, ſay the other ; We do not ſay that the Perſon is only a Modus, but that it is the divine Nature, or Godhead ſubſiſting under ſuch a

Modus, ſo that the Godhead is ſtill included in it, joyned to it, and diſtinguiſhed by it. Grant all this, the Unitarians reply, yet where there is the ſame individual Subſtance, the Perſon can be only a Modus. To which it is anſwer'd, That this individual Subſtance hath three diſtinct ways of ſubſiſting, according to which it ſubſiſts diſtinctly and differently in each of the three divine Perſons. So that here lies the main point, whether it be Sabellianiſm, to aſſert the ſame individual Subſtance under three ſuch different Modes of Subſiſtence. If it be, the moſt learned and judicious of the Fathers did not know what Sabellianiſm meant (as I have ſhewed at large in the following Diſcourſe) for they utterly diſowned Sabellianiſm, and yet aſſerted, That the ſeveral Hypoſtaſes conſiſted of peculiar Properties in one and the ſame divine Subſtance. But it is not the Authority of Fathers which they regard, for they ſerve them only as Stones in the Boys way when they quarrel, viz. to throw them at our Heads.

Tritheiſm charged, p. 306.

Chap. VII.

Let us then examine this matter by reaſon without them. Perſons among Men, ſay they, are diſtinguiſhed from Perſonalities, becauſe they have diſtinct Subſtances, therefore where there is but one Subſtance, the Perſon can be only a Mode, and therefore the ſame with the Perſonality.

I anſwer, that the true original Notion of Perſonality is no more than a different Mode of ſubſiſtence in the ſame common Nature. For every ſuch Nature is in it ſelf one and indiviſible ; and the more perfect it is, the greater muſt its Unity be. For the firſt Being is the moſt One ; and all Diviſion comes from Diſtance, and Imperfection. The firſt foundation of Diſtinction is Diverſity ; for if there were no Diverſity, there would be nothing but entire and perfect Unity. All Diverſity comes from two things, Diſſimilitude and Dependance. Thoſe Philoſophers (called Megarici) did not think much amiſs, who ſaid, That if all things were alike, there would be but one Subſtance or being in the World ; and what we now call different Subſtances, would be only different Modes of Subſiſtence in the ſame individual Nature. The difference of Subſtances in created Beings, ariſes from theſe two things, 1. A Diſſimilitude of Accidents, both internal and external. 2. The Will and Power of God, whereby he gives them diſtinct and ſeparate Beings in the ſame common Nature. As for inſtance, the Nature and Eſſence of a Man conſider'd in it ſelf, is but one and indiviſible ; but God gives a ſeparate Exiſtence to every Individual, whereby that common Nature ſubſiſts in ſo many diſtinct Subſtances, as there are Individuals of that kind ; and every one of theſe Subſtances is diſtinguiſhed from all others, not only by a ſeparate internal vital Principle and peculiar Properties, but by ſuch external Accidents, as do very eaſily diſcriminate them from each other. And the ſubject of all theſe Accidents is that peculiar Subſtance, which God hath given to every Individual, which in rational Beings is called a Perſon ; and ſo we grant that in all ſuch created Beings, the Perſonality doth ſuppoſe a diſtinct Subſtance ; not from the Nature of Perſonality, but from the Condition of the Subject wherein it is. The Perſonality in it ſelf is but a different Mode of Subſiſtence in the ſame common Nature, which is but One ; but this Perſonality being in ſuch a ſubject as Man is, it from thence follows, that each Perſon hath a peculiar Subſtance of his own ; and not from the Nature of Perſonality. But when we come to conſider a divine Eſſence, which is moſt perfectly one, and is wholly uncapable of any ſeparate Exiſtence or Accidents, there can be no other way of diſtinction conceived in it, but by different Modes of Subſiſtence, or relative Properties in the ſame divine Eſſence. And herein we proceed, as we do in our other Conceptions of the divine Nature, i. e. we take away all Imperfection from God, and attribute only that to him, which is agreeable to his divine Perfections, although the manner of it may be above our comprehenſion. And if this be owning the Trinity of the Mob, I am not aſhamed to own myſelf to be one of them ; but it is not out of Lazyneſs or affected Ignorance, but upon the greateſt and moſt ſerious conſideration.

They

Letter to the Univerſity, p. 15.

They may call this a Trinity of Cyphers, if they pleaſe, but I think more modeſt and decent Language about theſe matters would become them as well as the things themſelves much better. And they muſt prove a little better than they have done, that different Modes of Subſiſtence in the divine Nature, or the relations of Father and Son are mere Cyphers, which is ſo often mentioned in Scripture, as a matter of very great conſequence; and that when we are baptized in the Name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, we are baptized into a Trinity of Cyphers.

Diſcourſe of Nominal and real Trinitarians. p. 10. Tritheiſm charged, &c. p. 157.

But our Unitarians proceed, and ſay, that the ſame Author affirms not only the Perſonalities, but the Perſons to be merely Relative. For he ſaith, That every Perſon, as well as every Perſonality in the Trinity, is wholly Relative. But it is plain he ſpeaks there, not of the Perſon in himſelf, but with reſpect to the manner of Subſiſtence, or the relative Properties belonging to them. But if the Notion of a Perſon doth beſides the relative Property, neceſſarily ſuppoſe the divine Nature together with it; how can a Perſon then be imagined to be wholly Relative? But they urge, That which makes the firſt Perſon in the Trinity to be a Perſon, makes him to be a Father, and what makes him to be a Father, makes him to be a Perſon. And what follows from hence, but that the relative Property is the Foundation of the Perſonality? But by no means, that the Perſon of the Father is nothing but the relative Property? The inſtance of Solomon is not at all to the Purpoſe, unleſs we aſſerted three Perſons founded upon thoſe different Relations in his individual Nature. Who denies, that one Perſon may have different Reſpects, and yet be but one Perſon ſubſiſting? Where doth the Scripture ſay, That the Son of David, the Father of Rehoboam, and he that proceeded from David and Bathſheba were three Perſons diſtinguiſhed by thoſe relative Properties? But here lies the foundation of what we believe as to the Trinity; we are aſſured from Scripture, that there are three to whom the divine Nature and Attributes are given, and we are aſſured both from Scripture and Reaſon, that there can be but one divine Eſſence; and therefore every one of theſe muſt have the divine Nature, and yet that can be but One. But it is a moſt unreaſonable thing to charge thoſe with Sabellianiſm, who aſſert, That every Perſon hath the divine Nature diſtinctly belonging to him, and that the divine Eſſence is communicated from the Father to the Son. Did ever Noetus or Sabellius, or any of their Followers ſpeak after this manner? Is the divine Eſſence but a mere Name, or a different reſpect only to Mankind? For the aſſerting ſuch relative Perſons as have no Eſſence at all, was the true Sabellian Doctrine, as will be made appear in the following Diſcourſe. And ſo much is confeſs'd by our Unitarians themſelves, for they ſay, That the Sabellians held, that Father, Son and Spirit are but only three Names of God given to him in Scripture, by occaſion of ſo many ſeveral Diſpenſations towards the Creature, and ſo he is but one ſubſiſting Perſon and three relative Perſons; as he ſuſtains the three Names of Father, Son and Spirit, which being the Relations of God towards things without him, he is ſo many relative Perſons, or Perſons in a Claſſical Critical Senſe, i. e. Perſons without any Eſſence belonging to them as ſuch. But thoſe who aſſert a Communication of the divine Eſſence to each Perſon can never be guilty of Sabellianiſm, if this be it, which themſelves affirm. And ſo thoſe called Nominal Trinitarians, are very unjuſtly ſo called, becauſe they do really hold a Trinity of Perſons in the Unity of the Godhead.

Diſcourſe of Nom. &c. p. 19.

2. Let us now ſee what charge they lay upon thoſe whom they call Real Trinitarians; and they tell us, That the Nominals will ſeem to be profound Philoſophers, deep Sages in compariſon with them. Theſe are very obliging expreſſions to them in the beginning. But how do they make out this groſs Stupidity of theirs? In ſhort it is, That they ſtand condemned and anathematized as Hereticks by a general Council, and by all the Moderns, and are every day challenged and impeached of Tritheiſm, and cannot agree among themſelves, but charge one another with great Abſurdities; and in plain terms they charge them with Nonſenſe in the thing, whereas the other lay only in Words. Becauſe theſe aſſert three divine ſubſiſting Perſons, three infinite Spirits, Minds or Subſtances, as diſtinct as ſo many Angels or Men, each of them perfectly God, and yet all of them are but one God. To underſtand this matter rightly, we muſt conſider, that when the Socinian Pamphlets firſt came abroad, ſome Years ſince, a learned and worthy Perſon of our Church, who had appear'd with great vigour and reaſon againſt our Adverſaries of the Church of Rome in the late Reign (which ought not to be forgotten) undertook to defend the Doctrine of the Trinity againſt the Hiſtory of the Unitarians, and the Notes on the Athanaſian Creed; but in the warmth of diſputing, and out of a deſire to make this matter more intelligible, he ſuffer'd himſelf to be carried beyond the ancient Methods which the Church hath uſed to expreſs her Senſe by, ſtill retaining the ſame fundamental Article of three Perſons in one undivided Eſſence, but explaining it in ſuch a manner, as to make each Perſon to have a peculiar and proper Subſtance of his own.

p. 32.

This gave ſo great an advantage to the Author of thoſe Treatiſes, that in a little time he ſet forth his Notes with an Appendix in anſwrr to this new Explication. Wherein he charges him with Hereſie, Tritheiſm and Contradiction. The very ſame charges which have been ſince improved and carried on by others; I wiſh I could ſay, without any unbecoming Heat or Reflections.

Conſiderat. on the Explication of the Trinity, p. 12.

But I ſhall now examine how far theſe charges have any ground, ſo as to affect the Doctrine of the Trinity, which is the chief end our Adverſaries aimed at, in heaping theſe Reproaches upon one who appeared ſo early, and with ſo much zeal to defend it. We are therefore to conſider theſe things:

1. That a Man may be very right in the Belief of the Article it ſelf; and yet may be miſtaken in his Explication of it. And this one of his keeneſt Adverſaries freely acknowledges. For he plainly diſtinguiſhes between the fundamental Article and the manner of explaining it, and affirms, That a Man may quit his Explication without parting with the Article it ſelf. And ſo he may retain the Article with his Explication.

Tritheiſm charged, &c. p. 309.

But ſuppoſe a Man to aſſent to the fundamental Article it ſelf, and be miſtaken in his Explication of it, can he be charged with Hereſie about this Article? For Hereſie muſt relate to the fundamental Article to which he declares his hearty and unfeigned Aſſent; but here we ſuppoſe the miſtake to lie only in the Explication. As for inſtance, Sabellianiſm is a condemned and exploded Hereſie, for it is contrary to the very Doctrine of the Trinity; but ſuppoſe one who aſſerts the Doctrine of three Perſons, ſhould make them to be three Modes, muſt ſuch a one preſently be charged with Hereſie, before we ſee whether his Explication be conſiſtent with the fundamental Article or not? For this is liable to very obvious Objections, that the Father begets a Mode inſtead of a Son, that we pray to three Modes inſtead of three real Perſons, that Modes are mutable things in their own Nature, &c. but muſt we from hence conclude ſuch a one guilty of Hereſie, when he declares, that he withall ſuppoſed them not to be mere Modes, but that the divine Eſſence is to be taken together with the Mode to make a Perſon? Yea, ſuppoſe ſome ſpiteful Adverſary ſhould ſay, That it is a Contradiction to ſay, That the ſame common Nature can make a Perſon with a Mode ſuperadded to it, unleſs that be individuated, for a Perſon doth imply an individual Nature, and not a mere relative Mode. Is this ſufficient to charge ſuch a Perſon with the Sabellian Hereſie, which he utterly diſowns? Is not the like Equity to be ſhew'd in another though different Explication? Suppoſe then a Perſon ſolemnly profeſſes to own the fundamental Doctrine of the Trinity as much as any others; but he thinks, that three Perſons muſt have diſtinct Subſtances to make them Perſons, but ſo as to make no Diviſion or Separation in the Godhead, and that he cannot conceive

a Communication of the divine Eſſence without this; muſt this preſently be run down as Hereſie, when he aſſerts at the ſame time three Perſons in the ſame undivided Eſſence? But this is ſaid to be a Contradiction; ſo it was in the other caſe and not allow'd then, and why ſhould it be otherwiſe in this? I ſpeak not this to juſtifie ſuch Explications, but to ſhew that there is a difference between the Hereſie of denying an Article, and a miſtake in the Explication of it. Even the greateſt Hereſie-makers in the World, diſtinguiſh between Hereſies and erroneous Explications of Articles of Faith, as any one may find that looks into them. And even the Inquiſitors of Hereſie themſelves allow the diſtinction between Hereſie and an erroneous Propoſition in Faith, which amounts to the ſame with a miſtaken Explication of it; and they all grant that there may be Propoſitions that tend to Hereſie or ſavour of it, which cannot be condemned for Heretical. And even Pegna condemns Melchior Canus for being too cruel in aſſerting it to be Hereſie, to contradict the general Senſe of Divines, becauſe the Schools cannot make Hereſies.

Direct. Inquiſit. part II. quæſt. 2. p. 226.

2. It is frequently and ſolemnly affirmed by him, That the Unity of the Godhead is the moſt real, eſſential, indiviſible, inſeparable Unity; that there is but one divine Nature, which is originally in the Father, and is ſubſtantially communicated by the Father to the Son, as a diſtinct ſubſiſting Perſon, by an eternal ineffable Generation, and to the Holy Ghoſt by an eternal and ſubſtantial Proceſſion from Father and Son. Do the others who maintain a Trinity deny this? By no means. For we have already ſeen that they aſſert the ſame thing. So that they are fully agreed as to the main fundamental Article. And even the Unitarians yield, that from the beginning he aſſerted, That the three divine Perſons are in one undivided Subſtance. Wherein then lies the foundation of this mighty Quarrel, and thoſe unreaſonable Heats that Men have fallen into about it; to the great ſcandal of our Church and Religion? In ſhort it is this; that the ſame Author aſſerts, (1.) That it is groſs Sabellianiſm to ſay, That there are not three perſonal Minds, or Spirits, or Subſtances. (2.) That a diſtinct ſubſtantial Perſon muſt have a diſtinct ſubſtance of his own, proper and peculiar to his own Perſon. But he owns, that although there are three diſtinct Perſons, or Minds, each of whom is diſtinctly and by him ſelf God, yet there are not three Gods, but one God, or one Divinity; which he ſaith, is intirely, and indiviſibly, and inſeparably in three diſtinct Perſons or Minds. That the ſame one divine Nature is wholly and intirely communicated by the eternal Father to the eternal Son, and by the Father and Son to the eternal Spirit without any Diviſion or Separation; and ſo it remains one ſtill.

This is the ſubſtance of this new Explication, which hath raiſed ſuch Flames, that Injunctions from Authority were thought neceſſary to ſuppreſs them? But thoſe can reach no farther than the reſtraint of Mens Tongues and Pens about theſe matters, and unleſs ſomething be found out to ſatisfie their Minds, and to remove Miſapprehenſions, the preſent Heat may be only cover'd over and kept in; which when there is a vent given, may break out into a more dangerous Flame.

Therefore I ſhall endeavour to ſtate and clear this matter ſo as to prevent any future Eruption thereof, which will be done by conſidering how far they are agreed, and how far the remaining difference ought to be purſued.

1. They are agreed, That there are three diſtinct Perſons and but one Godhead.

2. That there are no ſeparate and divided Subſtances in the Trinity; but the divine Nature is wholly and entirely one and undivided.

3. That the divine Eſſence is communicated from the Father to the Son, and from both to the holy Spirit. So that the charge of Sabellianiſm on thoſe who reject this new Explication is without ground. For no Sabellian did or could aſſert a Communication of the divine Eſſence.

Which being agreed on both ſides, the Diſpute turns upon this ſingle point, whether a communicated Eſſence, doth imply a diſtinct Subſtance or not. On the one ſide it is ſaid, That there being but one God, there can be but one divine Eſſence, and if more Eſſences more Gods.

On the other ſide, that ſince they own a communicated Eſſence neceſſary to make a diſtinction of Perſons in the Son and Holy Ghoſt, if the Eſſence be not diſtinct, the foundation of diſtinct Perſonalities is taken away. But how is this clear'd by the other Party? They ſay, That it is one peculiar Prerogative of the divine Nature and Subſtance, founded in its infinite and therefore tranſcendent Perfection, whereby it is capable of reſiding in more Perſons than one, and is accordingly communicated from the Father to the Son and Holy Ghoſt.

Remarks p. 34.

So that the Communication of the divine Nature is owned to the Perſons of the Son and Holy Ghoſt. But how then comes it not to make a diſtinct Eſſence, as it makes diſtinct Perſons, by being communicated?

The anſwer we ſee is, That it is a peculiar Prerogative founded on the infinite and therefore tranſcendent Perfection of the divine Nature. But they farther add, That when the Son and Holy Ghoſt are ſaid to have the ſame divine Nature from the Father, as the Origin and Fountain of the Divinity; not by the Production of a new divine Nature, but by a Communication of his own, which is one and the ſame in all three without Separation, Difference, or Diſtinction; that this is indeed a great Myſtery, which hath been always look'd upon by the greateſt and wiſeſt Men in the Church, to be above all Expreſſions and Deſcription.

p. 35.

So that the greateſt difficulty is at laſt reſolved into the incomprehenſible Perfection of the divine Nature; and that neither Man nor Angels can give a ſatisfactory anſwer to Enquiries about the manner of them. And the Author of the Animadverſions ſaith, That in the divine Perſons of the Trinity, the divine Nature and the perſonal Subſiſtence coaleſce into one, by an incomprehenſible, ineffable kind of Union and Conjunction.

Ibid.

Animadv. p. 36.

But do thoſe on the other ſide think, that the aſſerting three diſtinct Subſtances in one and the ſame individual Subſtance tends to clear and explain the Notion of the Trinity and make it more eaſie and intelligible? The Divinity, they ſay, is whole, intire, indiviſible, and inſeparable in all three. But can one whole intire indiviſible Subſtance be actually divided into three Subſtances? For if every Perſon muſt have a peculiar Subſtance of his own; and there be three Perſons, there muſt be three peculiar Subſtances, and how can there be three peculiar Subſtances, and yet but one entire and indiviſible Subſtance? I do not ſay, there muſt be three divided Subſtances in place, or ſeparate Subſtances, but they muſt be divided as three Individuals of the ſame kind, which muſt introduce a Specifick Divine Nature, which I think very inconſiſtent with the divine Perfections; but of this at large in the following Diſcourſe.

Modeſt examin p. 30.

I do not lay any force upon this argument, that there can be no ground of the Diſtinction between the three Subſtances, if there be but one Subſtance in the Godhead, (as ſome have done) becauſe the ſame Subſtance cannot both unite and diſtinguiſh them; for the ground of the diſtinction is not the Subſtance but the Communication of it, and where that is ſo freely aſſerted, there is a reaſon diſtinct from the Subſtance it ſelf, which makes the Diſtinction of Perſons.

But the difficulty ſtill remains, how each Perſon ſhould have a Subſtance of his own; and yet there be but one entire and indiviſible Subſtance, for every Perſon muſt have a proper Subſtance of his own; or elſe according to this Hypotheſis, he can be no Perſon; and this peculiar Subſtance muſt be really diſtinct from that

Subſtance which is in the other two: ſo that here muſt be three diſtinct Subſtances in the three Perſons. But how then can there be but one individual Eſſence in all three? We may conceive one common Eſſence to be individuated in three Perſons, as it is in Men; but it is impoſſible to conceive the ſame individual Eſſence to be in three Perſons, which have peculiar Subſtances of their own. For the Subſtances belonging to the Perſons, are the ſame Eſſence individuated in thoſe Perſons: and ſo there is no avoiding making three individual Eſſences and one ſpecifick or common divine Nature. And Maimonides his Argument is conſiderable againſt more Gods than one; If, ſaith he, there be two Gods, there muſt be ſomething wherein they agree, and ſomething wherein they differ; that wherein they agree muſt be that which makes each of them God; and that wherein they differ muſt make them two Gods. Now wherein doth this differ from the preſent Hypotheſis? There is ſomething wherein they differ, and that is their proper Subſtance; but Maimonides thought that wherein they differ'd ſufficient to make them two Gods. So that I fear it will be impoſſible to clear this Hypotheſis as to the reconciling three individual Eſſences with one individual divine Eſſence, which looks too like aſſerting that there are three Gods and yet but one. And the Author of this Explication doth at laſt confeſs, that three diſtinct whole inſeparable Sames, are hard to conceive as to the manner of it. Now to what purpoſe are new Explications ſtarted, and Diſputes raiſed and carried on ſo warmly about them, if after all, the main difficulty be confeſs'd to be above our Comprehenſion? We had much better ſatisfie our ſelves with that Language which the Church hath receiv'd and is expreſs'd in the Creeds, than go about by new Terms, to raiſe new Ferments, eſpecially at a time when our united Forces are moſt neceſſary againſt our common Adverſaries. No wiſe and good Men can be fond of any new Inventions, when the Peace of the Church is hazarded by them. And on the other ſide, it is as dangerous to make new Hereſies as new Explications. If any one denies the Doctrine contained in the Nicene Creed, that is no new Hereſie; but how can ſuch deny the Son to be conſubſtantial to the Father, who aſſert one and the ſame indiviſible Subſtance in the Father, and the Son? But they may contradict themſelves. That is not impoſſible on either ſide. But doth it follow that they are guilty of Hereſie? Are not three Subſtances and but one a Contradiction? No more, ſay they, than that a communicated Subſtance is not diſtinct from that which did communicate. But this whole diſpute we find is at laſt reſolved into the infinite and unconceivable Perfections of the Godhead, where it is moſt ſafely lodged; and that there is no real Contradiction in the Doctrine it ſelf, is part of the deſign of the Diſcourſe afterwards.

More Nevoch, par. II. c. 1.

Modeſt examin. p. 30.

But here it will be neceſſary to take notice of what the Unitarians have objected againſt this new Explication, viz. That it was condemned by the Ancients in the Perſon of Philoponus; in the middle Ages, in the Perſon and Writings of Abbot Joachim; but more ſeverely ſince the Reformation, in the Perſon of Valentinus Gentilis, who was condemned at Geneva, and beheaded at Bern for this very Doctrine.

Conſiderat. on the Explication of the Trinity, &c. p. 12.

To theſe I ſhall give a diſtinct anſwer:

1. As to Joh. Philoponus, I do freely own, that in the Greek Church, when in the ſixth Century he broached his Opinion, That every Hypoſtaſis muſt have the common Nature individuated in it, this was look'd upon as a Doctrine of dangerous conſequence, both with reſpect to the Trinity and Incarnation. The latter was the firſt occaſion of it; for as Leontius obſerves, the diſpute did not begin about the Trinity, but about the Incarnation; and Philoponus took part with thoſe who aſſerted but one Nature in Chriſt after the Union, and he went upon this ground, That if there were two Natures there muſt be two Hypoſtaſes, becauſe Nature and Hypoſtaſis were the ſame. Then thoſe on the Churches ſide, ſaith Leontius, objected, That if they were the ſame, there muſt be three diſtinct Na-

Leont. de Sectis Act. 5.

Natures in the Trinity, as there were three Hypoſtaſes; which Philoponus yielded, and grounded himſelf on Ariſtotle*'s Doctrine, that there was but one common Subſtance and ſeveral individual Subſtances, and ſo held it was in the* Trinity, whence he was called the leader of the Hereſie of the Tritheiſts. This is the account given by Leontius who lived very near his time, A. D. 620. The ſame is affirmed of him by Nicephorus, and that he wrote a Book on purpoſe about the Union of two Natures in Chriſt, out of which he produces his own Words concerning a common and individual Nature, (which he calls μερικωτάτην ὕπαρξιν*) which can agree to none elſe. And the main argument he went upon was this, that unleſs we aſſert a ſingular Nature in the* Hypoſtaſes, we muſt ſay, that the whole Trinity was incarnate; as unleſs there be a ſingular humane Nature diſtinct from the common, Chriſt muſt aſſume the whole Nature of Mankind. And this argument from the Incarnation, was that which made Roſcelin, in the beginning of the diſputing Age, A. D. 1093, to aſſert, That the three Perſons were three things diſtinct from each other, as three Angels or three Men, becauſe otherwiſe the Incarnation of the ſecond Perſon could not be underſtood, as appears by Anſelm*'s Epiſtles, and his* Book of the Incarnation written upon that occaſion. But as Anſelm ſhews at large, if this argument hold, it muſt prove the three Perſons not only to be diſtinct, but ſeparate and divided Subſtances, (which is directly contrary to this new Explication) and then there is no avoiding Tritheiſm. But to return to Joh. Philoponus, who, ſaith Nicephorus, divided the indiviſible Nature of God into three Individuals as among Men: Which, ſaith he, is repugnant to the Senſe of the Chriſtian Church; and he produces the Teſtimony of Gregory Nazianzen againſt it, and adds, that Leontius and Georgius Piſides confuted Philoponus.

C. 48.

But in that divided time, there were ſome called Theodoſiani, who made but one Nature and one Hypoſtaſis; and ſo fell in with the Sabellians; but others held, That there was one immutable divine Eſſence, but each Perſon had a diſtinct individual Nature; which the reſt charged with Tritheiſm. Which conſequence they utterly rejected, becauſe although they held three diſtinct Natures, yet they ſaid, They were but one God, becauſe there was but one invariable Divinity in them. Nicephorus ſaith, that Conon's Followers rejected Philoponus; but Photius mentions a conference between Conon and others, about Philoponus, wherein he defends him againſt other Severians. Photius grants, that Conon and his Followers held a conſubſtantial Trinity and the Unity of the Godhead, and ſo far they were Orthodox; but ſaith, They were far from it, when they aſſerted proper and peculiar Subſtances to each Perſon. The difference between Conon and Philoponus about this point, (for Conon wrote againſt Philoponus about the Reſurrection) ſeems to have been partly in the Doctrine, but chiefly in the conſequence of it; for theſe rejected all kind of Tritheiſm, which Philoponus ſaw well enough muſt follow from his Doctrine, but he denied any real Diviſion or Separation in thoſe Subſtances as to the Deity. Iſidore ſaith, That the Tritheiſts owned three Gods, as well as three Perſons; and that if God be ſaid to be Triple, there muſt follow a Plurality of Gods. But there were others called Triformiani, of whom St. Auguſtin ſpeaks, Who held the three Perſons to be three diſtinct parts, which being united made one God; which, ſaith he, is repugnant to the divine Perfection.

But among theſe Severians, there were three ſeveral Opinions:

1. Of Philoponus, who held one common Nature and three Individual.
2. Of thoſe who ſaid there was but one Nature and one Hypoſtaſis.
3. Of thoſe who affirm'd there were three diſtinct Natures, but withal, that there was but one indiviſible Godhead; and theſe differ'd from Philoponus in the main ground of Tritheiſm, which was, that he held the common Nature in the Trinity, to be only a ſpecifick Nature, and ſuch as it is among Men. For Philoponus himſelf in the words which Nicephorus produces, doth aſſert plainly, that the common Nature is ſeparated from the Individuals, τῇ ψιλῇ ἐπινοίᾳ, by a meer act of the Mind; ſo that he allow'd no individual Unity in the divine Nature, but what was in the ſeveral Perſons; as the common Nature of Man is a Notion of the Mind, as it is abſtracted from the ſeveral Individuals, wherein alone it really ſubſiſts; ſo that here is an apparent difference between the Doctrine of Joh. Philoponus and the new Explication, for herein the moſt real, eſſential and indiviſible Unity of the divine Nature is aſſerted; and it is ſaid to be no Species, becauſe it is but one, and ſo it could not be condemned in Joh. Philoponus.

2. We now come to Abbat Joachim, whoſe Doctrine ſeems to be as much miſtaken, as it is repreſented in the Decretal, where the Condemnation of it by the Lateran Council is extant. But here I cannot but obſerve what great Authority theſe Unitarians give to this Lateran Council, as if they had a Mind to ſet up Tranſubſtantiation by it, which they ſo often parallel with the Trinity. Thence in their late Diſcourſe they ſpeak of it as the moſt general Council that was ever called, and that what was there defined, it was made Hereſie to oppoſe it. But by their favour, we neither own this to have been a general Council, nor that it had Authority to make that Hereſie which was not ſo before. But that Council might aſſert the Doctrine of the Trinity truly, as it had been receiv'd, and condemn the Opinion of Joachim juſtly. But what it was, they do not or would not ſeem to underſtand. Joachim was a great Enthuſiaſt, but no deep Divine (as Men of that Heat ſeldom are) and he had many Diſputes with Peter Lombard in his Life, as the Vindicator of Joachim confeſſes. After his Death, a Book of his was found, taxing Peter Lombard with ſome ſtrange Doctrine about the Trinity, wherein he called him Heretick and Madman; this Book was complained of in the Lateran Council, and upon Examination it was found, that inſtead of charging Peter Lombard juſtly, he was fallen into Hereſie himſelf, which was denying the eſſential Unity of the three Perſons, and making it to be Unity of Conſent. He granted that they were one Eſſence, one Nature, one Subſtance: But how? Not by any true proper Unity, but Similitudinary and Collective, as they called it, as many Men are one People, and many Believers make one Church. Whence Thomas Aquinas ſaith, that Joachim fell into the Arian Hereſie. It is ſufficient to my purpoſe, that he denied the individual Unity of the divine Eſſence, which cannot be charged on the Author of the new Explication, and ſo this comes not home to the purpoſe.

3. But the laſt charge is the moſt terrible, for it not only ſets down the Hereſie, but the capital puniſhment which follow'd it. Yet I ſhall make it appear, (notwithſtanding the very warm Proſecution of it by another hand) that there is a great difference between the Doctrine of Valentinus Gentilis, and that which is aſſerted in this Explication.

1. In the Sentence of his Condemnation it is expreſſed, That he had been guilty of the vileſt Scurrility and moſt horrid Blaſphemies againſt the Son of God, and the glorious Myſtery of the Trinity. But can any thing of this Nature be charged upon one, who hath not only written in Defence of it, but ſpeaks of it with the higheſt Veneration?

Brief Account of Valentin. Gentilis, p. 132.

2. In the ſame Sentence it is ſaid, That he acknowledged the Father only to be that infinite God which we ought to worſhip, which is plain Blaſphemy againſt the Son. But can any Man ever think to make this the ſame caſe with one, who makes uſe of that as one of his chief arguments, That the three Perſons are to be worſhiped with a diſtinct divine Worſhip.

Ibid.

Modeſt examin. p. 20.

3. It is charged upon him, That he called the Trinity a meer human Invention, not ſo much as known to any Catholick Creed, and directly contrary to the Word of God. But the Author here charged, hath made it his buſineſs to prove the Doctrine of the Trinity to be grounded on Scripture, and to vindicate it from the Objections drawn from thence againſt it.

Brief Account, &c. p. 40.

4. One of the main Articles of his charge was, That he made three Spirits of different Order and Degree, that the Father is the one only God, by which the Son and Holy Ghoſt are excluded manifeſtly from the Unity of the Godhead; But the Perſon charged with his Hereſie ſaith, The Reaſon why we muſt not ſay three Gods, is, becauſe there is but one and the ſame Divinity in them all; and that intirely, indiviſibly, inſeparably.

Brief Account, &c. p. 41, 42, 43, 45. Modeſt examin. p. 29.

But it is ſaid, that although there may be ſome differences, yet they agree in aſſerting, That there are three diſtinct eternal Spirits or Minds in the Trinity; and Genebrard is brought into the ſame Hereſie with them. But Genebrard with great indignation rejects the Doctrine of Valentinus Gentilis, becauſe he held an Inequality in the Perſons, and denied the individual Unity of the Godhead in them; but he ſaith, he follow'd Damaſcen in aſſerting three real Hypoſtaſes; and he utterly denies Tritheiſm, and he brings a multitude of reaſons, why the charge of Tritheiſm doth not lie againſt his Opinion, although he owns the Hypoſtaſes to be three diſtinct individuals, but then he adds, That there is an indiviſible and inſeparable Union of the divine Nature in all three Perſons.

Now to deal as impartially in this matter as may be, I do not think our underſtandings one jot helped in the Notion of the Trinity by this Hypotheſis; but that it is liable to as great difficulties as any other, and therefore none ought to be fond of it, or to ſet it againſt the general Senſe of others, and the current Expreſſions of Divines about theſe Myſteries; nor to call the different Opinons of others Hereſie or Nonſenſe, which are provoking Words, and tend very much to inflame Mens Paſſions, becauſe their Faith and Underſtanding are both call'd in queſtion, which are very tender things.

But on the other ſide, a difference ought to be made between the Hereſie and Blaſphemy of Valentinus Gentilis, and the Opinion of ſuch who maintain the individual and indiviſible Unity of the Godhead; but withal, believe that every Perſon hath an individual Subſtance as a Perſon, and that Sabellianiſm cannot be avoided otherwiſe. Wherein I think they are miſtaken, and that the Fathers were of another Opinion; and that our Church owns but one Subſtance in the Godhead, as the Weſtern Church always did, (which made ſuch difficulty about receiving three Hypoſtaſes, becauſe they took Hypoſtaſis for a Subſtance) but yet I ſee no reaſon why thoſe who aſſert three Hypoſtaſes, and mean three individual Subſtances ſhould be charged with the Hereſie of Valentinus Gentilis, or or ſo much as, with that of Abbat Joachim or Philoponus, becauſe they all rejected the individual Unity of the divine Nature, which is conſtantly maintained by the Defenders of the other Hypotheſis.

But it is ſaid and urged with vehemency, that theſe two things are inconſiſtent with each other; that it is going forward and backward, being Orthodox in one Breath and otherwiſe in the next; that all this looks like ſhuffling and concealing the true meaning, and acting the old Artifices under a different Form. For the Samoſatenians and Arians, when they were pinched, ſeem'd very Orthodox in their Expreſſions, but retained their Hereſies ſtill in their Minds; and there is reaſon to ſuſpect the ſame Game is playing over again, and we cannot be too cautious in a matter of ſuch Conſequence.

I grant very great caution is needful, but the mixture of ſome Charity with it will do no hurt. Why ſhould we ſuſpect thoſe to be inwardly falſe, and to think otherwiſe than they ſpeak, who have ſhew'd no want of Courage and Zeal, at a time when ſome thought it Prudence to ſay nothing, and never call'd upon their Superiors than to own the cauſe of God, and to do their Duties as they have now done, and that in no very obliging manner? And if the ſame Men can be cool and unconcerned at ſome times, (when there was ſo great reaſon to be otherwiſe)

wiſe) and of a ſudden grow very warm, and even to boil over with Zeal; the World is ſo ill natur'd, as to be too apt to conclude there is ſome other cauſe of ſuch an alteration than what openly appears. But there is a kind of bitter Zeal, which is ſo fierce and violent, that it rather inflames than heals any Wounds that are made; and is of ſo malignant a Nature, that it ſpreads and eats like a Cancer, and if a ſtop were not given to it, it might endanger the whole Body. I am very ſenſible how little a Man conſults his own eaſe, who offers to interpoſe in a diſpute between Men of Heat and Animoſity; but this moves me very little, when the intereſt of our Church and Religion is concerned, which ought to prevail more than the fear of diſpleaſing one or other Party, or it may be both. I do heartily wiſh, that all who are equally concerned in the common Cauſe, would lay aſide Heats, and Prejudices, and hard Words, and conſider this matter impartially; and I do not queſtion, but they will ſee cauſe to judge, as I do, that the difference is not ſo great as our Adverſaries for their own advantage make it to be. And ſince both ſides yield, that the matter they diſpute about is above their reach, the wiſeſt courſe they can take is to aſſert and defend what is revealed, and not to be too peremptory and quarrelſome about that which is acknowledged to be above our comprehenſion; I mean as to the manner how the three Perſons partake of the divine Nature.

Oderat rixas & jurgia, præſertimque inter eruditos; ac turpe eſſe dicebat viros indubitatè doctos canina rabie famam viciſſim ſuam rodere ac lacerare ſcriptis trucibus, tanquam viliſſimos de plebe cerdones in Angiportis ſeſe luto ac ſtercore conſpurcantes. Nic. Rigalt. vit. P. Puteani, p. 48.

It would be of the moſt fatal Conſequence to us, if thoſe Weapons, which might be ſo uſefully imploy'd againſt our common Adverſaries, ſhould ſtill be turned upon one another. I know no manner of advantage they have againſt us, but from thence, and this is it which makes them write with ſuch Inſolence and Scorn towards thoſe who are far their Superiors in Learning and Wit, as well as in the Goodneſs of their Cauſe. And is it poſſible that ſome of our moſt skilful Fencers ſhould play Prizes before them, who plainly animate them againſt each other for their own Diverſion and Intereſt? Sometimes one hath the better, ſometimes the other, and one is cried up in Oppoſition to the other, but taken alone is uſed with the greateſt Contempt. One Man's Work is ſaid to be learned and accurate, and the more, becauſe it follows, that he concerns not himſelf with the Socinians. The wiſer Man no doubt, for that Reaſon. At another time it is called the Birth of the Mountains, and the Author parallel'd with no leſs a Man than Don Quixot, and his elaborate Writings with his Adventures, and they ridicule his Notion of Modes as if they were only ſo many Gambols and Poſtures. And then for his Adverſary, they hearten and incourage him all they can; they tell him, He muſt not allow to the other the leaſt Tittle of all he contends for, leaſt their ſport ſhould be ſpoiled; and to comfort him, they tell him, that his Adverſary is a Socinian at bottom, and doth not know it; that all his Thingums, Modes, Properties are only an Addition of Words and Names, and not of Perſons properly ſo called, and that his whole Scheme is nothing but Socinianiſm dreſt up in the abſurd Cant of the Schools. That his Book hath much more Scurrility than Argument, that his uſage of him was barbarous, and a greater Solœciſm in Manners, than any he accuſes him of in Grammar or Speech; and in ſhort, That his Explication of the Trinity is a great Piece of Nonſenſe, (though it comes ſo near to Socinianiſm.) But how doth the other Antagoniſt eſcape? What, nothing but good Words to him? In this place they had a mind to keep him in heart, and only charge him with a Hereſie which they laugh at; but in another place, they ſet him out with ſuch colours, as ſhew they intended only to play one upon the other. They charge him not only with Hereſie but Polytheiſm, Which, they ſay, is next to Atheiſm; that his Vindication is a ſupercilious, diſdainful and peeviſh Anſwer: that he had neither Humanity nor good Manners left; that there is nothing conſiderable in his Books but what he borrow'd from Them. Theſe are ſome of the Flowers which they beſtow on theſe Perſons of Reputation in Polemick Squabble as they call it, which plainly ſhew, that their aim is, as much as may be, to divide and then to expoſe us. And ſhall we ſtill go on to gratifie this inſulting Humour of theirs, by contending with one another, and afford them ſtill new matter for Books againſt both? As we may ſee in their late Diſcourſe about Nominal and Real Trinitarians, which was intended for a rare ſhew, wherein the two Parties are repreſented as combating with one another, and they ſtand by and triumph over theſe Cadmean Brethren, as they call them.

Neither are they the Socinians only, but thoſe who deſpiſe all Religion (who I doubt are the far greater number) are very much entertained with ſuch encounters between Men of Wit and Parts, becauſe they think, and they do not think amiſs, that Religion it ſelf will be the greateſt ſufferer by them at laſt: And this is the moſt dangerous, but I hope not the moſt prevailing Party of Men among us. The Socinians profeſs themſelves Chriſtians, and I hope are ſo, (eſpecially if but One Article of Faith be required to make Men ſo) but I cannot but obſerve that in the late Socinian Pamphlets, there is too ſtrong a biaſs towards Deiſm, (which conſideration alone ſhould make us unite and look more narrowly to their ſteps.) I do not charge their Writers with a profeſſed deſign to advance Deiſm among us; but their way of managing their Diſputes, is as if they had a mind to ſerve them. And ſuch Men who are Enemies to all revealed Religion, could not find out better Tools for their purpoſe than they are. For they know very well, that in ſuch a Nation as ours, which is really concerned for the Profeſſion of Religion one way or other, there is no opening profeſſed Schools of Atheiſm; but the deſign muſt be carried on under ſome ſhew of Religion. And nothing ſerves their turn ſo well, as ſetting up natural Religion in oppoſition to Revealed. For this is the way by degrees to looſen and unhinge the Faith of moſt Men, which with great reaſon is built on the Scripture as the ſureſt foundation.

But here it is fit to obſerve the ſeveral ſteps they take in order to this advancing Deiſm, and how our Unitarians have complied with all of them.

I. The firſt point they are to gain is, The leſſening the Authority of Scripture, and if this be once done, they know Mens Minds will be left ſo roving and uncertain, that they will ſoon fall into Scepticiſm and Infidelity.

II. The next is, to repreſent Church-men as Perſons of Intereſt and Deſign, who maintain Religion only becauſe it ſupports them; and this they call Prieſt-Craft, and if they can by this means take away their Authority too, the way lies ſtill more open for them; for it is more eaſie to make a Prey of the Flock, when the Shepherds are ſuſpected only to look after their Fleeces. Since ſuch a ſuſpicion takes away all Truſt and Confidence in their Guides; and they know very well, how little others will be able to defend themſelves.

III. Another ſtep is, to magnifie the Deiſts as Men of Probity and good Senſe; that aſſert the juſt Liberties of Mankind, againſt that terrible thing called Prieſt-Craft; and that would reſcue Religion from falſe Gloſſes and abſurd Notions taken up from the Schools and taught in the Univerſities, on purpoſe to keep under thoſe Principles of univerſal Liberty as to Opinions, which thoſe of freer Minds endeavour to promote. But eſpecially they are great Enemies to all Myſteries of Faith, as unreaſonable Impoſitions on thoſe of more refined Underſtandings, and of clear and diſtinct Preceptions, as they have learnt to expreſs themſelves. Theſe they account intolerable Uſurpations on Men of ſuch Elevations as themſelves; for Myſteries are only for the Mob, and not for Perſons of ſuch noble Capacities.

IV. The laſt thing is, to repreſent all Religions as indifferent, ſince they agree in the common Principles of natural Religion, eſpecially the Unity of God, and all the reſt is but according to the different Inventions of Men, the ſkill of the Contrivers, and the ſeveral Humors and Inclinations of Mankind.

Theſe are the chief Myſteries of Deiſm in our Age; for even Deiſm hath its Myſteries, and it is it ſelf a Myſtery of Iniquity, which I am afraid is too much working already among us, and will be more if no effectual ſtop be put to it.

I call it Deiſm, becauſe that Name obtains now, as more plauſible and modiſh; for Atheiſm is a rude unmannerly Word, and expoſes Men to the Rabble, and makes Perſons ſhun the company and avoid the Converſation and Dealing with ſuch who are noted for it. And this would be a mighty Prejudice to them, as to their Intereſts in this World, which they have reaſon to value.

But to be a Deiſt, ſeems to be only a ſetting up for having more Wit, than to be cheated by the Prieſts, and impoſed upon by the common Forms of Religion, which ſerve well enough for ordinary People that want Senſe, and are not skill'd in Demonſtrations; but the Deiſts are ſo wiſe as to ſee through all theſe things. And therefore this name gains a Reputation among all ſuch as hate Religion, but know not how otherwiſe to diſtinguiſh themſelves from profeſſed Atheiſts, which they would by no means be taken for; although if they be preſſed home, very few among them will ſincerely own any more than a Series of Cauſes, without any intellectual Perfections, which they call God. A ſtrange God without Wiſdom, Goodneſs, Juſtice or Providence!

But I am now to ſhew, how in all theſe points the preſent Unitarians have been very ſerviceable to them, in the Books, which they have lately publiſhed and diſperſed both in City and Countrey.

1. As to the Authority of Scripture: They have been already juſtly expoſed for undermining the Authority of St. John's Goſpel, by muſtring up all the Arguments of the old Hereticks againſt it, and giving no anſwers to them. And what defence have they ſince made for themſelves? No other but this very trifling one, that they repeat their Reaſons but do not affirm them. What is the meaning of this? If they are true, why do they not affirm them? If they are falſe, why do they not anſwer them? Is this done like thoſe who believe the Goſpel of St. John to be divine, to produce all the arguments they could meet with againſt it; and never offer to ſhew the Weakneſs and Unreaſonableneſs of them? Doth not this look like a deſign to furniſh the Deiſts with ſuch arguments as they could meet with againſt it? Eſpecially, when they ſay, That St. John doth not oppoſe them. Why then are theſe Arguments produced againſt his Goſpel? Men do not uſe to diſpute againſt their Friends, nor to tell the World what all People have ſaid againſt them, and give not a word of anſwer in vindication of them. But they ſay, The modern Unitarians allow of the Goſpel and other Pieces of St. John. A very great favour indeed, to allow of them. But how far? As of divine Authority? Not a word of that. But as ancient Books which they think it not fit for them to diſpute againſt. But if the ancient Ebionites were their Predeceſſors, as they affirm, they can allow none but the Goſpel according to the Hebrews; and muſt reject the reſt and all St. Paul's Epiſtles; and in truth, they make him argue ſo little to the purpoſe, that they muſt have a very mean Opinion of his Writings. But of theſe things in the Diſcourſe it ſelf.

Vindication of the Archbiſhop's Sermons. p. 5.
Anſwer to Dr. Bull, p. 47.

Hiſtory of the Unitarians, p. 10

As to Church-men, no profeſſed Deiſts could expreſs themſelves more ſpitefully than they have done, and that againſt thoſe to whom they profeſs the greateſt reſpect. What then would they ſay of the reſt? They ſay in general, That it is natural to Worldlings, to mercenary Spirits, to the timorous and ambitious; in a word, to all ſuch as prefer not God before all other, whether Perſons or Conſiderations to believe as they would have it.

Conſiderat. on the Explication by the Archbiſhop, &c. p. 13.

But although the Words be general, yet any one that looks into them may ſoon find that they were intended for ſuch Church-men who had written againſt their Opinions. And the Inſinuation is, that if it were not for worldly Intereſts, they would own them to be in the right. Whereas I am fully perſwaded, that they have no way to defend their Opinions, but to reject the Scriptures and declare themſelves Deiſts; and as long as we retain a juſt Veneration for the Scriptures, we can be of no other Opinion, becauſe we look on their Interpretations as unreaſonable, new, forced, and inconſiſtent with the circumſtances of Places, and the main Scope and Tenor of the New Teſtament. But their Introduction to the Anſwer to the late Archbiſhop's Sermons about the Trinity and Incarnation, ſhew their Temper ſufficiently as to all Church-men. He was the Perſon they profeſſed to eſteem and reverence above all others, and confeſs that he inſtructs them in the Air and Language of a Father, (which at leaſt deſerved a little more dutiful Language from them.) But ſome Mens fondneſs for their Opinions breaks all bounds of Civility and Decency; for preſently after, mentioning the Archbiſhop and other Biſhops who had written againſt them, they ſay it ſignifies nothing to the caſe. That they are great Penſioners of the World. For it is certain we have a mighty Propenſity to believe as is for our Turn and Intereſt. And ſoon after, that their Oppoſers are under the power of ſuch fatal Biaſſes, that their Doctrine is the more to be ſuſpected becauſe it is theirs. For the reaſon why they maintain the Doctrine of the Trinity is, becauſe they muſt. The plain meaning of all this is, that the late Archbiſhop (as well as the reſt) was a mere ſelf-intereſted Man, (which none who knew either the outſide or inſide of Lambeth could ever imagine) that if he were really againſt them (as none could think otherwiſe, who knew him ſo well and ſo long as I did) it only ſhew'd what a ſtrange Power, Intereſt hath in the Minds of all Church-Men.

Anſwer to the Arch-biſh. Serm. p. 43.

p. 44.

But what Biaſs was it, which made him write with that ſtrength and judgment againſt their Opinions? Let us ſet aſide all Titles of Reſpect and Honour as they deſire, let Reaſon be compared with Reaſon; and his Arguments with their Anſwers; and it will be ſoon found that the advantage which he had, was not from any other Dignity than that of a clearer Judgment, and a much ſtronger way of Reaſoning. Whereas their Anſwers are ſuch, as may well be ſuppoſed to come from thoſe, who had ſome ſuch Biaſs, that they muſt at leaſt ſeem to anſwer what in truth they could not. As hath been fully made appear in the Vindication of him, to which no reply hath been given, although other Treatiſes of theirs have come out ſince. In the Concluſion of that Anſwer they ſay, That they did not expect that their Anſwer ſhould ſatisfie us, and in truth they had a great deal of reaſon to think ſo. But what reaſon do they give for it? A very kind one no doubt; becauſe Prepoſſeſſion and Intereſt have taken hold of us. As though we were Men of ſuch mean and mercenary Spirits, as to believe according to Prepoſſeſſion without Reaſon, and to act only as ſerves our preſent Intereſt. But we never made mean Addreſſes to Infidels to ſhew how near our Principles came to theirs, nor made Parallels between the Trinity and Tranſubſtantiation, as ſome did, and defended them, as well as they could, when Popery was uppermoſt. But enough of this.

Anſwer to the Archbiſhop. p. 65.

3. We have ſeen how much they have gratified the Deiſts by repreſenting Churchmen in ſuch a manner, let us now ſee in what manner they treat the Deiſts. It is with another ſort of Language; and which argues a more than ordinary kindneſs to them, in one place they ſay, That the Deiſts are moſtly well-natured Men, and Men of Probity and Underſtanding; in effect that they are ſincere honeſt-hearted Men, who do good by the impulſe of their natural Religion, Honeſty and good Conſcience, which have great Influence upon them. What another ſort of Character is this from that of the greateſt, and in their Opinion the beſt of our Clergy? This muſt proceed from ſome Intimacy and Familiarity with them; and it is eaſie to imagine from hence, that they are upon very good Terms with one another, becauſe they muſt be Unitarians, if they believe a God at all.

Some thoughts upon Dr. Sh. Vindication. p. 21.

But where elſe are theſe honeſt conſcientious Deiſts to be found?

It is rare indeed for others to find any one that rejects Chriſtianity out of pure Conſcience, and that acts by Principles of ſincere Virtue. I never yet could meet with ſuch, nor hear of thoſe that have. And I would fain know the reaſons on which ſuch conſcientious Men proceeded; for truly the Principles of natural Religion are thoſe which recommend Chriſtianity to me; for without them the Myſteries of Faith would be far more unaccountable than now they are; and ſuppoſing them, I ſee no incongruity in them, i. e. That there is a juſt and holy God, and a wiſe Providence, and a future State of Rewards and Puniſhments; and that God deſigns to bring Mankind to happineſs out of a State of Miſery; let theſe be ſuppoſed, and the Scheme of Chriſtianity will appear very reaſonable and fitted to the Condition and Capacity of Mankind. And the ſublimeſt Myſteries of it are not intended to puzzle or amuſe Mankind, as weak Men imagine; but they are diſcover'd for the greateſt and beſt purpoſes in the World, to bring Men to the hatred of Sin and Love of God, and a patient continuance in well-doing, in order to a bleſſed Immortality. So that this is truly a Myſtery of Godlineſs, being intended for the advancement of real Piety and Goodneſs among Mankind, in order to make them happy. But as to theſe Unitarians, who have ſuch happy Acquaintance with theſe conſcientious Deiſts; I would fain learn from them, if they think them miſtaken, why they take no more pains to ſatisfie and convince them; for I find they decline ſaying a word againſt them. In one place they compare the Atheiſt and Deiſt together; and very honeſtly and like any conſcientious Deiſts, they impute all the Deiſm and moſt part of the Atheiſm of our Age to the Doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation.

Letter of Reſol. concerning the Trinity and Incar. p. 18.

Is it poſſible for Men that live in our Age to give ſuch an account as this of the Growth of Deiſm and Atheiſm among us? What number of Atheiſts is there, upon any other account than from a looſeneſs of Thinking and Living? Where are thoſe who believe God to be an incomprehenſible Being, and yet reject the Myſteries which relate to his Being, becauſe they are incomprehenſible? Suppoſe any reject ſpiritual Subſtance as Nonſenſe and Contradiction, as they do the Trinity on the ſame Pretences. Is this a ſufficient reaſon or not? They may tell them, as they do us that they can have no Ideas, no clear and diſtinct Perceptions of immaterial Subſtances? What anſwer do they give in this caſe? Not a Syllable; although they take notice of it. But I hope they give ſome better ſatisfaction to the Deiſt; No, for they ſay, This is not a place to argue againſt either Atheiſt or Deiſt. By no means: ſome would ſay, They were not ſuch Fools to fall out with their Friends. And it cannot be denied, that they have been the greateſt Incouragers of ſuch kind of Writings, which ſerve their turn ſo well; and in pure Gratitude they forbear to argue againſt them.

Letter of Reſol. p. 5.

IV. To ſhew how near they come to an Indifferency in Religion, they ſpeak favourably of Mahometans, and Jews, and even Tartars, becauſe they agree with them in the Unity of the Godhead. What an honeſt hearted Deiſt do they make that Impoſtor Mahomet? One would hardly think ſuch a Character could have come out of the Mouth of Chriſtians. But theſe are their Words, Mahomet is affirmed by divers Hiſtorians to have had no other deſign in pretending himſelf to be a Prophet, but to reſtore the Belief of the Unity of God, which at that time was extirpated among the Eaſtern Chriſtians by the Doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation. Who are thoſe Hiſtorians who give this Character of him? Why are they not named, that their Authority might be examin'd? Was the Morocco Ambaſſador one of them? Or Paulus Alciatus, who from an Unitarian turned Mahometan? But by the beſt accounts we can meet with, we find that he was a very cunning Impoſtor, and took in from the Jews and Iſhmaelites his Countrymen, Circumciſion; from the Chriſtians, an honourable mention of Chriſt, as a Prophet, and as the Word and Spirit of God, and owned his Miracles; from the ancient Hereticks he denyed his Suffering but owned his being taken up into Heaven. Yea, he owned, That he had his Goſpel from Heaven;

ven; but that his Diſciples changed it after his Death, and attributed more to Chriſt than he aſſumed to himſelf. Which ſhews that he had ſo much Sence, as to diſcern, that if the Books of the New Teſtament were genuine, more muſt be given to Chriſt, than either Mahomet or the Unitarians do allow. Let any indifferent Reader compare their Character of Mahomet with that of Athanaſius, which theſe Men give, and they will eaſily find that they take as much care to blacken one, as they do to vindicate the other. What Chriſtian Ingenuity is here? But Mahomet was a Deiſt, and Athanaſius a Trinitarian. But they go on.

Acts of Athanaſius, p. 5.

Whatſoever the deſign of Mahomet was, it's certain, that Mahometiſm hath prevailed over greater Numbers and more Nations, than at this day profeſs Chriſtianity. But how? Was it not by force of Arms, and the Prevalency of the Saracen and Turkiſh Empire? No, ſay theſe learned Hiſtorians, It was not by the Force of the Sword, but by that one Truth in the Alcoran, the Unity of God. It were endleſs to quote the Hiſtorians, who ſay, That it was Mahomet's Principle, to ſubdue all by force of Arms who oppoſed his Religion; but the Authority of Elmacinus alone is ſufficient; for in the beginning of his Hiſtory he owns that it was his Principle, To make War upon thoſe that would not ſubmit to his Law. And others ſay, that in remembrance of this, Their Law is expounded by their Doctors, with a Sword drawn by them, and that it is the Law of the Alcoran to kill and ſlay thoſe that oppoſe it. What liberty the Turkiſh Empire allows to Chriſtians in the conquer'd Provinces is not to this purpoſe, but by what means Mahometiſm prevailed in the World.

Ricard. contut. legis Saracen. c. 10.

But ſay they, The Jews as well as Mahometans are alienated from us, becauſe they ſuppoſe the Trinity to be the Doctrine of all Chriſtians. And what then? Muſt we renounce the Chriſtian Doctrine to pleaſe the Jews and Mahometans? Muſt we quit Chriſt's being the Meſſias, becauſe the Jews deny it? Or the ſuffering of Chriſt, becauſe the Mahometans think it inconſiſtent with his Honour?

But if this be the truth of the caſe, as to Jews and Mahometans; no Perſons are ſo well qualified to endeavour their Converſion, as our Unitarians; which would be a much better imployment for them, than to expoſe the Chriſtian Doctrine by ſuch Writings among us. I am aſhamed to mention what they ſay of the Tartars, when they call them, The Shield and Sword of that way of acknowledging and worſhiping God. So that Mahometans, Jews and Tartars, are fairly repreſented becauſe they agree in the grand Fundamental of the Unity of the Godhead; but the Chriſtian Church is charged with believing Impoſſibilities, Contradictions, and pure Nonſenſe.

Letter of Reſol. p. 19.

And thus we find our Unitarians ſerving the Deiſts in all their methods of overthrowing Revealed Religion and advancing Deiſm among us. And if this will not awaken us to look more after them, and unite us in the defence of our Common Cauſe againſt them, I do not think that other Methods will do it. For it is become a reſtleſs and active, although as yet, but a ſmall Body of Men, and they tell the World plainly enough, that they are free from the Biaſſes of Hopes and Fears; and ſit looſe from the Awes and Bribes of the World. So that there is no way of dealing with them, but by ſhewing the falſeneſs and weakneſs of the grounds they go upon; and that they have no advantage of us as to Scripture, Antiquity or Reaſon; which is the Deſign of this Undertaking.

In Vindication of the Doctrine of the TRINITY.

WITH

An Anſwer to the late SOCINIAN Objections.

CHAP. I.

The Occaſion and Deſign of this Diſcourſe.

IT is now above twenty years ſince I firſt publiſhed a Diſcourſe about the reaſons of the Sufferings of Chriſt, (lately reprinted) in anſwer to ſome Socinian Objections at that time. But I know not how it came to paſs, that the Socinian Controverſie ſeemed to be laid aſleep among us for many years after ; and ſo it had continued to this day, if ſome Mens buſie and indiſcreet Zeal for their own particular Opinions (or other Hereſies) had not been more prevalent over them, than their Care and Concernment for the common Intereſt of Chriſtianity among us. For it is that which really ſuffers by theſe unhappy and very unſeaſonable Diſputes about the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith, which could never have been ſtarted and carried on with more fatal conſequence to all revealed Religion, than in an Age too much inclined to Scepticiſm and Infidelity. For all who are but well-wiſhers to that, do greedily catch at any thing which tends to unſettle Mens Minds as to matters of Faith, and to expoſe them to the ſcorn and contempt of Infidels. And this is all the advantage which they have above others in their Writings. For upon my careful Peruſal of them (which was occaſion'd by reprinting that Diſcourſe) I found nothing extraordinary, as to depth of Judgment, or cloſeneſs of Reaſoning, or ſtrength of Argument, or skill in Scripture or Antiquity, but the old ſtuff ſet out with a new dreſs, and too much ſuited to the Genius of the Age we live in, viz. Brisk and airy, but withal too light and ſuperficial. But although ſuch a ſort of Raillery be very much unbecoming the weight and dignity of the Subject, yet that is not the worſt part of the Character of them ; for they ſeem to be written not with a deſign to convince others, or to juſtifie themſelves, but to ridicule the great Myſteries of our Faith, calling them, Jargon, Cant, Nonſenſe, Impoſſibilities, Contradictions, Samaritaniſm, and what not? Any thing but Mahometiſm and Deiſm. And at the ſame time they know, that we have not framed theſe Doctrines our ſelves ; but have received them by

by as univerſal a Tradition and Conſent of the Chriſtian Church, as that whereby we receive the Books of the New Teſtament, and as founded upon their Authority. So that, as far as I can ſee, the truth of theſe Doctrines and authority of thoſe Books muſt ſtand and fall together: For from the time of the writing and publiſhing of them, all Perſons who were admitted into the Chriſtian Church by the Form of Baptiſm, preſcribed by our Saviour, were underſtood to be received Members upon profeſſion of the Faith of the Holy Trinity; the Hymns and Doxologies of the Primitive Church were to Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; and thoſe who openly oppoſed that Doctrine were caſt out of the Communion of it; which to me ſeem plain and demonſtrative Arguments, that this was the Doctrine of the Chriſtian Church from the beginning, as will appear in the progreſs of this Diſcourſe. The chief deſign whereof is to vindicate the Doctrine of the Trinity, as it hath been generally received in the Chriſtian Church, and is expreſſed in the Athanaſian Creed, from thoſe horrible Imputations of Nonſenſe, Contradiction and Impoſſibility; with which it is charged by our Unitarians (as they call themſelves;) and that in the anſwer to the Sermon lately reprinted, about the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith: which I firſt preached and publiſhed ſome Years ſince, upon the breaking out of this Controverſie among us, by the Notes on Athanaſius his Creed, and the other miſchievous Pamphlets one upon another. I was in hopes to have given ſome check to their inſolent way of writing about matters ſo much above our reach, by ſhewing how reaſonable it was for us to ſubmit to divine Revelation in ſuch things, ſince we muſt acknowledge our ſelves ſo much to ſeek, as to the nature of Subſtances, which are continually before our Eyes; and therefore, if there were ſuch difficulties about a Myſtery which depended upon Revelation, we had no cauſe to wonder at it; but our buſineſs was chiefly to be ſatisfied, whether this Doctrine were any part of that Revelation. As to which I propoſed ſeveral things, which I thought very reaſonable, to the finding out the true ſenſe of the Scripture about theſe matters. After a conſiderable time, they thought fit to publiſh ſomething, which was to paſs for an Anſwer to it; but in it, they wholly paſs over that part which relates to the ſenſe of Scripture, and run into their common place about Myſteries of Faith; in which they were ſure to have as many Friends, as our Faith had Enemies; and yet they managed it in ſo trifling a manner, that I did not then think it deſerved an Anſwer. But a worthy and judicious Friend was willing to take that task upon himſelf, which he hath very well diſcharged; ſo that I am not concerned to meddle with all thoſe particulars, which are fully anſwer'd already, but the general Charge as to the Chriſtian Church about the Doctrine of the Trinity, I think my ſelf oblig'd to give an anſwer to upon this occaſion. But before I come to that, ſince they ſo confidently charge the Chriſtian Church for ſo many ages, with embracing Errors and Nonſenſe, and Contradictions for Myſteries of Faith, I deſire to know (ſuppoſing it poſſible for the Chriſtian Church to be ſo early, ſo generally, and ſo miſerably deceived in a matter of ſuch moment) by what light they have diſcovered this great Error. Have they any new Books of Scripture to judge by? Truly they had need, for they ſeem to be very weary of the old ones; becauſe they find they will not ſerve their turn; therefore they muſter up the old Objections againſt them, and give no anſwer to them; they find fault with Copies, and ſay, they are corrupted and falſified to ſpeak the Language of the Church; they let fall ſuſpicious Words, as to the Form of Baptiſm, as though it were inſerted from the Churches Practice; they charge us with following corrupt Copies, and making falſe Tranſlations without any manner of ground for it.

And doth not all this diſcover no good will to the Scriptures, at leaſt, as they are received among us? And I deſpair of meeting with better Copies, or ſeeing a more faithful Tranſlation than ours is. So that it is plain, that they have no mind to be tried by the Scriptures. For theſe exceptions are ſuch, as a Malefactor would make to a Jury he is afraid to be condemned by.

But what then is the peculiar light which theſe happy Men have found in a corner, the want whereof hath made the Chriſtian Church to fall into ſuch monſtrous Errors and Contradictions? Nothing (they pretend) but the mere light of common ſenſe and reaſon; which they call after a more refined way of ſpeaking, clear Ideas and diſtinct Perceptions of things.

But leſt I ſhould be thought to miſrepreſent them; I will produce ſome of their own Expreſſions. In one place they ſay, We deny the Articles of the new Chriſtianity, or the Athanaſian Religion, not becauſe they are Myſteries, or becauſe we do not comprehend them; but we deny them becauſe we do comprehend them; we have a clear and diſtinct Perception, that they are not Myſteries, but Contradictions, Impoſſibilities, and pure Nonſenſe. We have our reaſon in vain, and all ſcience and certainty would be deſtroy'd if we could not diſtinguiſh between Myſteries and Contradictions. And ſoon after, We are not to give the venerable name of Myſteries to Doctrines that are contrary to nature's and reaſon's Light, or which deſtroy or contradict our natural Ideas. Theſe things I have particular reaſon to take notice of here, becauſe they are publiſhed as an Anſwer to the foregoing Sermon about the Myſteries of the Chriſtian Faith: and this ſhews the general grounds they go upon, and therefore more fit to be conſider'd here. To which I ſhall add one paſſage more, wherein they inſinuate, that the Doctrine of the Trinity hath been ſupported only by intereſt and force. Their Words are (after they have called the Doctrine of the Trinity, a monſtrous Parodox and Contradiction) This is that, ſay they, which becauſe all other Arguments failed them in their diſputations with the Photinians and Arians, they at laſt effectually proved, by the Imperial Edicts, by Confiſcations and Baniſhments, by ſeizing and burning all Books written againſt it or them, by capital Puniſhments, and when the Papacy (of which this is the chief Article) prevailed by Fire and Faggot. This is a new diſcovery indeed, that the Doctrine of the Trinity, as it is generally receiv'd in the Chriſtian Church, is the chief Article of Popery; although it were embraced and defended long before Popery was known; and I hope would be ſo, if there were no ſuch thing as Popery left in the World. But if every thing which diſpleaſes ſome Men muſt paſs for Popery, I am afraid Chriſtianity it ſelf will not eſcape at laſt: For there are ſome who are building apace on ſuch foundations as theſe; and are endeavouring what they can, to remove out of their way all revealed Religion, by the help of thoſe two powerful Machines, viz. Prieſt-craft and Myſteries.

Anſ. to Dr. Wallis's four Letters, p. 4.

But becauſe I intend a clear and diſtinct Diſcourſe concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, as it hath been generally received among us; I ſhall proceed in theſe four Enquiries.

(1.) Whether it was accounted a monſtrous Paradox and Contradiction, where Perſons were not ſway'd by Force and Intereſt?

(2.) Whether there be any ground of common reaſon. on which it can be juſtly charged with Nonſenſe, Impoſſibilities and Contradiction?

(3.) Whether their Doctrine about the Trinity or ours, be more agreeable to the ſenſe of Scripture and Antiquity?

(4.) Whether our Doctrine being admitted, it doth overthrow all certainty of reaſon, and makes way for the believing the greateſt Abſurdities under the pretence of being Myſteries of Faith?

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

The Doctrine of the TRINITY not received in the Chriſtian Church by Force or Intereſt.

AS to the firſt, it will lead me into an enquiry into the ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church, as to this Doctrine, long before Popery was hatched, and at a time when the main force of Imperial Edicts was againſt Chriſtianity it ſelf; at which time this Doctrine was owned by the Chriſtian Church, but diſowned and diſputed againſt by ſome particular Parties and Sects. And the queſtion then will be, whether theſe had engroſſed Senſe, and Reaſon, and Knowledge among themſelves; and all the body of the Chriſtian Church, with their Heads and Governors, were bereft of common Senſe, and given up to believe Nonſenſe and Contradictions for Myſteries of Faith. But in order to the clearing this matter, I take it for granted, That Senſe and Reaſon are no late Inventions only to be found among our Unitarians; but that all Mankind have ſuch a competent ſhare of them, as to be able to judge, what is agreeable to them, and what not, if they apply themſelves to it; That no Men have ſo little Senſe as to be fond of Nonſenſe, when Senſe will do them equal ſervice; That if there be no Biaſs of Intereſt to ſway them, Men will generally judge according to the evidence of reaſon; That if they be very much concerned for a Doctrine oppoſed by others, and againſt their Intereſt, they are perſwaded of the Truth of it, by other means than by force and fear; That it is poſſible for Men of Senſe and Reaſon to believe a Doctrine to be true on the account of divine Revelation, although they cannot comprehend the manner of it; That we have reaſon to believe thoſe to be Men of Senſe above others, who have ſhew'd their Abilities above them in other matters of Knowledge and Speculation; That there can be no reaſon to ſuſpect the Integrity of ſuch Men in delivering their own Senſe, who at the ſame time might far better ſecure their Intereſt by renouncing their Faith; laſtly, That the more Perſons are concerned to eſtabliſh and defend a Doctrine which is oppoſed and contemned, the greater evidence they give, that they are perſwaded of the truth of it.

Theſe are Poſtulata ſo agreeable to Senſe and common reaſon, that I think it an affront to humane Nature to go about to prove them. But to ſhew what uſe we are to make of them; we muſt conſider that it cannot be denied, that the Doctrine of the Trinity did meet with oppoſition very early in the Chriſtian Church, eſpecially among the Jewiſh Chriſtians; I mean thoſe who ſtrictly adhered to the Law of Moſes, after the Apoſtles had declared the freedom of Chriſtians from the obligation of it. Theſe (as I ſhall ſhew by and by) ſoon after the diſperſion of the Church of Jeruſalem, gathered into a body by themſelves, diſtinct from that which conſiſted of Jews and Gentiles, and was therefore called the Catholick Chriſtian Church. And this ſeparate body, whether called Ebionites, Nazarens, or Mineans, did not only differ from the Catholick Chriſtian Church, as to the neceſſity of obſerving the Law of Moſes, but likewiſe as to the Divinity of our Saviour, which they denied, although they profeſſed to believe him as the Chriſt or promiſed Meſſias.

Theodoret hath with very good judgment placed the Hereſies of the firſt Ages of the Chriſtian Church, under two diſtinct heads, (which others reckon up confuſedly) and thoſe are ſuch as relate to the Humanity of Chriſt, Theodoret hæret. l. 1. & 11.

as Simon Magus, and all the Sects of thoſe who are called Gnoſticks, which are recited in his firſt Book. In his ſecond he begins with thoſe which relate to the Divinity of Chriſt; and theſe are of two kinds:

Epiphan. Hareſ. 19. n. 5. 29. n. 17.

1. The Jewiſh Chriſtians who denied it. Of theſe he reckons up the Ebionites, Cerinthians, the Nazarens, and Elceſaitæ, whom he diſtinguiſhed from the other Ebionites, becauſe of a Book of Revelation, which one Elxai brought among them; but Epiphanius ſaith, he joyned with the Ebionites and Nazarens.

Tertul. de præſcript. hæret. c. 52. Euſeb. hiſt. Eccl. l. 5. c. 28.

2. Thoſe of the Gentile Chriſtians, who were look'd on as broaching a new Doctrine among them; of theſe he reckons Artemon as the firſt, then Theodotus, whom others make the firſt Publiſher of it, as Tertullian, and the old Writer in Euſebius, ſuppoſed to be Caius, who lived near the time, and of whom a conſiderable Fragment is preſerved in Euſebius, which gives light to theſe matters. The next is another Theodotus, who framed a new Sect of ſuch as ſet up Melchiſedeck above Chriſt. Then follow Paulus Samoſatenus, and Sabellius, who made but one Perſon as well as one God, and ſo overthrew the Trinity with whom Marcellus agreed in ſubſtance, and laſt of all Photinus. But Theodoret concludes that Book with this paſſage, viz. That all theſe Hereſies againſt our Saviour's Divinity were then wholly extinct; ſo that there were not ſo much as any ſmall Remainders of them. What would he have ſaid, if he had lived in our Age, wherein they are not only revived, but are pretended to have been the true Doctrine of the Apoſtolical Churches? Had all Men loſt their Senſes in Theodoret's time? And yet there were as many learned and able Men in the Chriſtian Church then, as ever were in any time.

CHAP. III.

Hiſt. of the Unit. p. 10. Edit. II.

BUT this is not the Age our Unitarians will ſtand or fall by. They are for going backward; and they ſpeak with great comfort about the old Ebionites and Nazarens as entirely theirs; "And that they had "conſiderable Men among them, as Theodotion and Symmachus, two Tran-"ſlators of the Hebrew Bible. And among the Gentile Chriſtians, they va-"lue themſelves upon three Men, Paulus Samoſatenus, Lucianus the moſt "learned Perſon, they ſay, of his Age, and Photinus Biſhop of Sirmium. "As to the Unitarians at Rome, (whom they improperly call Nazarens) they "pretended that their Doctrine was Apoſtolical, and the general Doctrine "of the Church till the times of Victor and Zepherin.

Euſeb. l. 3. c. 27.

1. That they were a diſtinct, ſeparate body of Men from the Chriſtian Church. For all the ancient Writers who ſpeak of them, do mention them as Hereticks, and wholly divided from it, as appears by Irenæus, Tertullian, Epiphanius, Theodoret, St. Auguſtin, and others. Euſebius ſaith of them, That although the Devil could not make them renounce Chriſtianity, yet finding their weakneſs, ἐσφετερίζετο, he made them his own. He would never have ſaid this of any whom he look'd on as Members of the Chriſtian Church. But wherein is it that Euſebius blames them? He tells it in the very next words; that it was for the mean opinion they entertained of Chriſt; for they look'd on him as a mere Man, but very juſt. And although there were two ſorts of them; ſome owning the miraculous Conception, and others not; yet ſaith he, They at laſt agreed in the ſame Impiety, which was, That they would not own Chriſt to have had any Pre-exiſtence before his Birth, nor that he was Θεὸς Λόγος, God the Word, It's true, he finds fault with them afterwards for keeping to the Law of Moſes; but the firſt Impiety he charges them with, is the other. That which I infer from hence is, that Euſebius himſelf (to whom they profeſs to ſhew greater reſpect than to moſt of the ancient Writers, for his exactneſs and diligence in Church-Hiſtory) doth affirm the Doctrine which overthrows the Pre exiſtence and Divinity of Chriſt to be an Impiety. And therefore, when he affirms the firſt fifteen Biſhops of the Church of Jeruſalem who were of the Circumciſion, viz. to the Siege of it by Hadrian, did hold the genuine Doctrine of Chriſt, it muſt be underſtood of his Pre-exiſtence and Divinity; for the other we ſee he accounted an Impiety. And he tells us, the Church of Jeruſalem then conſiſted of believing Jews, and ſo it had done from the Apoſtles times to that of Hadrian's Baniſhment of the Jews. Which is a conſiderable Teſtimony to two purpoſes:

Ante-Nice-niſm. p. 37.

Anſwer to Miſſ. p. 20. Euſeb. l. 4. c. 5.

1. To ſhew that the Primitive Church of Jeruſalem did hold the Doctrine of Chriſt's Pre-exiſtence and Divinity. But ſay our Unitarians, this doth not follow. For what reaſon? When it is plain that Euſebius accounted that the only genuine Doctrine. No, ſay they, he meant only the miraculous Conception, and that they held that, in oppoſition to thoſe Ebionites who ſaid that he was born as other Men are. This is very ſtrange; when Euſebius had diſtinguiſhed the two ſorts of Ebionites about this matter, and had blamed both of them, even thoſe that held him born of a Virgin, for falling into the ſame Impiety. What can ſatisfie ſuch Men, who are content with ſuch an anſwer? But ſay they, Euſebius only ſpake his own ſenſe. Not ſo neither: For he ſaith in that place, that he had ſearched the moſt ancient Records of the Church of Jeruſalem. Yes, ſay they, for the Succeſſion of the firſt Biſhops; but as to their Doctrine he had it from Hegeſippus, and he was an Ebionite himſelf. Then Euſebius muſt not be the Man they take him for. For if Hegeſippus were himſelf an Ebionite, and told Euſebius in his Commentaries, that the Primitive Church of Jeruſalem conſiſted of all ſuch, then Euſebins muſt ſuppoſe that Church guilty of the ſame Impiety with which he charges the Ebionites; and would he then have ſaid, That they had the true knowledge of Chriſt among them? No, ſay they, Euſebius ſpake his own opinion, but Hegeſippus being an Ebionite himſelf, meant otherwiſe. But Euſebins doth not uſe Hegeſippus his Words, but his own in that place; and withal, how doth it appear that Hegeſippus himſelf was an Ebionite? This one of their lateſt Writers hath undertaken, but in ſuch a manner, as is not like to convince me. It is thus, Hegeſippus was himſelf a Jewiſh Chriſtian, and made uſe of the Hebrew Goſpel, and among the Hereticks which crept into the Church of Jeruſalem, he never numbers the Ebionites or Cerinthians, but only the Gnoſticks. I will not diſpute, whether Hegeſippus was a Jewiſh Chriſtian or not. Grant he was ſo, yet how doth it appear that all the Jewiſh Chriſtians were at that time Ebionites or Cerinthians? It ſeems they were neither of them Hereticks, although they were oppoſite to each other; the one held the World created by inferiour Powers; the other by God himſelf: the one, we ſee, made Chriſt a mere Man; but the Cerinthians held an illapſe of the Λόγος upon him, and ſo made him a kind of a God by his Preſence, as Neſtorius did afterwards. But honeſt Hegeſippus took neither one nor the other for Hereticks, if our Unitarians ſay true. But yet it doth not appear, that Hegeſippus was either one or the other. For he ſpeaks of the Church of Jeruſalem, as is plain by Euſebius, and the Cerinthians and Ebionites, were in other parts; the former in Egypt and the leſſer or Proconſular Aſia; and the latter about Decapolis and Cœleſyria, from whence they ſpread into Arabia and Armenia, as appears by Epiphanius. But Origen ſaith, That all the Jewiſh Chriſtians were Ebionites. What! no Cerinthians among them? Were not thoſe Jewiſh Chriſtians? Or were they all turned Ebionites then? No ſuch thing appears by Origen's ſaying. But we are not enquiring now, what they were in his time, but in the Church of Jeruſalem. Doth Origen ſay, all the Jewiſh Chriſtians there were ſuch? And as to his own time, it is not improbable that thoſe who then made up the ſeparate Body of Jewiſh Chriſtians were Ebionites. But what is this to the firſt Chriſtians of the Church of Jeruſalem? Very much, ſay they, becauſe the firſt Chriſtians were called Nazarens, and the Nazarens held the ſame Doctrine with the Ebionites. But the title of Nazarens did not Acts 24.5. always ſignifie the ſame thing. It was at firſt uſed for all Chriſtians, as appears by the Sect of the Nazarens in Tertullus, his Accuſation of St. Paul;

Epiphan. Hæreſ. 29. n. 7. then it was taken for the Chriſtians who ſtaid at Pella, and ſettled at Decapolis and thereabouts, as Epiphanius affirms; for although all the Chriſtians withdrew thither before the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as Euſebius ſaith, yet they did not all continue there, but a great number returned to Jeruſalem, and were there ſettled under their Biſhops; but thoſe who remained about Pella kept the name of Nazarens, and never were united with the Gentile Chriſtians, but kept up their old Jewiſh Cuſtoms, as to their Synagogues, even in St. Jerom and St. Auguſtine's time. Now theſe Nazarens might be all Ebionites, and yet thoſe of the Church of Jeruſalem not ſo at all.

2. The next thing obſervable from this place of Euſebius is, that while the Nazarens and Ebionites were ſettled in Cœleſyria, and the Parts thereabouts, there was a regular Chriſtian Church at Jeruſalem, under the Biſhops of the Circumciſion, to the Siege of Hadrian. Euſebius obſerves, that be-Euſeb. l. 3. c. 5. fore the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, all the Chriſtians forſook not only Jeruſalem, but the Coaſts of Judea. But that they did not all continue there, is moſt evident from what Euſebius here ſaith of the Church and Biſhops of Jeruſalem; between the two Sieges of Titus Veſpaſian and Hadrian, which was in
L. 4. c. 8. the 18th Year of his Empire, ſaith Euſebius. Who produces another Teſtimony out of Juſtin Martyr, which ſhews that the Chriſtians were returned to Jeruſalem. For therein he ſaith, That Barchochebas in that War uſed the Chriſtians with very great ſeverity to make them renounce Chriſtianity. How could this be, if all the Chriſtians were out of his reach, then being ſettled
L. 4. c. 6. about Pella? And although Euſebius ſaith, That when the Jews were baniſhed their Country by Hadrian*'s Edict, that then the* Church of Jeruſalem was made up of Gentiles; yet we are not ſo ſtrictly to underſtand him, as though the Chriſtians who ſuffer'd under Barchochebas, were wholly excluded. O-
Oroſ. l. 7. c. 13. roſius ſaith, That they were permitted by the Emperor's Edict. It is ſufficient for me, if they were connived at, which is very probable, although they did not think fit to have any ſuch publick Perſons as their Biſhops to be any other than Gentiles. And Hegeſippus is allow'd after this time, to have been a Jewiſh Chriſtian of the Church of Jeruſalem: ſo that the Church there muſt conſiſt both of Jews and Gentiles; but they can never ſhew that any of the Ebionites did admit any Gentile Chriſtians among them, which ſhews that they were then diſtinct Bodies.

2. They were not only diſtinct in Communion, but had a different rule of Faith. This is a point of great conſequence, and ought to be well conſider'd. For, ſince our Unitarians own the Ebionites as their Predeceſſors, we ought to have a particular eye to the rule of Faith received by them, which muſt be very different from ours, if they follow the Ebionites, as I doubt Anſwer to Dr Bull p. 42. not to make it appear. They ſay, The Ebionites uſed only St. Mathew*'s Goſpel.* But the Chriſtian Church then, and ever ſince, have receiv'd the four

Goſpels, as of divine Authority. Euſebius, one of the moſt approved Authors in Antiquity by our Unitarians, reckons up the four Evangeliſts and St. Paul's Epiſtles, as writings univerſally received by the Chriſtian Church; then he mentions ſome generally rejected as ſpurious; and after thoſe which were doubted, among which he mentions the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, which the Jewiſh Chriſtians follow'd. Now here is an apparent difference put between the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, and St. Matthew's Goſpel; as much as between a Book receiv'd without Controverſie, and one that was not. But if the Goſpel according to the Hebrews were then acknowledged to be the true Goſpel of St. Matthew, it was impoſſible a Man of ſo much ſenſe as Euſebius, ſhould make this difference between them. But it is worth our obſerving, what our Unitarians ſay about this matter. And by that we may judge very much of their Opinion about the Goſpels. I ſhall ſet down their Words, for fear I ſhould be thought to do them wrong. “Symmachus and the Ebionites, ſay they, as they held our Saviour to be the Son of Joſeph and Mary; ſo they contended that the firſt Chapter of St. Matthew's Goſpel was added by the Greek Tranſlators. St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel in Hebrew, when it was tranſlated into Greek, the Tranſlator prefaced it with a Genealogy and Narration that our Saviour was conceived by the Holy Spirit of God, and was not the Son of Joſeph, but this Genealogy and Narration, ſaid Symmachus and the Ebionites, is not in the Hebrew Goſpel of St. Matthew, nay, is the mere invention of the Tranſlator. As for the other Goſpels, the Ebionites and Symmachians did not receive the Goſpel of St. Luke; and for that of St. John, they ſaid it was indeed written by Cerinthus, to confirm his Platonick Conceits about the Logos or Word, which he ſuppoſed to be the Chriſt or Spirit of God, which reſted on and inhabited the Perſon of Jeſus. Let us now but join to this another Paſſage, which is this, “Thoſe whom we now call Socinians, were by the Fathers and the firſt Ages of Chriſtianity called Nazarens; and afterwards they were called Ebionites, Mineans, Symmachians, &c.

Anſwer to Dr. Bull. p. 39.

If this be true, they muſt have the ſame Opinions as to the Books of the new Teſtament; and hereby we ſee what ſort of Men we have to deal with, who under the pretence of the old Ebionites, undermine the Authority of the new Teſtament. As to St. Matthew's Goſpel, I ſee no reaſon to queſtion its being firſt written in the Language then uſed among the Jews, which was mixt of Hebrew, Syriack and Chaldee: ſince this is affirmed, not merely by Papias, whoſe Authority never went far; but by Origen, Irenæus, Euſebius, St. Jerom, and others. But I muſt diſtinguiſh between St. Matthew's Authentick Goſpel, which Pantænus ſaw in the Indies, and that which was called the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, and the Nazaren Goſpel. St. Jerom in one place ſeems to inſinuate, that St. Matthew's Goſpel was preſerved in the Library of Pamphilus at Cæſarea, and that the Nazarens at Berrhæa in Syria had given him leave to tranſcribe it. But if we compare this with other places in him, we ſhall find, that he queſtion'd whether this were the Authentick Goſpel of St. Matthew or not; he ſaith, It is ſo called by many; but he confeſſes it was the ſame which the Ebionites and Nazarens uſed. In which were many interpolations, as appears by the collections out of it in St. Jerom's Works and other ancient Writers; which ſome learned Men have put together. And St. Jerom often calls it the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. And ſo do other ancient Writers. From the laying ſeveral Paſſages together, Eraſmus ſuſpects, that St. Jerom never ſaw any other than the common Nazaren Goſpel, and offers a good reaſon for it, viz. That he never made uſe of its Authority to correct the Greek of St. Matthew, which he would not have failed to have done in his Commentaries; and he produces the Nazaren ren Goſpel upon ſlight occaſions. But how came the Preface to be curtail'd in the Ebionite Goſpel? Of which Epiphanius gives an account, and ſhews what was inſerted inſtead of it: No, ſay the Ebionites, the Preface was added by the Tranſlator into Greek. From what evidence? and to what end? To prove that Chriſt was born of the Holy Spirit. This then muſt be look'd on as a mere Forgery; and thoſe Ebionites were in the right, who held him to be the Son of Joſeph and Mary. What do theſe Men mean by ſuch ſuggeſtions as theſe? Are they reſolved to ſet up Deiſm among us, and in order thereto, to undermine the Authority of the new Teſtament? For it is not only St. Matthew's Goſpel, but St. Luke's and St. John's which they ſtrike at, under the pretence of repreſenting the arguments of theſe wretched Ebionites. If their arguments are mean and trifling, and merely precarious, why are they not ſlighted and anſwered by ſuch as pretend to be Chriſtians? If they think them good, we ſee what we have to do with theſe Men; it is not the Doctrine of the Trinity, ſo much as the Authority of the Goſpels, which we are to maintain againſt them: And not thoſe only, for the Ebionites rejected all St. Paul's Epiſtles and called him an Apoſtate and a Tranſgreſſor of the Law. Anſwer to Dr. Bull. p. 35. What ſay our Unitarians to this? Why truly, This comes from Epiphanius, and becauſe he quotes no Author, it ſeems to be one of his malicious Tales. This is a very ſhort way of anſwering, if it would ſatisfie any Men of Senſe. But p. 40. they ought to have remembred that within a few Pages, they alledge Epiphanius as a very competent Witneſs about the Ebionites, becauſe he was born in Paleſtine, and lived very near it. But we do not rely wholly upon Epiphanius in this matter. For thoſe whom they allow to be the beſt Witneſſes as to the Doctrine of the Nazarens, ſay the ſame thing concerning them. As p. 39. the moſt learned Origen, as they call him, who lived a long time in Syria and Origen. c. Celſ. l. 5. p. 274. Paleſtine it ſelf; and he affirms, that both ſorts of Ebionites rejected St. Paul's Epiſtles: and Theodoret, who they ſay, lived in Cœleſyria, where the Nazarens moſt abound, affirms of them, That they allowed only the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, and called the Apoſtle an Apoſtate: by whom they meant St. Paul. Theodor. hæret. l. 2. c. 1. Hieron. in Matt. c. 12. And the ſame is ſaid by St. Jerom, who converſed among them; That they look on St. Paul as a Tranſgreſſor of the Law, and receive none of his Writings. Have we not now a very comfortable account of the Canon of the New Teſtament from theſe ancient Unitarians? And if our modern ones account them their Predeceſſors, we may judge what a mean Opinion they muſt have of the Writings of the New Teſtament. For if they had any concernment for them, they would never ſuffer ſuch ſcandalous inſinuations to paſs without a ſevere cenſure, and a ſufficient anſwer. But their Work ſeems to be rather to pull down, than to eſtabliſh the Authority of revealed Religion; and we know what ſort of Men are gratified by it.

CHAP. IV.

Of the conſiderable Men they pretend to have been of their Opinion in the Primitive Church.

I Now come to conſider the Men of Senſe they pretend to among theſe ancient Unitarians.

The firſt is Theodotion, whom they make to be an Unitarian. But he Euſeb. l. 5. c. 8. was, ſaith Euſebius from Irenæus, a Jewiſh Proſelyte, and ſo they may very much increaſe the number of Unitarians, by taking in all the Jews as well as Pro-

Proſelytes. But muſt theſe paſs for Men of Senſe too, becauſe they are againſt the Doctrine of the Trinity, and much upon the ſame grounds with our modern Unitarians? For they cry out of Contradictions and Impoſſibilities juſt as they do; i. e. with as much confidence and as little reaſon. Symmachus is another of their ancient Heroes: he was, if Epiphanius may be believed, firſt a Samaritan, and then a Jew; and Euſebius ſaith indeed, That he was an Ebionite, and therefore for obſerving the Law of Moſes. St. Auguſtin ſaith, That in his time the Symmachiani were both for Circumciſion and Baptiſm. St. Jerom obſerves, That Theodotion and Symmachus, both Ebionites, tranſlated the Old Teſtament in what concerned our Saviour, like Jews; and Aquila, who was a Jew, like a Chriſtian; but in another place he blames all three for the ſame fault. Euſebius goes ſomewhat farther; for he ſaith, Symmachus wrote againſt St. Matthew's Goſpel, to eſtabliſh his own Hereſy, which ſhew'd he was a true Ebionite.

Epiph. de ponder. & menſ. n. 6. Euſeb. l. 6. c. 17. Auguſt. c. Creſcon. l. 1. c. 31. Hier. in Heb. c. 3. Adverſ. Ruffin.

The next they mention as one of their great Lights, was Paulus Samoſatenus, Biſhop and Patriarch of Antioch. But in another place they have a ſpiteful Inſinuation, that Men in ſuch places are the great Penſioners of the World, as though they were ſwayed only by Intereſt; and that it keeps them from embracing of the truth. Now Paulus Samoſatenus gave greater occaſion for ſuch a Suſpicion, than any of the perſons ſo unworthily reflected upon. For he was a man noted for his Affectation of exceſſive Vanity and Pomp, and very unjuſt methods of growing rich. It is well we have Euſebius his Teſtimony for this; for they ſlight Epiphanius for his malicious Tales, and St. Jerom for his Legends; but they commend Euſebius for his Exactneſs and Diligence. And I hope Theodoret may eſcape their cenſure, who affirms, that Paulus Samoſatenus ſuited his Doctrine to his intereſt with Zenobia, who then governed in thoſe parts of Syria and Phœnicia, who profeſſed her ſelf to be of the Jewiſh Perſuaſion. Athanaſius ſaith, She was a Jew, and a Favourer of Paulus Samoſatenus. What his opinions were, our Unitarians do not take the pains to inform us, taking it for granted that he was of their Mind. Euſebius ſaith, He had a very mean and low opinion of Chriſt, as having nothing in him above the common nature of Mankind. Theodoret ſaith, he fell into the Doctrine of Artemon to oblige Zenobia; and Artemon, he ſaith, held that Chriſt was a meer Man born of a Virgin, but exceeding the Prophets in Excellency. Where the words Ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος are uſed to expreſs the opinion of Artemon; which ought to be taken notice of, becauſe our modern Unitarians ſay, That thoſe words among the ancient Writers were taken in oppoſition to the miraculous Conception of our Saviour.

But Paulus Samoſatenus was univerſally diſowned by the Chriſtian Church of that time; although as long as Zenobia held her Power, he kept his See; which was for ſome time after he was firſt called in queſtion for his Hereſie. But at firſt he made uſe of many Arts and Devices to deceive the Chriſtian Biſhops of the beſt Reputation, who aſſembled at Antioch in order to the ſuppreſſing this dangerous Doctrine, as they all accounted it. For hearing of his Opinions about our Saviour, they ran together, ſaith Euſebius, as againſt a Wolf which deſigned to deſtroy the Flock. Now from hence it is very reaſonable to argue, that the Samoſatenian Doctrine was then look'd on as a very dangerous Novelty in the Chriſtian Church. For although the Ebionites had aſſerted the ſame thing, as to the Divinity of our Saviour, yet they were not look'd on as true Members of the Chriſtian Church; but as St. Jerom ſaith, While they affected to be both Jews and Chriſtians, they were neither Jews nor Chriſtians. Artemon, whoever he was, was but an obſcure Perſon; and Theodotus had Learning, they ſay, but was of no place in the Church; but for ſuch a conſiderable Perſon as the Biſhop of Antioch to own ſuch a Doctrine, muſt unavoidably diſcover the general ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church concerning it. Paulus Samoſatenus wanted neither parts, nor intereſt, nor experience; and he was ſupported by a Princeſs of great Spirit and Courage, enough to have daunted all the Biſhops, at leaſt in thoſe parts, from appearing againſt him. But ſuch was the zeal and concernment of the Biſhops of the Chriſtian Church in this great affair, that Athanaſ. de ſentent. Dionyſii, p. 558. they not only aſſembled themſelves, but they communicated it to Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria, and to another of the ſame name, Biſhop of Rome, and others, and deſired their advice and concurrence; who did all agree in the condemnation of his Doctrine. The former ſaid, He would have gone himſelf to Antioch, but for his extreme old Age, and he died ſoon after the firſt Council which met at Antioch on this occaſion; but he ſent his Judgement and Reaſons thither, which we find in an Epiſtle of his ſtill extant, whereof mention is made in the Epiſtle of the ſecond Synod of Antioch, to Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, and Maximus Biſhop of Alexandria, and all other Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons of the Catholick Church; wherein they give an Euſeb. l. 7. c. 30. account of their proceedings againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, and they ſay, They had invited the Biſhops of the remoter parts to come to Antioch for the ſuppreſſion of this damnable Doctrine; among the reſt, Dionyſius of Alexandria, and Firmilian of Cappadocia, as Perſons of greateſt reputation then in the Church. Firmilian was there at the former Synod, (of whom Theodoret ſaith, that he was famous both for divine and humane Learning) and ſo were Gregorius Thaumaturgus and Athenodorus Biſhops of Pontus, and Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus in Cilicia, and Nicomas of Iconium, and Hymenæus of Jeruſalem, and Theotecnus of Cæſarea; who all condemned his Doctrine, but they ſpared his Perſon upon his ſolemn promiſes to retract it; but he perſiſting in it when they were gone home, and freſh complaints being made of him, Firmilian was coming a third time to Antioch, but died by the way: But thoſe Biſhops who wrote the Synodical Epiſtle, do all affirm, That they were Witneſſes and many others, when he condemned his Doctrine, but was willing to forbear his Perſon upon his promiſe of amendment, which they found afterwards was merely deluſory.

Dionyſius Alexandrinus, they ſay, would not write to him, but ſent his mind about him to the Church of Antioch. Which Epiſtle is mention'd by St. Jerom, (as written by him a little before his Death) as well as by Euſebius and Theodoret; and I do not ſee ſufficient reaſon to queſtion the authority of that, which Fronto Ducæus publiſhed from Turrian's Copy, although it be denied by H. Valeſius and others. It's ſaid indeed, That he did not write to him, i. e. he did not direct it to him, but he might ſend it to the Council in anſwer to his Letters, which he mentions. How far it differs from his ſtyle in other Epiſtles, I will not take upon me to judge; but the deſign is very agreeable to an Epiſtle from him on that occaſion. It's true, that it ſeems to repreſent the opinion of Paulus Samoſatenus after a different manner from what it is commonly thought to have been: But we are to conſider, that he made uſe of all the Arts to diſguiſe himſelf that he could; and when he found the making Chriſt to be a mere Man would not be born, he went from the Ebionite to the Cerinthian Hypotheſis, viz. That the Λόγος did dwell in him, and that there were two Perſons in Chriſt, one Divine and the other Humane; and two Sons, the one by Nature the Son of God, who had a Pre-exiſtence, and the other the Son of David, who had no ſubſiſtence before. This is the opinion which Dionyſius ſets himſelf againſt in that Epiſtle, and which therefore ſome may imagine was written after Neſtorius his Hereſy: But that was no new Hereſy, as appears by the Cerinthians; and it was that which Paulus Samoſatenus fled to as more plauſible; which not only appears by this Epiſtle, but by what Athanaſius and Epiphanius have delivered concerning it.

Athanaſius wrote a Book of the Incarnation againſt the followers of Paulus Samoſatenus, who held, as he ſaith, Two Perſons in Chriſt, viz. One born of the Virgin, and a divine Perſon, which deſcended upon him and dwelt in him. Againſt which opinion he diſputes from two places of Scripture, viz. God was manifeſt in the Fleſh, and the Word was made Fleſh; and from the ancient Doctrine of the Chriſtian Church, and the Synod of Antioch againſt Paulus Samoſatenus. And in another place he ſaith, that he held, That the divine Word dwelt in Chriſt. And the words of Epiphanius are expreſs to the ſame purpoſe, That the Logos came and dwelt in the Man Jeſus. And the Clergy of Conſtantinople charged Neſtorius with following the Hereſy of Paulus Samoſatenus. And Photius in his Epiſtle ſaith, That Neſtorius taſted too much of the intoxicated Cups of Paulus Samoſatenus; and in the foregoing Epiſtle, he ſaith, That Paulus his followers aſſerted two Hypoſtaſes in Chriſt. But ſome think, that Paulus Samoſatenus did not hold any ſubſiſtence of the Λόγος before, but that the Word was in God before without any ſubſiſtence of its own, and that God gave it a diſtinct ſubſiſtence when it inhabited in the Perſon of Chriſt; and ſo Marius Mercator and Leontius underſtand him; who ſay that he differ'd from Neſtorius therein, who aſſerted a Divine Word with its proper ſubſiſtence. But according to them Paulus by the Word underſtood that Divine Energy whereby Chriſt acted, and which dwelt in him: But Dionyſius ſaith, he made two Chriſts, and two Sons of God. But the Doctrine of the Chriſtian Church, he ſaith, was, That there was but one Chriſt, and one Son, who was the eternal Word, and was made Fleſh. And it is obſervable, that he brings the very ſame places we do now to prove this Doctrine, as in the beginning was the Word, &c. and before Abraham was I am. It ſeems that ſome of the Biſhops who had been upon the examination of his Opinions before the ſecond Synod, which depoſed him, ſent him an account of their Faith, and required his anſwer; wherein they declare the Son not to be God, according to God's Decree, (which he did not ſtick at) but that he was ſo really and ſubſtantially; and whoſoever denied this, they ſaid, was out of the Communion of the Church, and all the Catholick Churches agreed with them in it.

And they declare, That they received this Doctrine from the Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament, and bring the ſame places we do now; as, Thy Throne, O God, was for ever, &c. Who is over all, God bleſſed for ever. All things were made by him, &c. And we do not find that Paulus Samoſatenus, as ſubtle as he was, ever imagin'd that theſe places belong'd to any other than Chriſt, or that the making of all things was to be underſtood of the making of nothing, but putting it into mens power to make themſelves new Creatures. Theſe were diſcoveries only reſerved for the Men of Senſe and clear Ideas in theſe brighter Ages of the World.

But at laſt, after all the arts and ſubterfuges which Paulus Samoſatenus uſed, there was a Man of Senſe, as it happen'd, among the Clergy of Antioch, called Malchion, who was ſo well acquainted with his Sophiſtry, that he drove him out of all, and laid his Senſe ſo open before the ſecond Synod, that he was ſolemnly depoſed for denying the Divinity of the Son of God, and his Deſcent from Heaven, as appears by their Synodical Epiſtle. It is pity we have it not entire; but by the Fragments of it which are preſerved by ſome ancient Writers, we find that his Doctrine of the Divinity in him by Inhabitation was then condemned, and the ſubſtantial Union of both Natures aſſerted. I have only one thing more to obſerve concerning him, which is, that the Arian Party in their Decree at Sardica (or rather Philippopolis) do confeſs, that Paulus Samoſatenus his Doctrine was condemned by the whole Chriſtian World. For they ſay, That which paſſed in the Eaſtern Synod, was ſigned and approved by all. And Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, in his Epiſtle to Alexander of Conſtantinople, affirms the ſame. And now, I hope, I may deſire our Men of Senſe to reflect upon theſe Matters. Here was no Fire nor Faggot threatned, no Imperial Edicts to enforce this Doctrine; nay, the Queen of thoſe parts, under whoſe Juriſdiction they lived at that time, openly eſpouſed the cauſe of Paulus Samoſatenus; ſo that here could be nothing of Intereſt to ſway them to act in oppoſition to her. And they found his Intereſt ſo ſtrong, that he retained the Poſſeſſion of his See, till Aurelian had conquered Zenobia, and by his authority he was ejected: This Synod which depoſed him, did not ſit in the time of Aurelian, as is commonly thought, but before his time while Zenobia had all the power in her hands in thoſe Eaſtern parts, which ſhe enjoy'd five years: till ſhe was diſpoſſeſt by Aurelian, from whence Ant. Pagi concludes, that Paulus kept his See three years after the Sentence againſt him; but upon application to Aurelian, he who afterwards began a Perſecution againſt all Chriſtians, gave this rule, That he with whom the Italian Biſhops and thoſe of Rome communicated, ſhould enjoy the See; upon which Paulus was at laſt turned out. By this we ſee a concurrence of all the Chriſtian Biſhops of that time againſt him that denied the Divinity of our Saviour; and this without any force, and againſt their intereſt, and with a general conſent of the Chriſtian World: For there were no mighty Awes and Draconic Sanctions to compel, of which they ſometimes ſpeak, as if they were the only powerful methods to make this Doctrine go down. And what greater argument can there be, that it was then the general ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church? And it would be very hard to condemn all his Oppoſers for men that wanted Senſe and Reaſon, becauſe they ſo unanimouſly oppoſed him.

Not ſo unanimouſly neither, ſay our Unitarians, becauſe Lucian, a Presbyter of the Church of Antioch, and a very learned man, joined with him. It would have been ſtrange indeed, if ſo great a Man as Paulus Samoſatenus could prevail with none of his own Church to join with him, eſpecially one that came from the ſame place of Samoſata, as Lucian did, and probably was by him brought thither.

He had an extraordinary Character given him by Euſebius, both for his Life and Learning; and ſo by St. Jerom, without the leaſt reflection upon him as to matter of Faith. But on the other ſide, Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, in his Epiſtle concerning Arius to Alexander of Conſtantinople, doth ſay, That he followed Paulus Samoſatenus, and held ſeparate Communion for many years, under the three following Biſhops. He doth not ſay that he died ſo, when he ſuffer'd Martyrdom under Maximinus at Nicomedia; neither doth he ſay the contrary: Upon which learned Men are divided, whether he perſiſted in that opinion or not. Petavius and Valeſius give him up; on the other ſide Baronius vindicates him, and ſaith, The miſreport of him came from his zeal againſt Sabellianiſm; and that Alexander wrote that of him before his Books were throughly examin'd, that Athanaſius never joins him with Paulus Samoſatenus, that the Arians never produced his authority in their debates, as they would have done, ſince the Emperor's Mother had built a City in the place where he ſuffer'd Martyrdom. It cannot be doubted that the Arian Party would have it believed that they came out of Lucian's School, as appears by Arius his Epiſtle to Euſebius of Nicomedia; but on the other ſide, the great argument to me is, That this very Party, at the Council of Antioch, produced a Creed, which they ſaid was there found written with Lucian's own hand, which is directly contrary to the Samoſatenian Doctrine. Now either this was true or falſe: If it were true, then it was falſe that he was a Samoſatenian; if it were falſe, how came the Arian Party to give it out for true? Eſpecially thoſe who valued lued themſelves for coming out of his School. They were far enough from being ſuch weak Men to produce the Authority of Lucian at Antioch, where he was ſo much eſteemed, for a Doctrine utterly inconſiſtent with that of Paulus Samoſatenus, if it were there known, that he was his Diſciple, and ſeparated from three Biſhops on that account. For therein the Son is owned to be God of God, begotten of the Father before all Ages, perfect God of perfect God, &c. Suppoſe they had a mind to ſubvert the Nicene Faith by this Creed, under the name of Lucian, (only becauſe ὁμοούσιος was left out) yet what an improbable way did they take, when they ſupported the main points by his Authority, and that at Antioch, where it was greateſt? If Philoſtorgius may be credited, the great Men of the Arian Party had been his Scholars, as beſides Euſebius of Nicomedia, Maris of Chalcedon, Theognis of Nice, Leontius of Antioch, and ſeveral other leading Biſhops, and even Arius himſelf pretended to it. Which makes me apt to think, that Alexander knowing this, and at firſt not being able ſo well to judge of Lucian's Opinion, charged him with following Paulus Samoſatenus, from whence the odium would fall upon his Scholars. For his deſign is to draw the Succeſſion down from Ebion and Artemon, and Paulus Samoſatenus, and Lucian, to Arius and his Aſſociates; and charges them with holding the ſame Doctrine, wherein he was certainly miſtaken; and ſo he might be about Lucian's Separation from the following Biſhops on that account.

The laſt our Unitarians mention among their great Men, is Photinus Biſhop of Sirmium. They take it for granted that he was of their Opinion. This is certain, that whatever it was, it was generally condemned, as well by the Arians as others; and after ſeveral Councils called he was depoſed for his Hereſie. The firſt time we find him condemned, was by the Arian Party in a ſecond Council at Antioch, as appears by the profeſſion of Faith drawn up by them, extant in Athanaſius and Socrates. There they anathematize expreſly the Diſciples of Marcellus and Photinus, for denying the Pre-exiſtence and Deity of Chriſt. But by Chriſt, they underſtood, The Perſon born of the Virgin, who was the Son of God; but they did not deny the Pre-exiſtence of the Λόγος, and never dream'd that any could think that Chriſt was to be called the Λόγος, from his Office of Preaching, as our modern Unitarians aſſert. But Photinus his Opinion was, That the Λόγος was before all Ages, but not Chriſt, or the Son of God, which divine Word was partly internal, and ſo it was ever with God, and partly external, when it was communicated to the Perſon of Chriſt, whereby he became the Son of God. But the Arians there declare their Belief, That Chriſt was the living Word, and Son of God before all Worlds, and by whom he made all things. The next time he is ſaid to be condemned, was in that which is called the Council at Sardica, but was the Council of the Eaſtern Biſhops after their parting from the Weſtern. This is mention'd by Epiphanius and Sulpitius Severus, the latter ſaith, he differ'd from Sabellius only in the point of Union, i. e. becauſe Sabellius made the Perſons to be merely Denominations, which was then called the Hereſie of the Unionitæ; and therefore Photinus muſt aſſert an Hypoſtaſis to the Λόγος, or elſe he did not at all differ from Sabellius. And it appears by Epiphanius, that Photinus did diſtinguiſh between Chriſt and the Word. In the Beginning was the Word, ſaid he, but not the Son, which title was promiſed and foretold, but did not belong to Chriſt till he was born of the Holy Ghoſt and Mary, ſo he expreſſes it. Herein, ſaith Epiphanius, he follow'd Paulus Samoſatenus, but exceeded him in his Inventions. In anſwer to him, he ſaith, that St. John's Words are not, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was in God, but the Word was with God, and the Word was God. Little did either ſide imagine that this was to be underſtood of the beginning of the Goſpel, as our modern Photinians would make us believe they think; but Photinus himſelf was a Perſon of too much Sagacity to take up with ſuch an abſurd and inſipid Senſe. I paſs over the freſh condemnations of Photinus in the Councils at Milan and Rome, becauſe his Opinion is not to be learnt from them; and come to that at Sirmium, where it is more particularly ſet forth, as well as condemned. But here we muſt diſtinguiſh the two Councils at Sirmium; in the former, he was condemned, but the People would not part with him; but in the ſecond, he was not only condemned, but effectually depoſed, the Emperor Conſtantius a profeſſed Arian, forcing him to withdraw: But it was upon his own Appeal to the Emperor againſt the Judgment of the Council, who appointed Judges Delegates to hear this Cauſe; and Baſilius Ancyranus was the manager of the debate with him, wherein he is ſaid to have been ſo much too hard for Photinus, that the Emperor himſelf order'd his Baniſhment. And I can find nothing of his return; but our Unitarians have found out (but they do not tell us where) That the People recall'd him, and ſo he planted his Doctrine among them, that it overſpread, and was the Religion of the Illyrican Provinces, till the Papacy on one hand, and the Turk on the other, ſwallow'd up thoſe Provinces. This looks too like making Hiſtory to ſerve a turn, unleſs ſome good Proof were brought for it. But inſtead of Photinus his returning, and his Doctrine prevailing and continuing there, we find Valentinian calling a Council in Illyricum, and eſtabliſhing the Nicene Faith there: and a Council at Aquileia againſt the Arians, where the Biſhop of Sirmium was preſent, and declared againſt Arianiſm, and joyned with St. Ambroſe, who condemns Photinus for making Chriſt the Son of David, and not the Son of God. Paulinus ſaith in his Life, that he went on purpoſe to Sirmium to conſecrate an Orthodox Biſhop there; which he did, notwithſtanding the power of Juſtina the Empreſs, who favoured the Arians. St. Jerom in his Chronicon ſaith, that Photinus died in Galatia which was his own Country; ſo that there is no probability in what they affirm of Photinus his ſettling his Doctrince in thoſe parts, till the Papacy and the Turk ſwallow'd thoſe Provinces; for any one that looks into the Hiſtory of thoſe Parts may be ſoon ſatisfied, that not the Pope, nor the Turk, but the Huns under Attila, made the horrible Devaſtations not only at Sirmium, but in all the conſiderable places of that Country: So that if theſe Mens reaſon be no better than their Hiſtory, there is very little cauſe for any to be fond of their Writings.

But as though it were not enough to mention ſuch things once; in their anſwer to the late Archbiſhop's Sermons, they inlarge upon it. For he having juſtly rebuked them for the Novelty of their Interpretations, they, to avoid this, boaſt of the concurrence of the ancient Unitarians, and followers of Paulus and Photinus, who, they ſay, abounded every-where, and even poſſeſſed ſome whole Provinces. This paſſage I was not a little ſurprized at: Since Theodoret, who, I think, was ſomewhat more to be credited than Sandius, doth ſo expreſly ſay, That the Samoſatenians and Photinians were extinct in his time, in a place already mention'd. But upon ſearch I could find no other ground for it, but a paſſage or two in Sandius, who is none of the exacteſt Hiſtorians. In one place he ſaith from an obſcure Poliſh Chronicle (extant in no other Language but of that Country) that the Bulgarians when they firſt received Chriſtianity embraced Photinianiſm. And is not this very good Authority among us? From hence he takes it for granted, that they all continued Photinians to the time of Pope Nicolas, who converted them. But all this is grounded on a ridiculous miſtake in Platina, who in the Life of Nicolas ſaith, That the Pope confirmed them in the Faith, pulſo Photino; whereas it ſhould be pulſo Photio; for Photius at that time was Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and as appears by his firſt Epiſtle, aſſumed their Converſion to himſelf; and inſiſted upon the right of Juriſdiction over that Country. Sandius refers to Blondus, who ſaith no ſuch thing, but only that the Bulgarians were converted before, which is true; and the Greek Hiſtorians, as Joh. Curopalates, Zonaras and others, give a particular Account of it; but not a word of Photinianiſm in it. So that the Archbiſhop had very great reaſon to charge their Interpretation with Novelty; and that not only becauſe the Photinians had no ſuch Provinces as they boaſt of; but that neither Paulus Samoſatenus, nor Photinus, nor any of their followers, that we can find, did ever interpret the beginning of St. John, as they do; i. e. Of the New Creation and not of the Old; and ſo, as the Word had no Pre-exiſtence before he was born of the Virgin. I do not confine them to the Niceniſts, as they call them; but let them produce any one among the Samoſatenians, or Photinians, who ſo underſtood St. John. And therein Sandius was in the right (which ought to be allow'd him, for he is not often ſo) when he ſaith, That no Chriſtian Interpreter before Socinus ever held ſuch a ſenſe of the Word as he did; and therefore his followers, he ſaith, ought to be called Socinians only, and not Ebionites, Samoſatenians, or Photinians.

But to return to Photinus his Opinion. It is obſervable, what Socrates ſaith, concerning his being depoſed at Sirmium, viz. That what was done in that matter was univerſally approved, not only then, but afterwards. So that here we have the general Conſent of the Chriſtian World, in that divided time, againſt the Photinian Doctrine. And yet it was not near ſo unreaſonable as our Unitarians; for Photinus aſſerted the Pre-exiſtence of the Λόγος and its inhabiting in Chriſt from his Conception; wherein he differ'd from Paulus Samoſatenus who aſſerted it to have been upon the Merit of his Vertue. In the Anathema's of the Council of Sirmium againſt Photinus, one is againſt any one that aſſerts that there is one God, but denies Chriſt to have been the Son of God before all Worlds, and that the World was made by him in obedience to the Will of the Father. Others againſt him that aſſerts that there was a Dilatation of the Divine Subſtance to make him the Son of God, who was a Man born of the Virgin Mary; this appears from Anath. 6, 7, 9. put together. Which is beſt explained by Hilary himſelf in another place, where he mentions this as the Photinian Doctrine, That God the Word did extend himſelf ſo far, as to inhabit the perſon born of the Virgin. This he calls a ſubtle and dangerous Doctrine. And therein he ſaith Photinus differ'd from Sabellius; that the latter denied any difference between Father and Son, but only in Names; but Photinus held a real difference, but not before the Nativity of Chriſt; then he ſaid, The divine Word inhabiting in Chriſt made him to be the real Son of God.

The only doubt is, whether Photinus held, the Word to have had a diſtinct Hypoſtaſis before or not. Marius Mercator, an Author of good credit, who lived in St. Auguſtin's time (and to whom an Epiſtle of his is extant in the new Edition of his Works) gives a very particular account of the Opinion of Photinus with relation to the Neſtorian Controverſie, in which he was very well verſed. In an Epiſtle written by him on purpoſe, he ſhews that Neſtorius agreed with Photinus in aſſerting, That the Word had a Pre-exiſtence; and that the name of Son of God did not belong to the Word, but to Chriſt after the inhabitation of the Word. But he there ſeems to think, that Photinus did not hold the Word to have had a real Hypoſtaſis before the Birth of Chriſt: but when he comes after to compare their Opinions more exactly, he then affirms, that Photinus and Neſtorius were agreed, and that he did not deny the Word to be Conſubſtantial with God; but that he was not the Son of God till Chriſt was born in whom he dwelt. By which we ſee how little reaſon our Unitarians have to boaſt of Photinus as their Predeceſſor.

As to the boaſt of the firſt Unitarians at Rome, that theirs was the general Doctrine, before the time of Victor; it is ſo fully confuted by the ancient Writer in Euſebius, who mentions it, from the Scriptures and the firſt Chriſtian

ſtian Writers, named by him, that it doth not deſerve to be taken notice of; eſpecially ſince he makes it appear, that it was not heard of among them at Rome, till it was firſt broached there by Theodotus, as not only he, but Tertullian affirms; as I have already obſerved.

Thus I have clearly proved, that the Doctrine of the Trinity, was ſo far from being embraced only on the account of force and fear, that I have ſhewed there was in the firſt Ages of the Chriſtian Church, a free and general Conſent in it, even when they were under Perſecution; and after the Arian Controverſie broke out, yet thoſe who denied the Pre-exiſtence, and Co-eternity of the Son of God were univerſally condemned; even the Arian Party concurring in the Synods mention'd by Hilary. But our Unitarians are ſuch great Pretenders to Reaſon, that this Argument from the Authority of the whole Chriſtian Church, ſignifies little or nothing to them.

Therefore they would conclude ſtill that they have the better of us in point of Reaſon, becauſe they tell us, that they have clear and diſtinct Perceptions, that what we call Myſteries of Faith, are Contradictions, Impoſſibilities, and pure Nonſenſe; and that they do not reject them, becauſe they do not comprehend them, but becauſe they do comprehend them to be ſo.

This is a very bold Charge, and not very becoming the Modeſty and Decency of ſuch, who know at the ſame time that they oppoſe the Religion publickly eſtabliſhed, and in ſuch things which we look on as ſome of the principal Articles of the Chriſtian Faith.

CHAP. V.

Of their Charge of Contradiction in the Doctrine of the TRINITY.

BUT I ſhall not take any Advantages from thence, but immediately proceed to the next thing I undertook in this Diſcourſe, viz. To conſider what Grounds they have for ſuch a Charge as this, of Contradiction and Impoſſibility. In my Sermon which gave occaſion to theſe Expreſſions (as is before intimated) I had undertaken to prove, that conſidering the infinite Perfections of the Divine Nature, which are ſo far above our reach, God may juſtly oblige us to believe thoſe things concerning himſelf, which we are not able to comprehend; and I inſtanced in ſome Eſſential Attributes of God, as his Eternity, Omniſcience, Spirituality, &c. And therefore, if there be ſuch Divine Perfections, which we have all the Reaſon to believe, but no Faculties ſufficient to comprehend, there can be no ground from Reaſon to reject ſuch a Doctrine which God hath revealed, becauſe the manner of it may be incomprehenſible by us. And what anſwer do they give to this?

Anſwer to the Serm. about the Trinity, p. 4, 5, 8.

They do not deny it in general, that God may oblige us to believe things above our Comprehenſion; but he never obliges us to believe Contradictions, and that they charge the Doctrine of the Trinity with; and for this they only refer me to their Books, where they ſay it is made out. But I muſt ſay, that I have read and conſider'd thoſe Tracts, and am very far from being convinced that there is any ſuch Contradiction in this Doctrine, as it is generally received in the Chriſtian Church; or as it is explained in the Athanaſian Creed. And I ſhall ſhew the unreaſonableneſs of this Charge from theſe things.

1. That there is a Difference between a Contradiction in Numbers, and in the Nature of things.

2. That it is no Contradiction to aſſert three Perſons in One common Nature.

3. That it is no Contradiction to ſay that there are three diſtinct Perſons in the Trinity, and not three Gods. If I can make out theſe things, I hope I may abate ſomething of that ſtrange and unreaſonable confidence, wherewith theſe Men charge the Doctrine of the Trinity with Contradictions.

1. I begin with the firſt of them; and I ſhall draw up the Charge in their own words. In one of their late Books they have theſe Words.

Theirs, they ſay, is an Accountable and Reaſonable Faith, but that of the Trinitarians is abſurd and contrary both to Reaſon and it ſelf, and therefore not only falſe but impoſſible. But wherein lies this Impoſſibility? That they ſoon tell us. Becauſe we affirm that there are three Perſons, who are ſeverally and each of them true God, and yet there is but one true God. Now, ſay they, this is an Error in counting or numbring, which when ſtood in is of all others the moſt brutal and inexcuſable; and not to diſcern it is not to be a Man. What muſt theſe Men think the Chriſtian Church hath been made up of all this while? What? were there no Men among them but the Unitarians? None that had common ſenſe, and could tell the difference between One and Three? But this is too choice a Notion to be delivered but once; we have it over and over from them. In another place they ſay, We cannot be miſtaken in the Notion of One and Three; we are moſt certain that One is not Three, and Three are not One. This it is to be Men! but the whole Chriſtian World beſides are in Brutal and Inexcuſable Errors about One and Three. This is not enough, for they love to charge home; for one of their terrible Objections againſt the Athanaſian Creed, is, That here is an Arithmetical as well as Grammatical Contradiction. For in ſaying God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt, yet not three Gods but one God; a Man firſt diſtinctly numbers three Gods, and then in ſumming them up, brutiſhly ſays, not three Gods but one God. Brutiſhly ſtill! Have the Brutes and Trinitarians learnt Arithmetick together? Methinks ſuch Expreſſions do not become ſuch whom the Chriſtian Church hath ſo long ſince condemned for Hereſies. But it may be with the ſame Civility they will ſay, It was brutiſhly done of them. But can theſe Men of Senſe and Reaſon think, that the Point in Controverſy ever was, whether in Numbers, One could be Three, or Three One? If they think ſo, I wonder they do not think of another thing, which is the begging all Trinitarians for Fools, becauſe they cannot count One, Two and Three, and an Unitarian Jury would certainly caſt them. One would think ſuch Writers had never gone beyond Shop-books; for they take it for granted, that all depends upon counting. But theſe terrible Charges were ſome of the moſt common and trite Objections of Infidels. St. Auguſtin mentions it as ſuch, when he ſaith, The Infidels ſometimes ask us, what do you call the Father? We anſwer God. What the Son? We anſwer God. What the Holy Ghoſt, we anſwer God. So that here the Infidels make the ſame Objection, and draw the very ſame Inference. Then, ſay they, the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt are three Gods. But what ſaith St. Auguſtin to this? Had he no more skill in Arithmetick than to ſay there are Three and yet but One? He ſaith plainly, that there are not three Gods. The Infidels are troubled becauſe they are not enlighten'd, their heart is ſhut up, becauſe they are without Faith. By which it is plain, he look'd on theſe as the proper Objections of Infidels, and not of Chriſtians. But may not Chriſtians have ſuch doubts in their minds? He doth not deny it; but then he ſaith, Where the true foundation of Faith is laid in the heart, which helps the Underſtanding, we are to embrace with it all that it can reach to; and where we can go no farther, we muſt believe without doubting; which is a wiſe reſolution of this matter. For there are ſome things revealed which we can entertain the notion of in our minds, as we do of any other matters, and yet there may be ſome things belonging to them which we cannot diſtinctly conceive. We believe God to have been from all Eternity, and that becauſe God hath revealed it; but here is ſomething we can conceive, viz. that he was ſo; and here is ſomething we cannot conceive, viz. How he was ſo. This Inſtance I had produced in my Sermon, to ſhew that we might be obliged to believe ſuch things concerning God, of which we cannot have a clear and diſtinct Notion; as that God was from all Eternity, although we cannot conceive in our minds how he could be from himſelf. Now what ſaith the Unitarian to this, who pretended to anſwer me? He ſaith, If God muſt be from himſelf, then an Eternal God is a Contradiction; for that implies that he was before he was, and ſo charges me with eſpouſing the cauſe of Atheiſts. I wiſh our Unitarians were as free from this Charge as I am. But this is malicious cavilling. For my deſign was only to ſhew, that we could have no diſtinct conception of ſomething which we are bound to believe. For upon all accounts we are bound to believe an Eternal God, and yet we cannot form a diſtinct and clear Idea of the manner of it. Whether being from himſelf be taken poſitively or negatively, the matter is not cleared; the one is abſurd, and the other unconceivable by us. But ſtill I ſay, it is a thing that we are bound to believe ſtedfaſtly, although it is above our comprehenſion. But inſtead of anſwering to this, he runs out into an Examination of one notion of Eternity; and, as he thinks, ſhews ſome Abſurdities in that, which are already anſwered. But that was not my meaning, but to ſhew that we could have no clear and diſtinct Notion of Eternity; and if his Arguments were good, they prove what I aimed at, at leaſt as to that part; and himſelf produces my own Words to ſhew, that there were ſuch difficulties every way which we could not maſter; and yet are bound to believe, that neceſſary Exiſtence is an inſeparable Attribute of God. So that here we have a clear inſtance of what St. Auguſtin ſaith, That we may believe ſomething upon full Conviction, as that God is eternal, and yet there may remain ſomething which we cannot reach to by our underſtanding, viz. the manner how Eternity is to be conceived by us; which goes a great way towards clearing the point of the Trinity, notwithſtanding the Difficulty in our conceiving the manner how Three ſhould be One, and One Three.

Anſw. to Serm. p. 5.

A fundamento fidei non recedamus, ut ad culmen Perfectionis veniamus. Deus eſt Pater, Deus eſt Filius, Deus eſt Spiritus Sanctus, & tamen Pater non eſt qui Filius; nec Filius eſt qui Pater, nec Spiritus Sanctus, Patris & Filii Spiritus, Pater eſt aut Filius. Ibid.

Trinitas unus Deus, Trinitas una Æternitas, una Poteſtas, una Majeſtas, tres Perſonæ ſed non tres Dii.

But St. Auguſtin doth not give it over ſo; Let us keep ſtedfaſt, ſaith he, to the Foundation of our Faith, that we may arrive to the top of Perfection; the Father is God, the Son is God, the Holy Ghoſt is God; the Father is not the Son, nor the Son the Father, nor the Holy Ghoſt either Father or Son. And he goes on, The Trinity is one God, one Eternity, one Power, one Majeſty, Three Perſons and one God. So it is in Eraſmus his Edition; but the late Editors ſay, that the word Perſonæ was not in their Manuſcript. And it is not material in this place, ſince elſewhere he approves the uſe of the word Perſons, as the fitteſt to expreſs our meaning in this Caſe. For ſince ſome Word muſt be agreed upon to declare our Senſe by, he ſaith, thoſe who underſtood the Propriety of the Latin Tongue, could not pitch upon any more proper than that, to ſignifie that they did not mean three diſtinct Eſſen- ces, but the ſame Eſſence with a different Hypoſtaſis, founded in the relation of one to the other; as Father and Son have the ſame Divine Eſſence, but the Relations being ſo different that one cannot be confounded with the other, that which reſults from the Relation being joined with the Eſſence, was it which was called a Perſon.

Non audemus dicere unam Eſſentiam tres Subſtantias, ſed unam Eſſentiam vel Subſtantiam, tres autem Perſonas, quemadmodum multi Latini iſta tractantes & digni auctoritate dixerunt, cum alium modum aptiorem non invenirent, quo enunciarent verbis, quod ſine verbis intelligebant. Aug. de Trinitat. l. 5. c. 8.

But ſaith St. Auguſtin, The Caviller will ask, If there be Three, what Three are they? He anſwers, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. But then he diſtinguiſhes between what they are in themſelves, and what they are to each other. The Father as to himſelf is God, but as to the Son he is Father; the Son as to himſelf is God, but as to the Father he is the Son. But how is it poſſible to underſtand this? Why, ſaith he, Take two Men, Father and Son; the one as to himſelf is a Man, but as to the Son a Father; the Son as to himſelf is a Man, but as to the Father he is a Son: but theſe two have the ſame common Nature.

Nunc mihi calumniator reſpondeat, quid ergo tres? ecce inquit tres dixiſti, ſed quid tres exprime? Immo tu numera. Nam ego compleo tres cum dico, Pater & Filius & Spiritus Sanctus. Id. ubi ſupra. Id enim quod Pater ad ſe eſt, Deus eſt, quod ad Filium eſt, Pater eſt: quod Filius ad ſeipſum eſt, Deus eſt: quod ad Patrem eſt, Filius eſt.

But, ſaith he, Will it not hence follow, that as theſe are two Men, ſo the Father and Son in the Divine Eſſence muſt be two Gods? No; there lies the Difference between the Humane and Divine Nature, that one cannot be multiplied and divided as the other is.

Sed non quomodo illi duo homines ſunt ſic iſti duo Dii. Quare hoc non eſt ita ibi? Quia illud aliud, hoc autem aliud eſt, quia illa Divinitas eſt, hæc humanitas.

And therein lies the true Solution of the Difficulty, as will appear afterwards. When you begin to count, ſaith he, you go on, One, Two and Three. But when you have reckon'd them what is it you have been counting? The Father is the Father, the Son the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt the Holy Ghoſt. What are theſe Three? Are they not three Gods? No; Are they not three Almighties? No: They are capable of Number as to their Relation to each other; but not as to their Eſſence which is but One.

Ubi cogitare cœperis, incipis numerare; ubi numeraveris, quid numeraveris non potes reſpondere. Pater, Pater eſt; Filius, Filius; Spiritus Sanctus, Spiritus Sanctus eſt. Quid ſunt iſti tres? Non tres Dii? Non. Non tres omnipotentes? Non. ſed unus omnipotens. Hoc ſolo numerum inſinuant, quod ad invicem ſunt non quod ad ſe ſunt.

The ſubſtance of the Anſwer lies here: The Divine Eſſence is that alone which makes God, that can be but One, and therefore there can be no more Gods than one. But becauſe the ſame Scripture, which aſſures us of the Unity of the Divine Eſſence, doth likewiſe join the Son and Holy Ghoſt in the ſame Attributes, Operations, and Worſhip; therefore as to the mutual Relations, we may reckon Three, but as to the Divine Eſſence, that can be no more than One.

Boethius was a great Man in all reſpects, for his Quality, as well as for his Skill in Philoſophy and Chriſtianity; and he wrote a ſhort but learned Diſcourſe to clear this matter. The Catholick Doctrine of the Trinity, ſaith he, is this; the Father is God, the Son God, and the Holy Ghoſt God; but they are not three Gods, but one God. And yet (which our Unitarians may wonder at) this very Man hath written a learned Book of Arithmetick. But how doth he make this out? How is it poſſible for Three to be but One? Firſt, he ſhews, "That there can be but one Divine Eſſence; for to make more than One muſt ſuppoſe a Diverſity. Principium enim Pluralitatis Alteritas eſt. If you make a real difference in Nature as the Arians did, then there muſt be as many Gods as there are different Natures. Among Men there are different Individuals of the ſame kind; but, ſaith he, it is the diverſity of Accidents which makes it; and if you can abſtract from all other Accidents, yet they muſt have a different Place, for two Bodies cannot be in the ſame place. The Divine Eſſence is ſimple and immaterial, and is what it is of it ſelf; but other things are what they are made, and conſiſt of Parts, and therefore may be divided. Now

Boëth. oper. p. 1121

“ that which is of it ſelf can be but One, and therefore cannot be numbred. And one God cannot differ from another, either by Accidents or ſubſtantial Differences. But, ſaith he, there is a twofold Number, one by which we reckon, and another in the things reckoned. And the repeating of Units in the former makes a Plurality, but not in the latter. It may be ſaid, that this holds where there are only different Names for the ſame thing; but here is a real Diſtinction of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. But then he ſhews, “ That the difference of Relation can make no Alteration in the Eſſence; and where there is no diverſity, there can be but one Eſſence, although the different Relation may make three Perſons. This is the ſubſtance of what he ſaith concerning this Difficulty; which, as he ſuggeſts, ariſes from our Imaginations, which are ſo filled with the Diviſion and Multiplicity of compound and material things, that it is a hard matter for them ſo to recollect themſelves, as to conſider the firſt Principles and Grounds of Unity and Diverſity. But if our Unitarians have not throughly conſidered thoſe foundations, they muſt, as they ſay to one of their Adverſaries, argue like Novices in theſe queſtions. For theſe are ſome of the moſt neceſſary Speculations for underſtanding theſe matters; as, What that Unity is which belongs to a perfect Being? What Diverſity is required to multiply an infinite Eſſence, which hath Unity in its own Nature? Whether it be therefore poſſible, that there ſhould be more divine Eſſenees than one, ſince the ſame eſſential Attributes muſt be, where-ever there is the divine Eſſence? Whether there can be more Individuals, where there is no Diſſimilitude, and can be no Diviſion or Separation? Whether a ſpecifick Divine Nature be not inconſiſtent with the abſolute Perfection, and neceſſary Exiſtence which belongs to it? Whether the Divine Nature can be individually the ſame, and yet there be ſeveral individual Eſſences? Theſe and a great many other Queſtions it will be neceſſary for them to reſolve, before they can ſo peremptorily pronounce that the Doctrine of the Trinity doth imply a Contradiction on the account of the Numbers of Three and One. And ſo I come to the ſecond Particular.

Numerus enim duplex eſt, unus quidem, quo numeramus, alter verò qui in rebus numerabilibus conſtat; ergo in Numero quo numeramus, repetitio unitatum facit Pluralitatem; in rerum vero numero non facit PluralitatemUnitatum repetitio.

Ita igitur ſubſtantia continet Unitatem, relatio verò multiplicat Trinitatem. Nam idem Pater qui Filius non eſt; nec idem uterque qui Spiritus Sanctus. Idem tamen Deus eſt, Pater, Filius & Spiritus Sanctus.

CHAP. VI.

No Contradiction for three Perſons to be in one common Nature.

II. THat it is no contradiction to aſſert three Perſons in one common Nature. I ſhall endeavour to make theſe matters as clear as I can; for the greateſt difficulties in moſt mens minds have riſen from the want of clear and diſtinct apprehenſions of thoſe fundamental Notions, which are neceſſary in order to the right underſtanding of them.

1. We are to diſtinguiſh between the Being of a thing, and a thing in Being; or between Eſſence and Exiſtence.

2. Between the Unity of Nature or Eſſence, and of Exiſtence or Individuals of the ſame nature.

3. Between the Notion of Perſons in a finite and limited Nature, and in a Being uncapable of Diviſion and Separation.

1. Between the Being of a thing, and a thing in Being. By the former we mean the Nature and Eſſential Properties of a thing; whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from all other kinds of Beings. So God and his Creatures are eſſentially diſtinguiſhed from each other by ſuch Attributes which are incommunicable; and the Creatures of ſeveral kinds are diſtinguiſhed by their Natures or Eſſences; for the Eſſence of a Man and of a Brute are not barely diſtinguiſhed by Individuals, but by their kinds. And that which doth conſtitute a diſtinct kind is One and Indiviſible in it ſelf: for the Eſſence of a Man is but one and can be no more; for if there were more, the kind would be alter'd; ſo that there can be but one common Nature or Eſſence to all the Individuals of that kind. But becauſe theſe Individuals may be or may not be, therefore we muſt diſtinguiſh them as they are in actual Being, from what they are in their common Nature; for that continues the ſame, under all the Variety and Succeſſion of Individuals.

2. We muſt now diſtinguiſh the Unity which belongs to the common Nature, from that which belongs to the Individuals in actual Being. And the Unity of Eſſence is two-fold:

1. Where the Eſſence and Exiſtence are the ſame, i. e. where neceſſary Exiſtence doth belong to the Eſſence, as it is in God, and in him alone; it being an eſſential and incommunicable Perfection.

2. Where the Exiſtence is contingent, and belongs to the Will of another; and ſo it is in all Creatures, Intellectual and Material, whoſe actual Being is dependent on the Will of God.

The Unity of Exiſtence may be conſider'd two ways.

1. As to it ſelf, and ſo it is called Identity; or a thing continuing the ſame with it ſelf: the Foundation whereof in Man is that vital Principle which reſults from the Union of Soul and Body. For as long as that continues, notwithſtanding the great variety of changes in the material Parts, the Man continues entirely the ſame.

2. The Unity of Exiſtence as to Individuals may be conſider'd as to others, i. e. as every one ſtands divided from every other Individulal of the ſame kind; although they do all partake of the ſame common Eſſence. And the clearing of this is the main Point, on which the right Notion of theſe matters depends.

In order to that, we muſt conſider two things.

1. What that is, whereby we perceive the difference of Individuals?

2. What that is, which really makes two Beings of the ſame kind to be different from each other?

1. As to the reaſon of our Perception of the difference between Individuals of the ſame kind, it depends on theſe things.

1. Difference of outward Accidents, as Features, Age, Bulk, Mein, Speech, Habit and Place.

2. Difference of inward Qualities and Diſpoſitions; which we perceive by obſervation, and ariſe either from Conſtitution, or Education, or Company, or acquired Habits.

2. As to the true ground of the real Difference between the Exiſtence of one Individual from the reſt, it depends upon the ſeparate Exiſtence which it hath from all others. For that which gives it a Being diſtinct from all others and divided by Individual Properties, is the true ground of the difference between them, and that can be no other but the Will of God. And no conſequent Faculties or Acts of the Mind by Self Reflection, &c. can be the reaſon of this difference; becauſe the difference muſt be ſuppoſed antecedent to them. And nothing can be ſaid to make that, which muſt be ſuppoſed to be before it ſelf; for there muſt be a diſtinct Mind in Being from all other Minds, before it can reflect upon it ſelf.

But we are not yet come to the bottom of this matter. For as to Individual Perſons, there are theſe things ſtill to be conſider'd

1. Actual Exiſtence in it ſelf, which hath a Mode belonging to it, or elſe the humane Nature of Chriſt could not have been united with the divine, but it muſt have had the perſonal Subſiſtence, and conſequently there muſt have been two Perſons in Chriſt.

2. A ſeparate and divided Exiſtence form all others, which ariſes from the actual Exiſtence, but may be diſtinguiſhed from it; and ſo the humane Nature of Chriſt, although it had the Subſiſtence proper to Being, yet had not a ſeparate Exiſtence, after the Hypoſtatical Union.

3. The peculiar manner of Subſiſtence, which lies in ſuch Properties as are incommunicable to any other; and herein lies the proper reaſon of Perſonality. Which doth not conſiſt in a mere Intelligent Being. but in that peculiar manner of Subſiſtence, in that Being which can be in no other. For when the common Nature doth ſubſiſt in Individuals, there is not only a ſeparate Exiſtence, but ſomething ſo peculiar to it ſelf, that it can be communicated to no other. And this is that which makes the diſtinction of Perſons.

4. There is a common Nature which muſt be joyned with this manner of Subſiſtence to make a Perſon; otherwiſe it would be a mere Mode; but we never conceive a Perſon without the Eſſence in Conjunction with it. But here appears no manner of contradiction in aſſerting ſeveral Perſons in one and the ſame common Nature.

5. The Individuals of the ſame kind are ſaid to differ in number from each other, becauſe of their different Accidents and ſeparate Exiſtence. For ſo they are capable of being numbred. Whatever is compounded is capable of number as to its parts, and may be ſaid to be one by the Union of them; whatever is ſeparated from another is capable of number by diſtinction. But where there can be no Accidents nor Diviſion, there muſt be perfect Unity.

36 Niceph. Calliſt. l. 18. c. 47.

6. There muſt be a Separation in Nature, where-ever there is a difference of Individuals under the ſame kind. I do not ſay there muſt be an actual Separation and Diviſion as to place; but that there is and muſt be ſo in Nature, where one common Nature ſubſiſts in ſeveral Individuals. For all Individuals muſt divide the Species, and the common Nature unites them. And this Philoponus underſtood very well, and therefore he never denied ſuch a Diviſion and Separation in the divine Perſons, as is implied in diſtinct Individuals; which is the laſt thing to be conſider'd here.

3. We are now to enquire how far theſe things will hold as to the Perſons in the Trinity, and whether it be a Contradiction to aſſert three Perſons in the Godhead and but one God. We are very far from diſputing the Unity of the divine Eſſence, which we aſſert to be ſo perfect and indiviſible, as not to be capable of ſuch a difference of Perſons as is among Men. Becauſe there can be no difference of Accidents, or Place, or Qualities in the divine Nature; and there can be no ſeparate Exiſtence, becauſe the Eſſence and Exiſtence are the ſame in God; and if neceſſary Exiſtence be an inſeparable Attribute of the divine Eſſence, it is impoſſible there ſhould be any ſeparate Exiſtence; for what always was and muſt be, can have no other Exiſtence than what is implied in the very Eſſence. But will not this overthrow the diſtinction of Perſons, and run us into Sabellianiſm? By no means. For our Unitarians grant, That the Noetians and Sabellians held, that there is but one divine Subſtance, Eſſence or Nature, and but one Perſon. And how can thoſe who hold three Perſons be Sabellians? Yes, ſay they, the Sabellians held three relative Perſons. But did they mean three diſtinct Subſiſtences, or only one Subſiſtence ſuſtaining the Names, or Appearances, or Manifeſtations of three Perſons? The latter they cannot deny to have been the true ſenſe of the Sabellians. But ſay they, Theſe are three Perſons in a claſſical critical Senſe. We meddle not at preſent with the Diſpute which Valla hath againſt Boethius about the proper Latin Senſe of a Perſon (and Petavius ſaith Valla's Objections are mere Jeſts and Trifles) but our Senſe of a Perſon is plain, that it ſignifies the Eſſence with a particular manner of Subſiſtence, which the Greek Fathers called an Hypoſtaſis, taking it for that incommunicable Property which makes a Perſon.

Petav. de Trinit. l. 4. c. 4.

But ſay our Unitarians, a Perſon is an intelligent Being, and therefore three Perſons muſt be three intelligent Beings. I anſwer, that this may be taken two ways. 1. That there is no Perſon where there is no intelligent Nature to make it a Perſon, and ſo we grant it. 2. That a Perſon implies an intelligent Being, ſeparate and divided from other Individuals of the ſame kind, as it is among Men: and ſo we deny it as to the Perſons of the Trinity, becauſe the Divine Eſſence is not capable of ſuch Diviſion and Separation as the humane Nature is.

Defence of the Hiſtory of the Unit. p. 5.

But ſay they again, The Fathers did hold a ſpecifical Divine Nature, and the Perſons to be as ſo many Individuals. This they repeat very often in their late Books; and after all, refer us to Curcellæus for undeniable Proofs of it. Let us for the preſent ſuppoſe it, then I hope the Fathers are freed from holding Contradictions in the Doctrine of the Trinity; for what Contradiction can it be, to hold three individual Perſons in the Godhead, and one common Nature, more than it is to hold that there are three humane Perſons in One and the ſame common Nature of Man? Will they make this a Contradiction too? But ſome have ſo uſed themſelves to the Language of Jargon, Nonſenſe, Contradiction, Impoſſibility, that it comes from them, as ſome Men ſwear, when they do not know it. But I am not willing to go off with this Anſwer; For I do take the Fathers to have been Men of two great Senſe and Capacity to have maintained ſuch an abſurd Opinion, as that of a Specifick Nature in God. For either it is a mere Logical Notion, an Act of the Mind, without any real Exiſtence belonging to it as ſuch, which is contrary to the very Notion of God, which implies a neceſſary Exiſtence; or it muſt imply a Divine Nature, which is neither Father, Son, nor Holy Ghoſt. Which is ſo repugnant to the Doctrine of the Fathers, that no one that is any ways converſant in their Writings on this Argument, can imagine they ſhould hold ſuch an Opinion. And I am ſo far from being convinced by Curcellæus his undeniable Proofs, that I think it no hard matter to bring undeniable Proofs that he hath miſtaken their meaning.

Of which I ſhall give an Account in this Place, becauſe I fear his Authority hath had too much ſway with ſome, as to this matter. I ſhall not inſiſt upon his groſs miſtake in the very entrance of that Diſcourſe, where he ſaith, That the Biſhops of Gaul and Germany diſliked the Homoouſion, and gave three Reaſons againſt it; whereas Hilary ſpeaks of the Eaſtern Biſhops whom he goes about to vindicate to the Weſtern Biſhops, who were offended with them for that reaſon; as any one that reads Hilary de Synodis may ſee. But I come to the main Point. His great Argument is from the uſe of the Word Ὁμοούσιος which may extend to Individuals of the ſame kind. Who denies it? But the Queſtion is whether the Fathers uſed it in that ſenſe, ſo as to imply a difference of Individuals in the ſame common Eſſence? There were two things aimed at by them in their Diſpute with the Arians.

(1.) To ſhew, That the Son was of the ſame Subſtance with the Father, which they denied, and made him of an inferior created Subſtance of another kind. Now the Fathers thought this term very proper to expreſs their Senſe againſt them. But then this Word being capable of a larger Senſe than they intended, they took care, (2.) To aſſert a perfect Unity and Indiviſibility of the Divine Eſſence. For the Arians were very ready to charge them with one of theſe two things. (1.) That they muſt fall into Sabellianiſm, if they held a perfect Unity of Eſſence: or (2.) When they clear'd themſelves of this, that they muſt hold Three Gods; and both theſe they conſtantly denied. To make this clear, I ſhall produce the Teſtimonies of ſome of the chief both of the Greek and Latin Fathers, and anſwer Curcellæus his Objections.

Athanaſius takes notice of both theſe Charges upon their Doctrine of the Trinity: As to Sabellianiſm he declared, That he abhorred it equally with Arianiſm; and he ſaith, it lay in making Father and Son to be only different Names of the ſame Perſon; and ſo they aſſerted but one Perſon in the Godhead. As to the other Charge of Polytheiſm, he obſerves, That in the Scripture Language, all Mankind was reckon'd as one, becauſe they have the ſame Eſſence; and if it be ſo, as to Men, who have ſuch a difference of Features, of Strength, of Underſtanding, of Language, how much more may God be ſaid to be One, in whom is an undivided Dignity, Power, Counſel and Operation? Doth this prove ſuch a difference, as is among Individuals of the ſame kind among Men? No Man doth more frequently aſſert the indiviſible Unity of the Divine Nature than he. He expreſly denies ſuch divided Hypoſtaſes, as are among Men; and ſaith, That in the Trinity there is a Conjunction without Confuſion, and a Diſtinction without Diviſion; that in the Trinity there is ſo perfect an Union, and that it is ſo undivided and united in it ſelf; that where-ever the Father is, there is the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, and ſo the reſt, becauſe there is but one Godhead, and one God who is over all, and through all, and in all. But ſaith Curcellæus, The contrary rather follows from this περιχώρησις or mutual Inexiſtence, for that could not be without diſtinct Subſtance, as in Water and Wine. But this is a very groſs miſtake of the Fathers Notion, who did not underſtand by it a Local In-exiſtence as of bodies, but ſuch an indiviſible Unity that one cannot be without the other, as even Petavius hath made it appear from Athanaſius and others.

Athanaſius upon all Occaſions aſſerts the Unity of the Divine Nature to be perfect and indiviſible. God, ſaith he, is the Father of his Son ἀμερίστως, without any Diviſion of the Subſtance. And in other places, That the Subſtance of the Father and Son admit of no Diviſion, and he affirms this to have been the ſenſe of the Council of Nice; ſo that the ὁμοούσιος muſt be underſtood of the ſame indiviſible Subſtance. Curcellæus anſwers, That Athanaſius by this indiviſible Unity meant only a cloſe and indiſſoluble Union. But he excluded any kind of Diviſion, and that of a Specifick Nature into ſeveral individuals as a real Diviſion in Nature; for no Man who-ever treated of thoſe matters denied, that a Specifick Nature was divided, when there were ſeveral Individuals under it. But what is it which makes the Union indiſſoluble? Is it the Unity of the Eſſence or not? If it be, is it the ſame individual Eſſence, or not? If the ſame individual Eſſence makes the inſeparable Union, what is it, which makes the difference of Individuals? If it be ſaid, The incommunicable Properties of the Perſons; I muſt ſtill ask how ſuch Properties in the ſame individual Eſſence, can make different Individuals? If it be ſaid to be the ſame Specifick Nature; then how comes that which is in it ſelf capable of Diviſion to make an indiſſoluble Union?

Athanaſ. de Synod. Arim. & Seleuc. p. 916, 920, 928.

But ſaith Curcellæus, Athanaſius makes Chriſt to be of the ſame Subſtance as Adam, and Seth, and Abraham, and Iſaac are ſaid to be Con-ſubſtantial with each other. And what follows? That the Father and Son are divided from each other, as they were? This is not poſſible to be his Senſe; conſidering what he ſaith of the Indiviſibility of the Divine Nature. And Athanaſius himſelf hath given ſufficient warning againſt ſuch a Miſ-conſtruction of his Words; and ſtill urges that our Conceptions ought to be ſuitable to the Divine Nature, not taken from what we ſee among Men. And it is obſervable, that when Paulus Samoſatenus had urged this as the beſt Argument againſt the term Ὁμοούσιος, That it made ſuch a difference of Subſtances as is among Men; for that Reaſon ſaith Athanaſius, his Judges were content to let it alone, for the Son of God is not in ſuch a ſenſe Con-ſubſtantial; but afterwards the Nicene Fathers finding out the Art of Paulus, and the ſignificancy of the Word to diſcriminate the Arians, made uſe of it, and only thought it neceſſary to declare, that when it is applied to God, it is not to be underſtood, as among individual Men.

P. 919.

As to the Dialogues under Athanaſius his Name, on which Curcellæus inſiſts ſo much; it is now very well known that they belong not to him, but to Maximus; and by comparing them with other places in him, it may appear, that he intended no Specifick Nature in God.

Curcell. n. 84.
Maxim. Oper. T. II. p. 384. T. I. p. 413.

But ſaith Curcellæus, If the Fathers intended any more than a Specifick Nature, why did they not uſe Words which would expreſs it more fully, As Μονοούσιος and ταυτοούσιος? For that very Reaſon, which he mentions from Epiphanius, becauſe they would ſeem to approach too near to Sabellianiſm.

Curcell. Sect. 73.

St. Baſil was a great Man, (notwithſtanding the flout of our Unitarians,) and apply'd his thoughts to this matter, to clear the Doctrine of the Church from the Charge of Sabellianiſm and Tritheiſm. As to the former, he ſaith, in many places, That the Hereſie lay in making but one Perſon as well as one God, or one Subſtance with three ſeveral Names. As to the latter, no Man aſſerts the individual Unity of the Divine Eſſence in more ſignificant Words than he doth. For he uſes the ταυτότης and τὸ τῆς οὐσίας ταυτὸν, as St. Cyril of Alexandria doth likewiſe, and yet both theſe are produced by Curcellæus for a Specifick Nature.

But ſaith Curcellæus, St. Baſil in his Epiſtle to Gregory Nyſſen doth aſſert the difference between Subſtance and Hypoſtaſis to conſiſt in this, That the one is taken for common Nature, and the other for individual, and ſo making three Hypoſtaſes, he muſt make three Individuals, and one common or Specifick Nature. I anſwer, That it is plain by the deſign of that Epiſtle, that by three Hypoſtaſes he could not mean three Individual Eſſences. For he ſaith, The deſign of his writing it, was to clear the difference between Subſtance and Hypoſtaſis. For ſaith he, From the want of this ſome aſſert but one Hypoſtaſis, as well as one Eſſence; and others, becauſe there are three Hypoſtaſes, ſuppoſe there are three diſtinct Eſſences. For both went upon the ſame Ground, that Hypoſtaſis and Eſſence were the ſame. Therefore ſaith he, thoſe who held three Hypoſtaſes, did make τὴν τῶν οὐσιῶν διαίρεσιν a Diviſion of Subſtances. From whence it follows, that St. Baſil did look upon the Notion of three diſtinct Subſtances as a miſtake: I ſay diſtinct Subſtances, as Individuals are diſtinct; for ſo the firſt Principles of Phiſoſophy do own that Individuals make a Διαίρεσις, or Diviſion of the Species into ſeveral and diſtinct Individuals.

Curcell. n. 74.

But doth not St. Baſil go about to explain his Notion by the common Nature of Man, and the ſeveral Individuals under it; and what can this ſignifie to his purpoſe, unleſs he allows the ſame in the Godhead? I grant he doth ſo, but he ſaith, the Subſtance is that which is common to the whole kind; the Hypoſtaſis is that which properly diſtinguiſheth one Individual from another; which he calls the τὸ ἰδιάζον the peculiar incommunicable Property. Which he deſcribes by a Concourſe of diſtinguiſhing Characters in every Individual. But how doth he apply theſe things to the divine Nature? For therein lies the whole difficulty. Doth he own ſuch a Community of Nature, and Diſtinction of Individuals there? He firſt confeſſes the divine Nature to be incomprehenſible by us; but yet we may have ſome diſtinct Notions about theſe things. As for inſtance, In the Father we conceive ſomething common to him and to the Son; and that is the divine Eſſence; and the ſame as to the Holy Ghoſt. But there muſt be ſome proper Characters to diſtinguiſh theſe one from another; or elſe there will be nothing but confuſion: which is Sabellianiſm. Now the eſſential Attributes and divine Operations are common to them; and therefore theſe cannot diſtinguiſh them from each other. And thoſe are the peculiar Properties of each Perſon, as he ſhews at large.

But may not each Perſon have a diſtinct Eſſence belonging to him, as we ſee it is among Men?

Οὐ γὰρ ἔστιν ἐπινοῆσαι τομὴν, ἢ διαίρεσιν καθ' οὐδένα τρόπον, p. 810. B.

For this St. Baſil anſwers: (1.) He utterly denies any poſſible Diviſion in the divine Nature.

Cod. 234

And he never queſtion'd, but the diſtinction of Individuals under the ſame Species was a ſort of Diviſion, although there were no Separation. And the followers of Joh. Philoponus did hold an indiſſoluble Union between the three individual Eſſences in the divine Nature; but they held a diſtinction of peculiar Eſſences, beſides the common Nature, which they called μερικὰς οὐσίας καὶ ἰδικὰς θεότητας and ἰδικὰς φύσεις; as appears by Photius, who was very able to judge. And it appears by one of themſelves in Photius, that the Controverſie was, whether an Hypoſtaſis could be without an individual Eſſence belonging to it ſelf; or whether the peculiar Properties and Characters did make the Hypoſtaſis. But as to St. Baſil's Notion we are to obſerve: (2.) That he makes the divine Eſſence to be uncapable of Number, by reaſon of its perfect Unity. Here our Unitarians tell us, that when St. Baſil ſaith, That God is not one in number, but in nature, he means; as the Nature of Man is one, but there are many particular Men, as Peter, James and John, &c. ſo the Nature of God, or the common Divinity is one, but there are as truly more Gods in number, or more particular Gods, as there are more particular Men. But that this is a groſs miſtake or abuſe of St. Baſil's meaning, I ſhall make it plain from himſelf. For, they ſay, That he held, that as to this queſtion, How many Gods? it muſt be anſwer'd, Three Gods in number, or three perſonal Gods, and one in Nature, or divine Properties; whereas he is ſo far from giving ſuch an anſwer, that he abſolutely denies that there can be more Gods than one in that very place. He mentions it as an Objection, that ſince he ſaid, That the Father is God, the Son God, the Holy Ghoſt God; he muſt hold three Gods; to which he anſwers, We own but one God, not in Number, but in Nature: Then, ſay they, He held but one God in Nature and more in Number. That is ſo far from his meaning, that I hardly think any that read the paſſage in St. Baſil, could ſo wilfully pervert his meaning. For his intention was ſo far from aſſerting more Gods in Number, that it was to prove ſo perfect a Unity in God, that he was not capable of number, or of being more than one. For, ſaith he, That which is ſaid to be one in number, is not really and ſimply one, but is made up of many, which by compoſition become one; as we ſay, the World is one, which is made up of many things. But God is a ſimple uncompounded Being; and therefore cannot be ſaid to be one in number. But the World is not one by Nature, becauſe it is made up of ſo many things, but it is one by Number, as thoſe ſeveral parts make but one World. Is not this fair dealing with ſuch a Man as St. Baſil, to repreſent his Senſe quite otherwiſe than it is? As though he allow'd more Gods than one in Number? Number, ſaith he again, belongs to Quantity, and Quantity to Bodies, but what relation have theſe to God, but as he is the Maker of them? Number belongs to material and circumſcribed Beings; but, ſaith he, the moſt perfect Unity is to be conceived in the moſt ſimple and incomprehenſible Eſſence. Where it is obſervable, that he uſes thoſe Words which are allow'd to expreſs the moſt perfect and ſingular Unity. This Petavius himſelf confeſſeth, that they can never be underſtood of a ſpecifick Nature: and Curcellæus cannot deny, That μόνος being added to Εἷς doth reſtrain the Senſe more to a nume- rical Unity, as he calls it. How then is it poſſible to underſtand St. Baſil of more Gods than one in number? And in the very ſame Page he mentions the ταυτότης τῆς φύσεως, the Sameneſs of the divine nature, by which the ὁμοούσιον is better underſtood.

But Curcellæus will have no more than a ſpecifick Unity underſtood. Cur. n. 106. Before he ſaid, that ταυτοούσιος would have ſignified more, but now he finds it uſed, the caſe is alter'd: So that the Fathers could not mean any other than a ſpecifick Unity, let them uſe what Expreſſions they pleas'd. But theſe, I think, are plain enough to any one that will not ſhut his Eyes.

In another place St. Baſil makes the ſame objection, and gives the ſame anſwer. One God the Father, and one God the Son; how can this be, and yet not two Gods? Becauſe, ſaith he, the Son hath the very ſame Eſſence with the Father. Not two Eſſences divided out of one, as two Brothers, but as Father and Son, the Son ſubſiſting as from the Father, but in the ſame individual Baſil. T. I. p. 604. Eſſence: τὸ γὰρ τῆς οὐσίας ταυτόν.

But Curcellæus hath one fetch yet, viz. That St. Baſil denied God to be one Cur. n. 113. in Number, and made him to be one in Nature, becauſe he look'd on a ſpecifick Unity, or Unity of Nature, as more exact than numerical. St. Baſil look'd on the divine Nature as ſuch to have the moſt perfect Unity, becauſe of its Simplicity, and not in the leaſt ſpeaking of it as a ſpecifick Unity; but N. 105. Curcellæus himſelf calls this an Unity by a mere Fiction of the Mind; and can he imagine this to have been more accurate than a real Unity? Theſe are hard ſhifts in a deſperate cauſe.

After all, our Unitarians tell us, That St. Baſil doth againſt Eunomius al- T. II. p. 30. low a diſtinction in Number with reſpect to the Deity. But how? As to the Eſſence? By no means. For he aſſerts the perfect Unity thereof in the ſame place, even the Unity of the Subſtance. But as to the characteriſtical Properties of the Perſons, he allows of Number, and no farther. But ſay they, This is to make one God as to Eſſential Properties, and three as to Perſonal. How can that be, when he ſaith ſo often, there can be but one God, becauſe there can be but one divine Eſſence; and therefore thoſe Properties can only make diſtinct Hypoſtaſes, but not diſtinct Eſſences. And is this indeed the great Secret which this bold Man, as they call him, hath diſcover'd? I think thoſe are much more bold, (I will not ſay impudent) who upon ſuch ſlight grounds charge him with aſſerting more Gods than one in number. But Gregory Nyſſen, ſaith Curcellæus, ſpeaks more plainly in his Cur. n 106. Epiſtle to Ablabius; for ſaith he, To avoid the difficulty of making three Greg. Nyſſen. Tom. Gods as three Individuals among Men are three Men; he anſwers, that truly III. p. 17. they are not three Men, becauſe they have but one common Eſſence, which is exactly one, and indiviſible in it ſelf, however it be diſperſed in Individuals: the ſame, he ſaith, is to be underſtood of God. And this Petavius had char- Petav. de Trin. l. 4. c. 9. n. 2, 3. ged him with before, as appears by Curcellæus his Appendix.

This ſeems the hardeſt paſſage in Antiquity for this purpoſe; to which I hope to give a ſatisfactory Anſwer from Gregory Nyſſen himſelf.

1. It cannot be denied, that he aſſerts the Unity of Eſſence to be indiviſible in it ſelf, and to be the true ground of the Denomination of Individuals; as Peter hath the Name of a Man, not from his individual properties whereby he is diſtinguiſhed from James and John; but from that one indiviſible Eſſence which is common to them all, but yet receives no Addition or Diminution in any of them.

2. He grants a Diviſion of Hypoſtaſes among Men, notwithſtanding this Indiviſibility of one common Eſſence: For ſaith he, among Men, although the Eſſence remain one and the ſame in all, without any Diviſion, yet the ſeveral Hypoſtaſes are divided from each other, according to the individual properties ἀλλ᾽ ὁ μὲν ὑποςάσεων λόγος διὰ τὰς ἐνθεωρουμένας ἰδιότητας τ̃ διαμερισμὸν ἐπιδέχεται.

perties belonging to them. So that here is a double conſideration of the Eſſence: as in it ſelf, ſo it is one, and indiviſible; as it ſubſiſts in Individuals, and ſo it is actually divided according to the Subjects. For although the Eſſence of a Man be the ſame in it ſelf in Peter, James and John; yet taking it as in the Individuals, ſo the particular Eſſence in each of them is divided from the reſt. And ſo Philoponus took Hypoſtaſis for an Eſſence individuated by peculiar Properties; and therefore aſſerted, that where-ever there was an Hypoſtaſis, there muſt be a diſtinct Eſſence; and from hence he held the three Perſons to have three diſtinct Eſſences.

Niceph. Calliſt. hiſt. l. 18. c. 47.

3. We are now to conſider how far Gregory Nyſſen carried this, whether he thought it held equally as to the divine Hypoſtaſis; and that he did not, appears to me from theſe arguments:

1. He utterly denies any kind of Diviſion in the divine Nature; for in the concluſion of that Diſcourſe, he ſaith, it is not only ἀπαράλλακτος, (a word often uſed by the Greek Fathers on this occaſion, from whence Athanaſius againſt Macedonius inferr'd an Identity, and Cæſarius joins τὸ ταυτὸν τῆς οὐσίας καὶ τὸ ἀπαράλλακτον τῆς θεότητος; and ſo St. Baſil uſes it) but he adds another Word, which is ἀδιαίρετος, Indiviſible. Yes, as all Eſſences are indiviſible in themſelves, but they may be divided in their Subjects, as Gregory Nyſſen allows it to be in Men. I grant it, but then he owns a Diviſion of ſome kind, which he here abſolutely denies as to the divine Nature; for his words are, that it is ἀδιαίρετος διὰ πάσης ἐννοίας in any conſideration whatſoever. Then he muſt deſtroy the Hypoſtaſes. Not ſo neither, for he allows that there is a διαφορὰ as to the Hypoſtaſes however. For he propoſes the Objection himſelf, That by allowing no difference in the divine Nature, the Hypoſtaſes would be confounded. To which he anſwers, That he did not deny their difference, which was founded in the relation they had to one another, which he there explains; and that therein only conſiſts the difference of the Perſons. Which is a very conſiderable teſtimony, to ſhew that both Petavius and Curcellæus miſtook Gregory Nyſſen's meaning. But there are other arguments to prove it.

Ὅτι τὸ ἀπαράλλακτον τῆς φύσεως ὁμολογοῦντες τὴν κατὰ τὸ αἴτιον καὶ αἰτιατὸν διαφορὰν οὐκ ἀρνούμεθα, ἐν ᾧ μόνῳ διακρίνεσθαι τὸ ἕτερον τοῦ ἑτέρου καταλαμβάνομεν.

2. He aſſerts ſuch a difference between the divine and human Perſons, as is unanſwerable, viz the Unity of Operation. For, ſaith he, among Men, if ſeveral go about the ſame Work, yet every particular Perſon works by himſelf, and therefore they may well be called many, becauſe every one is circumſcribed; but in the divine Perſons he proves that it is quite otherwiſe, for they all concur in the Action towards us, as he there ſhews at large. Petavius was aware of this, and therefore he ſaith, he quitted it and returned to the other; whereas he only ſaith, If his Adverſaries be diſpleaſed with it, he thinks the other ſufficient. Which in ſhort is, that Eſſence in it ſelf is one and indiviſible, but among Men it is divided according to the Subjects; that the divine Nature is capable of no Diviſion at all, and therefore the difference of Hypoſtaſes muſt be from the different Relations and manner of Subſiſtence.

3. He expreſſes his meaning fully in another place. For in his Catechetical Oration, he ſaith, he looks on the Doctrine of the Trinity as a profound Myſtery, (which three individual Perſons in one ſpecifick Nature is far from.) But wherein lies it? Chiefly in this, That there ſhould be Number and no Number, different View and yet but one, a diſtinction of Hypoſtaſes, and yet no Diviſion in the Subjects. For ſo his words are, καὶ οὐ μεμερίσθαι τὸ ὑποκείμενον, which is contrary to what he ſaid of human Hypoſtaſes. Now what is the Subject in this caſe? According to Curcellæus his Notion, it muſt be an Individual. But ſince he aſſerts there can be no Diviſion in the Subjects, then he muſt overthrow any ſuch Individuals as are among Men. Theſe are the chief Teſtimonies out of the Greek Fathers, whoſe authority Curcellæus and others rely moſt upon as to this matter, which I have therefore more particularly examin'd.

But St. Jerom, ſaith Curcellæus, in his Epiſtle to Damaſus, thought three Hypoſtaſes implied three diſtinct Subſtances; and therefore when the Campenſes would have him own them, he refuſed it, and asked his Advice. Then it is plain St. Jerom would not own three diſtinct Subſtances, and ſo could not be of Curcellæus his mind. But ſaith he, St. Jerom meant by three Subſtances, three Gods different in kind, as the Arians did. But how doth that appear? Doth he not ſay the Arian Biſhop and the Campenſes put him upon it? But who was this Arian Biſhop, and theſe Campenſes? No other than the Meletian Party; for Meletius was brought in by the Arians, but he joined againſt them with St. Baſil and others, who aſſerted three Hypoſtaſes; and the Campenſes were his People who met without the Gates, as the Hiſtorians tell us. But it is evident by St. Jerom, that the Latin Church underſtood Hypoſtaſis to be the ſame then with Subſtance; and the reaſon why they would not allow three Hypoſtaſes, was, becauſe they would not aſſert three Subſtances. So that Curcellæus his Hypotheſis hath very little colour for it among the Latin Fathers; ſince St. Jerom there ſaith, it would be Sacrilege to hold three Subſtances; and he freely beſtows an Anathema upon any one that aſſerted more than one.

Cur. n. 48.

N. 107.

But Hilary, ſaith Curcellæus, owns a ſpecifick Unity; for in his Book de Synodis, he ſhews, That by one Subſtance they did not mean one individual Subſtance, but ſuch as was in Adam and Seth, that is of the ſame kind. No Man aſſerts the Unity and Indiſcrimination of the divine Subſtance more fully and frequently than he doth, and that without any Difference or Variation as to the Father and the Son. And although againſt the Arians he may uſe that for an Illuſtration of Adam and Seth; yet when he comes to explain himſelf, he declares it muſt be underſtood in a way agreeable to the divine Nature. And he denies any Diviſion of the Subſtance between Father and Son, but he aſſerts one and the ſame Subſtance to be in both; and although the Perſon of the Son remains diſtinct from the Perſon of the Father, yet he ſubſiſts in that Subſtance of which he was begotten, and nothing is taken off from the Subſtance of the Father, by his being begotten of it.

But doth he not ſay, That he hath a Legitimate and proper Subſtance of his own begotten Nature from God the Father? And what is this but to own two diſtinct Subſtances?

Hilar. de Synod. n. 18.

How can the Subſtance be diſtinct, if it be the very ſame, and the Son ſubſiſt in that Subſtance of which he was begotten? And that Hilary (beſides a multitude of paſſages to the ſame purpoſe in him) cannot be underſtood of two diſtinct Subſtances will appear by this Evidence.

The Arians in their Confeſſion of Faith before the Council of Nice ſet down among the ſeveral Hereſies which they condemned, that of Hieracas, who ſaid the Father and Son were like two Lamps ſhining out of one common Veſſel of Oil. Hilary was ſenſible that under this that Expreſſion was ſtruck at God of God, Light of Light, which the Church owned. His Anſwer is, Luminis Naturæ Unitas eſt, non ex connexione porrectio, i. e. they are not two divided Lights from one common Stock, but the ſame Light remaining after it was kindled that it was before; as appears by his Words, Light of Light, ſaith he, implies, That it gives to another that which it continues to have it ſelf. And Petavius ſaith, that the Opinion of Hieracas was, That the ſubſtance of the Father and Son differ'd numerically as one Lamp from another. And Hilary calls it an Error of human Underſtanding, which would judge of God, by what they find in one another.

Doth not St. Ambroſe ſay, as Curcellæus quotes him, That the Father and Son are not two Gods, becauſe all Men are ſaid to be of one Subſtance?

Ambroſ. de Fide l. 5. c. 3. ed. Nov.

But St. Ambroſe is directly againſt him. For he ſaith, The Arians objected, that if they made the Son true God, and Conſubſtantial with the Father, they muſt make two Gods; as there are two Men, or two Sheep of the ſame Eſſence; but a Man and a Sheep are not ſaid to be Men, or two Sheep. Which they ſaid to excuſe themſelves, becauſe they made the Son of a different kind and ſubſtance from the Father. And what Anſwer doth St. Ambroſe give to this?

1. He ſaith, Plurality according to the Scriptures rather falls on thoſe of different kinds; and therefore when they make them of ſeveral kinds, they muſt make ſeveral Gods.

2. That we who hold but One Subſtance, cannot make more Gods than One.

3. To his inſtance of Men, he anſwers, That although they are of the ſame Nature by Birth, yet they differ in Age, and Thought, and Work, and Place from one another; and where there is ſuch Diverſity, there cannot be Unity; but in God there is no difference of Nature, Will, or Operation; and therefore there can be but one God.

Cur. n. 114.

The laſt I ſhall mention is St. Auguſtine, whom Curcellæus produces to as little purpoſe; for although he doth mention the ſame inſtance of ſeveral Men being of the ſame kind; yet he ſpeaks ſo expreſly againſt a Specifick Unity in God; that he ſaith, The Conſequence muſt be, that the three Perſons muſt be three Gods; as three humane Perſons are three Men. And in another place, That the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, are One in the ſame individual Nature. And what ſaith Curcellæus to theſe places, for he was aware of them. To the latter he ſaith, That by Individual, he means Specifick. This is an extraordinary Anſwer indeed. But what Reaſon doth he give for it? Becauſe they are not divided in Place or Time, but they may have their proper Eſſences however.

Auguſt de Trinit l. 4. c. 21. l. 5. c. 3, 5, 8. l. 6. c. 1. De Agone Chriſt. c. 16. C. Maxim. l. 3. c. 10.

But where doth St. Auguſtin give any ſuch Account of it? He often ſpeaks upon this Subject; but always gives another Reaſon, viz. becauſe they are but one and the ſame Subſtance. The Three Perſons are but One God, becauſe they are of One Subſtance; and they have a perfect Unity, becauſe there is no Diverſity of Nature, or of Will. But it may be ſaid, That here he ſpeaks of a Diverſity of Nature. In the next Words he explains himſelf, that the Three Perſons are One God, propter ineffabilem conjunctionem Deitatis; but the Union of three Perſons in one Specifick Nature, is no ineffable Conjunction, it being one of the commoneſt things in the World; and in the ſame Chapter, propter Individuam Deitatem unus Deus eſt; & propter uniuſcujuſque Proprietatem tres Perſonæ ſunt. Here we find one Individual Nature; and no difference but in the peculiar Properties of the Perſons.

Cur. n. 114.

In the other place he is ſo expreſs againſt a ſpecifick Unity, that Curcellæus his beſt Anſwer is, That in that Chapter he is too intricate and obſcure, i. e. He durſt not to ſpeak his Mind.
